The public services of Maecenas, though important, were unobtrusive; and notwithstanding the part that he played in assisting to establish the empire, it is by his private pursuits, and more particularly by his reputation as a patron of literature, that he has been best known to posterity. His retirement was probably far from disagreeable to him, as it was accompanied with many circumstances calculated to recommend it to one of his turn of mind, naturally a votary of ease and pleasure. He had amassed an enormous fortune, which Tacitus (Ann. xiv. 53, 55) attributes to the liberality of Augustus. It has been sometimes insinuated that he grew rich by the proscriptions; and Pliny (H. N. xxxvii. 4), speaking of Maecenas's private seal, which bore the impression of a frog, represents it as having been an object of terror to the tax-payers. It by no means follows, however, that the money levied under his private seal was applied to his private purposes; and had he been inclined to misappropriate the taxes, we know that Caesar's own seal was at his unlimited disposal, and would have better covered his delinquencies.

Maecenas had purchased a tract of ground on the Esquiline hill, which had formerly served as a burial-place for the lower orders. (Hor. Sat. i. 8. 7.) Here he had planted a garden and built a house remarkable for its loftiness, on account of a tower by which it was surmounted, and from the top of which Nero is said to have afterwards contemplated the burning of Rome. In this residence he seems to have passed the greater part of his time, and to have visited the country but seldom; for though he might possibly have possessed a villa at Tiber, near the falls of the Anio, there is no direct authority for the fact. Tacitus tells us that he spent his leisure urbe in ipso; and the deep tranquillity of his repose may be conjectured from the epithet by which the same historian designates it—velut peregrinum otium. (Ann. xiv. 53.) The height of the situation seems to have rendered it a healthy abode (Hor. Sat. i. 8. 14); and we learn from Suetonius (Aug. 72) that Augustus had on one occasion retired thither to recover from a sickness.

Maecenas's house was the rendevous of all the wise and virtuous of Rome; and whoever could contribute to the amusement of the company was always welcome to a seat at his table. In this kind of society he does not appear to have been very select; and it was probably from his undistinguishing hospitality that Augustus called his board parasitica mensa. (Suet. Vit. Hor.) Yet he was naturally of a reserved and taciturn disposition, and drew a broad distinction between the acquaintances that he adopted for the amusement of an idle hour, and the friends whom he admitted to his intimacy and confidence. In the latter case he was as careful and chary as he was indiscriminating in the former. His really intimate friends consisted of the greatest geniuses and most learned men of Rome; and if it was from his universal inclination towards men of talent that he obtained the reputation of a literary patron, it was by his friendship for such poets as Virgil and Horace that he deserved it. In recent times, and by some German authors, especially the celebrated Wieland in his Introduction and Notes to Horace's Epistles, Maecenas's claims to the title of a literary patron have been depreciated. It is urged that he is not mentioned by Ovid and Tibullus; that the Sabine farm which he gave to Horace was not so very large; that his conduct was perhaps not altogether disinterested, and that he might have befriended literary men either out of vanity or from political motives; that he was not singular in his literary patronage, which was a fashion amongst the eminent Romans of the day, as Messalla Corvinus, Asinius Pollio, and others; and that he was too knowing in pearls and beryls to be a competent judge of the higher works of genius. As for his motives, or the reasons why he did not adopt Tibullus and Ovid, we shall only remark, that as they are utterly unknown to us, so it is only fair to put the most liberal construction on them; and that he had naturally a love of literature for its own sake, apart from all political or interested views, may be inferred from the fact of his having been himself a voluminous author. Though literary patronage may have been the fashion of the day, it would be difficult to point out any contemporary Roman, or indeed any at all, who indulged it so magnificently. His name had become proverbial for a patron of letters at least as early as the time of Martial; and though the assertion of that author (viii. 56), that the poets enriched by the bounty of Maecenas were not easily to be counted, is not, of course, to be taken literally, it would have been utterly ridiculous had there not been some foundation for it. That he was no bad judge of literary merit is shown by the sort of men whom he patronised—Virgil, Horace, Propertius; besides others, almost their equals in reputation, but whose works are now unfortunately lost, as Varius, Tucca, and others. But as Virgil and Horace were by far the greatest geniuses of the age, so it is certain that they were more beloved by Maecenas, the latter especially, than any of their contemporaries. Virgil was indebted to him for the recovery of his farm, which had been appropriated by the soldiery in the division of lands, in a. c. 41; and it was at the request of Maecenas that he undertook the Georgics, the most finished of all his poems. To Horace he was a still greater benefactor. He not only procured him a pardon for having fought against Octavianus at Philippi, but presented him with the means of comfortable subsistence, a farm in the Sabine country. If the estate was but a moderate one, we learn from Horace himself that the bounty of Maecenas was regulated by his own contented views, and not by his patron's want of generosity. (Carm. ii. 18. 14, Carm. iii. 16. 38.) Nor was this liberality accompanied with any servile and degrading conditions. The poet was at liberty to write or not, as he pleased, and lived in a state of independence creditable alike to himself and to his patron. Indeed their intimacy was rather that of two familiar friends of equal station, than of the royally-descended and powerful minister of Caesar, with the son of an obscure freedman. But on this point we need not dwell, as it has been already touched upon in the life of Horace.

Of Maecenas's own literary productions, only a few fragments exist. From these, however, and from the notices which we find of his writings in ancient authors, we are led to think that we have not suffered any great loss by their destruction; for, although a good judge of literary merit in others, he does not appear to have been an author of much taste himself. It has been thought that two of his works, of which little more than the titles remain, were tragedies, namely the Pro-metheus and Octavia. But Seneca (Ep. 19) calls the former a book (librum); and Octavia, mentioned in Priscian (lib. 10), is not free from the suspicion of being a corrupt reading. An hexameter line supposed to have belonged to an epic poem, another line thought to have been part of a Galliambic poem, one or two epigrams, and some other fragments, are extant, and are given by Meibom and Frandsen in their lives of Maecenas. In prose he wrote a work on natural history, which Pliny several times alludes to, but which seems to have related chiefly to fishes and gems. Servius (ad Virg. Aen. viii. 310) attributes a Symposium to him. If we may trust the same authority he also composed some memoirs of Augustus; and Horace (Curm. ii. 12. 9) alludes to at least some project of the kind, but which was probably never carried into execution. Maecenas's prose style was affected, unnatural, and often unintelligible, and for these qualities he was derided by Augustus. (Suet. Aug. 26.) Macrobius (Saturn. ii. 4) has preserved part of a letter of the emperor's, in which he takes off his minister's way of writing. The author of the dialogue De Causis Corruptae Elo-quentiæ (c. 26) enumerates him among the orators, but stigmatises his affected style by the term calamistros Maecenatis. Quintilian (Inst. Orat. ix. 4. § 28) and Seneca (Ep. 114) also condemn his style; and the latter author gives a specimen of it which is almost wholly unintelligible. Yet, he likewise tells us (Ep. 19), that he would have been very eloquent if he had not been spoiled by his good fortune; and allows him to have possessed an ingenium grande et virile (Ep. 92). According to Dion Cassius (lv. 7), Maecenas first introduced short-hand, and instructed many in the art through his freedman, Aquila. By other authors, however, the invention has been attributed to various persons of an earlier date; as to Tiro, Cicero's freedman, to Cicero himself, and even to Ennius.

But though seemingly in possession of all the means and appliances of enjoyment, Maecenas cannot be said to have been altogether happy in his domestic life. We have already alluded to an intrigue between Augustus and his wife Terentia; but this was not the only infringement of his domestic peace. Terentia, though exceedingly beautiful, was of a morose and haughty temper, and thence quarrels were continually occurring between the pair. Yet the natural uxoriousness of Maecenas as constantly prompted him to seek a reconciliation; so that Seneca (Ep. 114) remarks that he married a wife a thousand times, though he never had more than one. Her influence over him was so great, that in spite of his cautious and taciturn temper, he was on one occasion weak enough to confide an important state secret to her, respecting her brother Murena, the conspirator (Suet. Aug. 66; Dion Cass. liv. 3). Maecenas himself, however, was probably in some measure to blame for the terms on which he lived with his wife, for he was far from being the pattern of a good husband. His own adulteries were notorious. Augustus, in the fragment of the letter in Macrobius before alluded to, calls him μολαγμα μαechurum; and Plutarch (Erod. 16) relates of him the story of the accommodating husband, Galba, who pretended to be asleep after dinner in order to give him an opportunity with his wife. Nay, he is even suspected of more infamous vices. (Tacit. Ann. i. 54.)

In his way of life Maecenas was addicted to every species of luxury. We find several allusions in the ancient authors to the effeminacy of his dress. Instead of girding his tunic above his knees, he suffered it to hang loose about his heels, like a woman's petticoat; and when sitting on the tribunal he kept his head covered with his paludam (Sen. Ep. 114). Yet, in spite of this softness he was capable of exerting himself when the occasion required, and of acting with energy and decision (Vell. Pat. ii. 88). So far was he from wishing to conceal the softness and effeminacy of his manners, that he made a parade of his vices; and, during the greatest heat of the civil wars, openly appeared in the public places of Rome with a couple of eunuchs in his train (Senec. L. c.). He was fond of theatrical entertainments, especially pantomimes; as may be inferred from his patronage of Bathyllus, the celebrated dancer, who was a freedman of his. It has been concluded from Tacitus (Ann. i. 54) that he first introduced that species of representation at Rome; and, with the politic view of keeping the people quiet by amusing them, persuaded Augustus to patronize it. Dion Cassius (lv. 7) tells us that he was the first to introduce warm swimming baths at Rome. His love of ointments is tacitly satirized by Augustus (Suet. Aug. 86), and his passion for gems and precious stones is notorious. According to Pliny he paid some attention to cookery; and as the same author (xix. 57) mentions a book on gardening, which had been dedicated to him by Sabinus Tiro, it has been thought that he was partial to that pursuit. His tenacious, and indeed, unmanly love of life, he has himself painted in some verses preserved by Seneca (Ep. 101), and which, as affording a specimen of his style, we here insert:—

Debilem facito manu
Debilem pede, coxa;
Tuber adstrue gibberum,
Lubricos quate dentes;
Vita dum superest, bene est.
Hanc mihi, vel acuta
Si cedeam cruce, sustine.—

From these lines it has been conjectured that he belonged to the sect of the Epicureans; but of his philosophical principles nothing certain is known.

That moderation of character which led him to be content with his equestrian rank, probably arose from the love of ease and luxury which we have described, or it might have been the result of more prudent and political views. As a politician, the principal trait in his character was fidelity to his master (Maecenatis erant vera tropaea fides, Propert. iii. 9), and the main end of all his cares was the consolidation of the empire. But, though he advised the establishment of a despotic monarchy, he was at the same time the advocate of mild and liberal measures. He recommended Augustus to put no check on the free expression of public opinion; but above all to avoid that cruelty, which, for so many years, had stained the Roman annals with blood (Senec. Ep. 114). To the same effect is the anecdote preserved by Cedrenus, the Byzantine historian; that when on some occasion Octavianus out on the tribunal, condemning numbers to death, Maecenas, who was among the bystanders, and could not approach Caesar by reason of the crowd, wrote upon his tablets, "Rise, hangman!" (Surge tandem carnifex!), and threw them into Caesar's lap, who immediately left the judgment-seat (comp. Dion Cass. iv. 7).

Maecenas appears to have been a constant valetudinarian. If Pliny's statement (vii. 51) is to be taken literally, he laboured under a continual fever. According to the same author he was sleepless during the last three years of his life; and Seneca tells us (de Provid. iii. 9) that he endeavoured to procure that sweet and indispensable refreshment, by listening to the sound of distant symphonies. We may infer from Horace (Carm. ii. 17) that he was rather hypochondriacal. He died in the consulate of Gallus and Censorinus, B.C. 8 (Dion Cass. iv. 7), and was buried on the Esquiline. He left no children, and thus by his death his ancient family became extinct. He bequeathed his property to Augustus, and we find that Tiberius afterwards resided in his house (Suet. Tib. 15). Though the emperor treated Maecenas with coldness during the latter years of his life, he sincerely lamented his death, and seems to have sometimes felt the want of so able, so honest, and so faithful a counsellor. Dion Cass. liv. 9, lv. 7; Senec. de Ben. vi. 32.)

The life of Maecenas has been written in Latin by John Henry Meibom, in a thin quarto, entitled rer singularis de C. Cilii Maecenatis Vita, Moribus, et Rebus Gestis, Leyden, 1653. It contains at the end the elegies ascribed to Peto Albinovanus, and is a learned and useful work, though the author has taken an extravagant view of his hero's merits, and, according to the fashion of those days, is a rather too liberal of the contents of his commonplace book. In Italian there is a life by nni, Rome 1684; by Dini, Venice 1704; and Sante Viola, Rome, 1816; in German, by nemann, Leipzig, 1744; by Dr. Albert Lion (faciemationis), Göttingen, 1824; and by Frandt, Altona, 1843; which last is by far the best of Maecenas. In French there is a life of Maecenas by the Abbé Richer, Paris, 1746. The life in English is by Dr. Ralph Schomberg, London, 1766, 12mo. It is a mere compilation from Meibom and Richer, and shows no critical examination. [T. D.]

MAECIA GENS, plebeian. Only one person this gens is mentioned under the republic, Sp. ecus Tarpa, a contemporary of Cicero [TARPA]; under the empire the Maecii became more distinguished though they are rarely mentioned by our writers. Thus we find on coins mention of a M. Maecius Rufus, who was proconsul of Bithynia in the reign of Vespasian; in inscriptions (Gruter, p. 49. 3) of a M. Maecius Rufus who was consul with L. Turpilius Dexter, though date of their consulship is uncertain; and in consular Fasti of a M. Maecius Memmius in Placidus, who was consul A. D. 343, with Pisidius Romulus.

MAECIANUS, the son of Avidius Cassius, at the breaking out of the rebellion against Aurelianus, entrusted by his father with the command of Alexandria, and was soon afterwards slain by his own soldiers. (Capitolin. M. Aurel. 25.)

MAECILIA GENS, plebeian. Only two members of it are mentioned under the republic.

1. L. MAECILIUS, one of those tribunes of the plebs who were chosen for the first time in the comitia tributa, B. C. 471. (Liv. ii. 58.)

2. SP. MAECILIUS, chosen for the fourth time tribune of the plebs, B. C. 416. (Liv. iv. 48.)

In the time of Augustus we find the name of M. Maecilius Tullius, a triumvir of the mint, on many coins (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 240); and at length not long before the downfall of the Roman empire in the west a Maecilius obtained the imperial dignity. [AVITUS, MAECILIUS.]

MAECIUS, QUINTUS (Kóivτος Μαίκιος), the author of twelve epigrams in the Greek Anthology, which are among the best in the collection, was evidently, from his name, a Roman; but nothing further is known of him. (Brunck. Anal. vol. ii. p. 236, vol. iii. p. 332; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 220, vol. xiii. pp. 913, 914; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 481.) [P. S.]

MAELIA GENS, the richest plebeian gens of the equestrian order, shortly after the time of the decemvirate. The name does not occur after the Samnite wars. Of this gens CAPITOLINUS is the only cognomen mentioned.

MAELIUS. 1. SP. MAELIUS, the richest of the plebeian knights, employed his fortune in buying up corn in Etruria in the great famine at Rome in B. C. 440. This corn he sold to the poor at a small price, or distributed it gratuitously. Such liberality gained him the favour of the plebeians, but at the same time exposed him to the hatred of the ruling class. Accordingly, in the following year, B. C. 439, soon after the consuls had entered upon their office, L. Minucius Augurinus, who had been appointed praefectus annonae [AUGURINUS, No. 5], revealed to the senate a conspiracy which Maelius was said to have formed for the purpose of seizing the kingly power. He declared that the tribunes had been bribed by Maelius, that secret assemblies had been held in his house, and that arms had been collected there. Thereupon the aged Quintus Cincinnatus was immediately appointed dictator, and C. Servilius Ahala, the master of the horse. During the night the capitol and other strong places were garrisoned, and in the morning the dictator appeared in the forum with an armed force. Maelius was summoned to appear before his tribunal; but as he saw the fate which awaited him, he refused to go, seized a butcher's knife to ward off the officer (apparitor), who was preparing to drag him along, and took refuge among the crowd. Straightway Ahala, with an armed band of patrician youths, rushed into the crowd, and slew Maelius. His property was confiscated, and his house pulled down; its vacant site, which was called the Aequimaelium, continued to subsequent ages a memorial of his fate. Niebuhr says that it lay at the foot of the capitol, not far from the prison.

Later ages, following the traditions of the Quintian and Servilian houses, fully believed the story of Maelius's conspiracy. Thus Cicero speaks of him as "omnibus exosus" (de Amic. 8), and repeatedly praises the glorious deed of Ahala. But his guilt is very doubtful, and his death was clearly an act of murder, since the dictator himself had no right to put him to death, but only to bring him to trial before the comitia centuriata. The fact that he was thus violently and illegally slain, is a strong proof that no crime could be proved against him. Niebuhr thinks it is not improbable that the real design of Maenius was to obtain the consulship for himself, and to compel the patricians to divide it between the two orders. None of the alleged accomplices of Maenius was punished; but Ahala was brought to trial, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile. [AHALA, No. 2.] (Liv. iv. 13—16; Zonar. vii. 20; Dionys. Exc. Vat. in Mai, Nov. Collect. ii. p. 466; Cic. de Senect. 16, in Cal. l. 1, de Rep. ii. 27, Philipp. ii. 44, pro Mil. 17, pro Dom. 38; Val. Max. vi. 3. § 1; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 418, &c.)

2. SP. MAELIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 436, brought in a bill for confiscating the property of Ahala, but it failed. (Liv. iv. 21.) Livy makes no other mention of the punishment of Ahala; but it is stated on other authorities, as is mentioned above, that Ahala was brought to trial, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile. (Val. Max. v. 3. § 2; comp. Cic. de Rep. i. 3, pro Dom. 32.)

3. Q. MAELIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 320, maintained, with his colleague, Ti. Numicius or L. Livius, that the peace made with the Samnites at the Caudine Forks ought to be faithfully kept. They had been present at the battle, and they are mentioned among the other officers who were surrendered to the Samnites, when the Romans resolved not to adhere to the agreement. (Liv. ix. 8; Cic. de Off. iii. 30.) As to the question how tribunes of the plebs could have been with the army on that occasion, see Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 220.

MAEMACTES (Μαυμακτης), i. e. the stormy, a surname of Zeus, from which the name of the Attic month Maemacterion was derived. In that month the Maemacteria was celebrated at Athens. (Plut. de fr. coh. 9.) [L. S.]

MAENA'LIUS or MAENA'LIDES (Μαυδαλιος), a surname of Pan, derived from mount Maenalus in Arcadia, which was sacred to the god. (Paus. viii. 26. § 2, 36. § 5; Ov. Fast. iv. 630.) [L. S.]

MAENALUS (Μαυναλος), the name of two mythical personages, the one a son of Lycaon, and founder of the Arcadian town of Maenalus (Paus. viii. 3. § 1), and the other the father of Atalanta. (Apollod. iii. 9, fin.) [L. S.]

MAENIA GENS, (on coins and inscriptions frequently written MAINIA,) plebeian, produced several distinguished champions of the rights of the plebeian order. The first and only member of it who obtained the consulship, was C. Maenius (cos. B. C. 338). In ancient writers no cognomen is mentioned in this gens, but it appears from coins that some members bore the surname of Antiatius [see MAENIUS, Nos. 6 and 8].

MAE'NIUS. 1. MAENIUS, or according to some manuscripts MAENIVS, was the proposer of the law by which an addition was made to the Circensian games of the day, called insulariis (Macrob. Sat. i. 11). We learn from Livy (ii. 36) that this happened in B. C. 489, and we may therefore suppose that Maenius was tribune of the plebs in that year.

2. C. MAENIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 483, attempted to prevent the consuls from levying troops till they carried into effect a division of the ager publicus among the plebs; but this opposition was rendered of no effect, by the consuls withdrawing from the city and holding the levy outside the walls, at a mile beyond the gates, where the protecting power of the tribunes ceased. All who refused to obey the summons of the consuls were punished (Dionys. viii. 87). The manuscripts of Dionysius have C. Manius, for which Lupus substituted Manilius, and Gelenius Maenius; but the latter is no doubt the correct conjecture. (Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 185, n. 410.)

3. M. MAENIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 410, was the proposer of an agrarian law, and attempted, like his predecessor [No. 2], to prevent the consuls from levying troops, till this law was passed and carried into execution. But as the consuls were supported by the nine colleagues of Maenia, they were able to enforce the levy. So great was the popularity of Maenia, that the senate resolved that consuls should be elected for the following year, and not consular tribunes, because, if the latter had been elected, Maenius would have been sure to have been one of the number. (Liv. iv. 53.)

4. P. MAENIUS, is mentioned by Livy as consular tribune in B. C. 400, and again in B. C. 396 (Liv. v. 12, 18). The name, however, is written variously in the manuscripts. Alachefski, the latest editor of Livy, reads P. Manlius in the former of these years, but retains P. Maenius in the latter. In the Fasti Capitolini the name Maenius does not occur in either of these years, but instead of it we have P. Manlius Vulso, in B. C. 400, and Q. Manlius Vulso, in B. C. 396. The names in Diodorus (xiv. 47, 90) differ again; and it seems to be impossible to reconcile the conflicting statements. In any case Livy is in error in designating Maenius and his colleagues as patricians.

5. M. MAENIUS, occurs in the old editions of Livy (vi. 19) as tribune of the plebs in B. C. 384, where, however, Alachefski, in accordance with the best MSS., now reads M. Menenius. In the same way, in another passage (vii. 16), we ought to read L. Menenius, instead of L. Maenius, as tribune of the plebs in B. C. 357.

6. C. MAENIUS P. P. P. N., consul, in B. C. 338, with L. Furius Camillus. [CAMILIUS, No. 4.] The two consuls completed the subjugation of Latium; they were both rewarded with a triumph; and equestrian statues, then a rare distinction, were erected to their honour in the forum. Maenius defeated, on the river Astura, the Latin army, which had advanced to the relief of Antium, and the rostra of some of the ships of the Antians were applied to ornament the suggestus or stage in the forum from which the orators addressed the people. In consequence of this victory, Maenius seems to have obtained the surname of Antiatius, which, we know from coins, was borne by his descendants. [See below, No. 8.] The statue of Maenius was placed upon a column, which is spoken of by later writers under the name of Columna Maenia, and which appears to have stood near the end of the forum, on the Capitoline. (Liv. vii. 13; Flor. i. 11; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 5. a. 11, vi. 60; Cic. pro Sen. 58; Becker, Handbuch der Römisch. Alterth. vol. i. p. 322; Omann, De Columna Maenia, Gießen, 1844.)

In B. C. 320 Maenius was appointed dictator, in order to investigate the plots and conspiracies which many of the Roman nobles were suspected to have formed, in conjunction with the leading men of Capua, which revolted in the following year. Maenius named M. Fofius Flaccinator to be magister equitum, and both magistrates conducted the inquiry with great vigour, and brought to fight the intrigues of many of the Roman nobles of high family. The latter in their turn retorted, by bringing charges against the dictator and the magister equitum; whereupon both Maenius and Follus resigned their offices, demanded of the consuls a trial, and were most honourably acquitted. (Liv. ix. 26, comp. 34.)

In a. c. 318 Maenius was censor with L. Papirius Crassus. In his censorship he allowed balconies to be added to the various buildings surrounding the forum, in order that the spectators might obtain more room for beholding the games which were exhibited in the forum; and these balconies were called after him Maeniana (sc. œdificia). They are frequently mentioned by the ancient writers, and are described at length by Salmasius (ad Spurtian. Pœtana. 12, p. 676). Comp. Paul. Diac. p. 134, ed. Müller; Cic. Acad. iv. 22, who speaks of the Maenianorum umbra; Suet. Cal. 18; Vitruv. v. 1; Val. Max. ix. 12. § 7; Pseudo-Ascon. in Cic. Divina. in Cæcil. p. 121, ed. Orelli, who, however, absurdly mixes them up with the Columna Maenia, and with the spendthrift mentioned below [No. 11].

In a. c. 314 Maenius was a second time dictator, and again appointed M. Follus the magister equitum. (Fasti Capit.)

7. MAENIUS, the proposer of the law, about a. c. 286, which required the patres to give their sanction to the election of the magistrates before they had been elected, or in other words to confer, or agree to confer, the imperium on the person whom the comitia should elect. (Cic. Brut. 14.) Fighius and Freinsheim supposed that this Maenius was a tribune of the plebs; but Niebuhr conjectures (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 421) that he may have been the same as the C. Maenius above-mentioned [No. 6], and that the high character and venerable age of the latter may have had some influence in procuring the enactment of the law.

8. P. MAENIUS ANT(IATICUS) ME(GELLUS) or MEDULLINUS, occurs on a coin, the obverse of which represents the head of Hercules, and the reverse the prow of a ship. On other coins we find only the names P. Maen. Ant.; and it is conjectured that the Megellus or Medullinus was an agnomen to distinguish this Maenius Antiatius from other members of his family. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 240, 241.)

9. M. MAENIUS, tribune of the soldiers, fell in battle against Mago, in the country of the Insubrian Gauls, a. c. 203. (Liv. xxx. 18.)

10. T. MAENIUS, praetor urbanus a. c. 186. He served as tribune of the soldiers in a. c. 180, in the army of the praetor Q. Fulvius, against the Celtiberi. (Liv. xxxix. 6, 8, xl. 35.)

11. MAENIUS, a contemporary of Lucilius, was a great spendthrift, who squandered all his property and afterwards supported himself by playing the buffoon. He possessed a house in the forum, which Cato in his censorship (a. c. 184) purchased of him, for the purpose of building the basilica Porcia. Some of the ancient scholiasts ridiculously relate, that when Maenius sold his house, he reserved for himself one column, the Columna Maenia, from which he built a balcony, that he might thence witness the games. The true origin of the Columna Maenia, and of the balconies called Maeniana, has been explained above. [See No. 6.] (Hor. Sat. i. l. 101, i. 3. 21, Epist. i. 15. 26, &c.; Liv. xxxix.

44; Porphyr. ad Hor. Sat. i. 3. 21; Pseudo-Ascon. in Cic. Divina. in Cæcil. p. 121, ed. Or.; Becker, Handbuch der Römisch. Alterth. vol. i. p. 300.)

12. C. MAENIUS, praetor a. c. 180, received Sardinia as his province, and also the commission to examine into all cases of poisoning which had occurred beyond ten miles from the city. After condemning 3000 persons, he still found so many who were guilty, that he wrote to the senate to state that he must abandon either the investigation or the province. (Liv. xl. 35, 43.)

13. Q. MAENIUS, praetor a. c. 170, was employed in the Macedonian war. (Liv. xliii. 8.)

MAENON (Μαινων), a Sicilian, a native of Segesta, had fallen as a captive when a youth into the hands of Agathocles, and rose to a high place in the favour of the Syracusan monarch; notwithstanding which, he was induced by Archagathus, the grandson of Agathocles, to unite in a project against the life of the aged king. He is said to have administered poison to him by means of a quill used as a toothpick, which brought about the death of Agathocles, with the most excruciating pains. Archagathus was at the time absent from Syracuse with an army, and the people having re-established the democracy on the death of the old king, Maenon fled from Syracuse to the camp of Archagathus, but soon after took an opportunity to assassinate the young prince, and placed himself at the head of his troops. With this mercenary force he made war on the Syracusans, and though opposed by Hicetas with an army, he obtained the powerful support of the Carthaginians, which enabled him to dictate the terms of peace. One of the conditions imposed was the return of the exiles; but though this would seem likely to have placed Maenon in a prominent position at Syracuse, we hear nothing more of him from this time. (Diod. xxi., Erat. Hæsch. pp. 491—493.) [E. H. B.]

MAEON (Μαιων), a son of Maemon of Thebes. He and Lycopontes were the leaders of the band that lay in ambush against Tydeus, in the war of the Seven against Thebes. Maëon was the only one whose life was spared by Tydeus, and when the latter fell, Maëon is said to have buried him. (Hom. Il. iv. 394, &c.; Apollod. iii. 6. § 5; Paus. ix. 18. § 2.) Another personage of this name occurs in Diodorus (iii. 58). [L. S.]

MAEONIDES (Μαιωνίδης), properly a son of Maëon, the husband of Dindyme, who was the mother of Cybele, or a native of Maëonia, which was the ancient name of a portion of Lydia, but was also applied to the whole country of Lydia. As Homer was believed by some to have been a native of Lydia, he is sometimes called Maëonides, or the Maëonian bard. The feminine form of this patronymic, Maëonia, also occurs as a surname of Omphale (Ov. Fast. ii. 310), and of Arachne (Ov. Met. vi. 103), because both were Lydians. [L. S.]

MAEONIUS, the cousin, or, according to Zonaras, the nephew of Odenathus, whom he murdered in consequence of a hunting quarrel, not, it is said, without the consent of Zenobia, who was filled with jealous rage on perceiving that her husband preferred Herodes, his son by a former marriage, to her own children, Herennianus and Timolauus. Maëonius finds a place among the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [AUREOLUS], and a coin of very doubtful character is described in the Pembroke collection with the legend IMP. C. MAEONIUS; but these published by

MAEONNIUS, A'STYANAX, is quoted by Trebellius Pollio as his authority for the speeches of Macrianus and Balista [BALISTA; MACRIANUS], when the former was induced to assume the purple after the capture of Valerianus by the Persians. Maeonius was, we are told, actually present at the meeting where the discussion took place. (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. 11.) [W. R.]

MAERA (Μαίρα). 1. [ICARIUS, No. 1.]

2. A daughter of Nereus. (Hom. Il. xviii. 48.)

3. A daughter of Proetus and Anteia, was one of the companions of Artemis, but was killed by her after she had become by Zeus the mother of Locrus; others, however, state that she died as a virgin. (Hom. Od. xi. 325; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1688.) She was represented by Polygnotus in the Leseche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 30. § 2.)

4. One of the four daughters of Erasinus of Argos. (Anton. Lib. 40.)

5. A daughter of Atlas, was married to Tegeates, the son of Lycan. Her tomb was shown both at Tegea and Mantinea in Arcadia, and Pausanias thinks that she was the same as the Maera whom Odysseus saw in Hades. (Paus. viii. 12. § 4, 48. § 4, 53. § 1; Völcker, Mythol. des Iapet. Geschl. p. 114.) [L. S.]

MAESA, JU'LIA, the sister-in-law of Septimius Severus, the aunt of Caracalla, the grandmother of Elagabalus and Alexander Severus. [See genealogical table prefixed to CARACALLA.] She was a native of Emesa in Syria, and seems, after the elevation of the husband of her sister Julia Domna, to have lived at the imperial court until the death of Caracalla, and to have accumulated great wealth. The boldness and skill with which she contrived and executed the plot which transferred the supreme power from Macrinus to her grandson, the sagacity with which she foresaw the downfall of the latter, and the arts by which, in order to save herself from being involved in his ruin, she prevailed on him to adopt his cousin Alexander, are detailed in the articles ELAGABALUS and MACRINUS. By Severus she was always treated with the greatest respect, and she exerted all her influence in the best direction, ever urging him to obliterate by his own virtues all recollection of the foul enormities of his predecessor. She enjoyed the title of Augusta during her life, died in peace, and received divine honours. Every particular of her history points her out as one of the most able and strong-minded women of antiquity, one who was passionately desirous of power, who was unscrupulous in the means she employed to gratify her ambition, but who had the wisdom to perceive that the dominion thus obtained would be best preserved by justice and moderation. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 30; Herodian. in Elagab. For other authorities, see CARACALLA, ELAGABALUS, MACRINUS, SEVERUS.) [W. R.]

MAESON (Μαίων), a comic actor of Megara, who seems to have been celebrated for his skill in the buffoonery which characterised the old Megaric comedy. He invented the masks of the slave and the cook; and the coarse jokes of those characters were called σκώμματα μασιωνικά. (Athen. xiv. p. 659, a; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1751, 56.) The following proverb is attributed to him by several ancient writers—

Ἄν' εὐφραδίης Ἀγαμέμνονα δῖον Ἀχαιοί.

(Zenob. Cent. ii. 11; Liban. de Noc. Joliva. p. 285, b; Harpocr. s. v. Ἐπὶ; Diogenian. ap. Gaisford, Paroemiogr. p. v.) Polemon (ap. Athen. xiv. p. 659, c) maintained, in opposition to Timaeus, that Maeson was a native of Megara in Sicily, and not of the Nisaeon Megara. If so, he must have lived before B. C. 483, in which year the Megarians were expelled by Gelo. (Thuc. vi. 4, comp. Herod. vii. 156.)

It may be conjectured, with some probability, that Maeson was a native of the Nisaeon Megara, but migrated to Megara in Sicily, and was then one of those who introduced into Sicily that style of comedy which Epicharmus afterwards brought to perfection. (Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 22, 24; Grynser, de Com. Dor. p. 16.) [P. S.]

MAEVIUS. 1. The envious poetaster of the Augustan age, is spoken of under BAVIUS.

2. A person, who killed his brother in the civil war, and thus has become the subject of two beautiful elegiac poems, which are printed in the Latin Anthology (ii. 131, 132, ed. Burmann, or Ep. 829, 821, ed. Meyer), and by Wernsdorff (Poët. Lat. Min. vol. iii. pp. 199, &c.).

MAGADATES (Μαγαδάτης), general of Tigranes, king of Armenia, was entrusted by him with the government of Syria, when it had been conquered from Antiochus X. (Eusebes) in A. C. 83. Magadates, having ruled over the country for fourteen years, left it in A. C. 69 to aid his master against Lucullus; and Antiochus XIII., son of Antiochus X., seized the opportunity to recover the kingdom. (App. Syr. 48, 49, Mithr. 84, &c.; Plut. Luc. 25, &c.; Just. xi. 1, 2.) Justin differs, apparently, from Appian in mentioning eighteen years as the period during which Syria was held by the officer of Tigranes; but the numbers are satisfactorily reconciled by Cistae. (F. H. vol. iii. p. 340.) [E. E.]

MAGARSIA (Μαγάρσια or Μαγάρσις), a surname of Athena, derived from Magarus, a Cilician town near the mouth of the river Pyramus, where the goddess had a sanctuary. (Arrian, Anab. i. 5.) [L. S.]

MAGAS (Μάγας). 1. King of Cyrene, was a step-son of Ptolemy Soter, being the offspring of the accomplished Berenice by a former marriage. His father's name was Philip; he is termed by Pausanias (i. 7. § 1) a Macedonian of obscure and ignoble birth, but Droysen regards him as the same with the Philip, son of Amyntas, who is frequently mentioned as commanding one division of the phalanx in the wars of Alexander. Magas seems to have accompanied his mother to Egypt, where he soon rose to a high place in the favour of Ptolemy, so that in A. C. 308 he was appointed by that monarch to the command of the expedition destined for the recovery of Cyrene after the death of Ophellias. [OPHELLIAS.] The enterprise was completely successful, and Magas obtained from his step-father the government of the province then re-united to Egypt, which he continued to hold without interruption from thenceforth till the day of his death, an interval of not less than fifty years. (Paus. i. 6. § 8; Agatharchides, ap. Athen. xii. p. 550 b.) Of the transactions of this long period we know almost nothing: it is certain that Magas at first ruled over the province of Cyrenæ only as a dependency of Egypt, and there is no reason to suppose that he threw off his allegiance to Ptolemy Soter so long as the latter lived, though it appears probable that he early obtained the honorary title of king. But after the accession of Ptolemy Philadelphus this friendly union no longer subsisted, and Magas not only assumed the character of an independent monarch, but even made war on the king of Egypt. He had advanced as far as the frontier of the two kingdoms, when he was recalled by the news of a revolt of the Marmaridae, which threatened his communications with Cyrene, and thus compelled him to retreat. (Paus. i. 7. § 1, 2.) Soon after this he married Apama, daughter of Antiochus Soter, and concluded a league with that monarch against Ptolemy; in pursuance of which he undertook a second expedition against Egypt, took the frontier fortress of Panetorium, and advanced so far as to threaten Alexandria itself. The war appears to have been terminated by a treaty, by which Berenice, the infant daughter of Magas, was betrothed to Ptolemy Euergetes, the son of Philadelphus. (Paus. i. 7. § 3; Polyæn. ii. 28; Justin. xxvi. 3.) The chronology of these events is very uncertain; but it seems clear that a considerable interval of peace followed, during which Magas abandoned himself, as he had previously done, to indolence and luxury, and grew in consequence so enormously fat as to cause his death by suffocation, B.C. 258. (Agatharch. ap. Athen. l. c.) From a passage in the comic writer Philemon cited by Plutarch (De Ira c. 9), it appears that Magas had the character of being very illiterate; but the anecdote there related confirms the impression of his being a man of a mild and gentle character, which the tranquillity of his long reign is calculated to convey. The few particulars known concerning him will be found collected and discussed by the Abbé Belley in the Hist. de l'Acad. des Inscri. vol. xxxvi. p. 19, also by Thirge, Res Cyrenensis, and more fully and critically by Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. i. p. 417, vol. ii. pp. 242—248. It is worthy of notice that the name of Magas is found in an Indian inscription on a rock near Peshawer. (Droysen, vol. ii. p. 321.)

The chronology of the reign of Magas is very uncertain: in the dates above given, the authority of Droysen has been followed. Niebuhr, on the contrary (Kl. Schrift. p. 236), places the commencement of his reign after the battle of Ipsus.

He left only one daughter, Berenice, afterwards the wife of Ptolemy Euergetes. Besides the Syrian Apama already mentioned, he had a second wife, Arsinoë, who survived him. (Just. xxvi. 3; and see Niebuhr, Kl. Schrift. p. 230, note.)

2. A grandson of the preceding, being a son of Ptolemy Euergetes and Berenice. He was put to death by his brother Ptolemy Philopator, soon after the accession of the latter, at the instigation of Sosibius. (Polyb. v. 34, xv. 25.) [E. H. B.]

MAGENTENUS, or MAGENTINUS LEO. [Lao. p. 744, No. 17.]

MAGIA GENS, plebeian, was of Campanian origin, and one of the most distinguished houses at Capua in the time of the second Punic war. (Comp. Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 34, in Pison. 11.) At Rome none of its members ever obtained any of the higher offices of the state. CHILLO or CILLO is the only cognomen which occurs in the gens in the time of the republic.

MAGIUS. 1. DECIVS MAGIUS, one of the most distinguished men at Capua in the time of the second Punic war, and the leader of the Roman party in that town in opposition to Hannibal. He is characterised by Velleius Paterculus (ii. 16), who was descended from him, as "Campanorum princeps celeberrimus et nobilissimus vir." He used every effort to dissuade his fellow-citizens from receiving Hannibal into their town after the battle of Cannæ, B.C. 216, but in vain; and, accordingly, when Hannibal entered the city, one of his first acts was to require the senate to deliver up Magius to him. This request was complied with: Magius was put on board ship, and sent to Carthage; but a storm having driven the vessel to Cyrene, Magius fled for refuge to the statue of Ptolemy. He was in consequence carried to Alexandria to Ptolemy Philopator, who set him at liberty, and gave him permission to go where he pleased. Magius chose Egypt as his residence, as he could not return to Capua, and did not choose to go to Rome, where he would have been looked upon as a deserter, as long as there was war between his own town and the Romans. (Liv. xxiii. 7, 10.)

2. CN. MAGIUS, of Atella (Atellanus), probably a relation of the preceding, but belonging to the opposite political party, was medix tuticus at Capua in B.C. 214. (Liv. xxiv. 19.)

3. MINATIUS MAGIUS ARCULANENSIS, grandson of No. 1, and staves of the historian Velleius Paterculus, distinguished himself in the Social or Mariæ war (B.C. 90) by his fidelity to the Romans. He levied a legion among the Hirpini, and was of no small assistance to T. Didius and L. Sulla. So great were his services, that the Roman people bestowed upon him the Roman franchise, and elected two of his sons to the praetorship. (Vell. Pat. ii. 16.)

4. P. MAGIUS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 87, is mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 48) in the list of orators of that time. Cicero speaks of him as the colleague of M. Virgilius, but Plutarch (Sull. 10) calls his colleague Virginius.

5. MAGIUS, a prefect of Piao in Gaul. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 60.)

6. L. MAGIUS, the companion of L. Fannius, deserted from the army of Flavius Fimbria in Asia, and went over to Mithridates. An account of this Magius is given under FANNIUS, No. 4.

7. CN. MAGIUS and MAGIA, the son and daughter of Dinæa, a woman of Larinum. Magia was married to Oppianicus. (Cic. pro Cluent. 7, 12.)

8. NUMERIUS MAGIUS (erroneously called in Caesar Cn. Magius), of Cremona, was praefectus fabrum in the army of Pompey at the breaking out of the civil war in B.C. 49. He was apprehended by Caesar's troops while he was on his journey to join Pompey at Brundisium, and Caesar availed himself of the opportunity to send by means of Magius offers of peace to Pompey, who was then at Brundisium. (Caes. B. C. i. 24; Caes. ad Att. ix. 13. § 8, ix. 13, a, ix. 7, c.)

9. L. MAGIUS, a rhetorician, who married a daughter of the historian Livy. (Senec. Controv. lib. v. Proem.)

10. MAGIUS CELER VELLEIANUS, a brother of the historian Velleius Paterculus, must have been adopted by a Magius Celer. He served as legate to Tiberius in the Dalmatian war, A.D. 9, and shared in the honours of his commander's triumph. At the time of Augustus's death (A.D. 14) he and his brother were the "candidati Caesaris" for the praetorship. (Vell. Pat. ii. 116, 121, 124.)

MAGIUS CAECILIANUS. [CAECILIANUS.]
MAGNA MATER. [RHENA.]

MAGNENTIUS, Roman emperor in the West, A. D. 350—353. FLAVIUS POPILIUS MAGNENTIUS, according to the accounts preserved by Victor and Zosimus, belonged to one of those German families who were transported across the Rhine, and established in Gaul, about the end of the third century; according to the statement of Julian, which is not irreconcilable with the former, he was a captive taken in war by Constantius Chlorus, or Constantine. Under the latter he served with reputation in many wars, rose eventually to the dignity of count, and was entrusted by Constantius with the command of the famous Jovian and Herculean battalions who had replaced the ancient praetorian guards when the empire was remodelled by Diocletian. His ambition was probably first roused by perceiving the frailty of the tenure under which the weak and indolent prince whom he served held power; and having associated himself with Marcellinus, chancellor of the imperial exchequer (comes sacrarum largitionum), a plot was deliberately contrived and carefully matured. A great feast was given by Marcellinus at Autun on the 18th of January, A. D. 350, ostensibly to celebrate the birthday of his son, to which the chief officers of the army and the most distinguished civilians of the court were invited. When the night was far spent, Magnentius, who had quitted the apartment under some pretext, suddenly reappeared clad in royal robes, and was instantly saluted as Augustus by the conspirators, whose acclamations were caught up and echoed almost unconsciously by the remainder of the guests. The emissaries despatched to murder Constantius having succeeded in accomplishing their purpose [CONSTANTIUS, p. 828], the troops no longer hesitated to follow their leaders, the peaceful portion of the population did not resist the example of the soldiery, and thus the authority of the usurper was almost instantly acknowledged throughout Gaul, and quickly extended over all the Western provinces, except Illyria, where Vetricianus, the imperial general [VETRANIO], had himself assumed the purple. Intelligence of these events was quickly conveyed to Constantius, who hurried from the frontier of Persia to vindicate the honour of his house, by crushing this double rebellion. The events which followed—the fruitless attempts of the two pretenders to negotiate a peace—the submission of Vetricianus at Sardica—the distress of Constantius in Pannonia, which induced him in his turn, but fruitlessly, to make overtures to his opponent—the defeat of Magnentius at the sanguinary battle of Mursa on the Drave, in the autumn of A. D. 351, followed by the loss of Italy, Sicily, Africa, and Spain—his second defeat in the passes of the Cottian Alps—the defection of Gaul—and his death by his own hands about the middle of August, A. D. 353, are fully detailed in other articles. [CONSTANTIUS, p. 847; DECENTIUS, DESIDERIUS, NEPOTIANUS, VETRANIO.]

Magnentius was a man of commanding stature and great bodily strength, was well educated, and accomplished, fond of literature, an animated and impressive speaker, a bold soldier, and a skilful general. But, however striking his physical and intellectual advantages, however conspicuous his merits when in a subordinate station, not one spark of virtue relieved the blackness of his career as a sovereign, not one trait of humanity gave indication that the Christianity which he professed had ever touched his heart. The power which he obtained by treachery and murder he maintained by extortion and cruelty, rendered, if possible, more odious by a hypocritical assumption of good-natured frankness. (Julian. Orat. i. ii.; Libani. Orat. i.; Amm. Marc. xiv. 5; Aurel. Viet. de Caes. 41, 42, Epi. 41, 42; Eutrop. x. 6, 7; Zosim. ii. 41—44; Zonar. xiii. 5—9; Socrat. H. E. ii. 32; Sozomen. H. E. iv. 7.) [W. R.]

MAGNES (Μάγνης). 1. A son of Aecolus and Enarete, became the father of Polydectes and Dictys by a Naiad. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3, 2. § 6, 1. 3. § 3.) The scholiast of Euripides (Phoen. 1769) calls his wife Philodice, and his sons Euryonius and Eioneus; but Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 338) calls his wife Meliboea, and mentions one Meliboea, and adds that he called the town of Meliboea, at the foot of mount Pelion, after his wife, and the country of Magnesia after his own name.

2. A son of Argos and Perimele, and father of Hymenaeus; from him also a portion of Thesmy derived its name Magnesia. (Anton. Lib. 23.)

3. A son of Zeus and Thya, and brother of Macedon. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μακεδονία, with the commentators.) [L. S.]

MAGNES (Μάγνης), one of the most important of the earlier Athenian comic poets of the old comedy, was a native of the demus of Icaria or Icarus, in Attica. (Suid. s. v.) He is mentioned by Aristotle (Poet. 3) in such a manner as to imply that he was contemporary, or nearly so, with Chionides. An anonymous writer on comedy (p. 28) places him intermediate between Epicharmus and Cratinus. Suidas states that he was contemporary, as a young man, with Epicharmus in his old age. His recent death, at an advanced age, is referred to in the Knights of Aristophanes (524), which was written in B. C. 423. From these statements it may be inferred that he flourished about O. 80, A. C. 460, and onwards. The grammarian Diomedes is evidently quite wrong in joining him with Susarion and Myllus (iii. p. 484).

The most important testimony respecting Magnes is the passage of the Knights just referred to, in which Aristophanes upbraids the Athenians for their inconstancy towards the poet, who had been extremely popular, but lived to find himself out of fashion (vv. 520—525):—

Τοῦτο μὲν εἶδος ἔπαθε Μάγνης ἄμα ταῖς παλαιαῖς κατιούσαις,
"Ὅς πλεῖστα χορῶν τῶν ἀντιπάλων εἰς αὐτὸν
τροπαῖα
Πάσας δ' οὐκ ἔμυν φωνὰς ἰὲς καὶ ψάλλον καὶ ὑπεργίζων καὶ λυθίζων καὶ ψηρίζων καὶ βαττόμενος βαττοχέλους Οὐκ ἐξήρκεσεν, ἀλλὰ τελευτῶν ἐπὶ γήρας, οὐ γὰρ
ἐφ' ἡβης,
Ἐξεβλήθη προσβύτης ὢν, ὅτι τοῦ σκώπτεται ἀνελίφθῃ.

These lines, taken in connexion with the statements of ancient writers, and the extant titles of the plays of Magnes, give us a fair notion of his style. The allusions in the third and fourth lines are said by a scholiast to be to his plays entitled Βαττοχέλους, Ὅρνιθες, Λυθοὶ Ψηρίτες, and Βαττοχέλους. It is evident, therefore, that his plays contained a large portion of the mimetic element, in the extenson of which, as the age at which he wrote, and the testimony of the grammarians, Diomedes (iii. p. 486), concur in establishing, there was a great deal of coarse buffoonery. The concluding words of Aristophanes, ὅτι τοῦ σκώπτειν ἀνελεύθητον, especially as they occur in a sort of apologetic address by that poet, who, through his whole career, prided himself on his less frequent indulgence in the extravagant jests in which other comedians were addicted, gave some countenance to the supposition that Magnes had attempted a similar restriction upon his comic licence during the latter period of his life, and had suffered, as Aristophanes himself was always exposed to suffer, for not pandering sufficiently to the taste of his audience. The words may, however, refer simply to the decline of his comic powers.

According to Suidas and Eudocia, Magnes exhibited nine plays, and gained two victories, a statement obviously inconsistent with the second line of the above extract from Aristophanes. The anonymous writer (l.c.) assigns to him eleven victories, and states that none of his dramas were preserved, but that nine were falsely ascribed to him. (Comp. Athen. xiv. p. 646, e.) Some of these spurious dramas seem to have been founded on the titles, and perhaps on some remains, of his genuine plays. (Suid. s. v. Μαγίσων.)

It is worthy of notice that Magnes is the earliest comic poet of whom we find any victories recorded. (Comp. Aristot. Poet. 5.)

Only a few titles of his works are extant. Of those mentioned by the scholiast on Aristophanes, the Βασιλεύς should probably be corrected to Βασιμωρ; and the play was no doubt a satire on certain musicians who were fond of the lyre called korbion. The Αἰῶλ seems to have been an attack on the voluptuous dances of the Lydians. (Suid. s. v. Αἰῶλ; Hesych. s. v. Αἰῶλ; Athen. xv. p. 690, c; Pollux, vii. 188.) The Ψύγες took its name from a sort of gall fly which infested the fig; and both it and the Βάρπαχοι belong to a class of titles common enough with the Attic comedians; but we have no indication of their contents. There are a few other titles, namely, Διδύμοι, of which there were two editions, and which should perhaps be assigned to Crates (Athen. ix. p. 367, E, xiv. p. 646, e.; Poll. vi. 79), Πιρακίς, or Πιρακίδης (Suid. vol. ii. p. 640; Phot. s. v. πύρ δὲ; the true form of this title is quite uncertain), Πλοδωρία (Schoi. ad Plat. p. 336, Bekker), and Γαλαμνομαχία, a title which does not well agree with what we know of the character of the plays of Magnes. (Eudoc. p. 302.) The extant fragments of Magnes scarcely exceed half a dozen lines. (Meineke, Frag. Com. Græcæ. vol. i. pp. 29—35, vol. ii. pp. 9—11; Fabric. Bibl. Græcæ. vol. ii. p. 453; Bode, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtk. vol. iii. Pt. 2, p. 31.) [P. S.]

MAGNUS, a Roman consular, accused of having organized an extensive plot against Maximianus I., in which, according to Herodian, he was supported by a great number of centurions, and the whole body of the senate. The emperor, soon after his accession (A. D. 235), was about to commence a campaign against the Germans; and having thrown a bridge over the Rhine, for the purpose of transporting his troops, it was proposed by the conspirators to break down the structure as soon as the prince should have passed, and thus leave him on the further bank, with a handful of men, at the mercy of the barbarians. The truth or falsehood of the charge was never ascertained, for all who were impeached, or who were open to the most remote suspicion, were instantly put to death without trial or investigation, without being allowed to confess their guilt, or to assert their innocence. The statement that the whole senate were parties to the scheme is, considering the nature and circumstances of the case, an extravagant hyperbole, contradicted by the very details of the narrative, although doubtless from the well-known hatred entertained by that body towards the sanguinary tyrant, they would have rejoiced in any event which might have caused his destruction. (Herodian. vii. 2; Capitolin. Maximin. duo. 10.) [W. R.]

MAGNUS (Μάγνος), the name of several physicians, whom it is difficult to distinguish with certainty. (See Fabric. Bibl. Græcæ. vol. xiii. p. 313, ed. vet.; C. G. Kühn, Additam. ad Elench. Medicor. Vet. a J. A. Fabricio exhibit.; Guidot, Notes to Theophilus, De Urin.; Haller, Bibl. Med. Pract. vol. iv. p. 203.)

1. A native of Antiochia Mygdonica (called more frequently Nisibis), in Mesopotamia, who studied medicine under Zenon, and was a fellow-pupil of Oribasius and Ionicus, in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ. Eunapius, who has given a short account of his life (De Vit. Philos. p. 168, ed. 1568), says that he lectured on medicine at Alexandria, where he enjoyed a great reputation, though not so much for his practical skill as for his eloquence and power of argument. He is probably the person who wrote a work on the Urine, which is mentioned by Theophilus (De Urin. præf. and c. 3, 9) and Joannes Actuarius (De Urin. i. 2). If so, he bore the title Ἱατροσοφιστής (Theoph. l.c.). He is also probably the physician mentioned by Philostorgius (Hist. Eccles. viii. 8) as living at Alexandria in great repute, in the time of Valentinian and Valens.

2. A native of Ephesus, in Lydia, from the second book of whose letters ("Epistolæ") Cælius Aurelianus quotes (De Morb. Acut. iii. 14. p. 225) a short passage, relating to hydrophobia. He is perhaps the same physician who is elsewhere quoted by Cælius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 10. p. 96), and said to have belonged to the medical sect of the Methodici, and to have lived before Agathinus, and therefore in the first century after Christ.

3. A native of Philadelphia in Lydia, whose medical formulæ are quoted by the younger Andromachus, and who must therefore have lived in or before the first century after Christ. (Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. vii. 4, vol. xiii. p. 80.) He is also mentioned elsewhere in Galen's works (vol. xiii. pp. 296, 829).

4. A native of Tarsus in Cilicia, who must have lived in or before the beginning of the second century after Christ, as one of his medical formulæ is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacion. (Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. ix. 7, vol. xiii. p. 313.)

MAGNUS Κλινικός, and MAGNUS ὁ Περιούσιος, whose prescriptions are mentioned by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. v. 3, vol. xii. pp. 829, 844), are perhaps the same person; perhaps also they are the same as either No. 3, or No. 4. Magnus "Sophista," whose medical formulæ are quoted by Nicolaus Myrepsus (De Compos. Medicam. i. 305, ii. 5, xxxiv. 17), may also be the same person.

5. The Magnus who wrote on Antidotes, and attained the dignity of Archiatr, must be a different person from any of the preceding, as he was a contemporary of Galen, about the middle of the second century after Christ. (Galen, De Ther. ad Pis. cc. 12, 13, vol. xiv. pp. 261, 262.) He is quoted also by Serapion (Pract. vii. 8), who calls him "Rex Medicorum in tempore Galieni."

6. The Magnus who lived after Themison, about the same time as Archigeneas, or a little earlier, and who belonged to the medical sect of the Pneumatici (Galen, De Differ. Puls. iii. 2, vol. viii. p. 646), was also probably a different person from any of the preceding, and lived in the latter half of the second century after Christ. He wrote a work, Περὶ τῶν Ἐπειρητικῶν μετὰ τοῦ Θεμισωνοῦ Χρόνου, De Incutis post Themisonis Tempora, consisting of at least three books (Gal. ibid. p. 641), from which several passages are quoted by Galen relating to the pulse (ibid. pp. 640, 641, 756). On this subject Magnus differed in several points from Archigeneas, by whom some of his opinions were controverted. (Gal. De Caus. Puls. i. 4, vol. ix. pp. 8, 18, 21, Id. De Differ. Puls. vol. viii. pp. 638, 640, &c.)

7. Abū-l-Faraj mentions a physician of this name, who lived in the seventh century after Christ; but the Arabic writers are so incorrect in Greek history and Chronology, that it is not at all unlikely that he is speaking of one of the persons already named. (Hist. Dynast. p. 115.)

There is extant in the Greek Anthology an epigram of a physician of this name, Εἰς τὴν Ἑλέκτρα Γαληνοῦ (Anthol. Planud. § 270); and also one by Palladas, Εἰς Μάγον Ἱατροσοφιστὴν (xi. 281, ed. Tauchn). [W. A. G.]

MAGO (Μάγων), a name of common occurrence at Carthage. Hence the same difficulty is found as with most other Carthaginian names in discriminating or identifying the different persons incidentally mentioned who bear this name.

1. A Carthaginian who, according to Justin, was the founder of the military power of that city, being the first to introduce a regular discipline and organisation into her armies. He is said to have himself obtained by this means great successes; and still farther advantages were reaped by his two sons Hasdrubal and Hamilcar, who followed in their father's footsteps. (Justin, xviii. 7, xix. 1.) If the second of his two sons be correctly identified with the Hamilcar that was killed at Himera [HAMILCAR, No. 1], we may conclude that Mago himself must have flourished from 550 to 500 years before Christ. (See Heeren, Ideen, vol. iv. p. 537.)

2. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet under Himilco in the war against Dionysius, B. C. 396. He is particularly mentioned as holding that post in the great sea-fight off Catania, when he totally defeated the fleet of the Syracusans under Leptines, the brother of Dionysius, sinking or destroying above 100 of their ships, besides capturing many others. (Diod. xiv. 59, 60.) We have no information as to the part he bore in the subsequent operations against Syracuse itself; but after the disastrous termination of the expedition, and the return of Himilco to Africa, Mago appears to have been invested with the chief command in Sicily, where he endeavoured by measures of lenity and conciliation towards the Greek cities, and by concluding alliances with the Sicilian tribes, to re-establish the Carthaginian power in the island. In 393 he advanced against Messana, but was attacked and defeated by Dionysius near Abacenum, which compelled him to remain quiet for a time. The next year, however, having received powerful reinforcements from Sardinia and Africa, he assembled an army of 80,000 men, with which he advanced through the heart of Sicily as far as the river Chrysa, but was there met by Dionysius, who having secured the alliance of Agrig, tyrant of Agrigum, succeeded in cutting off the supplies of the enemy, and by this means reduced them to such distress, that Mago was compelled to conclude a treaty of peace, by which he abandoned his allies the Sicilians to the power of Dionysius. (Id. xiv. 90, 95, 96.) After this Mago returned to Carthage, where he was not long after raised to the office of king or suffete, a dignity which he held in B. C. 383, when the ambition and intrigues of Dionysius led to the renewal of hostilities between Carthage and Syracuse. Mago landed in Sicily with a large army, and after numerous petty combats, a pitched battle at length took place, in which, after a severe contest, the Carthaginians were defeated, and Mago himself slain. (Diod. xv. 15.)

3. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet and army in Sicily in B. C. 344. When Timoleon had made himself master of the citadel of Syracuse, after the departure of Dionysius, Hicetas, finding himself unable to cope single-handed with this new and formidable rival, called in the assistance of Mago, who appeared before Syracuse with a fleet of 150 triremes, and an army of 50,000 men. He did not, however, accomplish anything worthy of so great a force; not only were both he and Hicetas unable to make any impression on the island citadel, but while they were engaged in an expedition against Catania, Neon, the Corinthian governor of Syracuse, took advantage of their absence to make himself master of Achradia. Jealousies likewise arose between the Carthaginians and their Syracusan allies, and at length Mago, becoming apprehensive of treachery, suddenly relinquished the enterprise, and on the approach of Timoleon at the head of a very inferior force, sailed away with his whole fleet, and withdrew to Carthage. Here his cowardly conduct excited such indignation, that he put an end to his own life, to avoid a worse fate at the hands of his exasperated countrymen, who, nevertheless, proceeded to crucify his lifeless body. (Plut. Timol. 17—22; the same events are more briefly related by Diodorus, vi. 69, but without any mention of the name of Mago.)

4. Commander of a Carthaginian fleet, which, according to Justin, was despatched to the assistance of the Romans during the war with Pyrrhus, apparently soon after the battle of Asculum (B. C. 279). The Roman senate having declined the proffered aid, Mago sailed away to the south of Italy, where he had an interview with Pyrrhus himself, in which he endeavoured to sound the monarch in regard to his views on Sicily. (Justin, xviii. 2.) It was probably part of the same fleet which we find mentioned as besieging Rhegium and guarding the straits of Messana, to prevent the passage of Pyrrhus. (Diod. Ess. Hoeschel, xiii. 9, p. 496.)

3. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and brother of the famous Hannibal. He was the youngest of the three brothers, and must have been quite a youth when he accompanied Hannibal into Italy, a. c. 218. But his whole life had been spent in camps, under the eye of his father or brother, and young as he was, he had already given proofs not only of personal courage, but of skill and judgment in war, sufficient to justify Hannibal in entrusting him with services of the most important character. The first occasion on which he is mentioned is the passage of the Po, which he effected successfully at the head of the cavalry: according to Caelius Aspidater, he and his horsemen crossed the river by swimming. (Liv. xxi. 47.) At the battle of the Trebia shortly afterwards, he was selected by his brother to command the body of chosen troops placed in ambuscade among the thickets of the bed of the river, and by his well-timed attack on the rear of the Roman army contributed mainly to the success of the day. (Polyb. iii. 71, 74; Liv. xxi. 54, 55; Frontin. Strateg. ii. 8. § 23.) We next find him commanding the rear-guard during the attempt to cross the Apennines, and in the dangerous and toilsome march through the marshes of Etruria. At Cannae he was associated with his brother in the command of the main body of the Carthaginian army: such at least is the statement of Polybius and Livy; Appian, on the contrary, assigns him that of the right wing: in either case, it is clear that he held no unimportant post on that great occasion. (Polyb. iii. 79, 114; Liv. xxii. 2, 46; Appian. Annal. 20.) After the battle he was detached by Hannibal with a considerable force, to complete the subjugation of Samnium: as soon as he had effected this he marched southwards into Bruttium, and after receiving the submission of many cities in that part of Italy, crossed over in person to Carthage, where he was the first to announce the progress and victories of his brother. The tidings naturally produced a great effect, and, notwithstanding the opposition of Hanno, the Carthaginian senate came to the resolution of sending powerful reinforcements to Hannibal in Italy. A force of 12,000 foot and 1500 horse, with twenty elephants and sixty ships, was accordingly assembled, and placed under the command of Mago, but just as he was about to sail intelligence arrived of the alarming state of the Carthaginian affairs in Spain, which induced the government to alter their plan of operations, and Mago, with the forces under his command, was despatched to the support of his brother Hasdrubal in that country, a. c. 215. (Liv. xxiii. 1, 11, 13, 32; Appian, Hisp. 16; Zonar. ix. 2, 3.)

It is hardly necessary to point out in detail the part borne by Mago in the subsequent operations in Spain, a sketch of which is given under HASDRUBAL, No. 6. We find him mentioned as co-operating in the siege of Illiturgi (a. c. 215), in the defeat of the two Scipios (a. c. 212), and on several other occasions. (Liv. xxiii. 49, xxiv. 41, 42, xxv. 32, 38, xxvi. 20; Appian, Hisp. 24.) His position during these campaigns is not quite clear, but it would seem that though frequently acting independently, he was still in some degree subject to the superior authority of his brother, as well as of Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco: perhaps it was the somewhat ambiguous character of their relations to one another that led to the dissensions and jealousies among the three generals, of which we hear as one of the chief causes that led to the disasters of the Carthaginian arms. (Polyb. x. 6.) At length, in 209, it was determined at a council of the three generals, held shortly after the battle of Bæcula, that while Hasdrubal, the son of Barca, set out on his adventurous march into Italy, Mago and the other Hasdrubal should carry on the war in Spain; the former repairing in the first instance to the Balearic islands, in order to raise fresh levies for the approaching campaign. (Liv. xxvii. 20.) The whole of the following year is a blank, so far as the Spanish war is concerned; but in 207 we had Mago in Celtiberia at the head of an army composed mainly of troops levied in that country, but to which Hanno, who had just arrived in Spain, had lately joined his new army of Carthaginian and African troops. Their combined forces were, however, attacked by M. Silanus, one of the lieutenants of Scipio, and totally defeated; Hanno himself was taken prisoner, while Mago, with a few thousand men, effected his escape, and joined Hasdrubal, the son of Gisco, in the south of Spain. Here they once more succeeded in assembling a numerous army, but the next year (a. c. 206) their decisive defeat by Scipio at Silpia (HASDRUBAL, p. 358) crushed for ever all hope of re-establishing the Carthaginian power in Spain. (Liv. xxviii. 1, 2, 12—16; Polyb. xi. 20—24; Appian, Hisp. 25—27; Zonar. ix. 8.) After this battle Mago retired to Gades, where he shut himself up with the troops under his command; and here he remained long after Hasdrubal had departed to Africa, still keeping his eye upon the proceedings of the Romans, and not without hope of recovering his footing on the main land; for which purpose he was continually intriguing with the Spanish chiefs, and even it is said fomenting the spirit of discontent among the Roman troops themselves. The formidable insurrection of Indibilis and Mandonius, and the mutiny of a part of the Roman army, for a time gave him hopes of once more restoring the Carthaginian power in that country; but all these attempts proved abortive. His lieutenant Hanno was defeated by L. Marcus, and Mago, who had himself repaired to his assistance with a fleet of sixty ships, was compelled to return to Gades without effecting anything. At length, therefore, he began to despair of restoring the fortunes of Carthage in Spain, and was preparing to return to Africa, when he received orders from the Carthaginian senate to repair with such a fleet and army as he could still muster to Liguria, and thus transfer the seat of war once more into Italy. The command was well suited to the enterprising character of Mago; but before he finally quitted Spain he was tempted by intelligence of the defenceless state of New Carthage to make an attempt on that city, in which however he was repulsed with considerable loss. Foiled in this quarter, he returned to Gades, but the gates of that city were now shut against him, an insult he is said to have avenged by putting to death their chief magistrates, whom he had decoyed into his power, under pretence of a conference; after this he repaired to the Balearic islands, in the lesser of which he took up his quarters for the winter. (Liv. xxviii. 23, 30, 31, 36, 37; Appian, Hisp. 31, 32, 34, 37; Zonar. ix. 10.) The memory of his sojourn there is still preserved, in the name of the celebrated harbour called Portus Magonia, or Port Mahon.

Early in the ensuing summer Mago landed in Liguria, where he surprised the town of Genoa. His name quickly gathered around him many of the Ligurian and Gaulish tribes, among others the Ingaunes, and the spirit of disaffection spread even to the Etruscans, so that the Romans were obliged to maintain an army in Etruria, as well as one in Cisalpine Gaul, in order to hold him in check. Whether these forces proved sufficient effectually to impede his operations, or that he wasted his time in hostilities against the mountain tribes, in which at one time we find him engaged, our imperfect accounts of his proceedings will not enable us to decide. It is certain that, though repeatedly urged by messages from Carthage to prosecute the war with vigour, and more than once strengthened with considerable reinforcements, he did not effect anything of importance, and the alarm at first excited at Rome by his arrival in Liguria gradually died away. Meanwhile, the successes of Scipio in Africa compelled the Carthaginians to concentrate all their forces for the defence of their capital, and they at length sent messengers to recal Mago as well as his brother Hannibal from Italy a.c. 203. Just before these orders arrived Mago had at length encountered in Cisalpine Gaul the combined forces of the prætor Quintilius Varus and the proconsul M. Cornelius. The battle, which was fought in the territory of the Insubrians, was fiercely contested, but terminated in the complete defeat of the Carthaginians, of whom 5000 were slain. Mago himself was severely wounded, but effected his retreat to the seacoast among the Ingaunes, where he received the pressing summons of the senate to Carthage. He immediately embarked his troops, and set sail with them in person, but died of his wound before they landed in Africa. (Liv. xxviii. 46, xxix. 4, 5, 13, 36, xxx. 18, 19; Polyb. Frag. Hist. 31; Appian, Illyp. 37, Annib. 54, Pun. 9, 31, 32; Zonar. ix. 11, 13.) Such is the statement of Livy and all our other authorities; but Cornelius Nepos, on the contrary, represents him as not only surviving the battle of Zama, but as remaining at Carthage after the banishment of Hannibal, and subsequently co-operating with his brother at the commencement of the war with Antiochus (a.c. 193) in endeavouring to induce the Carthaginians to join in hostilities against Rome. According to the same author, he was banished from Carthage on this account, and died soon after, being either shipwrecked or assassinated by his slaves. (Corn. Nep. Hann. 7, 8.) It seems probable that the circumstances here related refer in fact to some other person of the name of Mago, whom Nepos has confounded with the brother of Hannibal.

6. One of the chief officers of Hannibal in Italy, whose name is appended to the treaty concluded by that general with Philip V., king of Macedonia. (Polyb. vii. 9.) It would seem probable that he is the same who was sent immediately afterwards with Bostar and Gisco to accompany the Macedonian ambassadors back to the court of Philip, and obtain the ratification of the treaty by that monarch, but who unfortunately fell into the hands of the Romans, and were carried prisoners to Rome. (Liv. xxiii. 34.) Schweighæuser, on the contrary, supposes him to be the same with the following.

7. Surnamed the Samnite (ὁ Σαυνίτης), was one of the chief officers of Hannibal in Italy, where he held for a considerable time the chief command in Bruttium. Here he is mentioned in a.c. 212 as co-operating with Hanno, the son of Bomilcar, in the siege and capture of Thurii; and not long after he was enabled by the treachery of the Lucanian Flavius to lead the Roman general Tib. Gracchus into an ambuscade in which he lost his life. (FLAVIUS, No. 2.) Mago immediately sent his lifeless body, together with the insignia of his rank, to Hannibal. (Liv. xxv. 15, 16; Diod. Sic. Valer. xxvi. p. 569; Val. Max. l. 6. § 8.) In 208 we find him defending the city of Locri against the Roman general L. Cincius, who pressed the siege with so much vigour both by land and sea, that Mago could with difficulty hold out, when the opportune arrival of Hannibal himself compelled the Romans to raise the siege with precipitation. (Liv. xxvii. 26, 28; comp. Frontin. Strat. iv. 7. § 29.) According to Polybius (ix. 25), this Mago had been the companion and friend of Hannibal from his earliest youth: he was involved by the Carthaginians themselves in the same general charge of avarice with his great commander.

8. A Carthaginian of noble birth, and a near relation of Hannibal, taken prisoner in Sardinia a.c. 215. (Liv. xxiii. 41.)

9. An officer who commanded a body of Carthaginian cavalry at Capua in a.c. 212, and by a sudden sally threw the Roman army under the two consuls App. Claudius and Fulvius into confusion, and occasioned them heavy loss. (Liv. xxv. 18.) It is probably the same whom we find shortly afterwards commanding a body of horse under Hannibal himself, and taking a prominent part in the defeat of the prætor Cn. Fulvius at Herdonia. (Id. 21.)

10. Commander of the garrison of New Carthage when that city was attacked by P. Scipio in a.c. 209. So little had the Carthaginian generals thought it necessary to provide for the defence of this important post, that Mago had only 1000 regular troops under his orders when the enemy appeared before the walls. He, however, armed about 2000 more as best he could, and seems to have displayed all the qualities of an able and energetic officer; making a vigorous sally in the first instance, and repulsing the troops of Scipio in their first assault. But all his efforts were ineffectual: the Romans scaled the walls where they had been supposed to be guarded by a lagoon, and made themselves masters of the town; and Mago, who had at first retired into the citadel, with the intention of holding out there, at length saw that all further resistance was hopeless, and surrendered to Scipio. He himself, with the other more eminent of the Carthaginian captives, was sent a prisoner of war to Rome. (Polyb. x. 8, 12—15, 18, 19; Liv. xxvi. 44—46, 51; Appian, Illyp. 19—22.) Eutropius (iii. 15) and Orosius (iv. 18) have confounded this Mago with the brother of Hannibal.

11. An officer of cavalry under Hasdrubal, son of Gisco, in the war against Scipio and Maximus in Africa, a.c. 204. (Appian, Pun. 15.)

12. One of the Carthaginian ambassadors sent to Rome just before the breaking out of the third Punic war (a.c. 149), to avert the impending hostilities by offering unqualified submission. (Polyb. xxxvi. 1.)

13. A Carthaginian, apparently not the same as the preceding, who, on the return of the embassy just spoken of, addressed the Carthaginian senate in a speech at once prudent and manly. (Polyb. xxi. 3.) He is termed by Polybius the Brutian (ἰβητικός), from whence Reiske inferred him to be the same with the lieutenant of Hannibal (No. 7), but this, as Schweighauser has observed, is impossible, on chronological grounds. That author suggests that he may be the son of the one just alluded to, and may have derived his surname from the services of his father in Bruttium. (Schw. ad Polyb. l. c. and Index Historicus, p. 365.)

14. A Carthaginian of uncertain date, who wrote a work upon agriculture in the Punic language, which is frequently mentioned by Roman authors in terms of the highest commendation. He is even styled by Columella the father of agriculture—rationis parens (De R. R. i. l. § 13). Nothing is known of the period at which he flourished, or of the events of his life, except that he was a man of distinction in his native country, and had held important military commands. (Colum. xii. 4. § 3; Plin. H. N. xviii. 5.) Heeren's conjecture that he was the same as No. 1, is wholly without foundation: the name of Mago was evidently too common at Carthage to afford any reasonable ground for identifying him with any of the persons known to us from history. His work was a voluminous one, extending to twenty-eight books, and comprising all branches of the subject. So great was its reputation even at Rome, that after the destruction of Carthage, when the libraries which had fallen into the hands of the Romans were distributed among the princes of Africa, an exception was made in favour of the work of Mago, and it was ordered by the senate that it should be translated into Latin by competent persons, at the head of whom was D. Silanus. (Plin. H. N. xviii. 5; Colum. i. l. § 13.) It was subsequently translated into Greek, though with some abridgment and alteration, by Cassius Dionysius of Utica, and an epitome of it in the same language, brought into the compass of six books, was drawn up by Diophanes of Bithynia, and dedicated to king Deiotarus. (Varro, de R. R. i. l. § 10; Colum. i. l. § 10.) His precepts on agricultural matters are continually cited by the Roman writers on those subjects, Varro, Columella, and Palladius, as well as by Pliny: his work is also alluded to by Cicero (De Orat. i. 58) in terms that imply its high reputation as the standard authority upon the subject on which it treated. It is said to have opened with the very sound piece of advice that if a man meant to settle in the country, he should begin by selling his town house. (Colum. i. l. § 18; Plin. H. N. xviii. 7.) All the passages in Roman authors in which the work of Mago is cited or referred to are collected by Heeren. (Asia, vol. iv. p. 527, &c.) [E. H. B.]

MAGUS (Μάγος), one of the followers of Simus in the merry and licentious songs, the poets of which were called ἱαποδοί. [Lysis.] [P. S.]

MAHARBAL (Μαδάρης), son of Himilco, and one of the most distinguished Carthaginian officers in the Second Punic War. He is first mentioned as commanding the besieging force at the siege of Seguntum, during the absence of Hannibal, when he carried on his operations and pressed the siege with so much vigour that neither party, says Livy, felt the absence of the general-in-chief. (Liv. xxi. 2.) We next find him detached with a body of cavalry to ravage the plains near the Po, soon after the arrival of Hannibal in Italy, but from this service he was recalled in haste to rejoin his commander before the combat on the Ticinus. (Id. xxi. 45.) After the victory of Thrasymene (a. c. 217), he was sent with a strong force of cavalry and Spanish infantry to pursue a body of 6000 Romans who had escaped from the battle and occupied a strong position in one of the neighbouring villages. Finding themselves surrounded, they were induced to lay down their arms, on receiving from Maharbal a promise of safety. Hannibal refused to ratify the capitulation, alleging that Maharbal had exceeded his powers; but he dismissed, without ransom, all those men who belonged to the Italian allies, and only retained the Roman citizens as prisoners of war. (Polyb. iii. 84, 85; Liv. xxii. 6, 7; Appian, Annab. 10.) Shortly after Maharbal had an opportunity of striking a fresh blow by intercepting the praetor C. Centinius, who was on his march to join Flaminius with a detachment of 4000 men, the whole of which were either cut to pieces or fell into the hands of the Carthaginians. (Polyb. iii. 86; Liv. xxii. 8; Appian, Annab. 11.) He is again mentioned as sent with the Numidian cavalry to ravage the rich Falernian plains; and in the following year he commanded, according to Livy, the right wing of the Carthaginian army at the battle of Cannae. Appian, on the contrary, assigns him on that occasion the command of the reserve of cavalry, and Polybius does not mention his name at all. But, whatever post he held, it is certain that he did good service on that eventful day; and it was he that, immediately after the victory, urged Hannibal to push on at once with his cavalry upon Rome itself, promising him that if he did so, within five days he should sup in the Capitol. On the refusal of his commander, Maharbal is said to have observed, that Hannibal knew indeed how to gain victories, but not how to use them; a sentiment which has been confirmed by some of the best judges in the art of war. (Liv. xxii. 13, 46, 51; Appian, Annab. 20, 21; Florus, ii. 5; Zonar. ix. 1; Cato ap. Gell. x. 24; Plutarch, Fab. 17, erroneously assigns this advice to a Carthaginian of the name of Barca.) Except an incidental notice of his presence at the siege of Casilinum (Liv. xxiii. 18), Maharbal from this period disappears from history. A person of that name is mentioned by Frontinus (Strateg. ii. 5. § 12) as employed by the Carthaginians against some African tribes that had rebelled, but whether this be the same as the subject of the present article, or to what period the event there related is referable, we have no means of judging. [E. H. B.]

MAIA (Maia or Maid), a daughter of Atlas and Pleione (whence she is called Atlantis and Pleias), was the eldest of the Pleiades, and in a groto of mount Cyllene in Arcadia she became by Zeus the mother of Hermes. Arcas, the son of Zeus by Callisto, was given to her to be reared. (Hom. Od. xiv. 435, Hymn. in Merc. 3; Hes. Theog. 938; Apollod. iii. 10. § 2, 8. § 2; Tzet. ad Lycoph. 219; Horat. Carm. i. 10. 1, 2, 42, &c.)

Maia is also the name of a divinity worshipped at Rome, who was also called Majesta. She is mentioned in connection with Vulcan, and was regarded by some as the wife of that god, though it seems for no other reason but because a priest of Vulcan offered a sacrifice to her on the first of May, while in the popular superstition of later times she was identified with Maia, the daughter of Atlas.

It is more probable that Maia was an ancient name of the bons des, who was also designated by the names of Opa, Fauna, and Fatua. (Macrob. Sat. i. 12; Gellius, xiii. 22; Fest. p. 134, ed. Müller.)

MAIOR (Μαίωρ), a Greek sophist and rhetorician, who lived about the middle of the third century after Christ, before and in the reign of the emperor Philippus. He was a native of Arabia, and wrote a work, περί ορδωσιν, in thirteen books, of which scarcely a trace has come down to us. (Suid. s. v. Μαίωρ; Budoc. p. 300; Schol. ad Hermog. p. 130.)

MAJORIANUS, JU'LIUS VALERIUS, emperor of Rome (A. D. 457—461), ascended the throne under the following circumstances. After the death of the emperor Avitus, the supreme power in the western empire remained in the hands of Ricimer, who was the real master previously, and would have assumed the imperial title, but for the certainty that his elevation would create a terrible commotion. For he was a Suevian by origin, and there was a decided prejudice among the Romans to choose a barbarian for their emperor. Ricimer consequently gave the crown to Majorianus, with the consent of the Eastern emperor Leo (A. D. 457). The name of Majorian appears as early as 438, when he distinguished himself in the war against the Franks, and ever since he had continued to serve in the field, making himself known at once for his military skill and his excellent character. He was descended from a family distinguished in the army, and was indeed one of the best men that ever filled the throne of the Caesars: he had experienced both good fortune and bad fortune, and enjoyed unbounded popularity with the troops. Ricimer thought he was only a general, unfit for administrative business, who, being accustomed to obey him, would continue so. In this respect, however, Ricimer was mistaken. As soon as Majorian was possessed of the supreme title, he aimed at supreme power also. His choice of his principal officers did great credit to his discernment: among them we mention his private secretary Petrus, Egidius who commanded in Gaul, Magnus, praefectus praetorio in Gaul, and others. In 458 the coast of Campania was infested by the Vandals, who held the sea with a powerful fleet; but Majorian, informed of their designs, had posted his troops so well, that the main body of the Vandals was surprised when on shore, and totally defeated. The only means to stop the perpetual incursions of the Vandals was to attack their king Genseric in Africa, and this Majorian resolved to do. He consequently entered Gaul with a strong army, and succeeded in quelling the domestic troubles by which that province was agitated through the intrigues of the West Gothic king Theodoric. The Roman army which he was leading to Africa was, however, anything but Roman, being mostly composed of barbarians, such as Bastarnae, Suevians, Huns, Alani, Rugii, Burgundians, Goths, and Sarmatians with whom he passed the Alps in November, 458. Majorian first went to Lyon, where he was complimented by the poet Sidonius Apollinarius, who there wrote his panegyric of Majorian, after having been pardoned by him for his participation in the previous revolt. From Lyon the emperor went to Arles, where he stayed the whole year 459, having fixed upon that city as a meeting-place for those immense, but still scattered forces, with which he intended to invade Africa. At Arles he prevailed upon Theodoric to desist from further attempts at causing disturbances in Gaul. In the beginning of 460 every thing was ready for setting out for Africa, and Majorian crossed the Pyrenees, his intention being to join his fleet, which lay at anchor in the harbour of Carthage. Meanwhile, Genseric made offers for peace, which, having been rejected by the emperor, he employed intrigues, and succeeded in bribing some of the principal officers of the Roman navy, who enabled him to surprise the fleet at Carthage. The defeat of the Romans was complete, the whole of their ships being sunk, burnt, or taken. The traitors were personal enemies of Majorian, who looked with jealousy upon his rising fortune. The loss of the fleet obliged the emperor to return to Gaul, where he remained during the ensuing winter; and Genseric having renewed his offers, he accepted them, and peace was made between Rome and Carthage. From Gaul Majorian went to Italy, where his presence became indispensable to his own interest. Ricimer, jealous of the rising power and popularity of a man whom he looked upon as his tool, formed a scheme to deprive him of the crown. While Majorian was at Tortona in Lombardy, the conspiracy broke out: he found himself unexpectedly surrounded by the partizans of Ricimer; and the only way to save his life was to abdicate, which he did on the 2d of August, 461. He died suddenly, on the 7th of August, five days after his abdication, of dysentery, as was reported; but Idatius plainly says that he was put to death by order of Ricimer, who now placed Severus on the throne.

We cannot finish this notice without calling the student's attention to the laws of Majorian, which ensure him an honourable rank among Roman legislators. He put an end to the awful fiscal oppression in the provinces; he re-invested the provincial magistrates with power to assess taxes; he stopped the dilapidation of the splendid monuments in Rome and other places, which venal officers would allow any body, who wanted building materials, to take down, if money was paid for the permission; and he made several other wise and useful laws and regulations, which are contained in the Codex Theodosianus. E.* ii. 7, sub fin.; Idatius, Chron.; Marcellin. Chron.) [W. P.]

COIN OF MAJORIANUS.

MA'LAÇON (Μαλάκων), a native of Heraclea on the Euxine, in the service of Seleucus, who slew Lysimachus with a javelin at the battle of Corpedion, B. C. 281. (Memnon, c. 8.) [E. H. R.]
MALACUS (Μαλάκός), a Greek historical writer, the author of a work entitled Συρίων Ὀψία, which is quoted by Athenaeus (vi. p. 267). It has been conjectured by some that he is the same with Apollonius of Alabanda, who was surnamed

Malaxus. [APOLLONIUS.] [C. P. M.]
 MALALAS. [ΜΑΛΑΛΑΣ]

MALAS, of Chios, a sculptor, mentioned by Piny (H. N. xxxvi. 5. a. 4) as having lived before Dipoenus and Scyllia. He was the grandfather of Anthesinus, and must therefore have flourished about the 35th or 40th Olympiad. [P. S.]

MALCHUS or MALICHUS (Μάλχος, Málchos), historical. This name is in fact a mere title and signifies "a king." (Gesenius, Léng. Phoen. Mon.
 p. 409; and Kuster, ad Suid. s. v. Πορφόριος.)

1. A Carthaginian leader who, according to Justin, was one of the first that extended the power and dominion of his country, first, by successful wars against the African tribes, and afterwards by the subjugation of great part of Sicily.
 But, having subsequently crossed into Sardinia, he was defeated in a great battle; on account of which disaster he was disgraced and banished by his countrymen. In revenge for this he led his army to Carthage and laid siege to the city. His son Carthalo was in vain sent to intercede with him; he was crucified by order of Malchus himself within sight of the walls. Yet, having at length made himself master of the city, he was content with putting to death ten of the principal senators, and left the rest in possession of the chief power, of which they soon after availed themselves to bring him to trial and condemn him to death. (Justin, xviii. 7.) Orosius, who has merely abridged the narrative of Justin, adds that these events took place during the reign of Cyrus the Great (Oros. iv. 6), but this is probably a mere inference from the statement of Justin, that Malchus was followed in the command by Mago.
 [Mago, No. 1.] The chronology of these events is in fact extremely uncertain.

2. One of the chief leaders among the Jews at the time that Cassius Longinus was in Syria, s. c.
 43. He had failed in payment of the tribute which he was appointed to collect, on which account Cassius was about to put him to death, and he was with difficulty saved by the intercession of Hyrcanus and Antipater. But, far from being grateful to Antipater for the service thus rendered him, Malchus began to form designs against his life, and at length succeeded in removing him by poison. Herod, the son of Antipater, for a time dissembled his desire of vengeance, and pretended to be reconciled to Malchus, who obtained a high place in the favour of Hyrcanus; but he soon took an opportunity to have him assassinated by a band of soldiers. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 11. §§ 2—6, 2 J. i. 11. §§ 2—8.)

3. King of Arabia Petraea (probably the same who is mentioned by Hirtius, B. Alex. 1, as sending an auxiliary force of cavalry to Caesar in Egypt, and is termed by him king of the Na-thaceans), was contemporary with Herod the Great, who fled to him for refuge when he was driven out of Jerusalem by Antigonus and the Arabians, s. c. 40. But Malchus, though bound by many obligations to Herod and his father Antater, refused to receive him in his adversity, and forbade him to enter his territories. At a subsequent period (s. c. 32) hostilities arose between Malchus and Herod, in consequence of the refusal of the former to pay the appointed tribute Cleopatra, which Herod was charged by Antony

nearly two years with various changes of fortune, but seems to have been terminated by the decisive defeat of the Arabian monarch. We however again hear of Malchus, at a subsequent period, as fomenting the intrigues of Alexandra and Hyrcanus against Herod. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 14. §§ 1
 2, xv. 4. §§ 2, 4, 5, 6. § 2, B. J. i. 14. §§ 1, 2,
 19.) [E. H. B.]

MALCHUS (Μάλχος), literary. 1. Of BYZAN-
 TIUM. [No. 4.]

2. Of MARONIA. [No. 3.]

3. MONACHUS, the MONK, author of a curious autobiography, dictated by him in his extreme old age to Jerome, then a young man residing at Maronia, a hamlet about thirty miles from Antioch.
 (Hieronym. Vita Malchi, Opera, vol. ii. col. 41,
 &c. ed. Vallartii.)

4. Of PHILADELPHIA. Among the writers from whom the Ἐκλογαὶ περὶ πρέσβων, Excerpta de Legationibus, compiled by order of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, are taken, was Malchus the sophist (Μάλχος σοφιστής). According to Suidas and Eudocia (s. v. Μάλχος) Malchus was a Byzantine; but the statement of Photius that he was a native of Philadelphia, is preferable; and his Syriac name makes it probable that Philadelphia was the city so called (the ancient Rabbah) in the country of Ammonitis, east of the Jordan. Malchus probably followed his profession of rhetorician or sophist at Constantinople, and the statement that he was a native of that city may have arisen from that circumstance. According to Suidas and Eudocia, he wrote a history extending from the reign of Constantine to that of Anastasius; but the work in seven books, of which Photius has given an account (Bibl. cod. 78), and to which he gives the title Βυζαντιακά, comprehended only the period from the final sickness of the Eastern emperor Leo I. (A. d. 473 or 474), to the death of Nepos, emperor of the West (A. d. 480). It has been supposed that this was an extract from the work mentioned by Suidas, or a mutilated copy:
 that it was incomplete is attested by Photius himself, who says that the commencement of the first of the seven books showed that the author had already written some previous portions, and that the close of the seventh book showed his intention of carrying it further, if his life was spared. Some eminent critics, among whom is Valesius (Not. in Excerpt. de Legat.), have thought that the history of Malchus began with Leo's sickness, and that he was the continuator of Priscus, whose history is supposed to have left off at that point. Niebuhr (De Historicis, &c., prefixed to the Bonn edition of the Excerpta) supposed that this coincidence arose from Photius having met with a portion only of the work of Malchus, which had been inserted in some historical Cutena after the work of Priscus; or that the history of the antecedent period had been given by Malchus in another work. As, however, Suidas and Eudocia speak of the history in its whole extent, as one work, we are rather disposed to think it was published in successive parts, as the author was able to finish it (a su-position which best coincides with the notice in Photius of the continuation being contingent on the longer duration of the author's life); and that Photius had met with only one part. Photius praises the style of Malchus as a perfect model of historical composition; pure, free from redundancy and consisting of well-selected words and phrases.

He notices also his eminence as a rhetorician, and says that he was favourable to Christianity; a statement which has been thought, but we do not see why, inconsistent with the praises he has bestowed on the heathen philosopher and diviner, Pamphilius [ILLUS]. The works of Malchus are lost, except the portions contained in the Excerpta of Constantine [CONSTANTINUS VII.], and some extracts in Suidas, which are collected and subjoined to the Bonn edition of the Excerpta. (Photius, Suidas, Eudocia, II. c.; Voessius, De Hist. Graecis, ii. 21; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 496; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 540; Niebuhr, I. c.)

5. SOPHISTA, the SOPHIST. [No. 4.]

6. OF TYRÆ. Malchus was the Hellenized form of the original Syriac name of the philosopher Porphyry. [PORPHYRIUS.] The Syriac name Malchus signifies "king;" and the Greek Porphyrius, Πορφύριος, was perhaps designed to be its equivalent. [J. C. M.]

MALECHUS CLEODEMUS. [CLEODEMUS.]

MALEATES (Μαλεάτης), a surname of Apollo, derived from cape Malea, in the south of Laconia. He had sanctuaries under this name at Sparta and on mount Cynortium. (Paus. iii. 12. § 7, ii. 27, in fin.) [L. S.]

MA'LELAS, or MALALAS, IOANNES (Ἰωάννης ὁ Μαλέλας or Μαλάλας), a native of Antioch, and a Byzantine historian. According to Hody he lived in the ninth century; but it is more probable that he lived shortly after Justinian the Great, as Gibbon very positively asserts (Decline and Fall, vol. vii. p. 61, not. 1, ed. 1815, 8vo.). Those, however, who pretend that he could not have lived after Mohammed, simply because his name in Syriac, ("Malalas,") means "an orator," the Syrian language being soon superseded by the Arabic, are much mistaken, for the outrooting of the Syriac was no more the work of a century than of a day. It is unknown who Malelas was. He wrote a voluminous history, or rather chronicle of the world, with special regard to Roman, Greek, and especially Byzantine history. It originally began with the creation of the world, but the commencement is lost, and the extant portion begins with the death of Vulcanus and the accession of his son Sol, and finishes abruptly with the expedition of Marcianus, the nephew of Justinian the Great, against the Cutsinae in Africa. We do not know how much of the end is lost. This history is full of most absurd stories, yet contains also some very curious facts, and is of great importance for the history of Justinian and his immediate predecessors. The earlier emperors are treated very briefly; eight lines seemed sufficient to the author for the reign of Arcadius. The Eastern emperors have more space allotted to them than the Western. The style is barbarous, except where the author copies other historians who wrote well: the Chronicon Pascale and Cedrenus are extracted to a large extent. Edmund Chilmead of Oxford prepared the Editio Princeps, from a Bodleian MS., but he died before he accomplished his task, and the work was published by Humphrey Hody, Ox. 1691, 8vo. That MS. does not contain the beginning of the work, but Chilmead thought that Georgius Hamartolus had copied this portion of the history of Malelas, and consequently supplied the defect from the dry account of Hamartolus. The whole work was divided by Chilmead into 18 books, the first of which, as well as the beginning of the second, belong to Hamartolus. Hody added very valuable prolegomena. The Venice reprint of the Oxford edition (1733, fol.) is quite useless. The Bonn edition by L. Dindorf, 1831, 8vo., is a very careful and revised reprint of the Oxford edition, which contains a considerable number of small omissions, misprints, and other trifling defects, though, on the whole, it is a very good one. Dindorf thought that the account of Hamartolus was not identical with that of Malelas, and consequently published it separately, under the title "Anonymi Chronologica;" he might as well have put the name of Hamartolus on the title. A very good account of Malelas is given by Bentley in his "Epistola ad Joannem Millium," on Malelas and other contemporary writers, which is given in the Oxford and Bonn editions. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 446, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 568; Hamburger, Nachrichten von Gelehrten Männern.) [W. P.]

MA'LEUS (Μάλεος), a son of Heracles by Omphale, is said to have been the inventor of the trumpet. (Schol. ad Hom. II. xviii. 219; Stat. Thel. iv. 224.) [L. S.]

MA'LIADDES (Μαλίδης νύμφης), nymphs who were worshipped as the protectors of flocks and of fruit-trees. They are also called Μυλίδες or Έμυλίδες. (Theocrit. i. 22, with Valck. note, xiii. 45; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1963.) The same name is also given to the nymphs of the district of the Malians on the river Spercheus. (Soph. Philoct. 725.) [L. S.]

MA'LEOLUS, PUBLICIUS. 1. M. PUBLICIUS L. F. L. N. MALLEOLUS, consul a. c. 232 with M. Aemilius Lepidus, was sent with his colleague against the Sardinians. (Zonar. viii. p. 401, c.) It was this M. Publicius and his brother L. Publicius who built in their aedileship the temple of Flora, instituted the Florales Ludi, and also built the beautiful clivus (Publicius Clivus) which led up the Aventine. They executed these works with the money obtained from the fines which were exacted from the persons who had violated the agrarian laws. Varro and Ovid call them plebeian, but Festus curule aediles. (Tac. Ann. ii. 49; Festus, p. 238, ed. Müller; Or. Fast. v. 279, &c.; Varro, L. L. v. 158, ed. Müller.) Their aedileship must have fallen in a. c. 240, as we learn from Velleius Paterculus (i. 14) that the Florales Ludi were instituted in that year. (Compare Pighius, Annal. vol. ii. p. 72.)

2. L. PUBLICIUS L. F. L. N. MALLEOLUS, aedile with his brother in a. c. 240, as is mentioned above. We may conclude, from his praenomen being the same as that of their father, that he was the elder brother.

3. PUBLICIUS MALLEOLUS killed his mother, and was in consequence sewn up in a sack, and cast into the sea. This occurred in a. c. 101, and is mentioned as the first instance of this crime which had occurred among the Romans. (Orat. v. 16; Liv. Epit. 58; Cic. ad Herenn. i. 13.)

4. C. (PUBLICIUS) MALLEOLUS, quaestor M. Cn. Dolabella in Cilicia, a. c. 80, died in the province, and was succeeded in his office by Verres, who also became the tutor of his son. Malleolus had amassed great wealth in the province by plundering the provincials, but, according to the statement of Cicero, Verres took good care to apply the greater part of it to his own use. Cicero further says, that Malleolus was killed (occisus) by Verres.

but this is probably an oratorical exaggeration, as the scholiast suggests. (Cic. Verr. l. 15, 36; Pseudo-Ascon. ad ll. cc.)

MALLIA GENS, plebeian. This name is frequently confounded with that of Manlius; and in almost every passage where Mallius occurs some authorities read Manlius. It appears, however, from ancient inscriptions and the best manuscripts, that Mallius is the correct reading in certain cases; and we can easily understand how this name, which was one of no celebrity, should be altered into the well-known one of Manlius. The only person in this gens who obtained any of the higher offices of the state was Cn. Mallius Maximus, who was consul B. C. 105. [MAXIMUS.]

C. MALLIUS, one of Catiline's conspirators, was stationed by the chief at Fesulæ in Etruria, where he was commissioned to collect an army and prepare all military stores. He had served under Sulla as a centurion, and possessed great military experience and reputation. In the battle against Cicero's colleague, Antonius, in which Catiline fell, Mallius commanded the right wing, and was killed in the conflict. (Sall. Cat. 24, 27—30, 32, 33, 36, 59, 60; Cic. in Cat. l. 3, 9, 12, ii. 6, 9; Dion. Cass. xxxvii. 30.)

MALLIUS THEODORUS. [THEODORUS.] MALUGINENSIS, a celebrated patrician family of the Cornelia gens in the early ages of the republic. It disappears from history even before the time of the Samnite wars. This family seems to have been originally the same as that of Cossus, since we find at first both surnames united. [See No. 1.] Afterwards, however, the Cossi and Maluginenses became two separate families. [COSSUS.]

1. SER. CORNELIUS P. F. COSSUS MALUGINENSIS, consul B. C. 485 with Q. Fabius Vibulanus, a which year Sp. Cassius was condemned. Maluginenses carried on war against the Veientes with success. (Liv. ii. 41; Dionys. viii. 77, 82.)

2. L. CORNELIUS SER. P. F. N. MALUGINENSIS, consul B. C. 459 with Q. Fabius Vibulanus. The consul of this year carried on war against the Volsci and the Aequi with great glory and success. According to some accounts Maluginensis took Anium, and we learn from the triumphal Fasti that he obtained a triumph for his victory over the Antiates. (Liv. iii. 22—24; Dionys. x. 20, 21; Diod. xi. 86.) He is mentioned as one of the defenders in the senate of the second decemvirate B. C. 449, because his brother Marcus was one of the number (Liv. iii. 40; Dionys. xi. 15); but if we can rely upon the Fasti, in which Marcus is called L. P. SER. N., we must understand frater and δελφός to mean first cousin, and not brother.

3. M. CORNELIUS L. P. SER. N. MALUGINENSIS, a member of the second decemvirate. [See No. 2.] (Liv. iii. 35, 40, 41; Dionys. x. 58, xi. 14, 23.)

4. M. CORNELIUS M. F. MALUGINENSIS, consul B. C. 436 with L. Papirius Crassus. (Liv. iv. 21; Diod. xii. 46.)

5. P. CORNELIUS M. F. M. N. MALUGINENSIS, one of the consular tribunes, B. C. 404. (Liv. iv. 4; Diod. xiv. 19.)

6. P. CORNELIUS P. F. M. N. MALUGINENSIS, consular tribune in B. C. 397 (Liv. v. 16; Diod. dv. 88), and magister equitum to the dictator M. Furius Camillus in B. C. 396. At least the Fasti Capitolini name Maluginensis as the magister equitum in this year; but Livy (v. 19) and Plutarch

(Camill. 5) call the magister equitum P. Cornelius Scipio. He was consular tribune a second time in B. C. 390, the year in which Rome was taken by the Gauls. (Liv. v. 36; Diod. xiv. 110.) In Diodorus and in the common editions of Livy his praenomen is Servius, but in some of the best MSS. of Livy he is called Publius.

7. P. CORNELIUS MALUGINENSIS COSSUS, consular tribune B. C. 395, and consul B. C. 393 with L. Valerius Potitus. [COSSUS, No. 9.]

8. M. CORNELIUS P. F. P. N. MALUGINENSIS, was elected censor in B. C. 393, to supply the place of C. Julius Julia, who had died in his year of office; but as Rome was taken by the Gauls in this lustrum, this practice was considered of ill omen, and no censor was ever elected again in place of one who had died in his year of office. (Liv. v. 31, ix. 34.)

9. SER. CORNELIUS P. F. M. N. MALUGINENSIS, seven times consular tribune: the first time in B. C. 386, the second time in B. C. 384, the third time in B. C. 382, the fourth time in B. C. 380, the fifth time in B. C. 376 (Livy does not mention the consular tribunes of this year, see Diod. xv. 71, and Anonym. Noric.), the sixth time in B. C. 370, and a seventh time in B. C. 368. (Liv. vi. 6, 18, 22, 27, 36, 38.)

10. M. CORNELIUS MALUGINENSIS, consular tribune in B. C. 369, and again in B. C. 367. (Liv. vi. 36, 42.)

11. SER. CORNELIUS SER. P. M. N. MALUGINENSIS, magister equitum to the dictator F. Quinctius Pennus Capitolinus Crispinus, B. C. 361, who was appointed to conduct the war against the Gauls. (Liv. vii. 9.) [CAPITOLINUS, QUINCTIUS, No. 7.]

MALUS (Μάλος), a son of Amphictyon or of Amyrus, said to have given the name to the town of Malieus. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μαλιεύς.) [L. S.]

MAMAEA, JU'LIA, the daughter of Julia Maesa, the niece of Septimius Severus, the first cousin of Caracalla, the aunt of Elagabalus, the wife of Gessius Marcianus, the mother of Alexander Severus. [See genealogical table prefixed to CARACALLA.] She was a native of Emesa in Syria, and seems, after the accession of Septimius Severus, to have lived at Rome, under the protection of her aunt Julia Domna. At all events it is clear that she must have been at court in A. D. 204, otherwise the report, which at one time gained general credit, that Alexander as well as Elagabalus was in reality the son of Caracalla, could never have been circulated. We know nothing of her subsequent history, until the period when she accompanied Elagabalus to Rome. From that time forward she became remarkable on account of the diligence with which she protected the person of her son from the treachery of his cousin, and the exemplary zeal with which she guarded the purity of his mind in the midst of a very hot-bed of vice and debauchery. The high principles which she instilled were fully developed after his elevation to the throne, and proved a blessing to mankind during his short reign. But the character of Mamaea was not without serious defects. Extreme pride, and a jealousy of power which could brook no rival, led her to treat with great harshness and indignity one, at least, of her daughters-in-law. Her counsels, swayed by an inordinate desire to accumulate money, induced Severus to adopt a system of ill-judged parsimony towards his soldiers, and thus gave rise to the mutiny which proved fatal both to herself and to her son, who is said to have upbraided her with his dying breath as the cause of his destruction. Their death took place in Gaul, early in the year A.D. 235. (For authorities, see CARACALLA; ELAGABALUS; SEVERUS.) [W. R.]

COIN OF JULIA MAMAEA.

MAMERCINUS or MAMERCUS, the most ancient family of the patrician Aemilia gens, and one of the most distinguished of all the Roman families in the early ages of the republic. The family professed to derive its name from Mamercus in the reign of Numa, to whom indeed all the Aemilii traced their origin. [MAMERCUS; AEMILIA GENA.] This family, like many of the other distinguished families in early Roman history, disappears about the time of the Samnite wars. The name Mamercus was very early used as a praenomen in the Aemilia gens, and continued to be so employed, especially by the Aemilii Lepidi, long after the family of this name had become extinct. In the same way we find that Cossus, which was originally a family-name of the Corneli, was revived as a praenomen by the Corneli Lentuli, after the family of the Cossi had sunk into oblivion. [COSSUS.]

1. L. AEMILIUS MAM. P. MAMERCUS, consul for the first time in B.C. 484 with K. FABIVS VIBULANUS, conquered the Volsci and Aequi, according to Livy, but suffered a defeat from them, according to the statement of Dionysius, who also says that Mamercus was in consequence ashamed to go into the city for the purpose of holding the comitia. (Liv. ii. 42; Dionys. viii. 88—87; Diod. xi. 38.) He was consul a second time in B.C. 478 with C. Servilius Structus Ahala, and defeated the Veientes before the walls of their city with great slaughter. He subsequently concluded a treaty with them on terms which the senate regarded as too favourable, and was in consequence denied the honour of a triumph. (Liv. ii. 49; Dionys. ix. 16, 17; Diod. xi. 52.) He was consul a third time in B.C. 473 with Vopiscus Julius. For the events of this year see JULUS, No. 3, where the authorities are given. We learn from Dionysius (ix. 51) that he supported in B.C. 470 the agrarian law, on account of his hostility to the senate for having denied him a triumph.

2. TIB. AEMILIUS L. P. MAM. N. MAMERCUS, son of No. 1, was consul in B.C. 470 with L. Valerius Potitus. Their year of office was one of considerable agitation, on account of the agrarian law and the trial of App. Claudius. Tib. Mamercus supported the law along with his father, because the latter had been wronged by the senate. [No. 1.] He also led an army into the country of the Sabines, but did not perform anything of consequence. (Liv. ii. 61, 62; Dionys. ix. 51, 55; Diod. xi. 69.) He was consul a second time in B.C. 467 with Q. Fabius Vibulanus, and again warmly supported the agrarian law: in each year it was no doubt the execution of the Censius law which he endeavoured to carry into effect. In this year he was to some extent successful. Without disturbing the occupiers of the public land, some land which had been taken from the Volsci in the preceding year was assigned to the plebs, and a colony sent to Antium. Mamercus carried on war against the Sabines again in this year. (Liv. iii. 1; Dionys. ix. 59; Diod. xi. 74; comp. Niebahr, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. pp. 229, 230.)

3. MAM. AEMILIUS M. P. MAMERCINUS, consular tribune in B.C. 438. (Liv. iv. 16; Diod. xii. 38.) In B.C. 437 he was nominated dictator, to prosecute the war against the Veientes and Fidenates, because Fidenae had revolted in the previous year to Lar Tolumnius, the king of Veii. He appointed L. Quinctius Cincinnatus his magister equitum, and gained a brilliant victory over the forces of the enemy, and obtained a triumph in consequence. (Liv. iv. 17—20; Entrop. i. 19; Lydus, de Magistr. i. 38.) It was in this battle that Lar Tolumnius is said by Livy to have been killed in single combat by Cornelius Cossus; but it is very doubtful whether this event happened in this year. [See COSSUS, No. 2.] Indeed the conquest of the Fidenates and the death of Lar Tolumnius is referred by Niebahr to B.C. 426, in which year Aemilius Mamercinus is stated to have been dictator for the third time. And it is not improbable, as Niebahr remarks, that "some member of the Aemilian house found matter in legendary traditions for an apocryphal panegyric on this Aemilius: in this panegyric more dictatorships were probably ascribed to him than he ever really filled, and the exploits achieved under his auspices, as well as his own, were referred to definite years, which they did not belong to. (Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 458.)

But, returning to the ancient authorities, we find that Aemilius Mamercinus is put down as dictator a second time in B.C. 433 with A. Postumius Tubertus as his magister equitum. He was appointed to the dictatorship through fear of an impending war in Etruria, but this passed off, and he had no occasion to leave the city. In this year he carried a law limiting to eighteen months the duration of the censorship, which had formerly lasted for five years. This measure was received with great approbation by the people; but the censors then in office were so enraged at it, that they removed him from his tribe, and reduced him to the condition of an acerarius. (Liv. iv. 23, 24.) He is named as dictator a third time in B.C. 426 with A. Cornelius Cossus as his magister equitum. It was probably in this year, as we have already stated, that he conquered the Veientes and Fidenates, and took Fidenae, not in his first dictatorship, though Livy and other ancient authorities speak of a victory gained over these people in each of these years. (Liv. iv. 31—34; Oros. ii. 13; Diod. xii. 60.)

4. M. AEMILIUS MAM. P. M. N. MAMERCINUS, son of No. 3, was consul in B.C. 410 with C. Valerius Potitus Volusus. (Liv. iv. 53; Diod. xiii. 76.) He was also three times consular tribune, first in B.C. 405, a second time in B.C. 403, and a third time in B.C. 401. (Liv. iv. 61, v. 1, 10.)

5. C. AEMILIUS TIB. P. TIB. N. MAMERCINUS, consular tribune in B.C. 394, carried on the war with his colleague Sp. Postumius Albius against the Aequi. He was consular tribune again in B.C.

391, when, in conjunction with his colleague C. Læcinius, he conquered the people of Volturni. (Liv. v. 26, 28, 32; Diod. xiv. 97, 107.)

6. L. AEMILIUS MAM. F. M. N. MAMERCINUS, son of No. 3, was consular tribune seven times, first in B.C. 391 (Fast. Capit.), a second time in 389, a third time in 387, a fourth time in 383, a fifth time in 382, a sixth time in 380, and a seventh time in 377. (Liv. vi. 1, 5, 21, 22, 27, 32.)

7. L. AEMILIUS L. F. MAM. N. MAMERCINUS, son of No. 6, was magister equitum to the dictator M. Furius Camillus, B.C. 368. He was consul in B.C. 366 with L. Sextius Lateranus, who was the first plebeian elected to this dignity, in accordance with the Licinian law, which had been recently passed. He was again elected to the consulship in B.C. 363, with Cn. Genucius Aventinensis. (Liv. vi. 38, vii. 1, 3; Diod. xv. 82, xvi. 2.)

8. L. AEMILIUS L. F. L. N. MAMERCINUS, son of No. 7, was interrex in B.C. 353, and magister equitum to C. Julius Julius in B.C. 352. (Liv. vii. 17, 21.)

9. L. AEMILIUS L. F. L. N. MAMERCINUS PRIVERNAS, the son of No. 8, a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, was consul for the first time in B.C. 341 with C. Plautius Venno Sympnus, in which year he merely laid waste the Samnite territory. In B.C. 335 he was elected dictator, for the purpose of holding the comitia as he consuls were absent from Rome. In B.C. 329 he was consul a second time with C. Plautius Deianus. There was great alarm at Rome at this time, in consequence of a report that the Gauls were marching southward. Accordingly, while the Gauls proceeded against Privernum, which continued to prolong its resistance, Mamercinus began to levy a large army, in order to oppose the Gauls; as the report of the Gaulish inroad proved to be unfounded, both consuls united their forces against Privernum. The town was taken, and Mamercinus as well as his colleague obtained a triumph in consequence. The capture of this town must have been regarded as a very glorious achievement, since Mamercinus received the surname of Privernas, and the Plautii preserved the collection of it upon their coins. In B.C. 316 Mamercinus was again elected dictator, and fought against the Samnites with success. (Liv. viii. 1, 20, ix. 21.)

10. TIB. AEMILIUS TIB. F. TIB. N. MAMERCINUS, consul B.C. 339 with Q. Publilius Philo, invested his colleague with the dictatorship, for the purpose of depriving the curiae of a part of their power. (See Dict. of Ant. s. v. titulus Leges.) Livy attributes the appointment of Publilius to disappointment on the part of the latter, who had been refused a triumph by the senate; but respecting the real reason for this step, see Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 1, &c. (Liv. viii. 12.)

MAMERCUS (Μάμερκος), according to one tradition a son of king Numa, who chose this name because one of the sons of Pythagoras likewise bore it. (Plut. Num. 8; Paul. Diac. p. 23, ed. Müller.) Another tradition made Mamercus a son of Mars and Sylvia. (Plut. Parall. Gr. et Rom. 26.) Festus says that Mamercus was a praenomen among the Oscans, who called the god Mars, Mamers. But it would seem that Marcus or Mamercus was the common name for indigenous soothsayers and founders of new forms of religious worship, for it occurs in many instances of this kind. (Hartung, Die Rel. der Röm. vol. i. p. 129.) [L. S.]

MAMERCUS (Μάμερκος), tyrant of Catana, at the time when Timoleon landed in Sicily, B.C. 344. He is termed by Plutarch a man both warlike and wealthy. After the defeat of Hicetas at Adranum by Timoleon, Mamercus joined the latter and concluded a treaty of alliance with him. But when Timoleon had not only made himself master of Syracuse, but defeated the Carthaginians in the great battle of the Crimissus (B.C. 339), Mamercus became apprehensive that his object was nothing less than the complete expulsion of all the tyrants from Sicily, and in consequence concluded a league with Hicetas and the Carthaginians to oppose his progress. They at first obtained a partial success, and cut to pieces a body of mercenaries in the Syracusan service; but Hicetas was defeated by Timoleon, and soon after fell into his hands; after which the Corinthian leader marched against Catana. Mamercus met him in the field, but was defeated with heavy loss, and the Carthaginians now concluded a peace with Timoleon. Thus abandoned by his allies Mamercus despaired of success, and fled to Messana, where he took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. Timoleon, however, quickly followed, and laid siege to Messana both by sea and land, whereupon Hippon took to flight, and Mamercus surrendered to the Corinthian general, stipulating only for a regular trial before the Syracusans. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly of the people there, he was condemned by acclamation, and executed like a common malefactor. (Plut. Timol. 13, 30, 31, 34; Diod. xvi. 69, 82; Corn. Nep. Timol. 2.) We may, perhaps, infer from an expression of Cornelius Nepos, that Mamercus was not a Sicilian by birth, but had first come to the island as a leader of Italian mercenaries. Plutarch informs us (Timol. 31) that he prided himself much upon his skill in poetry, apparently with but little reason, if we may judge from the two verses preserved to us by that author. [E. H. R.]

MAMERCUS, AEMI'LIUS. [MAMERCINUS.]

MAMERCUS SCAURUS. [SCAURUS.]

MAMERS was the Oscan name of the god Mars. (Paul. Diac. p. 131, ed. Müller.) Varro (De Ling. Lat. v. 73; comp. Plut. Num. 21), on the other hand, calls Mamertus the Sabine name of the god. The Romans worshipped Mamers as a rustic divinity, and reckoned him among the country Lares. (Cato, de Re Rust. 83, 141.) The ancients derived the name of the Mamertines in Messana from the god Mamers. [L. S.]

MAMERTINUS. The first piece in the collection of the "Panegyrici Veteres" [see DREPANUS] usually bears the title, Claudii Mamertini Panegyricus Maximiano Herculo dictus, was spoken on the 21st of April, in the year A.D. 289, at some city of Gaal, probably Trèves, and is addressed to Maximianus Herculeus, at that time actively engaged in preparations against Carausius. It must be observed that the name Mamertinus is altogether wanting in several of the best MSS., and it is doubtful whether it appears in any of the more ancient.

The second piece in the collection, which stands in printed editions as Claudii Mamertini Panegyricus Genethliacus Maximiano Augusto dictus, is in honour of the birthday of the emperor, and falls between the first of April, A. D. 291, and the first of March A. D. 292 (Clinton, Fasti Rom. ad ann. 291). In this case it is admitted that none of the more ancient MSS. present us with the name of Mamertinus, but usually state that it is by the same author as the preceding, a conclusion fully warranted by the general tone, as well as by some peculiarities of expression, and indeed there seems to be in c. 5 a distinct allusion to the former discourse.

The tenth piece in the collection is inscribed, Mamertini pro Consulatu Gratiano Actio Juliano Augusto, belongs to A. D. 362, and was delivered at Constantinople, soon after the accession of Julian, by Claudius Mamertinus, consul for the year, who had previously held the offices of praefect of the Aerarium and praefect of Illyricum, manifestly a different person from the Claudius Mamertinus of the first two orations, if we admit the existence of an individual bearing that appellation as their author. (See the dissertations prefixed to the edition of the Panegyrici Veteres, by Schwarzius, 4to. Venet. 1728; to the Censura XII. Panegyricorum Veterum, in the 6th volume of the Opuscula Academica of Heyne; and the other authorities cited under DREPANUS.) [W. R.]

MAMERTUS (Μάμερος), an ancient surname of Ares, which must have arisen after the identification of the Italian Mamers with the Greek Ares. (Lycoph. 938, 1410.) [L. S.]

MAMERTUS, CLAUDIUS ECDIDIUS, was a presbyter in the diocese of Vienne, in France, of which his brother was bishop, and lived in the middle of the fifth century of our era. He died about the year 470, and his praises are celebrated at great length by Sidonius Apollinaria. (Epist. iv. 11.) His works are as follow:—

1. De Statu Animae, in three books, against the opinions of Faustus Reiensis. [FAUSTUS, p. 142, a.] This work was first published by P. Mosellanus, Basil. 1520; afterwards by Grynaeus in his Orthodoxogr. p. 1247; in the Biblioth. Patrum Max. Lugdun. vol. vi. p. 1050, &c., and by Casp. Barthius, Cygneae, 1655.

2. Epistolae. Besides the letter to Sidonius Apollinaria, in which Mamertus dedicates to him his work De Statu Animae, there is also another letter to Sidonius, preserved among the epistles of the latter. (Epist. iii. 2.) Sidonius, in his reply (iii. 3), extols Mamertus and his work in the most extraordinary manner.

3. Carmen contra Poetas Vanos, a poem in hexameter verse, in which the author maintains the superiority of Christian doctrines over heathen poetry. The versification of this poem is smooth and flowing, and it bears evidence of its writer having carefully studied some of the best of the Roman poets. It is printed in Fabricius, Corp. Poët. Christ. p. 775, &c., and in the Biblioth. Patrum Mur. Lugdun. vol. vi. p. 1074.

4. The hymn De Passione Domini, beginning with the words Pange lingua gloriosi praetium certaminis, in the Roman breviary, is ascribed by some writers to Mamertus, and by others to Venantius Fortunatus.

5. The poems Carmen Paschale, Laus Christi, and Miracula Christi, which are printed among the works of the great poet Claudian, are by some writers likewise attributed to this Claudian Mamertus, but were perhaps written by neither of them. (Sidon. Apoll. iv. 2, 3, 11, v. 2; Gennad. De Viris Illustr. 83; Trithem. De Script. Eccles. 178; Fabric. Biblioth. Med. et Infim. Lat. i. v. Claudianus; Bähr, Geschichte d. Römisch. Literatur, Supplement-Band. i. § 33, ii. § 169.)

MAMILIA GENS, plebeian, was originally one of the most distinguished families in Tusculum, and indeed in the whole of Latium. It is first mentioned in the time of the Tarquins; and it was to a member of this family, Octavius Mamilius, that Tarquinius Superbus betrothed his daughter. The Mamilii traced their name and origin to the mythical Mamilia, the daughter of Telegonus, who was regarded as the founder of Tusculum, and was the reputed son of Ulysses and the goddess Circe. (Liv. i. 49; Dionys. iv. 45; Festus, p. 130, ed. Müller.) In B. C. 458 the Roman citizenship was given to L. Mamilius on account of his marching unsummoned two years before to the assistance of the city when it was attacked by Herdonius. (Liv. iii. 18, 29.) But although the Mamilii had obtained the Roman franchise, it was some time before any of the members of the house obtained any of the higher offices of the state: the first who received the consulship was L. Mamilius Vitulus, in B. C. 265, the year before the commencement of the first Punic war. The gens was divided into three families, LIMETANUS, TURRINUS, and VITULUS, of which the two latter were the most ancient and the most important. Limetanus, however, is the only surname which occurs on coins.

The mythical origin of the Mamilia gens, which has been mentioned above, is evidently referred to in the annexed coin. The obverse represents the head of Mercury or Hermes, who was the ancestor of Ulysses, and the reverse Ulysses himself, clad in a mean and humble dress, that he might not be recognised by the suitors. (Eckhel, vol. v. pp. 245, 243.)

COIN OF THE MAMILIA GENS.

MAMILIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny to whom the latter addressed two letters (ix. 12, 25), but of whose life we know nothing, except that he was engaged in military service when Pliny wrote to him.

MAMILIUS. 1. OCTAVIUS MAMILIUS, of Tusculum, called by Livy "longe princeps Latini nominis," was the person to whom Tarquinius Superbus gave his daughter, when he was anxious to conciliate the Latins. On the expulsion of the Tarquins from Rome, Superbus took refuge with is father-in-law, who, according to the beautiful as preserved by Livy, roused the Latin people against the infant republic, and perished in the great battle at the lake Regillus, by the hands of L. Herminius, whom he also slew. (Liv. i. 49, ii. 5, 19, 20; Dionys. iv. 45, v. 4—vi. 12; Cic. de Nat. Deor. ii. 2, ad Att. ix. 10.)

2. L. MAMILIUS, dictator or chief magistrate at Asculum in B.C. 460, marched in that year unsummoned to the assistance of Rome when it was attacked by Herdonius. For his services on this occasion he was rewarded two years afterwards with the Roman franchise. (Liv. iii. 18, 29; Dionys. x. 16.)

3. C. MAMILIUS, plebeian aedile, B.C. 207. Liv. xxvii. 36.)

MAMMAS (GREGORIUS), or MELISSEIUS (GREGORIUS), a monk of the latest Byzantine period. We first read of him as negotiator reconciling the brothers of the emperor Joannes I. Palaeologus. He was one of the Greek ecclesiastics, who accompanied the emperor, A.D. 1438, to the synod of Ferrara, and then held the office of Πνευματικός, "Pneumaticus," "Pater Spiritualis," or Confessor to the Emperor. He appears to have gone unwillingly; and Sguroplu (not, however, a very trustworthy witness) has recorded a saying of his one of his confidential friends, "If I go there, I will work all manner of evil." At first, after his rival in Italy, he was most vehement in his denunciations of hostility to the Latin church; but he was led, apparently by a quarrel with Marcus Eusebius, archbishop of Ephesus, and the great champion of the Greek church, and by a present or pension from the pope (Sguroplu. viii. 6) to pass over to the opposite side, and become a warm advocate of the union of the churches. Just before the removal of the synod from Ferrara to Florence, the emperor conferred on him the post of protosyncellus; and in A.D. 1446 he was appointed patriarch of Constantinople; but this was against his will; and after holding that dignity for about seven years, he escaped from Constantinople, where he was Latinizing opinions and his support of the union made him odious, and the fall of which he foresaw must soon take place, and fled into Italy. He died at Rome A.D. 1459, and was buried there. His memory is held in great reverence by the Roman Catholics; and it has even been asserted that miracles were wrought at his tomb. Sguroplu generally calls Gregorius by his name and title of office, without his surname. Phranza calls him Gregorius Melisaeus (ὁ Μηλισσηνός), but states that others called him Strategopulus (Στρατηγόπουλος), a name which, as Phranza elsewhere (ii. 2) states, many members of the illustrious family of the Melisaei had derived from Alexius strategopulus, who had recovered Constantinople at the hands of the Latins. The name Mammula (ὁ Μάμμου) is given him by the author of the Historia Politica in the Turco-Græcia of Crusius. Sguroplu, Hist. Concil. Florent. iii. 20, v. 15, i. 23, 24, vii. 14, viii. 6, &c.; Phranza, Anales, ii. 12, 15, 19, iii. 1; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 309.)

The works of Gregorius are as follows: 1. Ἀπολογία Γρηγορίου ἱερομονάχου τοῦ μεγάλου πρωτοπρεσβυτέρου, τοῦ πνευματικοῦ, τοῦ ὑπερῶν χρηματιστῆς πατριάρχου, καὶ ἐν Ῥώμῃ ταφέντος καὶ μεταβυρσοῦντος, εἰς τὴν τοῦ Ἐφέσου ἐπιστολὴν ἡ ἀπεφάνη δόξα, Gregorii Hieromonachi, Magni

Protosyncelli et a Confessionis, qui postmodum creatus est Patriarcha, et Romae sepultus cornu-covit Miraculis, Responsio ex variis Sanctorum Sententiis ad Epistolam Marci Ephesii. This answer was translated into Latin by Joannes Matthæus Caryophilus, and subjoined by him to the second volume of the Acta Concilii Florentini: it is reprinted in some editions of the Concilia, e.g. in the last vol. of that of Binius, in vol. xiii. of that of Labbe, and in that of Hardouin, vol. ix. col. 601—670. This work is twice mentioned by Fabricius; first as Antirrheticus adversus Marci Ephesii Epistolam, and then as Apologia a Responsio ad Epistolam Ephesii, as if he was speaking of two distinct works. 2. Γρηγορίου πρωτοσυγκέλλου πατριάρχου Κωνσταντινουπόλεως πρὸς τὸν βασιλέα Τραπεζούντος, Gregorii Protosyncelli, Patriarchae Constantinopolitani, ad Imperatorem Trapezuntis. This is given in the Græcia Orthodoxa of Allatius, vol. i. p. 419, 420. Rome, 1652, with a Latin version by the editor. These are the only works of Gregory which have been published; but there are extant in MS.: 3. Ἀπολογία εἰς τὴν τοῦ Ἐφέσου ὁμολογίαν, Apologia in Confessionem Marci Ephesii. This is in the libraries of Florence and Munich. 4. Πραγματεία, Tractatus, sc. de Synodo Florentino, mentioned by Gregory himself in his Ἀπολογία (Concil. vol. ix. col. 658, c. d. Hardouin), and described by Fabricius as Apologia pro quinque Capitulis Florentini Concilii. Many Epistolæ of Gregory are, or were, extant in the Vatican library. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 393; Cave, Hist. Litt. (Appendix) ad ann. 1440, vol. ii. Appendix, p. 152, ed. Oxford, 1740—42; Bandini, Catalog. Codd. MSS. Biblioth. Medic. Laur. vol. i. pp. 483, 484; Aretin a. Hardt, Catalog. Codd. MSS. Biblioth. Reg. Bavar. vol. i. pp. 146, 147.) [J. C. M.]

MA'MMULA, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelia gens, but which never became of much importance in the state.

1. A. CORNELIUS MAMMULA, was praetor, B.C. 217, at the commencement of the second Punic war, in which year he vowed a ver sacrum (Dict. of Ant. s. v.), but this vow was not fulfilled till B.C. 195 (Liv. xxxiii. 44, compared with xxii. 9, sub fin.). In B.C. 216 Mammula was propraetor in Sardinia, and applied in vain to the senate for corn and pay for his troops. (Liv. xxxiii. 21; Val. Max. vii. 6. § 1.)

2. A. CORNELIUS MAMMULA, praetor B.C. 191, in which year the war with Antiochus broke out, received as his province the southern part of Italy (Bruttii). (Liv. xxxv. 24, xxxvi. 2, xxxvii. 2, 4.)

3. P. CORNELIUS MAMMULA, praetor B.C. 180, with the province of Sicily. (Liv. xl. 35.)

4. M. CORNELIUS MAMMULA, was sent with four others as ambassador to Perseus, king of Macedonia, and Ptolemy, king of Egypt, in B.C. 173. (Liv. xlii. 6.)

MAMURIUS VETURIUS. [VETURIUS.]

MAMURRA, a Roman knight, born at Formiae, was the commander of the engineers (praefectus fabrum) in Julius Caesar's army in Gaul. He amassed great riches, the greater part of which, however, he owed to Caesar's liberality. He is mentioned by Pliny as the first person at Rome who covered all the walls of his house with layers of marble, and also as the first, all of the columns in whose house were made of solid marble. In one of the poems of Catullus, addressed to Caesar (Curia, xxix.), Mamurra is attacked, together with the dictator, with the severest invectives; but, instead of resenting the insult, Caesar simply retaliated by inviting the poet to dine with him. In another poem of Catullus (Carm. lvii.), Mamurra and Caesar are said to have lived on the most disgraceful terms; and the former is again alluded to in a third poem (Carm. xlii. 4), under the name of deceptor Formianus (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 6, s. 7; Suet. Caes. 73; Cic. ad Att. vii. 7, xlii. 52.). Mamurra seems to have been alive in the time of Horace, who calls Formiae, in ridicule, Mamurrarum urbs (Sat. i. 5. 37), from which we may infer that his name had become a bye-word of contempt.

MANA or MANA GENITA, an ancient Italian divinity. When a sacrifice was offered to her, the people used to pray that none of those born in the house should become pious, that is, that none should die. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 52.) The name Mana is of the same root as Manes, and like manis (whence immanis) originally signified good. (Comp. Macrobi. Sat. i. 3; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 63; Isidor. Orig. viii. 11.) It is not impossible that Mana may be the same divinity as Mania. [L. S.]

MANAECHMUS or MENAECHMUS (Μανᾶχμος or Μενᾶχμος). 1. A native of Sicyon, who lived in the time of the first Ptolemy. He was the son of a man named Alcibiades or Alcibiadea. He wrote an account of Alexander the Great; a treatise ἐπὶ τοῦ βασιλέως, quoted by Athenaeus, ii. p. 65, a., and elsewhere; and a treatise entitled Σικωνικά, quoted by Athenaeus, vi. p. 271, d. Menaechmus is also quoted by the scholiast on Pindar (Nem. ii. 1, ix. 30), and by Pliny, H. N. iv. 12, s. 21. (Suid. s. v. Μανᾶχμος; Vossius, de Hist. Gr. p. 102, ed. Westermann.) [MENAECHMUS.]

2. A native of Alopeconnesus, who wrote a commentary on Plato's Republic, which is no longer extant, and some other philosophical works. (Suidas, s. v.) [C. P. M.]

MANASSES, CONSTANTINUS (Κωνσταντῖνος δ' Μανασσῆς), lived in the middle of the twelfth century, during the reign of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, and wrote Σύνοψις ἱστοριῶν, being a chronicle from the creation of the world, down to the accession of Alexis I. Comnenus, in 1081. This work is written in a sort of verses which the later writers called versus politici, but which is rather rhythmical prose; it contains 6733 of such verses, and 12 supplementary verses. Editions:—A Latin version by J. Leunclavius, Basel, 1573, 8vo.; the Greek text, from a Codex Palatinus, with the version of Leunclavius, and notes by J. Meursius, Leyden, 1616, 4to.; the same revised (with Variae Lectiones by Leo Allatius), from two Parisian MSS., by Fabrot, who added a valuable glossary, Paris, 1655, fol.; the last edition is that by Im. Bekker, Bonn, 1837, 8vo., a revised reprint of the Paris edition. The edition by Meursius is remarkable for being dedicated to the great king of Sweden, Gustavus Adolphus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 469, &c.; Hamberger, Nachricht. von Gelehr. Männern.) [W. P.]

MANA'STABAL. [MASTANABAL.]

MA'NCIA, CURTI'LIUS, was legatus of the army on the upper Rhine, in the reign of Nero, and assisted Dubius Avitus, praefect of Gaul and lower Germany, in putting down the league of the Tenetheri, Bructeri, and Ampsivarii, against the Romans, A. D. 56–59. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 56; Phlegon, de Admir. 27.) [W. B. D.]

MA'NCIA, HE'LVIVS, a Roman orator (about B. C. 90), who was remarkably ugly, and whose name is recorded chiefly in consequence of a laugh being raised against him on account of his deformity by C. Julius Caesar Strabo (CAESAR, Na. 10), who was opposed to him on one occasion in some law-suit. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 66; Quintil. vi. 3, § 38; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4: the last writer mentions the orator Crassus as the person who raised the laugh against Mancina.) Cicero further relates a smart saying of Mancina on another occasion (de Orat. ii. 68).

MANCINUS HOSTI'LIUS. 1. L. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS, an officer in the army of the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus in A. C. 217. (Liv. xxii. 15.)

2. A. HOSTILIUS L. F. A. N. MANCINUS, was praetor urbanus B. C. 180, and consul B. C. 170 with A. Atilius Serranus. In his consulship he had the conduct of the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia; but from the fragmentary nature of the accounts that have come down to us, we are unable to form any definite idea of the campaign. So much, however, seems certain, that he conducted the war for the most part on the defensive. He remained in Greece for part of the next year (A. C. 169) as proconsul; and after passing the winter in Thessaly, he endeavoured to penetrate into Macedonia, but was obliged to retire before the superior force of Perseus. [For the details see PERSEUS.] In the same year he surrendered the command to his successor, the consul Q. Marcus Philippus, leaving behind him the reputation of having kept his soldiers in good discipline, and preserved the allies from injury, although he had performed no exploit worthy of mention. (Liv. xi. 35, xliii. 4—11, 17, xlv. 1; Polyb. xxvii. 14, xxviii. 3, &c.; Plut. Aemil. Paul. 9.)

2. L. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS, probably son of No. 1, was engaged as legate of the consul L. Calpurnius Piso (B. C. 148) in the siege of Carthage, in the third Punic war. He commanded the fleet, while Piso was at the head of the land-forces; and, notwithstanding some repulses which he received, he had the glory of being the first to take part of the town, which was finally conquered by Scipio in A. C. 146. Mancinus on his return to Rome exhibited in the forum paintings, containing views of Carthage and of the different attacks made upon it by the Romans, and was constantly ready to explain to the people all the details of the pictures. He became in consequence such a favourite with the people, that he was elected consul in A. C. 145 with Q. Fabius Maximus Aemilianus. (Appian, Pun. 110—114; Liv. Epit. 51; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4, s. 7; Cic. Lael. 25.)

3. C. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS, probably a brother of No. 2, was consul in B. C. 137 with M. Aemilius Lepidus Porcina, and had the conduct of the war against Numantia. Its unsuccessful issue was foretold the consul by many prodigies. He was defeated by the Numantines in several engagements, and at length, being entirely surrounded by the enemy, he negotiated a peace, through the intervention of his quaestor Tib. Gracchus, who was greatly respected by the enemy. Appian says that this peace contained the same terms for the Romans and Numantines; but as it must in that case have recognised the independence of the latter, the senate refused to recognise it, and went through the hypocritical ceremony of delivering over the consul bound and naked to the enemy, by means of the fetters. This was done with the consent of Mancinus, but the enemy refused to accept him. On his return to Rome Mancinus took his seat in the senate, as heretofore, but was violently expelled from it by the tribune P. Rutilius, on the ground that he had lost his citizenship. As the enemy had not received him, it was a disputed question whether he was a citizen or not by the Jus Postliminii (see Dict. of Ant. s. v. Postliminium), but the better opinion was that he had lost his civic rights, and they were accordingly restored to him by a lex. According to Aurelius Victor, he is said to have been subsequently elected praetor. (Appian, Hisp. 79—83; Liv. Epit. 55; Oros. v. 4; Ubesq. 83; Val. Max. i. 6. § 7; Vell. Pat. ii. 1; Flor. ii. 18; Eutrop. iv. 17; Plut. Tib. Gracch. 5; Dion Cass. Fragm. 164, ed. Reimar; Aurel. Vict. Vit. Illustr. 59; Cic. de Rep. iii. 18, de Off. iii. 30, de Orat. i. 40, 56, ii. 32, pro Caec. 33, Topic. 8; Dig. 50. tit. 7. s. 17.)

4. A. HOSTILIUS MANCINUS, curule aedile (but a what year is uncertain), of whom a tale is told by A. Gellius (iv. 14) from the "Conjectanea" of Ateius Capito.

MANCINUS, MANILIUS or MANLIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 108, proposed to the people the bill by which the province of Numidia and the conduct of the war against Jugurtha were given to Marius, who had been elected consul for the subsequent year. (Sall. Jug. 73; Gell. vi. 11.)

MANDANE (Μανδάνη), the daughter of Asyages, and mother of Cyrus. [CYRUS.] (Herod. i. 107; Xenoph. Cyrop. i. 2, 3, 4.) [P. S.]

MANDONIUS. [INDIBELLUS.]

MANDUBRATIUS, the son of Imanuentius, king of the Trinobantes in Britain, had fled to Caesar in Gaul, after his father had been killed by Caradvaunus. On Caesar's arrival in Britain, Mandubratius obtained the supreme command in its state. (Caes. B. G. v. 20.) Orosius (vi. 9) calls him Androgorius.

MA'NEROS (Μανέρως), a son of the first Egyptian king, who died in his early youth, and for whom a species of dirge was called, which was analogous to the Greek Linos. (Herod. ii. 9; Athen. xiv. p. 620.) [L. S.]

MANES, i. e. "the good ones" [MANA], is the general name by which the Romans designated the souls of the departed; but as it is a natural tendency to consider the souls of departed friends as blessed spirits, the name of Lares is frequently used as synonymous with Manes, and hence also they were called diis Manes, and were worshipped with vine honours. (Cic. de Leg. ii. 9, 22; Apul. de deo Sacrat.; August. de Civ. Dei, viii. 26, ix. 11; rr. ad Virg. Aen. iii. 63, 168; Vir. Fast. ii. 342; ss. Carm. ii. 8, 9.) At certain seasons, which were looked upon as sacred days (feriae denicales), sacrifices were offered to the spirits of the departed with the observance of various ceremonies. But an annual festival, which belonged to all the ages in general, was celebrated on the 19th of February, under the name of Ferialia or Parentalia, inasmuch as it was more especially the duty of children to heirs to offer sacrifices to the shades of their dead and benefactors. (Ov. Fast. ii. 535; Ter. ll. Bacc. Carm. i.) [L. S.]

MA'NETHO (Μανεθός * or Μανεθών), an Egyptian priest of the town of Sebennytus, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, and probably also in that of his successor, Ptolemy Philadelphus. He had in antiquity the reputation of having attained the highest possible degree of wisdom (Syncellus, Chronogr. p. 32, ed. Dindorf; Plut. de Is. et Os. 9; Aelian, H. A. x. 16), and it seems to have been this very reputation which induced later impostors to fabricate books, and publish them under his name. The fables and mystical fancies which thus became current as the productions of the Egyptian sage, were the reason why Manetho was looked upon even by some of the ancients themselves as a half mythical personage, like Epimenides of Crete, of whose personal existence and history no one was able to form any distinct notion. The consequence has been, that the fragments of his genuine work did not meet, down to the most recent times, with that degree of attention which they deserved, although the inscriptions on the Egyptian monuments furnish the most satisfactory confirmation of some portions of his work that have come down to us. It was a further consequence of this mythical uncertainty by which his personal existence became surrounded, that some described him as a native of Diospolis (Thebes), the great centre of priestly learning among the Egyptians, or as a high priest at Heliopolis. (Suid. s. v. Μανεθως.) There can be no doubt that Manetho belonged to the class of priests, but whether he was high-priest of Egypt is uncertain, since we read this statement only in some MSS. of Suidas, and in one of the productions of the Pseudo-Manetho. Respecting his personal history scarcely anything is known, beyond the fact that he lived in the reign of the first Ptolemy, with whom he came in contact in consequence of his wisdom and learning. Plutarch (de Is. et Osir. 28) informs us, that the king was led by a dream to order a colossal statue of a god to be fetched from Sinope to Egypt. When the statue arrived, Ptolemy requested his interpreter Timotheus and Manetho of Sebennytus to inquire which god was represented in the statue. Their declaration that the god represented was Serapis, the Osiris of the lower world or Pluto, induced the king to build a temple to him, and establish his worship.

The circumstance to which Manetho owes his great reputation in antiquity as well as in modern times is, that he was the first Egyptian who gave in the Greek language an account of the doctrines, wisdom, history, and chronology of his country, and based his information upon the ancient works of the Egyptians themselves, and more especially upon their sacred books. The object of his works was thus of a twofold nature, being at once theological and historical. (Euseb. Praep. Ev. ii. init.; Theodoret. Serm. II. de Therap. vol. iv. p. 753, ed. Schw.)

The work in which he explained the doctrines of the Egyptians concerning the gods, the laws of morality, the origin of the gods and the world, seems to have borne the title of Τῶν φυσικῶν ἐπιτομή. (Diog. Laërt. Proem. §§ 10, 11.) Various statements, which were derived either from this same or a similar work, are preserved in

Manethoth, that is, Ma-n-thoth, or the one given by Thoth, which would be expressed by the Greek Hermodotus or Hermodorus. (Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgesch. vol. i. p. 91.)

* His original Egyptian name was undoubtedly

Plutarch's treatise De Iside et Osiri (cc. 8, 9, 49, 62, 73; comp. Procl. ad Hesiod. Op. et D. 767), and in some other writers, who confirm the statements of Plutarch. (Iamblich. de Myst. viii. 3; Aelian, H. A. x. 16; Porphy. de Abst. p. 199.)

Suidas mentions a work on Cyphi, or the sacred incense of the Egyptians, its preparation and mixture, as taught in the sacred books of the Egyptians, and the same work is referred to by Plutarch at the end of his above-mentioned treatise. In all the passages in which statements from Manetho are preserved concerning the religious and moral doctrines of the Egyptians, he appears as a man of a sober and intelligent mind, and of profound knowledge of the religious affairs of his own country; and the presumption therefore must be, that in his historical works, too, his honesty was not inferior to his learning, and that he ought not to be made responsible for the blunders of transcribers and copyists, or the forgeries of later impostors.

The historical productions of Manetho, although lost, are far better known than his theological works. Josephus (Ant. Jud. i. 3. § 9) mentions the great work under the title of History of Egypt, and quotes some passages verbatim from it, which show that it was a pleasing narrative in good Greek (c. Apion. i. 14, &c.). The same author informs us that Manetho controverted and corrected many of the statements of Herodotus. But whether this was done in a separate work, as we are told by some writers, who speak of a treatise Πρὸς Ἡρόδοτον (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 857; Etym. Magn. s. v. Λεωτροκόμης), or whether this treatise was merely an extract from the work of Manetho, made by later compilers or critics of Herodotus, is uncertain. The Egyptian history of Manetho was divided into three parts or books; the first contained the history of the country previous to the thirty dynasties, or what may be termed the mythology of Egypt, as it gave the dynasties of the gods, concluding with those of mortal kings, of whom the first eleven dynasties formed the conclusion of the first book. The second opened with the twelfth and concluded with the nineteenth dynasty, and the third gave the history of the remaining eleven dynasties, and concluded with an account of Nectanebus, the last of the native Egyptian kings. (Syncell. Chronog. p. 97, &c.) These dynasties are preserved in Julius Africanus and Eusebius (most correct in the Armenian version), who, however, has introduced various interpolations. A thirty-first dynasty, which is added under the name of Manetho, and carries the list of kings down to Darius Codomannus, is undoubtedly a later fabrication. The duration of the first period described in the work of Manetho was calculated by him to be 24,900 years, and the thirty dynasties, beginning with Menes, filled a period of 3555 years. The lists of the Egyptian kings and the duration of their several reigns were undoubtedly derived by him from genuine documents, and their correctness, so far as they are not interpolated, is said to be confirmed by the inscribed monuments which it has been the privilege of our time to decipher. (Comp. Schöll, Gesch. der Griech. Lit. vol. ii. p. 128, &c.; Bunsen, Aegypt. Stelle in der Weltgesch. vol. i. pp. 88—125.)

There exists an astrological poem, entitled Ἀποτελεσματικά, in six books, which bears the name of Manetho; but it is now generally acknowledged that this poem, which is mentioned also by Suidas, cannot have been written before the fifth century of our era. A good edition of it was published some years ago by C. A. M. Axt and F. A. Rigler, Cologne, 1832, 8vo. Whether this poem was written with a view to deception, under the name of Manetho, or whether it is actually the production of a person of that name, is uncertain.

But there is a work which is undoubtedly a forgery, and was made with a view to harmonise the chronology of the Jews and Christians with that of the Egyptians. This work is often referred to by Syncellus (Chron. pp. 27, 30), who says that the author lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and wrote a work on the Dog Star (ὁ Σίρκος ἢ Σελήτης), which he dedicated to the king, whom he called Σελασφόρος. (Syncell. Chron. p. 73.) The very introduction to this book, which Syncellus quotes, is so full of extraordinary things and absurdities, that it clearly betrays its late author, who, under the illustrious name of the Egyptian historian, hoped to deceive the world.

The work of the genuine Manetho was gradually superseded: first by epitomisers, by whom the genuine history and chronology were obscured; next by the hasty work of Eusebius, and the interpolations he made, for the purpose of supporting his system; afterwards by the impostor who assumed the name of Manetho of Sebennytus, and mixed truth with falsehood; and lastly by a chronicle, in which the dynasties of Manetho were arbitrarily arranged according to certain cycles. (Syncell. Chron. p. 95.) For a more minute account of the manner in which the chronology of Manetho was gradually corrupted see the excellent work of Bunsen above referred to, vol. i. p. 256, &c. [L. S.]

MANGANEIA, GEORGIUS. [ΓΕΩΡΓΙΟΣ, No. 14, p. 246.]

MA'NIA, an ancient and formidable Italian, probably Etruscan, divinity of the lower world, is called the mother of the Manes or Lares. (Varro, de Ling. Lat. ix. 61; Arnob. adv. Gent. iii. 41; Macrobi. Sat. i. 7.) The festival of the Compitalia was celebrated as a propitiation to Mania in common with the Lares, and, according to an ancient oracle that heads should be offered on behalf of heads, boys are said to have been sacrificed on behalf of the families to which they belonged. The consul Junius Brutus afterwards abolished the human sacrifices, and substituted garlick and the heads of poppies for them. Images of Mania were hung up at the house doors, with a view to avert all dangers. (Macrobi. l. c.) As regards her being the mother of the Manes or Lares, the idea seems to have been, that the souls of the departed on their arrival in the lower world became her children, and either there dwelt with her or ascended into the upper world as beneficent spirits. (Müller, Die Etrusk. iii. 4.) In later times the plural Maniae occur in the designation of terrible, ugly, and deformed spectres, with which nurses used to frighten children. (Paul. Diac. p. 128; Festus, p. 128, at Müller.) [L. S.]

MA'NIA (Mavia). 1. A Phrygian, as the name implies (Mach. ap. Athen. xiii. p. 574, b) was the wife of Zenis, a Greek of Dardanus, and satrap, under Pharnabazus, of the Midland Asia. After the death of Zenis, Mania prevailed on Pharnabazus to allow her to retain the satrapy which her husband had held. Invested with the government, she strictly fulfilled her promise that the tribute should be paid as regularly as before and she not only kept in obedience the cities entrusted to her, but also added to them by conquest the maritime towns of Larissa, Hamaxitus, and Coloneæ, which she took with the Greek mercenaries whom she maintained liberally in her service. She continued to conciliate the favour of Pharnabazus by frequent presents, as well as by splendid and agreeable entertainments, whenever he came into her satrapy. The valuable assistance, too, which she rendered him both by arms and counsel, he fully appreciated; and she seems to have been at the height of her prosperity, when she was murdered by her son-in-law MARDIAS, shortly before the arrival of Dercyllidas in Asia, in B. C. 399. (Xen. Hell. iii. 1. §§ 10—14; Polyæn. viii. 54.)

2. An Athenian hetæra, a great favourite of Demetrius Poliorcetes. Mania was only her nickname. (Mach. ap. Athen. xiii. pp. 578, 579.) [E. E.]

MANIACÆS GEORGIUS. [GEORGIUS, No. 15, p. 246.]

MANIÆ (Μανίαι), certain mysterious divinities, who had a sanctuary in the neighbourhood of Megalopolis, in Arcadia, and whom Pausanias (Eun. 34. § 1) considered to be the same as the Eumenides. [L. S.]

MANILIA GENS, plebeian. It is difficult often to distinguish persons of this name from the Mania and Malii, as we sometimes find the same person called Manlius, Manlius, and Mallius, in different authors, or in different manuscripts of the same author. The first person of this gens who obtained the consulship was M. MANILIUS, in B. C. 149; but the gens never became of importance in the state, and the smallness of its numbers is shown by its never being divided into any families. Under the republic its only cognomen is MANCIUS, though even this, perhaps, belongs to the Manlii; not in the time of the empire we find one or two surnames. There are no coins of this gens.

MANILIUS. 1. SEX. MANILIUS, was elected with M. Oppius, as the commander of the soldiers, at their secession to the Aventine during the second decemvirate, B. C. 449 (Liv. iii. 51). He is called Manlius (Μάλιος) by Dionysius (xi. 44).

2. P. MANILIUS, one of the legates sent into Illyricum in B. C. 167, to settle the affairs of that country after the conquest of Perseus (Liv. xiv. 17).

3. M. MANILIUS, consul B. C. 149, was a jurist. [See below.]

4. MANILIUS, prætor B. C. 137, was defeated at Sicily by Eunus, the leader of the slaves in the great servile war in that island. [EUNUS.] (Flor. ii. 19; comp. Liv. Epit. 56; Oros. v. 6.)

5. P. MANILIUS, consul B. C. 120, with C. Papius Carbo, but nothing is recorded of him. (Cæsioid.; Chron. Alex.; Fasti Noria.)

6. L. MANILIUS, prætor probably in B. C. 79, and the government of Narbonese Gaul, with the title of proconsul, in B. C. 78. In the latter year he crossed over into Spain, with three legions and 5000 horse, to assist Metellus in the war against Ilerdus; but he was defeated by Hirtuleius, one of the generals of Sertorius, lost his camp and baggage, and escaped almost alone into the town of Ilerda. (Oros. v. 22; Liv. Epit. 90; Plut. Ilv. 12.)

7. C. MANILIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 66, was a partisan of Pompey, and is described by Valerius Paternulus (ii. 33) as "semper venalis et Emæ minister potitæ." Manilius entered upon his tribunate on the 10th of December, B. C. 67, and on the last day of the year carried a law, granting to the freedmen the right of voting in all the tribes along with their patrons; but as there seems to have been a violation of some constitutional forms in the comitia, the senate was able on the following day to declare the law invalid. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 25; Ascon. in Cic. Corr. pp. 64, 65, ed. Orelli; comp. MANLIUS, No. 5.) Not disheartened by this failure, Manilius shortly afterwards brought forward a bill, granting to Pompey the command of the war against Mithridates and Tigraneæ, and the government of the provinces of Asia, Cilicia, and Bithynia, in the place of Lucullus, Marcus Rex, and Acilius Glabrio. This bill was warmly opposed by Q. Catulus, Q. Hortensius, and the leaders of the aristocratical party, but was passed notwithstanding by the people, who were worn out by the length of the war, and were very ready to bestow new honours upon their favourite Pompey. Cicero, who was then prætor, spoke in favour of the law; and the oration which he delivered on the occasion has come down to us, and is one of the best specimens of his declamatory oratory. The reasons which induced Cicero to support the bill and to praise Pompey in such extraordinary terms, are mentioned in the life of the former. [Vol. I. p. 711.] (Cic. pro lege Manilia; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 25, 26; Vell. Pat. ii. 33; Liv. Epit. 100; Appian, B. Mithr. 97; Plut. Pomp. 30, Lucull. 35.) Manilius had incurred the bitter enmity of the aristocratical party; and, therefore, immediately upon the expiration of his tribunate he was brought to trial before Cicero, whose prætorship had still a few days to run. Dion Cassius and Plutarch speak as if Cicero was at first unfavourably disposed towards the accused, and was induced to support him and attack the senate by the evident displeasure which the people felt at his conduct. But this can hardly be a true account of the affair; for Cicero would certainly have had every reason for supporting the partisan of Pompey, whose favour and support he was so anxious to gain in order to secure his election to the consulship. So much, however, is certain: that the trial of Manilius was put off to the following year, that Cicero spoke in his favour, and that, notwithstanding all the efforts of his advocate, he was condemned. Of what offence Manilius was accused, is uncertain; but Plutarch speaks of extortion, but Asconius says that he was accused of violently disturbing the court for the trial of C. Cornelius. [C. CORNELIUS.] (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 27; Plut. Cic. 9; Ascon. in Cic. Cornel. pp. 50, 75, ed. Orelli; Cic. Orat. Fragm. pp. 445, 448, 450, ed. Orelli; Q. Cic. de Fel. Con. 13.)

8. Q. MANILIUS CUMANUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 52. (Ascon. in Cic. Mil. p. 38, ed. Orelli.)

M. MANILIUS, the jurist. The prænomen of Manilius is generally given as Manius in the printed books, but Mai asserts that in the MS. of Cicero, De Re Publica, the name is clearly written 'M', which means Marcus, and not 'M', which would mean Manius.

Marcus Manilius is one of the speakers in the De Re Publica (i. 12), and consequently a contemporary of C. Fannius, Q. Scaevola, Laelius, and Scipio Africanus the younger. He was a jurist (De Rep. iii. 10) and he is mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. i. tit. 2. s. 1. § 39) with P. Mucius, Pontifex Maximus, and Brutus; he calls these three the founders of jus civile. Pomponius says that Manilius wrote three treatises, which were extant in his time, and was a consular. Manilius, therefore, appears to be the consul of B. C. 149, with L. Marcius Censorinus. In B. C. 149 the third Punic war commenced, and Manilius and his colleague were appointed to conduct it. They made an attack on Carthage, and burnt the Carthaginian fleet in sight of the city (Liv. Epit. 49; Florus, ii. 15). The campaign of Manilius is described at length by Appian (Punic. 75—109). Carthage was taken by P. Scipio Africanus the younger, B. C. 146. During his consulship Manilius wrote to the Achæans to send Polybius to Lilybæum, as he wanted his services. But on arriving at Corcyra, Polybius found a letter from the consuls, which informed him that the Carthaginians had given all the hostages, and were ready to obey their orders, and that they considered that the war was ended, and the services of Polybius were not wanted, upon which Polybius returned to the Peloponnesus. (Polyb. lib. xxxvii. ed. Bekker.) The fact of Manilius the jurist having been consul is stated by Pomponius, and he must therefore have been the consul of B. C. 149, for there is no other to whom all the facts will apply. Cicero (Brutus, 16) remarks that the elder Cato died in the consulship of L. Marcius and M. Manilius, eighty-six years before his own consulship, which was B. C. 63. Cicero, in another passage in the Brutus (c. 28), speaks of M. Manilius as possessing some oratorical power, and makes him the contemporary of various orators of the period of the Gracchi. The propriety of Manilius and Scipio being introduced in the De Re Publica appears from the fact that Scipio served under Manilius and his colleague in the campaign of B. C. 149, and Manilius bore testimony to the great services of Scipio (Appian, Punic. 105), who was afterwards appointed to conduct the war.

The reputation of Manilius was not founded on his military services. Cicero (de Orat. i. 48) mentions M. Manilius as a real juriconsult, in connection with Sextus Aelius and P. Scaevola. L. Crassus (Cic. de Orat. iii. 33) says of M. Manilius, "I have seen him walking backwards and forwards across the forum, which was a token that a man who was doing this was ready to give his advice to all the citizens; and to such persons in olden time, both when they were walking about, and when seated at home in their chair, it was the practice to go and to consult them, not only about the jus civile, but about marrying a daughter, buying a piece of land, cultivating ground, and in fine, on every thing that a man had to do, and on every business transaction." Among the legal writings of Manilius was a treatise on the conditions applicable to sales (venalium vendendorum leges, Cic. de Orat. i. 58), which was apparently a book of forma. Probably he may have written on other subjects besides law. (Cic. Brut. 28, ed. H. Meyer.) The time of the birth and death of Manilius is not known. He is mentioned by Cicero (de Rep. iii. 10) as having been accustomed to give legal opinions before the Lex Voconia was enacted, which law was enacted B. C. 169. The time which Cicero fixes as the date of the supposed dialogue De Re Publica ("Tuditano Cons. et Aquilio," de Rep. i. 9) is B. C. 129, or forty years after the enactment of the Lex Voconia. If Manilius was giving legal opinions before the date of the Lex Voconia, we cannot suppose that he was under fifty years of age when he was consul, and seventy at the date given to the supposed dialogue. [G. L.]

MANILIUS (Marcus or Caius), or MANLIUS, or MA'LLIUS, for all of these and many other variations are found in MSS., the weight of evidence being in favour of M. Manilius, is known to us as the author of an astrological poem in five books, entitled Astronomica. The greatest uncertainty prevails on every point connected with his personal history. By some critics he is supposed to be the Manilius described by Pliny (H. N. x. 2), as "Senator ille maximis nobilibus doctrinis doctore nullo," who first collected accurate information with regard to the phoenix, and maintained that the period of its life corresponded with the revolution of the Great Year (magni conversionem anni), in which the heavenly bodies completed a perfect cycle; by others to be the Manilius Antiochus styled "astrologiae conditorum," who came to Rome as a slave, along with Publius Syrus the mimographer, and Staberius Eros the grammarian (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 58); by others, to be the "Manlius Mathematicus" who, in the time of Augustus, adjusted the obelisk in the Campus Martius, so as to act as a sun-dial (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 15. § 6); by others, to be no other than Fl. Mallius Theodorus, on whose consulship Claudian composed a panegyric, in which he extols his knowledge of the stars. Little proof has been adduced in support of these conjectures, beyond the mere correspondence of name, and the circumstance that each of the individuals selected is believed to have been more or less addicted to the study of the heavens, while many grave considerations forbid us to adopt any one of them. It does not appear that Manlius the senator composed any work at all upon astronomical topics. It is impossible that Manlius Antiochus, to whose claims the expression "founder of astrology" might seem to give some force, can be the person, for we know from Suetonius, that his companion Staberius Eros taught a school during the Sullan troubles, while Manlius, of whom we are in search, cannot, as we shall point out immediately, have flourished earlier than nearly a century after that date. Manlius "the mathematician" exists only in the more corrupt copies of the naturalist, the proper name being rejected as an interpolation by all the best editors. Claudian, although he dilates upon the moral perfections and literary distinction of Mallius, and bestows unmeasured praise on his essay concerning the origin and arrangement of the world, gives us no hint that the stoical principles which it advocated were developed in verse, but, on the contrary, declares that the honey of its refined eloquence (armonis mella politi) was to be preferred to the enchanting songs of Orpheus; while Salmonius (de Ampelium, p. 91) avers that this very treatise in prose by Theodorus, was still to be found in certain libraries, and P. J. Maassenus proposed to give it to the world. Finally, the arguments advanced by Gevartius and Spanheim, to prove from the language of the Astronomica, that these books must have been composed as late as the reign of Theodosius the Great, have been fully confuted by Salmonius, Huetius, Scaliger, Vossius, and Creech. The fact is, that no ancient writer with whom we are acquainted, either takes any notice of a poet Manilius, or quotes a single line from the poem. He is not mentioned by Ovid in his catalogue of poets temporary bards (as Pont. iv. 16), nor by Quintilian, who might with propriety have classed him along with Lucretius and Mæcer; nor by Gellius, nor by Macrobius, both of whom frequently discuss kindred subjects; nor by any of the compilers of mythological systems, who might have derived much information from his pages; nor by one out of the host of grammarians, to whom he would have afforded copious illustrations. We find no trace of him until he was discovered by Poggio, about the beginning of the fifteenth century, unless, indeed, he be the "M. Manilius de Astrologia," of whose work Gerbertus of Rheims, afterwards pope Sylvester II. (A. D. 1000), commissions a friend (Ep. 130) to procure a copy. It is true that the resemblance between the production of Manilius and the Mathesis of Julius Firmicus Maternus [FIRMICUS], who flourished under Constantine, is in many places so marked, that we can scarcely doubt that they borrowed from a common original, perhaps the Apotelesmata of Dorotheus of Sidon, or that one of them was indebted to the other. But even if we adopt the latter alternative it is obvious that we must determine the age of both, before we can decide the question of plagiarism. Such being the real state of the case, we are thrown entirely upon internal evidence, and this appears, at first sight, to be to a certain extent conclusive. The piece opens with an invocation of Caesar, the son and successor of a deified father, the heir of his temporal, as well as of his immortal honours; farther on (i. 798), the Julian line is said to have filled the heavenly mansion, Augustus is represented as sharing the dominion of the sky with the Thunderer himself, and the fourth book closes with similar expressions. Meteors and comets we are told portend wars and sudden commotions, and treacherous rebellions, such as took place lately (modo) among foreign nations, when savage tribes destroyed Varus and dyed the plains with the blood of three legions (i. 897); celestial warnings were not wanting before the solemn league concluded between bloody leaders covered the fields of Philippi with embattled hosts; when, subsequently, the thunderbolts of Jove strove with the sistrum of Isis; and when the son of Pompey filled the sea with the pirates swept away by his sire. Now, although the whole of these passages would seem to proceed from a writer of the Augustan age, it may be argued, that wherever Augustus is addressed in terms of flattery the words employed would apply to many of the later emperors as well as to him who first bore that title; that the modo used in connection with the disastrous defeat in Germany, and which, if translated lately, would be decisive, may with equal or greater fitness be here rendered sometimes; that there is a coldness in all the allusions to the civil wars, which would have been avoided by one seeking to extol the achievements and victories of a reigning prince, and that in particular the words "ducibus jurata cruentis Arma," which apply much more naturally to the triumvirs than to Brutus and Cassius, could not fail to prove highly offensive. On the other hand, when we observe that there is no reference to any historical event later than to the defeat of A. D. 9, that the lines which end the first book distinctly express the feelings of one who was living during a period of tranquillity, which had immediately followed the scenes of disorder and bloodshed depicted in the preceding paragraphs, and above all, when we mark the tone of adulation breathed in the verses (iv. 763)—

Virgine sub casta felix terraque marique
Est Rhodoe, hospitium recturi principis orbem;
Tumque domus vere solis, cui tota sacrata est,
Cum caperet lumen magni sub Caesare mundi—

we shall be led to the conclusion that they were penned during the sway of Tiberius. Assuming that Manilius belongs to the epoch now indicated, we infer from iv. 41,—

"Speratum Hannibalem nostris cecidisse catenis," that he was a Roman citizen, and from iv. 775,—

that he was an inhabitant of the metropolis. The notion of Bentley that he was an Asiatic, and that of Huet that he was a Carthaginian, rest upon no stable basis. Farther we cannot proceed, and the great difficulty still remains untouched, how it should have come to pass that a piece possessing a character so singular and striking, discussing a science long studied with the most eager devotion, should have remained entirely unknown or neglected. One solution only can be proposed. We can at once perceive that the work is unfinished, and the portion which we possess wears occasionally a rough aspect, as if it had never received a final polish. Hence it may never have been published, although a few copies may have passed into private circulation; some of these having been preserved by one of those strange chances of which we find not a few examples in literary history, may have served as the archetypes from which the different families of MSS. now extant originally sprung.

The first book serves as an introduction to those which follow; discoursing of the rise and progress of astronomy, of the origin of the material universe, of the position, form, and magnitude of the earth, of the names and figures of the signs of the zodiac and of the northern and southern constellations, of the circles of the sphere, of the milky way, of the planets, of comets and meteors, and the indications which these afford of impending evil, pestilence, famine, and civil strife. In the second book Manilius passes under review the subjects chosen by Homer, Hesiod, Theocritus, and other renowned bards, asserts the superior majesty of his own theme, and claims the merit of having quitted the beaten track and of having been the first to enter upon a new path. He then expounds the stoical doctrine of an Almighty Soul pervading, animating, controlling, and regulating every portion of the universe, so that all the different parts are connected by one common bond, stirred by one common impulse, and act together in unison and harmony. Hence things below depend upon things above, and if we can determine and read aright the relations and movements of the celestial bodies, we shall be able to calculate from them the corresponding change which will take place in other members of the system. The dignity and reasonableness of the science being thus vindicated, we are plunged at once into a maze of technicalities, embracing the classification of the signs, according to various fanciful resemblances or differences, their configurations, aspects, and influences, with all the jargon of trines, quadrates, sextiles, celestial houses, dodecatemoria, cardines, and athla. The treatise terminates abruptly, for the agency of the fixed stars alone is considered, the power which they exert in combination with the planets being altogether passed over (see ii. 961, iii. 583). Not even the first section is complete; the risings of several constellations with reference to the signs of the zodiac, which ought to have been included in the fifth book, are omitted, and a sixth would have been necessary to enumerate the settings of those constellations whose risings formed the subject of the fifth.

On the merits of Manilius as a poet we can say little. Occasionally, especially in the introductions and digressions, we discern both power of language and elevation of thought, but for the most part the attempts to embellish the dull details of his art are violent and ungraceful, affording a most remarkable contrast to the majestic with which Lucretius rises on high without an effort. The style is extremely faulty, it is altogether deficient in simplicity and precision, always harsh, frequently obscure, abounding in repetitions and in forced and ungainly metaphors, while the phraseology presents a number of unusual and startling combinations, although these are not of such a character as to justify the charge of barbarism. But while we withhold praise from his taste we must do justice to his learning. He seems to have consulted the best authorities, and to have adopted their most sagacious views. Blunders have, indeed, been detected here and there, in the statements regarding the relative position of the constellations, but some of the opinions which he advocates on sideral astronomy are anticipations of the brightest discoveries of modern times. Thus, not only is the popular belief that the fixed stars were all arranged on the surface of a concave vault, at equal distances from the centre of the earth, unhesitatingly rejected, but it is affirmed that they are of the same nature with the sun, and that each belongs to a separate system. The appearance exhibited by the milky way is in like manner correctly explained as arising from the blended rays of a multitude of minute stars.

The Editio Princeps of Manilius was printed in 4to. at Nuremberg, probably about 1472 or 1473, by Joannes Regiomontanus, from the MSS. originally brought to light by Poggio. Laurentius Bonincontrius published an edition at Bologna, fol. 1474, from a MS. preserved in the convent of Monte Casino, and annexed a commentary of little value. Steph. Dulcinius (fol. Mediolan. 1489) and Ant. Molinius (12mo. Lugd. 1551, 1556), profess to have introduced numerous emendations from MSS., but the last of the three editions by Joseph Scaliger (8vo. Paris, 1579, 1590, 4to. Lug. Bat. 1600), published at Leyden in 1600, is infinitely superior to all which preceded it, the text being founded chiefly on the Codex Gemblacensis, the oldest of existing MSS., and the notes by which it is accompanied being full of curious and recondite learning upon matters relating to ancient astronomy and astrology. Much, however, still remained to be done, and Bentley did not consider the task unworthy of his powers. By comparing the Codex Gemblacensis with the Codex Lipsiensis which stands next in point of antiquity and value, with the Codices of Voss, of Pithou, with some others of more recent date, and with the earliest editions, he produced the text (Lond. 4to. 1739) which is now the standard, and which is unquestionably the most pure, although, as we might have anticipated, occasionally disfigured by rash emendations. The more recent editions of Stoeber, 8vo. Argentorat. 1767; of Burton, 8vo. Lond. 1783; and of Piagru (with a French translation), 8vo. Paris, 1786, are of no particular value.

We have a metrical version of the first book of Manilius, by Edward Sherburne, fol. Lond. 1675, and of the whole poem by Thomas Creech, the translator of Lucretius, 8vo. Lond. 1697. (G. J. Voss, de Poetis Lat. cap. 2; comp. De Arte Gram. ii. 26; Scaliger, Prolegomena in Manilium; Fr. Jacob, De M. Manilio Poeta, 4to. Labeo. 1832.) [W. R.]

MANILIUS, the author of an epigram in two lines, quoted by Varro (L. L. p. 130, ed. Mäller). If Manilius the astrologer really flourished in the Augustan age, it may belong to him. (Bernard. Anthol. Lat. iii. 245, No. 35, ed. Meyer.) [W. R.]

MANISARUS, a prince who had seized upon Armenia in the time of Trajan, and against whom Osroes, the Parthian king, accordingly declared war. Upon Trajan's invasion of the East, Manisarus sent ambassadors to offer submission to the Roman emperor (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 22). There are some coins extant, which are assigned to this Manisarus. (Eckhel, vol. iii. p. 208.)

MANIUS, the person who managed the affairs of M. Antonius, in Italy, was one of the chief instigators of the war in B. C. 42, usually known as the Perusian war, which was carried on by L. Antonius and Fulvia, the wife of the triumvir, against Octavianus, during the absence of M. Antonius in the East. Manius also took an active part in the conduct of the war, but he was destined to pay dearly for his activity: for upon the reconciliation of Antonius and Octavianus, in B. C. 40, Manius was put to death by the former, as one of the disturbers of the peace, but partly, it appears, on account of his having exasperated Fulvia against Antonius. (Appian, B. C. v. 14, 19, 22, 29, 32, 66; comp. Mart. xi. 20.)

MANLIA GENS, one of the most ancient and celebrated of the patrician gentes at Rome. Subsequently we find some plebeians of this name. This name is frequently confounded with those of Mallius and Manilius. [MALLIA GENS and MANILIA GENS.] The first member of this gens who obtained the consulship was Cn. Manlius Cincinnatus, who was consul in B. C. 480; and from that time down to the last century of the republic, some of its members constantly filled the higher offices of the state. The family-names of the Manlii under the republic were:—ACIDINUS, CAPITOLES, CINCINNATUS (accidentally omitted under Cincinnatus, but given below), TORQUATUS, VELIN.

On coins the only cognomina are Torquatus and Ser.; the latter of which is variously interpreted to signify Serranus, Serratus, or Sergia: the last name would indicate the Sergian tribe. A few plebeian Manlii are mentioned without any cognomen; they are given below.

MANLIUS. 1. Cn. MANLIUS CINCINNATUS was consul in B. C. 480, with M. Fabius Vibellanus, and fell in battle against the Etruscans. (Liv. ii. 43, 47; Dionys. ix. 5, 6, 11, 12; Oro. ii. 5.)

2. A. MANLIUS, a legate of C. Marius, in the war against Jugurtha in Africa, B. C. 107. He was sent along with Sulla to Bocchus, to negotiate the surrender of Jugurtha. (Sall. Jug. 86, 90, 162.)

3. C. MANLIUS, the commander of Catiline's troops in Etruria, in B. C. 63, is more correctly named C. Mallius. [MALLIUS.]

4. MANLIUS LENTINUS, the legate of C. Pomptinus in Narbonese Gaul, in B. C. 61, took the city of Ventia, and defeated the barbarians. (Dion. Ann. xxvii. 47.)

5. CN. MANLIUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 58, brought forward a law granting to the freedmen (libertini) the right of voting in all the tribes; but he was prevented from passing it by Domitius Ahenobarbus, who was then praetor (Ascon. in Cl. M. p. 46). Baiter, in his note on Asconius (l.c.), has shown that this Cn. Manlius is a different person from C. Manilius, who was tribune in A. C. 66, and who brought forward a similar law. [MANILIUS, No. 7.]

MANLIUS VALENS. [VALENA.]

MANNUS, a son of Tuisco, was regarded by the ancient Germans, along with his father, to have been the founders of their race. They further ascribed to Mannus three sons, from whom the three tribes of the Ingaevones, Hermiones, and Isaeones derived their names. (Tac. German. 2.) Others, however, represented Mannus, who was worshipped as a god, as the father of more than three sons. Mannus is perhaps the same being as Irmin who is mentioned by other authors among the German gods (Witechind of Corv. i.; J. Grimm, Irminstrasse und Irminsule, p. 41), and seems to have been a kind of German Mars; though some believe that Irmin was the deified Arminius. It is not impossible that in later times Irmin and Arminius may have become identified in the imagination of the people. [L. S.]

MANNUS (Μάννος). 1. A king of some part of Arabia bordering upon Mesopotamia, who submitted to Trajan on his expedition against the Parthians. (Dion. Cass. lxxviii. 21, 22.)

2. A son or grandson of the preceding, who lived in the reign of M. Aurelius, and several of whose coins are extant, bearing the effigies of M. Aurelius and his wife Faustina, and of L. Verus and his wife Lucilla. The one annexed bears the head of Faustina, having for its legend, on the obverse, ΦΑΥΣΤΙΝΑ ΣΕΒΑΣΤΗ, and on the reverse, ΒΑΣΙΛΕΥΣ ΜΑΝΝΟΥ ΦΙΛΟΡ (ΩΜΑΙΟC). Spanheim, De Præst. et Usu Numism. vol. ii. p. 518; Eckhel, vol. iii. p. 513.)

COIN OF MANNUS.

MANTIAS (Μαντίας, or rather Μαντίας), a physician, who was the tutor of Heracleides of Tarentum (Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. ii. 15, vol. xiii. p. 462, 502), and one of the followers of Herophilus (Id. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vi. 9, vol. xii. p. 989); and who lived therefore most probably in the third century B. C. Galen says he was no ordinary physician (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, ii. 1, vol. xii. p. 534), and that he was the first who wrote a regular work on pharmacy (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. ii. 1, vol. xiii. p. 462). His works on this subject, which are several times quoted by Galen, are lost, but the titles of some of them have been preserved. (De Simplic. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. vi. præf.

vol. xi. p. 795, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Offic. Med." præf. and i. 5, vol. xviii. pt. ii. pp. 629, 666, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. iv. 14, vol. xiii. p. 751.) [W. A. G.]

MANTINEUS (Μαντινέος), a son of Lycam, and the reputed founder of Mantinea. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1; Paus. viii. 8. § 4.) Another person of the same name occurs in Apollodorus (ii. 2. § 1.) [L. S.]

MANTI'THEUS (Μαντιθέος), an Athenian, is mentioned by Xenophon (Hell. i. 1. § 10), as having been taken prisoner in Caria, but by whom, and on what occasion, does not appear, unless it was (according to the suggestion of Weiske) in the unsuccessful expedition of the Athenians to Caria and Lycia, under Melesander, in B. C. 430. (Thuc. ii. 69.) Mantitheus was the companion of Alcibiades in his escape, in B. C. 411, from Sardis, where Tissaphernes had confined him (Xen. L. c.; Plut. Alc. 27, 28). In B. C. 408 he was one of the ambassadors sent from Athens to Darius; but he and his colleagues were delivered, on their way through Asia Minor, by Pharnabazus to Cyrus, who had come down with instructions from his father to aid the Lacedæmonians; and it was three years before they were released. (Xen. Hell. i. 3. § 13, 4. §§ 4-7.) [E. E.]

MA'NTIUS (Μαντιος), a son of Melampus, and brother of Antiphates. (Hom. Od. xv. 242; Paus. vi. 17. § 4; comp. MELAMPUS.) [L. S.]

MANTO (Μαντώ). 1. A daughter of the Theban soothsayer Teiresias. She herself was a prophetess, first of the Imenian Apollo at Thebes, where monuments of her existed (Paus. ix. 10. § 3), and subsequently of the Delphian and Clarian Apollo. After the taking of Thebes by the Epigoni, she, with other captives, was dedicated to Apollo at Delphi. The god sent the captives to Asia, where they founded the sanctuary of Apollo not far from the place where afterwards the town of Colophon was built. Rhacius, a Cretan, who had settled there before, married Manto, and became by her the father of Mopsus. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 4; Paus. vii. 3. § 1, ix. 33. § 1; Strab. ix. p. 443; Schol. ad Apollon. i. 908.) According to Euripides, she had previously become the mother of Amphiloehus and Tisiphone, by Alcmaeon, the leader of the Epigoni. (Apollod. iii. 7. § 7.) Being a prophetess of Apollo, she is also called Daphne, i. e. the laurel virgin. (Diod. iv. 66; comp. Athen. vii. p. 298.)

2. A daughter of the soothsayer Polyeidus, and sister of Astycrateia. The tombs of these two sisters were shown at Megara, near the entrance of the sanctuary of Dionysus. (Paus. i. 43. § 5.)

3. A daughter of Heracles, is likewise described as a prophetess, and as the personage from whom the town of Mantua received its name. (Serv. ad Aen. x. 198.) [L. S.]

MANUEL L., COMNENUS (Μανουήλ ὁ Κομνηνός), emperor of Constantinople A. D. 1143—1181, the fourth child and son of the emperor Calo-Joannes (Joannes II.), was born about A. D. 1120, and succeeded his father in 1143. Of his three elder brothers, Alexia and Andronicus had both died before their father; but the third, Isaac Sebastocrator, was still alive, and would have had better claims to the crown than Manuel, but for a special declaration of the late emperor, who preferred the younger to the elder on account of his martial qualities. Manuel was with his father when the latter lost his life through an accident in Cilicia; and fears were entertained that Isaac, who was then in Constantinople, would seize the supreme power. But no sooner had John expired than the faithful minister, Axuch, hastened to the capital, seized Isaac, confined him in a prison, and succeeded in causing Manuel to be recognised in Constantinople, where he met with a brilliant reception, on his arrival from Cilicia, a short time afterwards. Manuel was scarcely seated on his throne, when he was involved in an uninterrupted series of wars with the nations of the East as well as the West, in which, though not always successful, he distinguished himself so much by his undaunted courage and heroic deeds as to deserve the name of the greatest hero of a time when there was no lack of extraordinary achievements in the field. The discovery that his brother Isaac seemed not to entertain ambitious designs, and the re-establishment of a good understanding between the two brothers, allowed Manuel to devote himself entirely to the conduct of his wars and to those endless intrigues and negotiations in which he found himself involved. As early as 1144 his general, Demetrius Branas, forced Raymond, the Latin prince of Antioch, who had shaken off his allegiance towards the emperor, to submit to Greek valour, and to renew, in Constantinople, the bonds of his vassalship. In the following year Manuel set out against the Turks, who had invaded Isauria, defeated them in several pitched battles, and cast such a terror among the Turkish soldiers, that they would no longer keep the field; whereupon peace was concluded to the advantage of the victor. About this time Manuel found reason to distrust his brother Isaac, who was deprived of his title of Sebastocrator; but as there was no direct evidence of treason against him, he was allowed to live on condition of retiring into a convent, where he spent the rest of his life. In the same year, 1147, Manuel received information from king Louis VII. of France, that the Western princes, headed by the king and the emperor Conrad III. of Germany, had resolved upon a new crusade, and desired his alliance. Manuel promised it, but gave secret information of the approaching storm to the Turks. Nevertheless he allowed Conrad to pass through his dominions with a vast army, and subsequently the French king also.

While the Crusaders were fighting with the Turks, Manuel was involved in a war with Roger, the Norman king of Sicily, who possessed likewise a large portion of Southern Italy, and who, thinking that the new crusade would prevent the Greek emperor from maintaining great forces in Europe, prepared for an invasion of Greece. This war, which broke out in 1148, is by far the most remarkable in the history of Manuel, who, however, did not engage in it alone, but found an ally in the republic of Venice. Marching at the head of his veterans towards Macedonia, he was informed, while at Philippopolis, that the Patzenegues had crossed the Danube, probably excited by king Roger. Without hesitating a moment, Manuel wheeled to the right, fell upon the barbarians, drove them back into the Dacian wildernesses; and after receiving hostages for their future good behaviour, returned with rapid marches towards Macedonia, embarked at Thessalonica, and landed his host in Corfu before the end of the year. There he was joined by a Venetian army. The fortress of Corfu yielded to him after an obstinate and protracted siege, signalised by the death of his brother-in-law, Stephanus Contostephanus, Magnus Dux, who was succeeded in the command by the faithful Axuch. The surrender of that important fortress was delayed by a bloody quarrel which broke out between the Greeks and the Venetians. In this siege Manuel was foremost among those who stormed the town; and his fleet having one day made several fruitless attempts to drive the Sicilians from some outworks near the sea, he put himself on the poop of a galley, and cheered his men on while showers of arrows and other missiles came down upon the spot where he stood. His boldness excited the admiration of the Sicilians, who ceased for a moment to make him the aim of their weapons. They would, however, soon have despatched him but for the voice of their commander, who cried out that it would be dishonourable to kill an hero like Manuel. The emperor intended to attack Roger within his own dominions, but the crafty Norman enticed the Servians and Hungarians to make a diversion on the Danube. The former were vanquished in two campaigns, when they begged for peace; and the Hungarian war lasted till 1152, when their king, Geisa, after having been beaten in many pitched battles, promised to desist from molesting the empire. The peace, however, was of short duration. In the same year, 1152, Manuel experienced a repulse in a war with the Turks in Cilicia; but in Italy his armies met with glorious success. The Greeks having landed in Italy, took Brundisium, Bari, and other places of importance; the fleet of the Sicilians was defeated in several decisive engagements; and it seemed that John Ducas, the gallant commander-in-chief of the Greeks, would find no more obstacles in re-asserting Southern Italy with the Byzantine empire. The sanguine hopes of Manuel were blighted by William, the successor of king Roger, who fell upon Alexis Comnenus, the successor of John Ducas; and after a severe struggle, routed the Greeks. At the same time the Greek fleet was defeated off Negropont; and Mainus, the Sicilian admiral, sailed without loss of time for Constantinople, where he landed a considerable force. The inhabitants were thrown into the utmost consternation; but their fears soon ceased, since Mainus was not strong enough to attempt any thing of importance, and consequently sailed home, satisfied with some booty and captives. These checks produced a great effect upon the mind of Manuel, who, having received a very noble letter from king William, with offers of an honourable peace, accepted the proposition, and thus this memorable war terminated in 1155. The conquests on both sides were given back, as well as all the captives, except those Greeks taken by the Sicilians who were silk-weavers, and who were to remain in Italy, where they laid the foundation of the flourishing state of Italian silk manufactures. The following years were signalised by hostilities with Raymond, prince of Antioch, who was soon brought to obedience; and Az-ed-din the Turkish Sultan, who met with no better success, and went to Constantinople to sue for peace.

The tranquillity of Asia was no sooner settled than a new and terrible war broke out in the north. King Geisa of Hungary fancied that the forces of the empire were exhausted by protracted wars, and accordingly crossed the Danube. Manuel intended to lead his armies in person, but he yielded to the entreaties of his subjects and his ministers, who wanted a firm head in the capital during the approaching storm; and the command of the army was consequently entrusted to Andronicus Contostephanus. Under Andronicus were Andronicus Lampadas, Andronicus Comnenus, and Demetrius and Georgias Branas. The armies met not far from Zeugminum, the present Semlin; and after one of the most bloody and obstinate contests recorded in history, in which Demetrius Branas was slain, and the left wing of the Greeks completely routed, Andronicus Contostephanus at last carried the day. So terrible was the loss of the Hungarians, that king Geisa sued for immediate peace, which was granted to him; and during a considerable period the Byzantine influence was so great in Hungary as to cause to its inhabitants great uneasiness for their further independence. A few years afterwards Manuel set out for Asia, and in an interview with king Amalric, who had just come to the throne, and intended to persuade Manuel to send him some auxiliaries for an expedition into Egypt, Manuel accepted the proposition with joy; but instead of a subordinate force, he equipped a fleet of 220 large ships, with a sufficient army on board, under the command of Andronicus Contostephanus (1169). When this powerful armament appeared off Ascalon it excited the jealousy of Amalric, who was justly afraid that his share in the projected conquests would not answer his expectation; and this jealousy gradually instilling itself into the minds of all the party, became the cause of the final failure of the whole undertaking. The combined Latin and Greek forces marched by land upon Damietta, where the fleet appeared soon afterwards. The siege was long; but the town was at last reduced to such extremity, that everybody expected its hourly surrender, when the treachery of either Amalric himself or one of his generals obliged the assailants to raise the siege and retreat into Palestine. In order to clear himself from any blame, Amalric went to Constantinople, where he met with a splendid reception from Manuel, who was ready to join him in a second expedition, when he was unexpectedly involved in two wars, with the Venetians and the Turks. In 1176 Manuel suffered a dreadful defeat near Myriocephalus from Sultan As-ed-din, in spite of his almost incredible personal valour, and completely surrounded by superior forces, was compelled to make a dishonourable peace, promising, among other conditions, to raze the fortresses of Sabeium and Dorylaeum (1176).* Anxious to revenge himself for such unexpected disgrace, Manuel broke the peace, and the war was renewed this time with better success for the Greeks, who routed As-ed-din in Lydia, and finally obtained an honourable peace (1177). Manuel now proposed to the emperor Frederic an alliance against king Henry of Sicily, whom he intended to deprive of all his dominions; but the negotiations to that effect were carried on slowly; and it seemed that Manuel had lost his former energy. In fact, the defeat at Myriocephalus preyed upon his mind; his strength was undermined by a slow fever; and in the spring of 1180 he was compelled to keep to his bed, from which he never rose again. After a painful and long illness, he died on the 24th of September following, at the age of sixty. The reign of Manuel was glorious, yet presents nothing but an uninterrupted series of bloodshed and devastation. Manuel was perhaps the greatest warrior of his time, but he was far from being a great general. When young he was virtuous, but after he had ascended the throne he plunged into all those vices by which the Greeks, and especially the Comnenian family, disgraced themselves. He oppressed his subjects by heavy war-taxes, yet he did not pay his troops, though he gave large pensions to ministers or other men of influence at foreign courts, where he was constantly intriguing. He is said to have been deeply versed in theology, but was certainly rather a great talker than a great thinker on religion. His first wife was Bertha (Irene), niece of Conrad III., emperor of Germany; and his second Maria (Xene), daughter of Raymond, prince of Antioch. His concubinage with his niece, Theodora Comnena, was a great disgrace to him. He was succeeded by his only son, Alexis II. (Cinnam. lib. i. iv.; Nicet. lib. ii. iii.; Guill. Tyrensis, lib. xvi. We have more Latin or Western than Byzantine sources on the history of the time.) [W. P.]

MANUEL II., PALAEOLOGUS (Μανουὴλ δὲ Παλαιολόγος), emperor of Constantinople A. D. 1391—1425, was the son of the emperor John VI., in whose life is related the history of Manuel previous to his sole accession, which took place on the death of John, in A. D. 1391. Manuel was then an hostage at the court of sultan Bayasid, but no sooner was he informed of the death of his father, than he escaped from Nicaea, and hastened to Constantinople, fearing lest his brother Andronicus should seize the crown. His flight enraged the sultan, who, without declaring war, advanced with his main army against Constantinople, and laid siege to it, swearing he would not retire till he had taken the city, and put the emperor to death. In this extremity Manuel implored the assistance of the Western princes, with whom he had constant negotiations: his efforts were crowned with success, inasmuch as a powerful army, composed of Hungarians, Germans, and French, headed by the flower of European chivalry and nobility, appeared on the Turkish frontier, and obliged Bayasid to raise the siege, and defend his own kingdom. The unfortunate battle of Nicopolis, in 1396, where the allies were routed, and 10,000 of them, who were taken prisoners, massacred by the victors on the field of battle, seemed to be the signal for the final destruction of the Greek empire, for no sooner had Bayasid obtained that decisive victory on the banks of the Danube, than he changed the blockade of Constantinople into a close siege. The obstinate resistance of the inhabitants, and the attention which the sultan was obliged to pay to the approaching danger arising from the conquests of Timur, delayed the surrender of the Greek capital; and after a blockade and siege of nearly six years, the belligerent parties came to terms. Manuel turned the friendship of Bayasid for John, the son of the blinded Andronicus, to his own advantage. He gave his nephew the government of Constantinople, reserving for himself the Peloponnesus, whither he proceeded with his family, and then set out for Europe, to beg succour from the Western princes. Italy, France, and Germany, received the imperial suppliant with all the honours due to his rank; but his prayers for assistance were in vain, and he returned to Constantinople in 1402, at a moment when a great political crisis made his presence most necessary. During his absence, John reigned with absolute power, having obtained his recognition from Bayazid, on conditions which show the state of helpless weakness into which the small remnant of the Byzantine empire was sunk. At that period there were already three mosques in Constantinople, where a numerous Mohammedan population enjoyed the free exercise of their religion. To these John was compelled to add a fourth; and besides, the sultan obtained the privilege of establishing in the capital a "mehkeme," or court of justice, where a Turkish "kadi," or judge, administered justice in the name of the sultan, who increased the number of Mohammedans by settling a numerous colony of Turks at Kinkhi, a borough in the immediate vicinity of Constantinople. A yearly tribute of 10,000 ducats was added as another condition.

Considering Constantinople a prey which he could seize at the first opportunity, Bayazid resolved, first to subdue Greece, the greater part of which was then governed by Latin princes, among whom the dukes of Delphi and Athens were the principal. Greece was an easy conquest, and Athens, which the Turks still called the city of philosophers, became for some time the seat of a Turkish pasha. The fall of Constantinople now seemed to be inevitable, and Bayazid had already assembled an army for its speedy reduction, when the great Timur invaded Asia Minor with a countless host. At Angora (1402) the Turkish army was annihilated by the Tatar; and Bayazid, with his son Musa, fell into the hands of the victor. This unexpected event saved Manuel. Bayazid died soon after his captivity; and Timur, who left Asia Minor for the purpose of conquering China, died in 1405. Meanwhile, the sons of Bayazid seized each a portion of their father's empire; and the Tatar having withdrawn from Asia Minor, a civil war broke out between the Turkish princes, which ended in the undisputed government of prince Mohammed, the first of the sultans of that name (1415). During these disturbances Manuel acted with diplomatic skill: he first removed his nephew, John, from the government; and perceiving the rising fortune of Mohammed, joined him; and in 1413 he contributed to the defeat and death of prince Musa, who had succeeded his brother Suleiman, in 1410, in the government of European Turkey. In reward for his assistance, Manuel received from Mohammed several places on the Euxine, Thessalonica and its territory, and several districts in the Peloponnesus. The latter part of the reign of Manuel was quiet. Still hoping that the Western princes would finally unite for the purpose of putting an end to the Turkish dominion and restoring the Greek empire, he sent ambassadors to the Council of Constance with seeming instructions to effect a union of the Latin and Greek churches. But his real intentions were quite different; he never earnestly wished for such an union; and Phranza (ii. 13) was witness when the emperor openly said that he negotiated with the Western princes for no other purpose but causing fear to the Turks. This was well known in Europe; and while Greek fickleness and duplicity prevented a cordial understanding between the East and the West, it became one of the principal causes of the destruction of the Greek empire. Manuel died in 1425, at the age of 77, and was succeeded by his eldest son John (VII.), whom he had by his wife Irene, daughter of Constantine Dragas, and whom he created co-emperor in 1419. (Laonic. i. 2; Ducas, c. 12—15; Phranza, i. 16, &c.) [W. P.]

MANUEL (Μανουήλ), literary and ecclesiastical.

1. Of BYZANTIUM. Among the writers enumerated by Joannes Scylites Curopalates, who lived in the latter part of the eleventh century, in the commencement of his Σύνοψις ιστοριών, as having written on historical subjects, but in a very imperfect manner, after Theophanes, is Manuel of Byzantium. It is probable that he was of very inferior reputation even in the days of Scylites, as Cedrenus (p. 2, ed. Paris, vol. i. p. 2, ed. Bonn), in transcribing the passage, does not mention his name, but comprehends him under the somewhat contemptuous term of λοῦρελ βοῦδιστις, "the other Byzantine."

2. BRYENNIUS. [BRYENNIUS.]

3. CALECAR. [CALECAR.]

4. CHARITOPULUS (ὁ Χαριτόπουλος), or SARANTENUS (ὁ Σαραντῆνης), or the PHILOSOPHER, a Greek ecclesiastic of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, acquired a high reputation by his philosophical attainments. He was appointed patriarch of Constantinople on the death of Maximus II., which occurred in A. D. 1215, and held the patriarchate for five years and seven months, dying about the middle of A. D. 1221. Three synodal decrees of a Manuel, patriarch of Constantinople, are given in the Jus Græco-Romanum of Leucavius (lib. iii. p. 238, &c.), who assigns them to Charitopolus, and is followed by Cave and Oudin, who have confounded Charitopolus with another Manuel [No. 7]. Le Quien objects to this judgment of Leucavius, as not founded on evidence; and with better reason adjudges them to Manuel II. Ephraem of Constantinople celebrates Charitopolus as φύλαξ δεσφύης καὶ νόμου καὶ καρδίας, "an exact observer of the laws and canons." (Georg. Acropolit. Annal. c. 19, p. 17, ed. Paris, p. 35, ed. Bonn; Ephraem, de Patriarchis CP. vs. 10251, ed. Bonn; Anonymus (supposed by some to be Niceph. Callist.), de Patriarchis CPolitaniæ Carmen Iambicum, and Patriarches CPolce, and Labbe, de Hist. Byzant. Scriptorib. Imperpetuæ; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 278; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1240, vol. ii. p. 297, ed. Oxford, 1740—42; Oudin, Comment. de Scriptorib. et Scriptis Eccles. vol. iii. col. 177.)

5. CHRYSOLORAS. [CHRYSOLORAS.]

6. Of CONSTANTINOPLE, 1. [No. 4.]

7. Of CONSTANTINOPLE, 2. There were two Manuels patriarchs of Constantinople, Manuel I. Charitopolus [No. 4.] and Manuel II., the subject of the present article. Cave, Oudin, and others seem to have confounded the two, for they state that Manuel Charitopolus succeeded Germanus II. [GERMANUS, No. 8] in A. D. 1240. Charitopolus was the predecessor of Germanus, not his successor; Manuel II. was his successor, though not immediately, for the brief patriarchate of Methodius II. and a vacancy in the see, of considerable but uncertain length, intervened. Manuel's death is distinctly fixed as having occurred two months before that of the emperor Joannes Ducas Vatatzes [JOANNES III.], which occurred 30th Oct. A. D.

1255. The duration of his patriarchate is fixed by Nicephorus Callisti, according to Le Quien, at eleven years, but the table in the Protrepticon of Labbe assigns to him fourteen years; so that A. D. 1241 or 1244 will be assumed as the year of his accession, according as one or the other of these authorities is preferred. Manuel held, before his patriarchate, a high place among the ecclesiastics of the Byzantine court then fixed at Nice, and was reputed a man of piety and holiness "though married," and of mild and gentle disposition, but by no means learned. The three Sententie Synodales of the patriarch Manuel, given in the Jus Græco-Romanum, undoubtedly belong to this patriarch, not to Charitopolus [see No. 4], for the second of them, De Transulione Episcoporum, is expressly dated July, Indict. 8, A. M. 6758, era of Constant. = A. D. 1250. Some works in MS., especially a letter to pope Innocent, by "Manuel Patriarcha CPol.," probably belong to the subject of this article. (Georg. Acropolit. Annal. c. 42, 51, 52, 53, pp. 39, 54, 56, 57, ed. Paris, pp. 77, 107, 110, 112, ed. Bonn; Ephraem. de Joan. Duca Fatale, vs. 8860; De Theod. Duca. Lascare, vs. 8922; De Patriarch. CP. vs. 10,267, &c.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. vol. i. col. 279; Cave and Oudin, as in No. 4; Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 668.)

8. HOLOBOLUS (Ὁλόβολος), a Byzantine writer of the latter part of the thirteenth century. When the ambitious Michael Palaeologus [MICHAEL VIII.] deprived his youthful colleague Joannes Lacaris [JOANNES IV.] of his eyes and his share in the empire, and sent him into banishment about A. D. 1261 or 1262, Holobolus, then a lad pursuing his studies, was cruelly mutilated by order of Michael, his nose and lips being cut off, because he had expressed grief at the treatment of the young emperor. The mutilated lad was confined to the monastery of the Precursor (τοῦ προδρομοῦ), where having excellent abilities and good opportunity, he pursued his studies with such success, that the patriarch Germanus III. of Constantinople [GERMANUS, No. 8], shortly after his accession to the patriarchate, A. D. 1267, procured him to be appointed master of the school for the instruction of young ecclesiastics, and prevailed upon the emperor to remit his punishment, and allow him to quit the monastery. The patriarch also conferred upon him the ecclesiastical office of rhetor, reader and expounder of the Scriptures, and showed him much kindness. When the emperor formed the design of a reconciliation of the Greek and Latin churches, Holobolus was one of the ecclesiastics of whose counsels he availed himself. Holobolus, however, did not enter very heartily into the business; and, having been hurt by a slight offered him by the emperor, he changed sides, and when called upon to give his opinion in a synod at Constantinople, declared against the plan of reconciliation altogether. This drew from the emperor, who was present, an outburst of reproach; to which the angry ecclesiastic gave so blunt and undaunted a reply, that he was near being torn to pieces by the courtiers who surrounded the emperor. He took sanctuary in the great church, but being taken from thence, was banished to the monastery of Hyacinthus at Nice, A. D. 1273. Before long he was brought back to Constantinople, cruelly beaten, and paraded with various circumstances of ignominy through the streets. In A. D. 1283, after the accession of Andronicus II. Palaeologus, son of Michael, who pursued with respect to the union of the churches an opposite policy to that of his father, Holobolus appeared in the synod of Constantinople, in which Joannes Veccus [VEXCUS] was deposed from the patriarchate of Constantinople, and he took part in the subsequent disputations with that chief of the Latinizing party. Little else is known of Holobolus (Georg. Pachym. de Mich. Palaeol. iii. 11, iv. 14, v. 12, 20; De Andron. Palaeol. i. 8, 34, 35.)

Holobolus wrote Versus Politici in Michaelis Palaeologum, cited in the Glossarium in Scriptores Med. et Infim. Græcistis of Ducange, s. v. Ψήρσι. These are probably the same verses which are extant in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, under the title of Versus Politici XXV. de Vanitate omnium Rerum. 2. The Ἐπὶ νεῖα, Scholia in Aram Dosiadæ, published by Valcknaer, in the Diatribe in Euripidis perditorum Dramatum Reliquia (c. xii.), subjoined to his edition of the Hippolytus of Euripides (4to. Leyden, 1768), may be probably ascribed to our Holobolus. But the Apologia ad Erolmata Francisci Ordinis Prædicatorum Monachi, published, though in a mutilated form, in the Faria Sacra of Le Moine (vol. i. p. 268—293), appears to be by a later writer described as "Manuel Rhetor," whom Cave places A. D. 1500, and who lived for many years after that time. (Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. vol. xi. p. 669; Cave, Hist. Litt. Appendix, ad ann. 1500, vol. ii. Appendix, p. 224.)

9. MOSCHOPULUS. [MOSCHOPULUS.]

10. PHILE. [PHILE.]

11. RHETOR. [No. 8.]

12. STRABOROMANUS, a Byzantine writer of the time of Alexius Comnenus. He wrote on astrology, and some of his works are extant in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 670.) [J. C. M.]

MA'RATHON (Μαράθων), the hero eponymus of the Attic town of Marathon. According to some traditions, he was a son of Epopeus; and being driven from Peloponnesus by the violence of his father, he went to Attica. After his father's death, he returned to Peloponnesus, divided his inheritance between his two sons, and then settled in Attica. (Paus. ii. 1. § 1, 15. § 4, 52. § 4.) According to others, Marathon was an Arcadian, and took part with the Tyndaridae in their expedition against Attica, and in pursuance of an oracle, devoted himself to death before the beginning of the battle. (Plut. Thes. 32; comp. Philostr. Vit. Sophr. ii. 7.) [L. S.]

MARATHUS, JU'LIVS, a freedman of the emperor Augustus, who wrote an account of the life of his master. (Suet. Aug. 79, 94.)

MARCELLA. 1. Daughter of C. Marcellus, C. F., and Octavia, the sister of Augustus. She was married, first to M. Vipsanius Agrippa, who separated from her in B. C. 21, after the death of her brother, Marcellus (No. 15), in order to marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus. After this her uncle gave her in marriage, secondly, to Julia Antonius, the son of the triumvir [ANTONIUS, No. 19], by whom she had a son Lucius. After his death she married, thirdly, Sext. Appuleius, who was consul in A. D. 14, by whom she had a daughter, Appuleia Varilia. (Plut. Anton. 87; Dion Cass. liii. 1, liv. 6; Vell. Pat. ii. 93, 100; Suet. Aug. 63; Tac. Ann. ii. 50.)

2. Sister of the preceding. (Plut. Ant. 87; Suet. Aug. 63.) [E. H. B.]

MARCELLA, was a wife or mistress of the poet Martial, to whom he has addressed two epigrams (xii. 21, 31). She was a native of Spain, and brought him as her dowry an estate. As Martial was married previously to Cleopatra (Ep. iv. 22, xi. 43, 104), he espoused Marcella probably after his return to Spain about A. D. 96. [W.B.D.]

MARCELLINUS, the author of the life of Thucydides. [THUCYDIDES.]

MARCELLINUS, a friend of Martial, who addressed to him three short poems while Marcellinus was travelling or with the legions on the Dacian frontier. (Ep. vi. 25, vii. 80, ix. 46.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLINUS, the chief minister of the usurper Magnentius, first appears in history as Præfectus Orientis, in A. D. 340, and is probably the Marcellinus who stands in the Fasti as consul the following year. He was Comes Sacrarum Largitionum under Constantia, and the most active promoter, if not the first contriver of the conspiracy by which that prince was destroyed (A. D. 350). Marcellinus, now holding the rank of Magister Officiorum and general in chief of the troops, was employed by the usurper to suppress the insurrection of Nepotiana, on which occasion he displayed the most savage cruelty towards the wealthier and more distinguished inhabitants of Rome. He subsequently headed the embassy despatched to offer terms of peace and alliance to Constantius, and is said to have been seized and detained by the indignant emperor, but we find him soon afterwards at liberty, commanding the armies of the West, and he probably perished at the great battle of Mursa, A. D. 351.

Marcellinus is represented by Julian as animated by the most violent and implacable hostility towards all the members of the house of Constantine, and as the master rather than the servant of Magnentius. [CONSTANTIUS I.; CONSTANTIUS; MAGNENTIUS; VETRIANO; NEPOTIANUS.] (Codex Theod. Chron. p. 41; Julian, Orat. i. 2; Zosim. ii. 41—54; Aurel. Vict. Epit. 41.) [W. R.]

MARCELLINUS, or MARCELLIANUS (Μαρκελλιανός, Procop.), a Roman officer, who acquired for himself in the fifth century an independent principality in Illyricum. He was a friend of the patrician Aëtius, on whose assassination, A. D. 454 [ÆTIUS], he appears to have renounced his allegiance to the contemptible emperor Valentinian III. [VALENTINIANUS III. AUG.]; and having gathered a force, established himself in Dalmatia and the other parts of Illyricum. (Procop. De Bell. Vandal. i. 6.) After the assassination of Valentinian, whether before the election or after the deposition of Avitus is not clear [AVITUS], a conspiracy of the young nobles was formed under the restless Paconius to raise Marcellinus to the empire, but without success. (Sidon. Apollin. Epistol. i. 11.) During the reign of Majorian, Marcellinus appears to have recognised his authority; and the title of Patricius Occidentis, which Marcellinus bore, was perhaps conferred at this time. He marched with a body of troops, chiefly or entirely Goths, to the assistance of Majorian against the Vandals, and was posted in Sicily to defend that island from invasion; but the patrician Ricimer, jealous of Marcellinus, employed his superior wealth in bribing his soldiers to desert him; and Marcellinus, fearing some attempt on his life, withdrew in anger from Sicily, which was left defenceless, and returned apparently to Illyricum. This was probably in A. D. 461 or 462, after Majorian's death. (Priscus, Historia, apud Excerpta de Legationibus Gentium ad Romanos, c. 14, and Romanorum ad Gentem, c. 10.) The Western empire, which had passed into the hands of Severus, now apprehended an attack from Marcellinus, but he was prevailed on to give up any hostile purpose by the mediation of the Eastern emperor, Leo, who sent Phylarchus as ambassador to him. (Priscus, ibid.) In A. D. 464 he was engaged in the defence of Sicily, from which he drove out the Vandals (Idatius, Chronicon); and apparently, in 468, at the request of Leo, drove the same enemy from Sardinia (Procopius, l. c.). About the time of the expedition of Basiliscus [BASILISCUS] against Carthage (A. D. 468), he was again in Sicily, acting with the Romans against the Vandals, when he was assassinated by his allies (Marcellin. Cassiodor. Chronicon). Genserik, the Vandal king, who regarded him as his most formidable enemy, rejoiced exceedingly at his death, and repeated the saying, that "the Romans had cut off their right hand with their left." (Damascius, Vita Isidor. apud Phot. Biblioth. Cod. 242.) Marcellinus was a heathen (Damascius, l. c.), a man of learning, and the friend of Salustius, the Cynic philosopher. He was given to divination, in which he had the reputation of being highly skilled; and was eminent for statesmanship and military skill, of which his establishment and maintenance of his independent position, unstained by any great crime, is a sufficient proof. He governed his principality equitably (Suidas, s. v. Μαρκελλιανός); and perhaps transmitted it to his family; for his nephew, Julius Nepos [ΝΕΠΟΣ], when driven from the Western empire by the patrician Orestes (ORESTES), retained some territory and the imperial title in Illyricum, where he was assassinated some years after. [GLYCERIUS.] The ancient authorities for the life of Marcellinus have been cited: of moderns, Gibbon (Decline and Fall, &c. c. 36) and Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, vol. vi.) may be consulted: but we doubt whether either of them has accurately digested the scattered notices of the ancient. [J. C. M.]

MARCELLINUS, AMMIANUS. [AMMIANUS.]

MARCELLINUS, BAE'BIUS, ædile A. C. 203, was unjustly and for a ridiculous reason condemned to death in that year. (Dion Cass. lxxvi 8, 9.)

MARCELLINUS, CLAUDIUS, an orator who pleaded on the defendant's side at the impeachment of Marius Priscus, proconsul of Africa, and replied to Pliny. (Plin. Ep. ii. 11; comp. Jur. Sat. i. 49, viii. 120.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLINUS COMES, so called on account of the office of comes, which he held probably at Constantinople, was a native of Illyricum, and is said to have written "IV. Libri de Temporum Qualitatibus et Positionibus Locorum," which is much praised by Cassiodorus (De Institutione Divinarum Liter., c. 7), but which is lost. He wrote besides a short "Chronicon," which begins with the consulship of Ausonius and Olybrius or the accession of Theodosius the Great, in A. D. 379, and goes down to the accession of Justin I. in 518. This is the original work of Marcellinus as published in the editio princeps by Scomberius. Another writer continued the work till the fourth consulate of Justinian the Great, in 534. The latter part is contained in the edition of Jo. Sirmond, Paris, 1619, 8vo. The compilation of Marcellinus, who lived probably at the end of the fifth and in the beginning of the sixth century of our era, is not without some value, and is often quoted by modern historians. (Fabric. Bibl. Lat. vol. ii. p. 616.) [W. P.]

MARCELLINUS, CORNELIUS LENTULUS. [MARCELLUS, CLAUDIUS.]

MARCELLINUS, EGNATIUS, a quaestor in a provincial government whose integrity towards the treasury is highly commended by the younger Pliny. (Plin. Ep. iv. 12.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLINUS, FABIVS, quoted by Lampridius (Alex. Sev. 48) as the author of a biography of Trajan, and ranked by Vopiscus (Prob. 2) among historians of the second class, such as Pharius Maximus, Suetonius Tranquillus, Julius Capitolinus, and Lampridius. [W. R.]

MARCELLUS CLAUDIUS. Marcellus was the name of the most illustrious plebeian family of the Claudia gens. Plutarch states (Marc. 1) that the conqueror of Syracuse was the first person who bore this cognomen, but this is certainly a mistake. At what time it was first introduced we know not, but the first person of the name who appears in history is the consul of B. C. 331. [No. 1.]

colleague Cn. Cornelius Scipio, both of whom were eager to carry on the war. (Polyb. ii. 36; Plut. Marc. 6.) The Gauls hereupon summoned to their assistance 30,000 of their brethren, the Gæ-satae, from beyond the Alps; but notwithstanding this reinforcement, they did not prevent the two consuls from invading the plain of the Po, and laying siege to Acerræ. In order to create a diversion, one division of the Gaulish army, consisting of 10,000 men, crossed the Po, and laid siege in their turn to the town of Clastidium. Hereupon Marcellus, with a large body of cavalry and a small force of infantry, hastened to oppose them, and a battle ensued, which ended in the total defeat and destruction of the Gaulish detachment. The action was commenced by a combat of cavalry, in which Marcellus slew with his own hand Britomartus or Viridomarus, the king, or at least the leader, of the enemy. After this brilliant exploit he rejoined his colleague before Acerræ, which soon after fell into their hands, and was followed by the conquest of Mediolanum, the most important city of Cisalpine Gaul. The Insubrians now submitted at discretion, and the two consuls had the glory of having put a termination to the Gallic war. Great part of the credit of the campaign, according to Polybius, would seem to have belonged to Scipio, but Marcellus alone was honoured with a triumph, which was rendered conspicuous by the spoils of Viridomarus, carried as a trophy by the victor, and afterwards dedicated by him as spolia opima in the temple of Jupiter Feretrius. This was the third and last instance in Roman history in which such an offering was made. (Polyb. ii. 34, 35; Plut. Marc. 6—8; Zonar. viii. 20, p. 404; Val. Max. iii. 2. § 5; Eutrop. iii. 6; Flor. ii. 3; Aur. Vict. de Vir. III. 45; Oros. iv. 13; Fast. Capit. ap. Gruter, p. 297.)

From this time we hear no more of Marcellus until the alarming progress of Hannibal in Italy, and especially his victory at the lake of Trasymene, compelled the Romans to look out for tried and able soldiers, to whom they could confide the conduct of the war, and Marcellus was appointed one of the prætors for the year 216. He was at first destined to take the command in Sicily, but while he was still occupied at Ostia with the preparation of a fleet for this purpose, he was suddenly recalled to Rome, in consequence of the disastrous defeat of the two consuls at Cannæ. By the orders of the senate he threw a body of 1500 men, which he had raised for the expedition to Sicily, into Rome itself, while he hastened with one legion to Canusium, and after collecting there the shattered remains of the consular army, drew them off into Campania, where he encamped near Suessula. Meanwhile, the important city of Capua had opened its gates to Hannibal, and Nola would have followed its example, had not Marcellus received timely notice of the danger from the aristocratic party in that city, who were favourably disposed towards Rome. He accordingly hastened thither with the forces under his command, threw himself into the town, and on the approach of Hannibal made a sudden sally, by which he repulsed the Carthaginians with some loss. The success thus obtained (though evidently greatly magnified by the Roman annalists), was important from its moral effect, as the first check, however slight, that Hannibal had yet received. Marcellus now secured Nola to the Roman interest, by the execution of seventy of the leading men of the opposite party, and again withdrew to the hills above Suessula. But neither he nor Gracchus were able to avert the fate of Casilinum, which fell into the hands of Hannibal before the close of the winter. (Liv. xxii. 35, 57, xxiii. 14—17, 19; Plut. Marc. 9—11; Appian, Ann. 27; Cic. Brut. 3.)

Marcellus was soon after summoned to Rome, to consult with the dictator L. Junius Pera and his master of the horse, Tib. Gracchus, concerning the future conduct of the war: he was then invested with the rank of proconsul, and returned to take the command of the army in Campania. Meanwhile, news arrived at Rome that Postumius, who had been chosen one of the consuls for the year 215, had been killed in Cisalpine Gaul; and the people unanimously elected Marcellus to supply his place. But the senate, who were unwilling to admit of two plebeian consuls at the same time, declared that the omens were unfavourable, and Marcellus, in obedience to the augurs, resigned the consulship, and repaired once more to the army in Campania as proconsul. (Liv. xxiii. 24, 25, 30—32; Plut. Marc. 12.) His principal exploit that we find recorded during this year was the relief of Nola, which he a second time successfully defended against Hannibal; and though the Carthaginian general had been lately joined by Hanno with a powerful reinforcement, Marcellus not only repulsed him from the walls, but (if we may believe the accounts transmitted to us) defeated him with considerable slaughter; and this success was immediately followed by the desertion to the Romans of a large body of Numidian and Spanish horse. (Liv. xxiii. 39, 41—46; Plut. Marc. 12.)

At the election of the consuls for the ensuing year (214) Marcellus was appointed for the third time, with Fabius Maximus for his colleague. Such a pair of consuls (says Livy) had not been seen for many years. Yet their operations during the ensuing campaign were not marked by any decisive results: Marcellus returned to his old camp near Nola, and a third time repulsed an attempt of Hannibal upon that city; whereupon the Carthaginian general marched away to Tarentum, and the two consuls took advantage of his absence to lay siege to the small but important town of Casilinum. The Campanian garrison of this fortress, after an obstinate defence, were admitted to a capitulation by Fabius, but Marcellus broke in upon them as they were quitting the city, and put them all to the sword, except about fifty, who escaped under the protection of Fabius. (Liv. xxiv. 9, 13, 19.) After this Marcellus returned to Nola, from whence he was ordered by the senate to proceed to Sicily, apparently before the close of the summer of B.C. 214. (Ib. 20, 21.) On his arrival in that island he found affairs in a very unsettled state. The death of Hieronymus, which had at first appeared favourable to the Roman cause, had eventually led to a contrary result; and Hippocrates and Epicydes, two Carthaginians by birth, had obtained the chief direction of affairs at Syracuse. [EPICTOR.] Marcellus, however, at first determined to try the effect of negotiation: his ambassadors obtained a favourable hearing, and even induced the Syracusans to pass sentence of banishment against Hippocrates and Epicydes. These two leaders were at the time at Locri, at the head of a considerable force, but they were unable to defend the town against Marcellus, who took it by storm, and though he spared the inhabitants, executed in cold blood 2000 Roman deserters whom he found among the troops that had formed the garrison. This sanguinary act at once alienated the minds of the Sicilians, and alarmed the mercenary troops in the service of Syracuse. The latter immediately joined Hippocrates and Epicydes, who had made their escape to Herbesus; the gates of Syracuse were opened to them by their partisans within the walls, and the party hostile to Rome thus established in the undisputed command of that city. (Liv. xxiv. 27—32; Plut. Marc. 13, 14; Appian, Sic. 3.)

Marcellus, whose severities had given rise to this revolution, now appeared before Syracuse at the head of his army, and after a fruitless summons to the inhabitants, proceeded to lay siege to the city both by sea and land. His attacks were vigorous and unrelenting, and were directed especially against the quarter of Achradina from the side of the sea; but though he brought many powerful military engines against the walls, these were rendered wholly unavailing by the superior skill and science of Archimedes, who directed those of the besieged. All the efforts of the assailants were baffled, and the Roman soldiers inspired with so great a dread of Archimedes and his engines, that Marcellus was compelled to give up all hopes of carrying the city by open force, and to turn the siege into a blockade. (Liv. xxiv. 33, 34; Plut. Marc. 14—17; Polyb. viii. 3, 5—9; Zonar. ix. 1; Tzet. Chil. ii. 35.) During the continuance of this, he himself with a part of his army carried on operations in the other parts of the island, saving App. Claudius to keep watch before Syracuse. In this manner he took Helorus and Herbesus, and utterly destroyed Megara; and though he failed in preventing the Carthaginian general Himilco from making himself master of Agrigentum, he defeated Hippocrates near Acræ. The advance of Himilco compelled Marcellus to retreat to his camp before Syracuse; but here the Carthaginian general was unable to molest him, and the war was again reduced to a series of desultory and irregular operations in different parts of the island. These were by no means all favourable to the Romans: Murgantia, an important town, where they had established large magazines, was rendered to the Carthaginians, and the strong fortress of Enna was only prevented from following the example by the barbarous massacre of its inhabitants by order of the Roman governor, L. P. Pinarius [PINARIUS], an act of cruelty which had the effect of alienating the minds of all the other Sicilians. (Liv. xxiv. 35—39; Plut. Marc. 18.) Meanwhile, the blockade of Syracuse had been prolonged far on into the summer of 212, nor did there appear any prospect of its termination, as the communications of the besieged by sea were almost entirely open. In this state of things Marcellus fortunately discovered a part of the walls more weak than the rest, and having prepared scaling ladders, effected an entrance at this point during the night which followed a great festival, and thus made himself master of the Epipolæ. At two quarters called Tyche and Neapolis were he at his mercy, and were given up to plunder; but Epicydes still held the island citadel, and the important quarter of Achradina, which formed two strong and strong fortresses. Marcellus, however, made himself master of the fort of Euryalus, and now closely beset Achradina, when the Carthaginian army under Himilco and Hippocrates advanced to the relief of the city. Their efforts were, however, in vain: all their attacks on the camp of Marcellus were repulsed, and they were unable to effect a junction with Epicydes and the Syracusan garrison. The unhealthiness of the country soon gave rise to a pestilence, which committed frightful ravages in both armies, but especially in that of the Carthaginians, where it carried off both their generals, and led to the entire break-up of the army. Thus freed from all apprehensions from without, Marcellus renewed his attacks upon those quarters of the city which still held out; but though the officers on whom the command devolved after the departure of Epicydes made several attempts at negotiation, nothing was effected. At length the treachery of Mericus, a leader of Spanish mercenaries in the Syracusan service, opened to Marcellus the gates of Achradina, and in the general attack that ensued he made himself master of the island of Ortygia also. The city was given up to plunder, and though the lives of the free inhabitants were spared, they were reduced to such distress, that many of them were compelled to sell themselves as slaves, in order to obtain the means of existence. (Diod. Erc. Val. p. 60.) Yet the clemency and liberality of Marcellus have been extolled by almost all the writers of antiquity. The booty found in the captured city was immense: besides the money in the royal treasury, which was set apart for the coffers of the state, Marcellus carried off many of the works of art with which the city had been adorned, to grace his own triumph and the temples at Rome. This was the first instance of a practice which afterwards became so general; and it gave great offence not only to the Greeks of Sicily, but to a large party at Rome itself, who drew unfavourable comparisons between the conduct of Marcellus in this instance and that of Fabius at Tarentum. (Liv. xxv. 23—31, 40; Plut. Marc. 18, 19, 21; Polyb. viii. 37, ix. 10; Zonar. ix. 5.)

But though Syracuse had fallen, the war in Sicily was not yet at an end. A considerable Carthaginian force still occupied Agrigentum under Epicydes and Hanno; and Mutines, with a body of Numidian cavalry, carried his incursions far into the interior. Marcellus now turned his arms against these remaining enemies, attacked Epicydes and Hanno in the absence of Mutines, and totally defeated them, after which he returned to Syracuse. (Liv. xxv. 40, 41.) The early part of the following year (211) seems to have been devoted to the settlement of affairs in Sicily; but it is strange that Marcellus does not seem to have made any efforts to put an end altogether to the war in that island before he returned to Rome, and when towards the close of the summer he resigned the command of the province to the prætor M. Cornelius, Mutines was still in arms, and Agrigentum still in the possession of the Carthaginians. On this account the senate refused him the honours of a triumph, notwithstanding his great successes, and he was obliged to content himself with the inferior distinction of an ovation. Previous to this, however, he celebrated with great magnificence a triumphal procession to the temple of Jupiter on the Alban Mount, and even his ovation was rendered more conspicuous than most triumphs by the number and magnificence of the spoils brought from Syracuse. (Liv. xxvi. 21; Plut. Marc. 20, 22.)

Shortly after his triumph he was elected for the fourth time consul, together with M. Valerius Laevinus. But scarcely had he entered on his office (a.c. 210) when he had to encounter a storm of indignation, raised against him by his proceedings in Sicily. Notwithstanding the praises bestowed by the Roman writers, and still more by Plutarch (Marc. 20; and see Cic. in Verr. ii. 2, iv. 52, 54), upon his moderation and clemency, it is evident that his conduct was considered by many, even of his own countrymen, as having been unnecessarily harsh. Deputies from the Sicilian cities now appeared at Rome, to lay their complaints before the senate, where they met with powerful support; and though the governing body was unwilling to cast a slur upon Marcellus, and determined to ratify his past acts, yet the entreaties of the Sicilians so far prevailed, that the two consuls exchanged provinces, and it was arranged that Marcellus, to whose lot Sicily had previously fallen, should take the command in Italy against Hannibal. (Liv. xxvi. 22, 26, 29—32; Plut. Marc. 23; Zonar. ix. 6.) From this time the Sicilians appear to have changed their policy, and being freed from all immediate apprehensions from Marcellus, they endeavoured to conciliate his favour by every kind of honour and flattery: the Syracusans placed their city under the patronage of himself and his descendants, erected statues to him, and instituted an annual festival, called the Marcellæ, which continued to be celebrated down to the time of Verres. (Liv. xxvi. 32; Plut. Marc. 23; Cic. in Verr. ii. 21, 63.)

Marcellus now joined the army in Apulia, where he was soon after enabled to strike an important blow, by the conquest of Salapia, which was betrayed into his hands by Blasina, one of the principal citizens of the place (BLASIVS), and this success was followed by the capture of two cities in Samnium, which had been occupied by Carthaginian garrisons. Meanwhile, Hannibal had surprised and destroyed the army of Cn. Fulvius at Herdonæa; whereupon Marcellus hastened to oppose him, and check his victorious career. The two armies met near Numistro in Lucania, and a battle ensued, apparently without any decisive result, though the Romans claimed a victory; and the remainder of the campaign was occupied with unimportant movements, Marcellus continuing to follow the steps of his wary antagonist, but carefully avoiding an engagement. So important, however, did he deem it not to lose sight for a moment of the Carthaginian general, that he declined to repair to Rome even in order to hold the comitia, and in consequence, by direction of the senate, named Q. Fulvius dictator for that purpose. (Liv. xxvi. 38, xxvii. 1—5; Plut. Marc. 24, 25; Appian, Annib. 45—47; Zonar. ix. 7; Val. Max. iii. 8. ext. § 1.)

During the following year (209) he retained the command of his army with the rank of proconsul, in order that he might co-operate with the two consuls of the year, F. F. Maximus and Fulvius Flaccus, against Hannibal. At the opening of the campaign he was the first to oppose the Carthaginian general, whom he found near Canusium; and in the neighbourhood of that city, according to the Roman historians, there ensued three successive actions between the two armies. Of these the first was a drawn battle, in the second the Romans were defeated with heavy loss, and in the third they are said to have gained a complete victory; notwithstanding which, Hannibal drew off his army unmolested towards Bruttium, while Marcellus was unable to follow him, on account of the number of his wounded. So severe indeed had been his losses, that he shut himself up within the walls of Venusia, and remained there in perfect inactivity during the remainder of the season, while Hannibal moved up and down throughout the south of Italy without opposition. Such conduct could not fail to give much dissatisfaction at Rome; and it was even proposed by one of the tribunes that Marcellus should be deprived of his command. But on hearing of this motion he immediately hastened to Rome, and defended himself so successfully, that he was not only absolved from all blame, but elected consul for the ensuing year, together with T. Quintus Crispinus. (Liv. xxvii. 7, 12—14, 20, 21; Plut. Marc. 25—27.)

Before he entered on this, his fifth consulship, he was sent into Etruria to appease a threatened revolt of the Arretians, and succeeded in quieting their discontent for a time. After he returned to Rome, and was preparing to resume operations in the field (a.c. 208), he was detained for some time by unfavourable omens and the religious ceremonies deemed necessary, in order to avert the evils thus threatened. At length he once more took the command of the army at Venusia, and being joined by his colleague Crispinus from Bruttium, they encamped with their combined forces between Venusia and Bantia. Hannibal's camp was at a short distance from them; between the two armies by a wooded hill, which the two consuls imprudently proceeded to reconnoitre, escorted only by a small body of horse, and in so doing fell into an ambuscade of Numidians. A sharp skirmish ensued, but the Romans being far inferior in number, were quickly dispersed or put to the sword: Marcellus himself was run through the body with a spear, and killed on the spot: his colleague was with difficulty carried off the field severely wounded. Hannibal displayed a generous sympathy for the fate of his fallen foe, and caused all due honours to be paid to his lifeless remains. (Liv. xxvii. 21—23, 25—28; Plut. Marc. 28—30; Polyb. x. 32; Appian, Annib. 50; Zonar. ix. 9; Val. Max. i. 6. § 9.)

There are few characters in Roman history at which the picture transmitted to us has been more disfigured by partiality than that of Marcellus. Almost the whole account of his military operations against Hannibal has been so perverted, that it is difficult now to arrive at the truth; but it is starting to find, after reading in Livy or Plutarch the details of his numerous victories over the Carthaginian general, that Polybius expressly denied he had ever defeated Hannibal at all. (Plut. Comp. Pelop. c. Marc. 1; and see Polyb. xv. 11.) The ambiguous character of many of his alleged victories has been indeed already adverted to, and is sufficiently apparent even from the accounts of the Romans themselves. It seems probable that many of these exaggerations have found their way into history from the funeral oration of Marcellus by his son, which we know to have been used as authority by some of the earlier annalists. (Liv. xxvii. 27.) Still more unfounded is the reputation he seems to have obtained for clemency and to manity. According to Livy's own account, he alienated the minds of the Sicilians by his cruel executions at Leontini; and he approved of, though he did not order, the barbarous massacre at Enna. The feelings with which he inspired the whole of the Sicilian Greeks may be gathered from their expression reported by Livy, that it would be better for the island to be sunk in the sea, or overwhelmed by the flames of Aetna, than to be placed once more at the mercy of Marcellus. (Liv. xvi. 29; comp. Appian, Sic. 4, 5.) It is admitted even by Plutarch (his most unqualified panegyrist) that he was illiterate and imperfectly educated; and his character may be summed up as that of a rude, stern soldier, brave and daring to excess, but harsh and unyielding, and wanting alike the more useful qualities which adorned the character of Scipio and the prudence necessary to constitute a truly great general.

The head on the obverse of the annexed coin (struck by P. Cornelius Lentulus Marcellinus) is unquestionably that of the conqueror of Syracuse: the reverse represents him carrying the spolia opima to the temple of Jupiter Feretrius.

COIN OF MARCELLUS.

5. M. CLAUDIUS M. F. M. N. MARCELLUS, son

of the preceding, was remarkable as a youth for his personal beauty, as well as for his modest and retiring demeanour. The insult offered him by Scipio, and the punishment inflicted on the latter by the elder Marcellus, have been already related to (p. 297, b). In B. C. 208 he accompanied his father as military tribune, and was one of those present with him at the time of his death. He was himself badly wounded in the skirmish in which the elder Marcellus fell, notwithstanding which, we find him shortly after entrusted by his father Crispinus with the charge of conducting the remains of his father's army into safe quarters at Capua. (Liv. xxvii. 27, 29; Polyb. x. 32; Plut. Mar. 28—30.) On his return to Rome, he was freed from Hannibal's ashes by his father, which he pronounced his funeral oration, a position which Caelius Antipater already regarded as unworthy of credit in an historical point of view (Liv. xxvii. 27), though it may well be supposed to be the source from whence have proceeded many of the misrepresentations and exaggerations which have disfigured the history of the elder Marcellus.

In B. C. 205 he dedicated the temple of Virtus, at the Porta Capena, which had been vowed by his father, but was still unfinished at the time of his death (Liv. xxix. 11); and the following year he held the office of tribune of the people. In this capacity he was one of those appointed to accompany the praetor, M. Pomponius Matho, to Sicily into the charge of sacrilege brought by the Carthaginians against Scipio, as well as his lieutenant, C. Atilius. (Liv. xxix. 20.) Four years later (B. C. 200) he was curule aedile with Sex. Aelius

Paetus: they rendered their magistracy conspicuous by the quantity of corn that they imported at a cheap rate from Africa, as well as by the magnificence with which they celebrated the Roman games. (Liv. xxxi. 50.) In B. C. 198 he was elected one of the praetors, and obtained Sicily as his province, with a force of 4000 foot and 300 horse, but his services were confined to the sending supplies to the Roman armies in Greece. (Id. xxxii. 8, 27.) After the customary interval of two years he obtained the consulship, with L. Furius Purpureo, B. C. 196. (Id. xxxiii. 24; Fast. Capit.) His great object was to obtain the renewal or continuation of the Macedonian war, to which an end had just been put by Flaminius; but this was frustrated by the people, who ratified the peace which the latter had concluded with Philip; and Marcellus was compelled to content himself with the conduct of the war in Cisalpine Gaul. Here he at first met with a defeat from the Boians, but this was soon compensated by a brilliant victory over the Insubrians, and the conquest of the important town of Comum. Besides this, in conjunction with his colleague, Purpureo, he obtained some advantages over the Boians and Ligurians: and on his return to Rome was, by unanimous consent, honoured with a triumph. (Liv. xxxiii. 25, 36, 37; Polyb. xviii. 25.) In the same year he was appointed pontifex, in the room of C. Sempromnius Tuditanus. (Liv. xxxiii. 42.) In B. C. 193 he again served in Cisalpine Gaul as one of the lieutenants of the consul L. Cornelius Merula, and took part in the great victory he obtained over the Boians. (Id. xxxv. 5, 8.) In B. C. 189 he obtained the censorship in conjunction with T. Flaminius, an honour which was enhanced in this instance by the number of distinguished competitors over whom they obtained the preference. Their census was marked by the first admission of the people of Formiae, Fundi, and Arpinum, to the full rights of Roman citizens. (Liv. xxxvii. 58, xxxviii. 28, 36.) From this time we hear no more of him till his death, in B. C. 177. (Id. xli. 13.)

6. M. CLAUDIUS M. F. M. N. MARCELLUS, probably a brother of the preceding, though bearing the same praenomen, was consul in B. C. 183, with Q. Fabius Labeo. (Liv. xxxix. 44; Fast. Capit.) It seems probable that he is the same person who is mentioned (Liv. xxxix. 23) as one of the praetors two years before (B. C. 185), though his name is there written in many of the editions and MSS. of Livy Marcellinus. Liguria was assigned to both the consuls as their province; but the arms of Marcellus were in fact directed against a body of Gauls who had lately crossed the Alps, and settled themselves in the territory of Aquileia. They, however, submitted on the approach of the consul, were disarmed, and compelled to return across the mountains. After this he carried his arms into Istria, but apparently effected little, and was soon obliged to return to Rome to hold the comitia. (Liv. xxxix. 45, 54—56.) He held the sacerdotial office of decemvir sacrorum, and died in B. C. 169. (Liv. xlv. 18.)

7. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, praetor in B. C. 188, in which office he ordered two Romans of noble birth, who had been guilty of an outrage towards the Carthaginian ambassadors, to be given up to that people. (Liv. xxxviii. 35, 42.) Some writers consider that it is this Marcellus, and not the praetor of 185, who became consul in 183.

8. M. CLAUDIUS M. F. M. N. MARCELLUS, son of No. 5, conspicuous for his three consulships. He succeeded his father as pontifex in B. C. 177, though he had not then held any of the higher offices of the state. (Liv. xli. 13.) In 169 he was appointed praetor, and Spain assigned him for his province. (Id. xliii. 11, 15.) Three years later he obtained his first consulship, B. C. 166, which was marked by a victory over the Alpine tribes of the Gaula, for which he was honoured with a triumph. (Liv. xlv. 44, Epit. xvi.; Fast. Capit.) His second consulship, in B. C. 155, was, in like manner, distinguished by a triumph over the Ligurians (Fast. Capit.); but we know nothing farther of his exploits on either of these occasions. In B. C. 152 he was a third time raised to the consulship, together with L. Valerius Flaccus, and appointed to conduct the war in Spain. Here he obtained some successes over the Celtiberians; and having added to the impression thus produced by the clemency with which he treated the vanquished, he induced all the tribes at that time in arms to give hostages, and send ambassadors to Rome to sue for peace; but his conduct was attributed to indolence or timidity: the senate refused to ratify the proposed terms, and appointed L. Lucullus, one of the new consuls, to succeed Marcellus, and continue the war. Meanwhile, Marcellus, after an expedition against the Lusitanians, in which he had reduced the strong town of Nergobriga, had returned to winter at Corduba; but on learning the resolution of the senate, he suddenly broke up his winter-quarters, and marched into the country of the Celtiberians; whereupon all those tribes who had been previously in arms hastened to submit at discretion; a result previously concerted, as it was suspected, with the consul himself, who admitted them to favourable terms, while he had the satisfaction of handing over the province to his successor in a state of perfect tranquillity. (Appian, Hisp. 48—50; Polyb. xxxv. 2, 3; Liv. Epit. xlviii.; Eutrop. iv. 9.) The administration of Marcellus in Spain was farther distinguished by the foundation of the important colony of Corduba. (Strab. iii. p. 141.) In 148 he was sent ambassador to Masinissa, king of Numidia, but was shipwrecked on the voyage, and perished. (Liv. Epit. l.; Cic. in Pison. 19, de Divin. ii. 5.) It is recorded of this Marcellus that he commemorated, by an inscription in the temple of Honour and Virtue, consecrated by his father, the circumstance that his grandfather, his father, and himself, had enjoyed between them no less than nine consulships, an instance unparalleled in the history of Rome. (Ascon. ad Cic. Pison. p. 12, ed. Orell.)

9. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, son of the preceding, and father of the following, as well as of No. 12. He is not mentioned by any ancient author, but is supplied as a necessary link of the pedigree. (See Drumann, Gesch. Roms, vol. ii. p. 393, and below, No. 12.)

10. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, curule aedile in A. C. 91. (Cic. de Or. i. 13.) He is supposed by Drumann to be the father of the following, and brother of No. 12.

11. M. CLAUDIUS, M. F. M. N. MARCELLUS (probably a son of the preceding), the friend of Cicero, and subject of the oration Pro M. Marcello, ascribed, though erroneously, to the great orator. He is first mentioned as curule aedile with P.

Clodius in B. C. 56. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 3.) In February of that year he defended Milo, at Cicero's request, against the charge of violence brought against him by Clodius. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 3.) In 54 he was one of the six advocates who defended the cause of M. Scaurus (Ascon. ad Scaur. p. 20, ed. Orell.); and after the death of Clodius (B. C. 52), took a prominent part in the defence of Milo. (Id. ad Milon. pp. 35, 40, 41.) In the same year he was elected consul, together with Ser. Sulpicius Rufus, for the ensuing year. For this distinction he was probably indebted to the support and favour of Pompey; and during the period of his magistracy (B. C. 51) he showed himself a zealous partisan of the latter, and sought to secure his favour by urging the senate to extreme measures against Caesar. Among other modes in which he displayed his zeal, was the very indiscreet one of causing a citizen of Comum to be scourged, in order to show his contempt for the privileges lately bestowed by Caesar upon that colony. (Cic. ad Att. v. 11; Appian, B. C. ii. 26; Suet. Caes. 28.) But his vehemence gradually abated, as he found himself opposed by his colleague Sulpicius and several of the tribunes, while Pompey himself lent him no active support, and even distinctly refused to second him in his proposition for the immediate abrogation of Caesar's authority. But the election of the new consuls terminated favourably to the party of Pompey; and at length, on the 30th of September, Marcellus procured a resolution of the senate, that the whole subject should be brought under discussion on the 1st of March in the following year. After this no further steps were taken before the expiration of his office. (Suet. Caes. 28, 29; Dion Cass. xl. 58, 59; Appian, B. C. ii. 26; Caes. B. G. viii. 53; Cic. ad Att. viii. 3; Caelius, ad Fam. viii. 1, 8, 10, 13.)

But all the party zeal and animosity of Marcellus did not blind him to the obvious imprudence of forcing on a war for which they were unprepared; and hence, as it became evident that an open rupture was inevitable, he endeavoured to moderate the vehemence of his own party. Thus, in A. C. 50, we find him urging the senate to interpose their authority with the tribunes to induce them to withdraw their opposition (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 13); and at the beginning of the year 49 he is seen suggested the necessity of making levies of troops before any open steps were taken against Caesar. (Caes. B. C. i. 2.) His advice was overruled, and he was among the first to fly from Rome and Italy. But though he joined Pompey and his partisans in Epeirus, it is clear that he did not engage with any heartiness in the cause of which, according to Cicero, he foresaw the failure from the beginning; and after the battle of Pharsalia he abandoned all thoughts of prolonging the contest, and withdrew to Mytilene, where he gave himself up to the pursuits of rhetoric and philosophy. Here Caesar was content to leave him unmolested in a kind of honourable exile; and Marcellus himself was unwilling to sue to the conqueror for forgiveness, though Cicero wrote to him repeatedly from Rome, urging him in the strongest manner to do so, and assuring him of the clemency of Caesar. But though Marcellus himself would take no steps to procure his recall, his friends at Rome were not backward in their exertions for that purpose; and at length, in a full assembly of the senate, C. Marcellus, the cousin of the exile, threw himself in Caesar's feet to implore the pardon of his kinsman, and his example was followed by the whole body of the assembly. Caesar yielded to this demonstration of opinion, and Marcellus was declared to be forgiven, and restored to all his former honours. Cicero wrote to announce to him this favourable result, in a letter now lost; but the answer of Marcellus is preserved, and is marked by a singular coldness, which would lead us to the conclusion that his indifference in this matter was real, and not assumed. He, however, set out immediately on his return; but having touched at the Peiræus, where he had an interview with his former colleague, Sulpicius, then proconsul in Greece, he was assassinated immediately afterwards by one of his own attendants, P. Magius Chilo. There seems no doubt that the deed was prompted by private resentment, though suspected at the time to have been committed at the instigation of Caesar. Sulpicius paid him all due funeral honours, and caused him to be buried in the Academy, where a monument was erected to him by the Athenians, at the public expense. (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 4, 7—11, 12, vi. 6, ad Att. xiii. 10—22, pro M. Marcello, passim, Brut. 71.)

Marcellus had been, as already observed, a friend of Cicero's from his earliest youth; their views on political affairs had generally coincided, and they continued to act in concert until the breaking out of the civil war. Hence we cannot wonder at the very high praises bestowed by the latter upon the wisdom and prudence of Marcellus, of whom he speaks on several occasions in terms which would lead us to suppose him a perfect model of a philosophic statesman. Caelius, on the contrary, calls him slow and inefficient; but while his conduct in his consulship was certainly not such as to give us a high opinion of his political sagacity or prudence, it would rather seem to have deserved censure for defects the very opposite of these. Of his merits as an orator, we are wholly incompetent to judge, but they are said to have been of a high order, and inferior to few except Cicero himself. (Cic. Brut. 71. All the passages in Cicero relating to M. Marcellus will be found collected or referred to by Orelli, Onomasticon Tullian. pp. 157, 158. See also Drumann, Gesch. Roms. vol. ii. p. 393, &c., and Passow in Zimmermann's Zeitschrift für Alterthumswissenschaft, 1835.)

12. C. CLAUDIUS, M. F. M. N. MARCELLUS, a brother of the preceding, of whom very little is known previous to his election in B. C. 50, to be consul for the ensuing year (49), a distinction which he obtained, it is said, in consequence of his declared enmity to Caesar. (Caes. B. G. viii. 50.) He is constantly confounded with his cousin, C. Marcellus [No. 14] who was consul in the year 50 with L. Aemilius Paulus, a confusion little to be wondered at: indeed it is sometimes impossible to determine which of the two is meant. Matters were fast approaching to a crisis when he and his colleague, L. Cornelius Lentulus, entered upon their office. While yet only consuls elect, they had lent their countenance to the violent and illegal act of the consul C. Marcellus in investing Pompey with the command of the army without authority from the senate (Dion Cass. xl. 66); and on the very first day of their consulship (1 Jan. B. C. 49) they brought under the consideration of the senate the measures to be taken in regard to Caesar, who was then at Ravenna, and from whom letters had been presented by Curio. It does not appear that Marcellus took any prominent part in the debates that ensued, and the violent proceedings which led to the flight of the tribunes and the actual breaking out of the war; but neither do we learn that he attempted to check the intemperate zeal of his colleague, and the other leaders of the war party. He appears indeed, so far as we can judge, to have been a man of small abilities, who was put forward as a tool by the more violent partisans of Pompey. On the breaking out of the war he accompanied his colleague, Lentulus, in his hasty flight from Rome, took part in the subsequent proceedings at Capua, and eventually crossed over to Dyrrhachium with a part of the army of Pompey. In the following year (B. C. 48) we find him mentioned as commanding a part of Pompey's fleet (Caes. B. C. iii. 5); but this is the last we hear of him, and it therefore seems probable, as suggested by Drumann, that he perished in the civil war. (Dion Cass. xli. 1—3; Caes. B. C. i. 1—5, 14, 25; Appian, B. C. ii. 33, 37—39; Plut. Caes. 35, Pomp. 62; Cic. ad Att. vii. 18, 20, 21, ix. 1.) Cicero certainly alludes to him some years afterwards as then dead. (Phil. xiii. 14.)

13. C. CLAUDIUS, M. F. M. N. MARCELLUS, uncle of the two preceding, and father of the consul in B. C. 50. He is called by the Pseudo-Asconius (ad Verr. p. 206) great-grandson (pronepos) of the conqueror of Syracuse [No. 4]; but as has been pointed out by Wesseling and Drumann, this is impossible on chronological grounds, and he must have been a grandson of No. 8, and therefore abnepos of No. 4. He was prætor apparently in B. C. 80, and afterwards succeeded M. Aemilius Lepidus in the government of Sicily. He found that province in a state of great distress and confusion from the exactions and oppressions of his predecessor; but by the mildness and justice of his administration, he restored it to such a flourishing state, that Cicero tells us he was looked upon by the Sicilians as the second saviour of their country. Statues were erected to him in almost every city of the island; and the festival of the Marcellæ already instituted in honour of his progenitor [see No. 4] was now renewed in his favour. Throughout the speeches against Verres, Cicero dwells frequently upon the administration of Marcellus, as affording the most striking contrast to that of the accused. By a singular accident, Marcellus himself was present on that occasion, as one of the judges of Verres. (Cic. Verr. ii. 3, 21, iii. 16, 91, iv. 40, 42, &c., Div. in Cæcil. 4.) He held the office of augur, in which Cicero was one of his colleagues, and is cited by him as one of those who regarded the whole science of augury as a merely political institution. (Cic. de Divin. ii. 35, de Leg. ii. 13.) He lived to see his son elected consul for the year B. C. 50; and on that occasion Cicero wrote him a letter of congratulation (ad Fam. xv. 8), expressed in the most friendly terms. Elsewhere also the latter dwells in the strongest manner upon the respect and affection with which he had always regarded Marcellus (pro Sull. 6).

14. C. CLAUDIUS, C. F. M. N. MARCELLUS, son of the preceding, and first cousin of M. Marcellus [No. 11], whom he succeeded in the consulship, B. C. 50. He enjoyed the friendship of Cicero from an early age, and attached himself to the party of Pompey in the state, notwithstanding his connection with Caesar by his marriage with

Octavia. It was evidently to the influence of Pompey, combined with that of his cousin M. Marcellus, that he was indebted for his elevation to the consulship at the comitia of the year 51; and during the year of his office he showed himself a zealous and uncompromising advocate of the party hostile to Caesar. His measures were, however, very much impeded by the opposition of his colleague, L. Aemilius Paullus, as well as of the tribune C. Curio, both of whom, though previously hostile, had been recently gained over by Caesar. The latter is said to have endeavoured to corrupt Marcellus also, but to have found him inaccessible to bribes. (Appian, B. C. ii. 26.) On the 1st of March, B. C. 50, Marcellus brought before the senate, as previously arranged, the question of superseding Caesar in his command; but the interposition of Curio prevented any conclusion being come to at that time; and afterwards the illness of Pompey and the elections for the ensuing year caused the question to be again postponed. The consul, however, succeeded in obtaining a decree of the senate for withdrawing from Caesar two of his legions, under pretence that they were wanted for the Parthian war; but as soon as the troops arrived in Italy they were detained at Capua, to wait for further orders. Meanwhile, repeated discussions took place in the senate in regard to Caesar, Curio still insisting that if he was compelled to resign his command, Pompey should do so too; while Marcellus in vain endeavoured to force on a decree in pursuance of the views of himself and the more violent party. At length, a rumour having arrived that Caesar was actually marching upon Rome with four legions, the consul once more took the opportunity to propose that Pompey should be immediately placed at the head of the forces then in Italy; but having again failed in obtaining the consent of the senate, he took the extraordinary step of investing Pompey with the command by his own personal authority, supported only by that of the two consuls elect, C. Marcellus and L. Lentulus. (Caes. B. G. viii. 54, 55; Dion Cass. xl. 59—64; Appian, B. C. ii. 27—31; Plut. Pomp. 58, 59.)

The violence with which Marcellus urged matters to a crisis at this time is strangely contrasted with his timidity and helplessness when the war had actually broken out, and which exceeded, according to Cicero, that of all others of his party. He used his utmost endeavours with Cicero to induce him not to quit Italy, in order that he might himself have an excuse for remaining: but even when the orator reluctantly followed Pompey and the senate to Epeirus, Marcellus could not make up his mind to do the same; he remained in Italy; and probably, from this circumstance, coupled with his relationship to Caesar, readily obtained the forgiveness of the conqueror. Thus, in B. C. 47, he was able to intercede with the dictator in favour of his cousin, M. Marcellus, who was then still in exile; and at a later period we find him enjoying, as the husband of Octavia, a place of high consideration. He is repeatedly mentioned by Cicero in the year 44, and must have lived till near the close of A. C. 41, as his widow, Octavia, was pregnant by him when betrothed to Antony in the following year. (Cic. ad Fam. iv. 4, 7, 11, ad Att. x. 15, xv. 12, pro Marc. 4, 11, Phil. iii. 6; Dion Cass. xlviii. 31.) Orelli has referred many of these passages to C. Marcellus, M. f., whom he considers as the husband of Octavia; but Drumann has satisfactorily shown that they relate to his cousin, the subject of the present article.

15. M. CLAUDIUS, C. F. C. N. MARCELLUS, son of the preceding and of Octavia, the daughter of C. Octavius and sister of Augustus. He must have been born in the year B. C. 43, and was a youth of promising talents and engaging manners, having been brought up with great care by his mother, a woman of superior understanding, as well as of the highest virtue. As early as B. C. 39 he was betrothed in marriage to the daughter of Sex. Pompey, as one of the conditions of the peace concluded in that year between Pompey and Octavian (Dion Cass. xlviii. 38); but the marriage never took place, as Pompey's death, in A. C. 35, removed the occasion for it.

In A. C. 29 Augustus, on his return from Egypt, distributed a congiarium, in the name of young Marcellus, to the boys of the Roman populace (id. ii. 21); and in A. C. 25 we find him, together with Tiberius, presiding at the games and spectacles exhibited by Augustus at the foundation of his new colony of Emerita in Spain. (id. liii. 26.) It was apparently in the same year that Augustus adopted him as his son, at the same time that he gave him his daughter Julia in marriage (Plut. Ant. 87; Dion Cass. liii. 27), and caused him to be admitted into the senate with praetorian rank, and with the privilege of suing for the consulship ten years before the legal period. Shortly afterwards (in A. C. 24), the young Marcellus was elected curule aedile for the ensuing year, and distinguished his magistracy by the magnificence of the games which he exhibited, on occasion of which the whole forum was covered over with an awning, as well as the theatres themselves, which were hung with splendid tapestries. Augustus himself did every thing in his power to contribute to the effect of this display, in which Octavia also bore an important part. (Dion Cass. liii. 28, 31; Propert. iii. 18, 13—20; Plin. H. N. xix. 1.) But Marcellus was not destined to survive the year of this his first office: in the autumn of A. C. 23, almost before the end of the games and shows, he was attacked by the disease, of which he died shortly after at Baiae, notwithstanding all the skill and care of the celebrated physician Antonius Musa. He was in the 20th year of his age (Propert. l. c.), and was thought to have given so much promise of future excellence, that his death was mourned as a public calamity; and the grief of Augustus, as well as that of his mother, Octavia, was for a time unbounded.

On the other hand, his untimely fate was so favourable to the views of Livia as to give rise to the suspicion, probably unfounded, that she had been the means of hastening it. (Dion Cass. liii. 33.) The rising favour of Marcellus with Augustus had led to the general expectation that he would name him his successor; and it is probable that he would have done so had the life of the young man been prolonged; but he evidently deemed him as yet unequal to the charge; and in a secret illness, which endangered his own life at the beginning of the year 23, Augustus had certainly destined Agrippa to succeed to the management of affairs in case of his death, a circumstance which gave rise to great jealousy between the two, and to the temporary removal of Agrippa from Rome. (Ibid. 31, 32.)

The obsequies of Marcellus were celebrated with the greatest magnificence by Augustus, who himself pronounced the funeral oration over his remains, after which they were deposited in the mausoleum lately erected for the Julian family. At a subsequent period (B.C. 14) Augustus dedicated in his name the magnificent theatre near the Forum Oltorium, of which the remains are still visible. But the most durable monument to the memory of Marcellus is to be found in the well-known passage of Virgil, which must have been composed and recited to Augustus and Octavia before the end of the year 22. (Dion Cass. liii. 30—32, liv. 26; Vell. Pat. ii. 93; Plut. Marc. 10; Suet. Oct. 63; Tac. Ann. i. 3, ii. 41, Hist. i. 15; Propert. iii. 18; Virg. Æn. vi. 860—886; Serv. ad Virg. l. c.; Donat. Vit. Virg.)

16. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, called by Cicero, or distinction's sake, the father of Aeserninus. (Brut. 36.) We have no account of his connection with the main branch of the Marcelli, the family of the conqueror of Syracuse: the pedigree, as made out by Drumann, though not in itself improbable, is wholly without authority. He is first mentioned as serving under Marius in Gaul in A.C. 102, when he bore an important part in the defeat of the Teutones near Aquæ Sextiæ. (Plut. Marc. 20, 21.) In B.C. 90 his name occurs as one of the lieutenants of L. Julius Cæsar in the Marsic war: and it appears that after the defeat of the consul by Vettius Cato, Marcellus threw himself, with a body of troops, into the strong fortress of Aesernia in Samnium, where he held out for a considerable time, but was at length compelled to surrender for want of provisions. (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 41; Liv. Epit. lxxiii.) It is doubtless from some circumstance connected with this siege that his son derived the surname of Aeserninus. There is little doubt that it is this M. Marcellus who appears as one of the judges in the trial of P. Quintus, B.C. 81 (Cic. pro Quint. 17), and to whom Cicero also alludes as having a deadly feud with the orator L. Crassus (pro Font. 1). He was himself a speaker of no ordinary merit. (Cic. Brut. 36.)

17. M. CLAUDIUS, M. F. MARCELLUS AESERNINUS, is mentioned by Cicero as a young man at the trial of Verres (B.C. 70), on which occasion he appeared as a witness. (Cic. Verr. iv. 42, where, however, several editions give his name as C. Marcellus.)

18. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS AESERNINUS, prætor in Spain in B.C. 48, under Q. Cassius Longinus. Drumann supposes him to be a son of the preceding, with whom Orelli, on the contrary, regards him as identical. (Onomast. Tullian.) Cassius sent him with a body of troops to hold possession of Corduba, on occasion of the mutiny and revolt excited in Spain by his own exactions. But Marcellus quickly joined the mutineers, though, whether voluntarily or by compulsion, is not certain; and put himself at the head of all the troops assembled at Corduba, whom he retained in their fidelity to Cæsar, at the same time that he prepared to resist Cassius by force of arms. But though the two leaders, with their armies, were for some time opposed to one another, Marcellus avoided coming to a general engagement; and on the arrival soon after of the præconsul, M. Lepidus, he hastened to submit to his authority, and place his legions under his command at his disposal. By the questionable part he had acted on this occasion Marcellus at first incurred the resentment of Cæsar, but was afterwards restored to favour. (Hirt. B. Alex. 57—64; Dion Cass. xlii. 15, 16.)

19. M. CLAUDIUS, M. F. MARCELLUS AESERNINUS, consul in B.C. 22. (Dion Cass. liv. 1, and Arg.) Perhaps the same with the preceding. He married Asinia, the daughter of C. Asinius Pollio, who was consul in B.C. 40.

20. M. CLAUDIUS, M. F. MARCELLUS AESERNINUS, son of the preceding. When a boy he broke his leg while acting in the Trojan games before Augustus, a circumstance of which his grandfather, Asinius Pollio, complained so loudly that the custom was abolished. (Suet. Oct. 43.) He was trained with much care by his grandfather in all kinds of oratorical exercises, and gave much promise as an orator. (Senec. Epit. Controv. lib. iv. præf.) In A.D. 20 he was one of those whom Piso requested to undertake his defence on the charge of having poisoned Germanicus, but he declined the office. (Tac. Ann. iii. 11.) It is probable that ASINIUS MARCELLUS who is mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xiv. 40) as a great-grandson of Pollio, was a son of this Aeserninus.

21. P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS MARCELLINUS, was a son of No. 16, and brother of No. 17 (Cic. Brut. 36), who must have been adopted by some one of the Cornelii Lentuli, though we know not by whom. (See Orelli. Onom. Tull. p. 177.) He is mentioned by Cicero (l. c.) as an orator of considerable merit, and figures as one of the lieutenants of Pompey in the war against the pirates, B.C. 67. (Appian, Mithr. 95.) It appears that he married a Cornelia, of the family of the Scipios. (Orelli. l. c.)

22. CN. CORNELIUS, P. F. LENTULUS MARCELLINUS, son of the preceding. (Dion Cass. Arg. xxxix.) He is first mentioned as zealously supporting the cause of the Sicilians against Verres, while yet a young man, B.C. 70. (Cic. Div. in Caecil. 4, in Verr. ii. 42.) He next appears in B.C. 61, as supporting his kinsman, L. Lentulus Crus, in the accusation of Clodius, for violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. (Schol. Bob. ad Cæc. in Clod. p. 336, ed. Orelli.) In B.C. 59 he held the office of prætor, and presided at the trial of C. Antonius, the colleague of Cicero. (Cic. in Patis. 11; Orelli. Onom. Tull. p. 177.) The following year he repaired to Syria, and administered that province for nearly two years, during which his time was principally taken up with repressing the predatory incursions of the neighbouring Arabs. (Appian, Syr. 51.) But he returned to Rome soon enough to sue for the consulship at the elections of the year 57, and was chosen for the ensuing year, together with L. Marcus Philippus. Before the close of the same year also he took a prominent part in favour of Cicero, after the return of the latter from exile, and exerted himself zealously and successfully to procure the restoration of his house and property. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 2, 3, ad Q. Fr. ii. 1, de Har. resp. i. 7.) During the year of his consulship (B.C. 56), Marcellinus opposed a vigorous resistance to the factious violence of Clodius and of the tribune C. Cato; and by his conduct in this respect earned from Cicero the praise of being one of the best consuls he had ever seen. (Ad Q. Fr. ii. 6.) At the same time he endeavoured to check the ambition and restrain the power of Pompey, and at the very commencement of his magistracy succeeded in preventing his being sent to Egypt with an army to reinstate Ptolemy Auletes. But not content with this, he was constantly inveighing against him and his ambition in his speeches both to the senate and people: and though the former generally were disposed to concur with him in these sentiments, it is probable that these attacks of Marcellinus contributed to induce Pompey to draw closer the bonds which united him to his brother triumvir, at the interview which took place this year at Luca. (Cic. ad Fam. i. 1, 2, ad Q. Fr. ii. 6; Dion Cass. xxxix. 16, 18.) We hear very little of Marcellinus after the expiration of his consulship; and the period of his death is wholly unknown. Cicero praises his eloquence, which displayed itself especially during the time that he was consul. (Brut. 70.) He held the sacerdotal office of one of the Epulones. (Id. de Har. resp. 10.)

23. (P.) CORNELIUS LENTULUS MARCELLINUS (probably a son of the preceding), was quaestor in the army of Caesar in B.C. 48, and commanded the part of his intrenchments near Dyrrhachium, which was attacked by Pompey. Marcellinus was defeated with heavy loss, and saved only by the timely arrival of M. Antony to his support. (Caes. B. C. iii. 62—65; Oros. vi. 15.) The praenomen of this Marcellinus is unknown: it has been supposed that he was the father of the following, who is called P. F., but of this there is no proof.

24. P. CORNELIUS P. F. LENTULUS MARCELLINUS, consul in B.C. 18. (Dion Cass. liv. 12, and Arg. liv.) Supposed to be a son of the preceding, but he may have been a grandson of No. 21. It is probable that the coin above described (p. 931, b.) was struck by him rather than by No. 21, to whom it has been generally ascribed. (Riccio, Monete Consolari, p. 52.)

The following Marcelli are also mentioned in history, of whose relation to either of the above families nothing is known.

25. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, plebeian aedile in A.C. 216. (Liv. xxiii. 30.)

26. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, tribune of the plebs in B.C. 171. (Liv. xiii. 32.)

27. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, praetor in B.C. 137, was killed by lightning during the year of his office. (Jul. Obseq. 83.)

28. M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS, an associate and friend of Catiline, and one of those who took part in his conspiracy, B.C. 63. On the discovery of their designs, he endeavoured to get up an insurrection among the Pelignians; but this was quickly suppressed by the praetor, L. Bibulus, and Marcellus himself put to death. (Cic. de Catil. i. 8; Oros. vi. 6.)

29. C. CLAUDIUS M. F. MARCELLUS, son of the preceding. He took part in all his father's plans, and appears to have thrown himself into Capua with a view of exciting the slaves and gladiators there to revolt; but being driven from thence by P. Sestius, took refuge in Bruttium, where he was put to death. (Cic. pro Sest. 4; Oros. vi. 6.) [E. H. B.]

MARCELLUS, CORNELIUS, a Roman senator in Nero's reign, was involved with others [FABATUS CALPURNIUS] in the charge of being privy to the crimes of Lepida, the wife of C. Cassius, A.D. 64. Marcellus eluded punishment on this occasion, but he was put to death by Galba's order in Spain, A.D. 68 (Tac. Ann. xvi. 8, Hist. i.

37), probably as a partisan of Nero's. (Comp. Plut. Galb. 15.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLUS, EMPIRICUS, was born at Burdigala (Bordeaux) in the fourth century after Christ. He is said to have held the office of "magister officiorum" under Theodosius the Great, A.D. 379—395, and to have lost this post under his successor Arcadius. He was a Christian, but it seems doubtful whether he was really a physician, though he is sometimes called "Archiatr." He is the author of a pharmacoeutical work in Latin, "De Medicamentis Empiricis, Physicis ac Rationabilibus," which he says in the preface he compiled for the use of his sons. It is of little value, and contains many charms and superstitious absurdities, as might have been anticipated when he tells us, that he inserted in the work not only the medicines approved of by physicians, but also those recommended by the common people (agrestes et plebei). It was first published in 1536, fol. Basil., and is inserted in the collection of medical writers published by Aldus, Venet. 1547, and H. Stephens, Paris, 1567. (Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd. vol. ii.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.) [W. A. G.]

MARCELLUS, EPRIUS, born of an obscure family at Capua, rose by his oratorical talents to distinction at Rome in the reigns of Claudius, Nero, and Vespasian. (Dialog. de Orator. 8; Schol. Vet. ad Juv. Sat. iv. 81.) On the deposition of L. Silanus, A.D. 49, Marcellus was appointed to the vacant praetorship, which, however, was so nearly expired that he held it only a few days, or perhaps hours. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 4; comp. Suet. Claud. 29.) At the beginning of Nero's reign Marcellus was proconsul of a portion of Asia Minor, probably of Pamphylia, for in A.D. 57, after his return to Rome, the Lycians, who since their annexation by Claudius, in A.D. 43, were attached to that province (Dion Cass. lx. 17), accused him of malversation. His eloquence, or rather his wealth, procured an acquittal, and some of his accusers were banished as the authors of an unfounded and frivolous charge. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 33.) Marcellus now became one of the principal delators under Nero. He was able, venal, and unscrupulous, and he accordingly acquired wealth, influence, and hatred. In A.D. 66, he seconded Cosutianus Capito [CAPITO COSSUTIANUS] in the impeachment of Thrasea Paetus, and for his exertions received from Nero an extravagant fee (id. Ann. xvi. 23, 26, 28, 33). The fortunes of Marcellus were for a time shaken by Nero's death. He became in turn the object of attack — by Helvidius Priscus, Thrasea's son-in-law, as a delator, and by Licinius Caecina, a partisan of Otho's [CAECINA, No. 10], as a favourite of Vitellius, A.D. 69. (Tac. Hist. ii. 53, iv. 6.) His contest with Helvidius Priscus in the senate, A.D. 74, when the mode of appointing the delegates to Vespasian in Egypt was debated, is sketched by Tacitus (Hist. iv. 6—8) with a brevity that leaves nothing obscure. From Helvidius and Caecina Marcellus escaped as much through the dissensions of the times, the feebleness of the emperor, and the fears of the senate, as by his own eloquence and address. But Helvidius assailed him a third time on the old charge of delation, and, on the occasion, his talents, backed indeed by his strong interest with Mucianus and Domitian, rescued him. (Dialog. de Orat. 8, comp. 5.) He ingre-dated himself with the elder Vespasian also, and was nearly as powerful for a while under the Flavian house as under Claudius and Nero. But towards the close of Vespasian's reign, A. D. 79, Marcellus, from what motives is unknown, engaged in Alienus Caecina's conspiracy against the emperor [CAECINA ALIENUS]. Caecina was assassinated, Marcellus was tried, convicted, and, unable to withstand the long-stored hatred of the senators, destroyed himself. (Dion Cass. lxxvi. 16.) The character of Marcellus is drawn by the author of the Dialogue de Oratoribus (5, 8, 13); his eloquence was his only merit, and he abused it to the worst purposes.

A coin of the town of Cyme in Aeolia bears on its obverse, ANOT. EHPION. MAPKEAAΩ. Γ. KY., and refers, probably, to the period of his proconsulate of Pamphylia. (Eckhel, Doct. Num. Vet. vol. ii. p. 493.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLUS, GRA'NIUS, praetor of Bithynia, in the reign of Tiberius, was accused, in A. D. 15, by his own quaestor, Caepio Crispinus, and by the notorious delator, Hispo Romanus, of treason and extortion in his provincial government. Marcellus was acquitted of treason, but convicted and fined for extortion. Tacitus marks this trial as one of the earliest of those frivolous yet fatal accusations which multiplied with the years and vices of Tiberius. (Tac. Ann. i. 74.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLUS, MA'RCIUS, a rhetorician mentioned by Seneca. (Contr. 28, 29.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLUS, MY'NDIUS, was an adherent of Augustus in the last war with Sext. Pompey, c. 36. Through Marcellus Menodorus negotiated his second desertion from Pompey to Augustus. (Appian, B. C. v. 102.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLUS, P. NERATIUS, is mentioned by the younger Pliny (Ep. iii. 8) as a person of rank and interest at Trajan's court. He was consul A. D. 104. (Fasti.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLUS, NONIUS, a Latin grammarian, the author of an important treatise, which MSS. is designated as Nonii Marcelli Peripatetici Tuburicensis de Compendiosa Doctrina per litteras ad Filium, for the latter portion of which the many printed copies substitute erroneously Proprietate Sermonis. The most recent editor obliged to confess, after a full investigation of every source from which information could be derived, that we are totally unacquainted with the personal history of this writer, that we cannot fix with certainty either the place or the time of his birth, that it is difficult to detect the plan pursued in the compilation of the work, that no satisfactory classification of the numerous codices has yet been accomplished, and that no sure estimate has been formed of their relative value. The epithet Tuburicensis, which appears also under the varying names, Tuburicensis, Tuburgicensis, Tiburicensis, Tiburicensis, Tiburienensis, does not lead readily to any conclusion. We can scarcely agree with any one in considering it equivalent to Tiburinus, a river which occurs so frequently elsewhere, that even the most ignorant transcribers would not have transformed it so rudely; nor can we persuade ourselves that Gerlach has succeeded in proving that it must be derived from Tuburicum or Tuburca, in Numidia, near the river Ampsaga, a town which became at an early period the seat of a Christian bishopric, and is to be distinguished from Carthago, in the proconsular province of Africa, also a bishop's see, the inhabitants of which unquestionably termed themselves Tuburicenses (see Orelli, Corp. Inscript. No. 3691), from the Colonia Tuburnica, the Oppidum Tuburicense of Pliny (H. N. vii. 4), and from the Oppidum Tuburitanum Majus and Minus of the ecclesiastical writers. It is equally difficult to determine within narrow limits the epoch when Nonius flourished: he must be later than the middle of the second century, since once at least (p. 49, ed. Gerl.) he refers to Appuleius, and frequently copies A. Gellius, although he nowhere refers to him by name. He must be earlier than the sixth century, since he is himself quoted repeatedly by Priscian (pp. 43, 278, 477, ed. Krehl.). Two points are thus fixed, but they are unfortunately far asunder, and we are left to wander over a space of three centuries, while the very nature of the piece almost entirely excludes the possibility of drawing any inference from style; all that can be said upon this head is, that the various words and expressions which have been adduced for the purpose of proving that he must belong to the fifth century, will, without exception, be found, upon examination, to fail in establishing this proposition; and on the other hand, the arguments employed to demonstrate that he ought to be placed at the commencement of the third are equally powerless. He may be the same person with the grammarian Marcellus addressed by Ausonius (Carm. xix.), but there is no evidence whatever in favour of the supposition except the identity of a very common name.

The work is divided into eighteen chapters, but of these the first twelve ought in reality to be viewed as separate treatises, composed at different periods, with different objects, and not linked together by any connecting bond. At the same time each chapter is far from presenting a compact, well-ordered, consistent whole, but generally exhibits a confused farrago, as if a compartment of an ill-kept commonplace book had been transcribed without adequate pains having been bestowed on the classification and distribution of the materials collected. Some idea of the contents may be obtained from the following outline:—

CAP. I. De Proprietate Sermonum, may be regarded as a glossary of obsolete words, which are thrown together without any arrangement. Many are, however, inserted which do not belong to this class, and which might, with perfect propriety, be transferred to c. iv.

CAP. II. De Honestis et Novis Veterum Dictis. A collection of words placed in alphabetical order, which were employed by the early Latin writers in a sense different from that which they bore in the age of Nonius. Many of these ought to have found a place in c. i.; and from the statements with regard to others, we might draw some curious inferences regarding the state of the language when this tract was drawn up.

CAP. III. De Indiscretis Generibus, a collection of words in alphabetical order, of which the gender is found to vary in the best authorities, such as finis, calx, papaver, and the like.

CAP. IV. De vera Significatione Verborum, a collection of words in alphabetical order, which occur in the same or in different writers with marked variations of meaning, such as aequor, conducere, lustrare. This is by far the longest section in the book.

CAP. V. De Differentiis Verborum, what we should now term a dissertation on synonyms, being a collection of words not in alphabetical order, which, although allied in signification, express distinct modifications of thought, such as auspicius and augurium, urbs and civitas, superstitio and religio.

CAP. VI. De Impropriis, a collection of words, not in alphabetical order, which are frequently employed, not in their true and literal, but in a figurative sense, such as liber, fucus, rostrum; the greater number of the examples, however, ought to have been included in chapter iv.

CAP. VII. De Contrariis Generibus Verborum, a collection of verbs not in alphabetical order, which, although usually deponent, are occasionally found assuming the active form, and vice versa, such as vagas for vagaris, contempla for contemplare, præcægitur for præcægit. Intermingled are archaic forms, such as esurio for esuriam, which belong to c. x., and some of which are actually repeated there, as expedito for expediam; and some archaic constructions, such as potior illam rem, libertatem uti, opus est illam rem, which are altogether out of place, but might have been inserted in chapter ix.

CAP. VIII. De Mutata Declinatione, a collection of nouns, not in alphabetical order, which vary in form or in declension, or in both, as itiner, iter; lacte, lac; poema, poematum; pervicax, pervicacis; senati, senatus, senatus, for the genitive of senatus.

CAP. IX. De Generibus et Casibus, a collection of passages in which one case seems to be substituted for another, such as fastidii mei, non ego sum dignus salutis.

CAP. X. De Mutatis Conjugationibus, a collection of verbs, not in alphabetical order, which are conjugated sometimes according to one form, sometimes according to another, such as ferui and feret, cupiret and cuperet, lavit and lavat. Some of the examples belong to c. vii., such as posset for posui, poteratur for poterat; others, such as expedito, audio, ought to have constituted a separate section.

CAP. XI. De Indiscretis Adverbis, a collection of adverbs, not in alphabetical order, which occasionally appear under forms at variance with ordinary usage or with analogy, such as amiciter, ampliter, fidele, memore, pugnitus, largitus.

CAP. XII. De Doctorum Indagine, is a complete medley, being a sort of supplement to the preceding books, and containing, in addition, some curious notices upon matters of antiquarian research.

CAP. XIII.—XVIII. are all in the style of the Onomasticon of Julius Pollux, each containing a series of technical terms in some one department. They are severally entitled De Genere Navigatorum, De Genere Vestimentorum, De Genere Vasorum vel Poculorum, De Genere vel Colore Vestimentorum, De Genere Ciborum vel Pomorum, De Genere Armorum, De Propinquitatibus, of which the last appears to be an unfinished sketch.

Although the attentive reader will soon discover that he can repose no confidence in the learning, critical sagacity, or logical precision of Nonius Marcellus, this compilation must ever be looked upon as one of value, since it is in a great measure made up of quotations from the early dramatists, annalists, satirists, and antiquaries, from Accius, Afranius, L. Andronicus, Cæcilius, Ennius, Nonius, Pacuvius, Turpilius, Lucilius, Cato, and Varro, writers whose chief works have not descended to us, and most of whom exist in fragments only, as well as from Plautus, Terence, Lucretius, Cicero, Virgil, and a few others, of whom we have more copious remains, thus affording many curious specimens of what we can find nowhere else, and occasionally enabling us to correct and illustrate the text of those productions which have been preserved entire.

The Editio Princeps of Nonius Marcellus is, according to the best bibliographic authorities, a folio volume, in Roman characters, without date and without name of place or printer, but which is known to have been printed at Rome, by George Laver, about 1470. The first edition with a date was published in 1471, and is, like the former, without name of place or printer. The first critical edition was that of Junius, 8vo. Antv. 1565, which was followed by that of Gothofredus, 8vo. Paris, 1586. Considerable reputation was enjoyed by the editions of Mercier, 8vo. Paris, 1583 and 1614, especially the second, which gave a new recension of the text, and was reprinted at Leipzig, 8vo. 1826. This, however, as well as every other, is now superseded by the edition of Gerlach and Roth, 8vo. Basil, 1842, which is in every respect infinitely superior to any of its predecessors. It contains, as well as those of Junius, Gothofredus, and Mercier, the tract of Fulgentius Planciades, "De Prisco Sermone." [FULGENTIUS] (Oman, Beiträge zur Griech. und Röm. Literaturgesch. p. 381; Præf. ad ed. T. D. Gerlach, et C. L. Roth.) [W. R.]

MARCELLUS, ORONTIUS, was the person to whom Longinus addressed his treatise Περὶ Τέλους, or De Finibus. (Longin. Fr. 5. ed. Weiske.) He was a pupil of Plotinus. (Porphyr. Vit. Plot. 7.) A daughter of Marcellus studied philosophy, and married Porphyry, the biographer of Plotinus (Cyril. contr. Julian. p. 209; Eunap. Vit. Septim. Porphyr.) [W. B. D.]

MARCELLUS, a PHYSICIAN who appears to have lived in the first century after Christ in the reign of Nero, A. D. 54—68. (Marcell. Empir. de Medicam. c. 20, p. 332, ed. H. Steph.) He is perhaps the same person who is quoted by Galen (De Remed. Parab. ii. 21, vol. xiv. p. 459), Aëtius (iii. 1, 43, p. 506), Paulus Aegineta (iii. 41, 79, iv. 11, vi. 43, pp. 460, 498, 507, 570), and Alexander Trallianus (viii. 8, p. 256, ed. H. Steph.) [W. A. G.]

MARCELLUS, M. POMPONIUS, a grammarian, who sometimes also pleaded causes, lived in the reign of Tiberius, and was celebrated as a rigid purist in language. There is an anecdote respecting this Marcellus and the emperor Tiberius related in Vol. I. p. 599, b. (Suet. de Illus. Gram. 22; Dion Cass. lvi. 17.)

MARCELLUS SIDETES, a native of Side in Pamphylia, was born towards the end of the first century after Christ, and lived in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, A. D. 117—161. He wrote a long medical poem in Greek hexameter verse, consisting of forty-two books, which was held in such estimation, that it was ordered by the emperors to be placed in the public libraries at Rome. (Suid. s. v. Μάρκελλος, and Kuster's note; Eudoc. Vidua apud Villosion, Anecd. Græca, vol. i. p. 239.) Of this work only two fragments remain, one Περὶ Λυκανθρώπων, or De Lycanthropia, and the other Ἰατρικὰ περὶ Ἰχθύων, or De Remediis et Ficiōibus. Of these the former is preserved (but in prosa) by Aëtius (ii. 2, 11, p. 254; compare Paul. Aegin.

xi. 16, and Mr. Adams's note, vol. i. p. 390), and is curious and interesting. The second fragment is less interesting, and consists of about 100 verses. It was first published in a separate form in Greek and Latin by Fred. Morell, Paris, 8vo. 1591, and is to be found in the first volume of Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. ed. vet., and elsewhere. (See Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Altere Medicin.) [W. A. G.]

MARCELLUS, SEX. VA'RIOUS, a native of Apameia, the husband of Julia Soemias, by whom he was the father of Elagabalus. [See genealogical table prefixed to CARACALLA.] He frequently discharged the duties of an imperial procurator, and was admitted into the senate. His various designations, titles, and distinctions, have been preserved in a bilingual inscription discovered near Veletrae, which was published at Rome in 1765, accompanied by a dissertation, and which are given by Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 245. After him, Elagabalus was originally called Varus Avitus Bassianus, and he gave his name to the Thermae Varianae, placed by Victor in the xiiith Region. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 30.) [W. R.]

MARCELLUS, VICTOR'RIUS, was the person to whom Quintilian dedicated his work, De Institutione Oratoria. He was apparently a man of rank and learning. A son of Marcellus was educated by Quintilian. (Quint. Ep. ad Tryph., lat. i. proem. iii. proem. vi. proem. xii. fine.) See Dodwell, Ann. Quintil. § 27. Statius inscribed the third book of his Silvae to Marcellus. [W. B. D.]

MARCELLUS, U'LPIUS. The period of this jurist is determined by Capitolinus (Antonin. Pius, 12), who states that Marcellus was one of the legal advisers of the emperor Antoninus Pius, and numerates with him, Salvius Valens, Javolenus, and others. It also appears from his own writings that Marcellus lived under Pius, for he mentions a decision of Aurelius Antoninus (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 18); if Aurelius Antoninus here means Pius, and not Marcus his successor. That he was living under the Divi Fratres, Marcus Antoninus and L. Verus, appears from a reference which he makes to an oration of the two emperors respecting tutors giving security (satisfactio). The passage is a citation by Ulpian from Marcellus, and the term livi may be, and appears to be, the addition of Ulpian, and therefore does not prove that Marcellus arrived Marcus Antoninus (Dig. 26. tit. 2. s. 19). Marcellus also quotes a judgment of Antoninus Augustus (Dig. 28. tit. 4. s. 3), by whom he means L. Antoninus, as appears from his naming the insula Padena and Pollio, who belong to A. D. 166. The question turned upon a will, in which the testator had cancelled the names of the heredes in his testament, and his property was claimed by the scus as bona caduca. The case was argued before the emperor by the advocates of the fiscus and the advocates of the claimants under the will. The emperor's judgment was in favour of the equitable interpretation, but against the strict law.

The conjecture that the Ulpian Marcellus, who commanded in Britain in the reign of Commodus, the jurist, hardly needs refutation. The only sound for it is the sameness of name, to which it objected that Dion Cassius, who speaks of the literary talent of Ulpian Marcellus, says nothing of his legal reputation (Dion Cassius, lxxii. 8, and note of Reimar). Besides this, it is very likely that a man who had been a jurist during the reigns of Pius and Marcus, the latter of which lasted near twenty years, should turn soldier under Commodus, the successor of Marcus, in the year A. D. 182. The soldier Marcellus may have been the son of the jurist.

The works of Marcellus mentioned in the Florentine Index are, thirty-one books of Digesta, six books on the Leges Julia et Papia, and a book of Responsa. But there are excerpts from other works of his in the Digest, as a work entitled "Publica" (Dig. 3. tit. 2. s. 22), the object of which may be collected from its being referred to under the title "De iis qui infamia notantur;" on the office of a praesul (Dig. 4. tit. 4. s. 43); and on the office of a consul, the fifth book of which is quoted by Marcianus (Dig. 40. tit. 15. s. 1). Marcellus also commented on the writings of Salvius Julianus (Dig. 4. tit. 4. s. 11), and on Pomponius (Dig. 7. tit. 4. s. 29). Marcellus was commented on by Cerridius Scaevola (Dig. 24. tit. 1. s. 11) and Ulpian. He is often cited by subsequent jurists, especially Paulus and Ulpian, and by Modestinus, one of the latest of the jurists. There are 159 excerpts from Ulpian Marcellus in the Digest. This notice differs in some matters from that of Zimmermann, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, vol. ii. p. 358, whose authorities do not always agree with his text. [G. L.]

MARCIA'NA, the sister of Trajan, who, if we may believe the panegyric of Pliny (Paneg. 84), was a woman of extraordinary merits and virtue. She was the mother of Matidia, who was the mother of Sabina, the wife of the emperor Hadrian [MATIDIA], but we do not know the name of her husband. We learn from Pliny that she received from the senate the title of Augusta, which we also find upon coins and inscriptions; and after her death she was enrolled among the gods, and is therefore called Divia on coins and inscriptions. The year of her death is uncertain; but it appears from one inscription that she was alive in A. D. 106, and from another that she had ceased to live in A. D. 115. It was in honour of her that Trajan gave the name of Marcianopolis to a city in Lower Moesia, on the Euxine. (Eckhel, vol. vi. p. 467, &c.)

COIN OF MARCIANA.

MARCIA. 1. Wife of M. Atilius Regulus, who was consul a second time B. C. 256, in the first Punic war. (Sil. Ital. vi. 403, 576.)

2. The wife of C. Julius Caesar, the grandfather of the dictator, and the sister of Q. Marcus Rex, consul in B. C. 118. (Suet. Caes. 6.)

3. A vestal virgin, who was condemned along with Licinia in B. C. 113 by L. Cassius Longinus. For particulars and authorities see LICINIA, No. 2.

4. The second wife of M. Cato Uticensis, to whom she bore many children, was the daughter of L. Marcus Philippus, consul B. C. 56. It was about the year B. C. 56 that Cato is related to have ceded her to his friend Q. Hortensius, with the approbation of her father: some remarks upon this curious tale are made elsewhere. [Vol. I. p. 648, b.] She continued to live with Hortensius till the death of the latter, in B. C. 50, after which she returned to Cato, who left her behind in Rome, placing his family and property under her care, when he fled from the city with the rest of the aristocratical party on Caesar's approach in B. C. 49. (Appian, B. C. ii. 99; Plut. Cat. min. 25, 39, 52; Lucan, ii. 329, &c.)

5. The wife of Fabius Maximus, the friend of Augustus, learnt from her husband the secret visit of the emperor to his grandson Agrippa, and informed Livia of it, in consequence of which she became the cause of her husband's death, A. D. 13 or 14. (Tac. Ann. i. 5.) We learn from Ovid (Fast. vi. 802) that she belonged to the family of the Philippi. Her name also occurs in the epistle which Ovid addressed to her husband (Ex Pont. i. 2).

6. The daughter of Cremutius Cordus, who was put to death in the reign of Tiberius, is spoken of under CORDUS. [Vol. I. p. 851, b.]

7. MARCIA FURNILLA, the second wife of the emperor Titus, was divorced by her husband after the death of their daughter Julia. (Suet. Tit. 4.) Some commentators propose changing the name of Furnilla into Fulvia or Fulvella, on the authority of a coin which bears the legend Φουλβία Σεβαστή. But the coin is of rather doubtful authority; and even if it be genuine it may refer to Fulvia Plautilla, the wife of Caracalla. It is very improbable that a coin should be struck in honour of a woman that had been divorced, and that the title of Augusta should be given to her. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 364.)

MARCIA. 1. The mistress of Quadratus, who was slain by Commodus, became the favourite concubine of Commodus himself. From her he adopted the title of Amazonius. She was one of the most active among the conspirators, who compassed his destruction. She subsequently became the wife of Eclectus, his chamberlain, also a conspirator, and was eventually put to death by Julianus, along with Laetna, who also had been actively engaged in the plot. We are told apparently by Xiphilinus, that she was friendly to the Christians, for whom, through her influence with the emperor, she procured many advantages. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 4, lxxiii. 16.) [COMMODOUS, ECLECTUS, LAETUS, QUADRATUS.]

2. The first wife of Septimius Severus. She died before her husband became emperor; and after his elevation he erected statues to her memory. (See authorities on SEVERUS.) [W. R.]

MARCIA GENS, originally patrician, afterwards plebeian likewise. We also, but not so frequently, find the name written Martius. This gens claimed to be descended from Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of Rome (Suet. Cues. 6; Val. Max. iv. 3. § 4; Ov. Fast. vi. 803); and hence one of its families subsequently assumed the name of Rex, and the heads of Numa Pompilius and Ancus Marcius were placed upon the coins of the gens. [See the coins under CENSORINUS and PHILIPPUS.] But notwithstanding the claims to such high antiquity made by the Marcii, no patricians of this name, with the exception of Coriolanus, are mentioned in the early history of the republic, and it was not till after the enactment of the Licinian laws that any member of the gens obtained the consulship. The first Marcius who reached this dignity was C. Marcius Rutilus Censorinus, in

B. C. 310. The only patrician family in this gens, as is remarked above, was that of CORIOLANUS; the names of the plebeian families in the time of the republic are CENSORINUS, CRISPUS, FIGULA, LIBO, PHILIPPUS, RALLA, REX, RUFUS, RUTILUS, SEPTIMUS, SERMO, TREMULUS. The only cognomens which occur on coins are Censorinus, Libo, Philippus. A few persons are mentioned without any surname: they are given under MARCIA.

MARCIANUS, emperor of the East (A. D. 450—457), was the son of an obscure but respectable man, who had served in the imperial armies. He was born either in Thrace or in Illyricum, about A. D. 391; and at an early age he entered the imperial army. Of his earlier history we are acquainted with a few trifling stories and adventures. His way to fortune was slow, for in 421, at the age of thirty, he was still a common soldier, or, perhaps, a non-commissioned officer. Some years afterwards he attached himself to the famous general Aspar, and subsequently to his son Ardaburius, as private secretary, obtaining, at the same time, the office of captain of the guards. During fifteen, or perhaps nineteen years, he continued in the service of those eminent men, and found ample opportunities for developing his military talents. He accompanied Aspar in his unfortunate campaign against Genseric, king of the Vandals in Africa, in 431, when he was made a prisoner of war; but on account of his reputation, and perhaps for services which history does not record, obtained his release, and returned to Constantinople. His history during the following nineteen years is veiled in obscurity; and it is only from subsequent events that we are allowed to conclude that he distinguished himself in no ordinary degree; for the emperor, Theodosius the Younger, having died in 450, his widow, the celebrated Pulcheria, offered her hand and the imperial title to Marcian, on condition that he would not prevent her from continuing the state of virginity which she had hitherto enjoyed; and Marcian, who was then about sixty, consented to it gladly, and married the chaste empress, who was then above fifty. At that time Marcian held the rank of tribune and senator; and he was so favourably known among the people, that his elevation to supreme power was received by them with applause and demonstrations of joy. His coronation took place on the 24th of August, 450; and the whole transaction, as it seems, was so little premeditated, and was settled in so short a time, that Valentinian, the emperor of Rome, was not even asked to give his consent, which he did, however, at a later period, for he stood in great want of the assistance of a man like Marcian, who, to military renown, acquired in the war against the Vandals and Persians, joined a kind disposition and accomplished diplomatic skill.

Both the Eastern and the Western empire were then in great apprehension from the unbounded ambition and power of Attila, who had no sooner heard of the election of Marcian than he despatched ambassadors to him, demanding, in an imperative tone, the tribute which the younger Theodosius had engaged to pay annually to the king of the Huns. "I have iron for Attila," was the emperor's stern answer, "but no gold." Upon the Apollonius was sent into Attila's camp to negotiate the continuance of peace, and was charged with presents for the barbarian, which he was to deliver on the express condition that they were presents, but no tribute. Attila having declined to admit the ambassador into his presence, though not to accept the presents, Apollonius firmly refused to give up the latter previous to having obtained an audience; and being at last admitted, behaved so nobly and fearlessly, that the king swore he would take bloody revenge. He thought it, however, more prudent to turn his wrath against Valentinian, who had likewise affronted him, by refusing to give up his sister Honoria, whom Attila claimed as his betrothed wife. Without disclosing his intention as to the countries he had chosen for an invasion, Attila sent messengers at once to Rome and Constantinople, who addressed each of the emperors with the haughty and insulting words: "Attila, my lord and thy lord, commands thee to provide a palace for his immediate reception." Upon this he set out for the invasion of Gaul, A. D. 451.

In the same year Marcian assembled the council of Chalcedon, where the doctrines of the Eutychians were condemned. In the following year, 452, the celebrated Ardabarius, then dux Orientis, defeated the Arabs near Damascus, and made them sue for peace; and Maximin met with similar success against the Blemmyes, who had invaded the Thebais in Upper Egypt. A strong army was also sent towards the frontiers of the Western empire to assist Valentinian against Attila, who was then invading Italy, and to secure the Eastern empire against any unexpected diversion of the barbarians. In short Marcian neglected nothing to prepare peace and happiness for his subjects, who had so cruelly suffered under his predecessors. The death of Attila, in 453, relieved him not only from great and just anxiety, but the subsequent, and almost immediate dissolution of the empire of the Huns, afforded him an opportunity of repopulating those provinces which had been laid waste by the Huns in their previous campaigns against Theodosius. Thus the Eastern Goths received extensive lands in Pannonia; Sarmatians (Slavonians) and Herules, in Illyricum; and Scyri, Alans and Huns, under Attila's youngest son Hernac, in Scythia and Lower Moesia. The death of the excellent empress Pulcheria, in 454, caused a general affliction; but the popularity of Marcian only gained by it. In the following year, 455, Valentinian was murdered; Maximin usurped the crown; Italy and Gaul were covered with ruins and blood; and the Vandal Genseric pillaged Rome. In the midst of these terrible commotions, Marcian secured the peace of his own dominions with his wonted wisdom and firmness; and some disturbances having broken out in Lazica, in 456, which were kindled by the Armenians and Persians, he sent able officers against the latter, who soon compelled the enemy to desist from farther hostilities. But in the beginning of 457 Marcian fell ill, and after five months' suffering, died on the 26th of June following. His death would have been the signal of great calamities but for the power of Aspar, who caused Leo the Great to be chosen emperor. Marcian had, of course, no issue from Pulcheria. He had, however, a daughter, the offspring of a former marriage, who was called Euphemia, and was married to Anthemius, who became afterwards emperor of the West. Marcian was decidedly an excellent man, who deserves our admiration for the manner in which he governed his wide dominions, and procured for them domestic and external peace during the terrible expeditions of the Huns and the Vandals. His laudable efforts to put down the venality and corruption of the public functionaries and advocates were crowned with success; and the Codex Theodosianus contains many of his constitutions, from which we may draw a favourable conclusion as to his honesty and wisdom. His orthodoxy caused him to be praised in an exaggerated degree by the orthodox writers. (Evang. ii. 12; Theophan. p. 89, &c.; Theodor. Lect. i. 28; Nicephor. Call. xv. 1—4; Priscus, pp. 41, 43, 48, 72, &c.; Zonar. vol. i. p. 45, &c.; Cedren. p. 343, &c.; Procop. Vand. l. 4; Malela, pp. 26, 27; Codin. pp. 35, 60, 61; Glycas, p. 262; Joel, p. 171.) [W. COIN OF THE EMPEROR MARCIANUS.

MARCIANUS, of Heracleia in Pontus, a Greek geographer, lived after Ptolemy, whom he frequently quotes, and before Stephanus of Byzantium, who refers to him, but his exact date is uncertain. If he is the same Marcianus as the one mentioned by Synesius (Ep. 103) and Socrates (H. E. iv. 9), he must have lived at the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era. He wrote a work in prose, entitled, Περὶ τῆς ἐξω θαλάσσης ἐφ' ὅσον τε καὶ ἐσωτερικῶν καὶ τῶν ἐν αὐτῇ μεγίστων νήσων, "A Periplos of the External Sea, both eastern and western, and of the largest islands in it." The External Sea he used in opposition to the Mediterranean, which he says had been sufficiently described by Artemiodorus. This work was in two books; of which the former, on the eastern and southern seas, has come down to us entire, but of the latter, which treated of the western and northern seas, we possess only the three last chapters on Africa, and a mutilated one on the distance from Rome to the principal cities in the world. In this work he chiefly follows Ptolemy, and in the calculation of the stadia he adopts the reckoning of Protogoras. He also made an epitome of the eleven books of the Periplos of Artemiodorus of Ephesus [ARTEMIODORUS, No. 6], but of this epitome we have only the introduction, and the periplos of Pontus, Bithynia, and Paphlagonia. It was not, however, simply an abridgment of Artemiodorus; for Marcianus tells us that he made use of the works of other distinguished geographers, who had written descriptions of coasts, among whom he mentions Timosthenes of Rhodes, Eratosthenes, Pytheas of Massilia, Isidorus of Charax, Sosander the pilot, Simmias, Apellas of Cyrene, Euthymenes of Massilia, Philcas of Athens, Androsthenes of Thasus, Cleon of Sicily, Eudoxus of Rhodes, Hanno of Carthage, Seylax of Caryanda and Botthaeus; but he says that he followed more particularly Artemiodorus, Strabo, and Menippus of Pergamus. Marcianus also published an edition of Menippus with additions and corrections. [MENIPPUS.]

The extant works of Marcianus were first published by D. Hoeschelius in his "Geographica,"

August. Vindel. 1600, 8vo., then by Morell, Paris, 1692, 8vo., and subsequently by Hudson, in the first volume of his "Geographi Graeci Minores," Oxon. 1698, and by Miller, Paris, 1839, 8vo. They have been also published separately by Hoffmann, "Marciani Periplus, Menippi Peripli Fragm. &c.," Lips. 1841, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 613, &c.; Dodwell, de Aetate et Scriptis Marciani, in Hudson, l. c.; Ukert, Geographie der Griechen und Römer, vol. i. pars i. p. 235; Forbiger, Handbuch der alten Geographie, vol. i. p. 448.)

MARCIA'NUS (Μαρτιανός), a physician at Rome, who enjoyed a great reputation as an anatomist in the second century after Christ, and wrote some works on that subject, which are now lost. Galen became personally acquainted with him during his first visit to Rome, about A. D. 165, and tells an anecdote of him which shows him to have been an envious and malicious person (De Praenot. ad Epig. c. 3, vol. xiv. p. 614, &c.). He is probably the same person as the physician named Martialis, though it is uncertain which name is correct.

Some medical formulae by a physician of the same name are quoted by Aëtius (ii. 3. 110, ii. 4. 47, iii. 3. 11, pp. 358, 402, 554) and Scribonius Largus (c. 46. § 177. p. 223); but this cannot be the same person as the contemporary of Galen, as he lived about the beginning of the Christian era in the reign of Augustus. [W. A. G.]

MARCIA'NUS, AELIUS, a Roman jurist, who wrote after the death of Septimius Severus, whom he calls Divus (Dig. 50. tit. 4. s. 7). Another passage (48. tit. 17. s. 1) shows that he was then writing under Antoninus Caracalla, the son and successor of Severus. It also appears from his Institutions, that he survived Caracalla (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 33; Cod. 9. tit. 8. s. 8). It is therefore probable that he also wrote under Alexander Severus, whose reign commenced A. D. 222. Caracalla died A. D. 217. Another Aelius Marcianus is cited in the Digest, who was proconsul of Baetica in the time of Antoninus Pius (Dig. 1. tit. 6. s. 2, where Ulpian gives the rescript of Pius addressed to this Marcianus).

The works of Marcianus, from which there are excerpts in the Digest, are:—Sixteen books of Institutions, from which there are excerpts in the Digest: this work was also used for the compilation of Justinian's Institutions (compare Inst. 4. tit. 3. s. 1, and Dig. 32. s. 65. § 4; Inst. 2. tit. 18, "hoc colore," &c., and Dig. 5. tit. 2. s. 2); two books on Publica Judicia; two books on Appellations; five books entitled Regularia; a single book on Delatores; a single book on the Hypothecaria Formula; and a single book ad Set. Turpillianum. He also wrote notes on Papinian. Marcianus is cited by Ulpianus and Paulus. There are 275 excerpts from Marcianus in the Digest. Zimmern (Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts) cites a work by G. Oelrichs, De Vita, Studiis, Honoribus et Scriptis Ael. Marciani ICI. Traj. ad Rhen. 1754. 4to.

There are rescripts addressed by Alexander Severus to A. Marcianus (Cod. 2. tit. 13. s. 6) and to A. Martianus, which may be the same name (Cod. 7. tit. 21. s. 4), and one by Gordian to A. Martianus in the year 239 (Cod. 4. tit. 21. s. 4); but this may be a different person from the jurist whose writings are excerpted in the Digest. [G. L.]

MARCIA'NUS MINEUS FELIX CAPPELLA. [CAPPELLA.]

MARCIA'NUS, GESSIUS, a native of Syria, the husband of Julia Mamaea, by whom he was the reputed father of Alexander Severus. We know nothing of his history, except that he on several occasions discharged the duties of an imperial procurator. (Dion. Cass. lxxviii. 30.) [W. R.]

MARCIA'NUS, GRA'NIUS, a Roman senator, was accused of majestas in A. D. 35, by C. Gracchus, and put an end to his own life. (Tac. Ann. vi. 38.)

MARCIA'NUS I'CELUS. [ICELUS.]

MARCIL'LIUS, attended Cicero as interpreter during his journey in Asia Minor and his administration of Cilicia, from August, B. C. 51, to the following February. Cicero highly recommends Marcellus, his son, and his family interests to Q. Minucius Thermus, praetor of Asia. (Ad Fam. xiii. 54.) [W. B. D.]

MA'RCION (Μαρκίων), one of the most celebrated of the so-called heretics of the second century. He was a native of Pontus. The account, prevalent in the days of Epiphanius, of which there is no reason to doubt the correctness, made him a native of Sinope in Hellenopontus. Tertullian repeatedly calls him a ship-master, naucerus (Adv. Marc. i. 18, iii. 6, iv. 9, &c.), and, according to one MS. and the version of Rufinus, Rhodon, a writer of the latter part of the second century (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 13), calls him the seaman Marcion. Some moderns have doubted whether he learned a man could have been in such an occupation, but we see no reason to question the statement, nor does his learning appear to have been great. His father was bishop of a Christian church (probably at Sinope), but there is reason to think that Marcion had grown up before his father's conversion, for Tertullian intimates (De Praescip. Hereticor. c. 30) that he had been a stoic, and speaks of his "finding out God" (Adv. Marcian. i. 1), expressions which indicate that he had not been brought up as a Christian, but had become a convert in an adult age, after inquiry, and on his own conviction. Be this as it may, he appears to have been a sincere and earnest believer, characterised by the severity of his ascetic practices; nor does he at first seem to have entertained, at least he did not avow, any opinions at variance with the usual belief of the church with which he was in full communion.

The course of his life was, however, altogether altered by his excommunication. The occasion of this is, in the spurious addition to one of the works of Tertullian (De Praescip. Haeret. c. 51), and by Epiphanius, stated to have been his seduction of a girl; but the silence of Tertullian in his genuine works, and of the other early opponents of Marcion, redly as they would have been to lay hold on anything unfavourable to him, throws, as Beausobre and Lardner have shown, considerable doubt on the accusation. Beausobre and Neander suppose that he was cut off from the church on account of his having already begun to propagate his obnoxious sentiments as to the Mosaic dispensation and the Old Testament generally. Even if the charge brought against him by Epiphanius be credited, there is no reason to regard his delinquency as an evidence of habitual licentiousness: it stands in marked contrast with the rigour of his system and with the ordinary tenor of his life, and at a later period he himself excommunicated Apelles, one of his disciples, for a similar, perhaps even a less heinous offence. (Tertull. ibid. c. 30.) Epiphanius further adds, that his first desire after his fall was to be restored to the communion of the church, and that, in order to this, he professed penitence; but that his father, by whom he had been excommunicated, refused to restore him, being angry at the shame which had fallen upon himself by his son's fall; or possibly (if there be any truth in the story at all), from an apprehension that his near connection with the offender might incline him, or make him suspected of inclining, to undue lenity. Failing to obtain his readmission, and unable to bear the opprobrium which his conduct had incurred, Marcion went to Rome. Epiphanius says that he arrived there after the decease of Pope Hyginus, a statement which is subject to considerable doubt, and of which, in any case, the uncertainty of the early Papal chronology prevents our fixing the date. Tillemont places the pope's death and Marcion's arrival in A. D. 142; but if Justin Martyr wrote his First Apology in which Marcion's residence at Rome, and his teaching his heretical views are mentioned (Justin. Apol. Prima, c. 26), in A. D. 139 [JUSTINUS, ecclesiastical, No. 1], Marcion must have settled at Rome some years earlier.

According to Epiphanius, Marcion's first care, on his arrival at Rome, was to apply to be admitted into communion with the church, but he was refused. Epiphanius adds, that he had aspired to succeed to the vacant bishopric,—a statement so absurd to merit refutation, especially taken in connection with the story of his previous incontinence; and that disappointed ambition stimulated him to unite himself with the Syrian Gnostic Cerdo, then at Rome, to adopt and propagate his opinions, and to carry out the threat with which he parted from the elders of the Roman church on their refusal to receive him, that "he would cause perpetual schism among them." Imputation of motives is so easy and so common, that it has little weight, especially when the writer is so credulous and uncharitable as Epiphanius; nor is his statement of facts in accordance with Tertullian, who tells us (De Præscript. Hæret. c. 30) that Marcion was in communion with the Roman church, and professed to hold the general belief, under the auspice of Eleutherius, but that on account of an ever-restless curiosity with which he pursued his inquiries, he was repeatedly (semel atque iterum) excommunicated, the last time finally (in perpetuum scilicet relegatus). It is possible that he may, in his final ejection, have uttered some such threat that attributed to him by Epiphanius, yet in any case Tertullian would have hardly forborne to mention it; and it may be observed that Marcion's boasted reconciliation with the church, and retraction or concealment of his opinions, indicate greater pliancy of temper and a more anxious desire to avoid a schism than it has been usual to ascribe to him. Tertullian is, indeed, by some critics, yet we think on insufficient ground, supposed to have confounded Marcion with Cerdo, of whom Irenæus (Adv. Hæres. iii. 4) gives a somewhat similar account.

We have seen that Marcion was at Rome, and engaged in the propagation of his views, which places his separation from the church, in A. D. 139, when Justin wrote his First Apology. Whether he resided into distant provinces to diffuse his opinions is very doubtful. Most modern critics, including

Tillemont, Beausobre, and Lardner, think that he did; but the passages cited from the ancients in support of the supposition are quite insufficient. That views similar to his were widely diffused in various parts, especially of the East, is indisputable, but that the diffusion was owing to his personal exertions and influence is by no means clear; and we do not know of any distinct evidence that he ever left Rome after his first arrival there. The passages from Tertullian and Ephrem Syrus are mere declamatory expressions, and the passage usually cited from Jerome (Epist. cxxxiii. ad Ctesiphont. c. 4, Opera, vol. i. col. 1025, ed. Vallarsii), if it has any foundation in truth, is most naturally referred to Marcion's first journey from Sinope to Rome; and it was probably on that same journey that he became acquainted with the venerable Polycarp, whom he afterwards met, apparently at Rome, and who, when Marcion asked if he knew him, replied, "I know thee as the first-born of Satan." (Irenæus, Adv. Hæres. iii. 3.) This anecdote of Marcion's anxiety to claim acquaintance with that venerable man is in accordance with his desire to be reconciled to the Catholic Church, a desire which continued to the close of his life, for after all his misbelief, the ministers, apparently of the Roman church, agreed to restore him on condition of his bringing back with him those whom he had led into error. This condition seems to show that his own immediate disciples were not numerous, and that the widely diffused body that held similar views, and was called by his name, had rather followed an independent course of thought than been influenced by him. His compliance with the condition of his restoration was prevented by his death, the time of which is quite unknown. (Tertullian, de Præscript. Hæret. c. 30.)

The doctrinal system of Marcion was of remarkable character. Its great feature was the irreconcilable opposition which it supposed to exist between the Creator and the Christian God, and between the religious systems, the Law and the Gospel, which it was believed they had respectively founded. Whether he held two or three original principles is not clear. Rhodon (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 13) and Augustin (de Hæres. c. 22) say he held two, Epiphanius charges him with holding three,—one, nameless and invisible, the Supreme, whom Marcion termed "the Good;" another "the visible God, the Creator;" the third, "the Devil," or perhaps matter, the source of evil. Theodoret says he held four "unbegotten existences,"—the good God, the Creator, matter, and the evil ruler of matter, meaning, apparently, the Devil. That he held matter to be eternal is admitted; the doubtful point is whether he really held the Creator to have been a principle, or to have been in some way derived from the good God. That he regarded them as independent first principles is the most natural inference from the strong opposition which he conceived to exist between them, and which formed the prominent feature in his doctrinal system. He was probably led to the belief of this opposition by the difficulty he found in reconciling the existence of evil, so prevalent in the world, with the attribute of goodness in the Deity, which was so distinctly manifested in the gospel. This is Tertullian's account of the origin of his heresy (Adv. Marcion. i. 2), and it is apparently the true one; nor will it materially differ from the account of Neander, that Marcion could not perceive in nature or in the Old Testament the same love which was manifested in the Gospel of Christ. He accordingly made the Creator, the God of the Old Testament, the author of evils, "malorum factorem," according to the statement of Irenaeus (Adv. Haeres. i. 29), by which he meant that he was the author, not of moral evil, but of suffering. The old dispensation was, according to him, given by the Creator, who chose out the Jews as his own people, and promised to them a Messiah. Jesus was not this Messiah, but the son of the "unseen and unnamed" God, and had appeared on earth in the outward form of man, possibly a mere phantasm, to deliver souls, and to upset the dominion of the Creator; and Marcion further supposed that, when he descended into Hades, he had delivered, not those who in the Old Testament were regarded as saints, such as Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, Moses, David, &c., who were apprehensive of some delusion and would not believe, but rather those who had rejected or disobeyed the Creator, such as Cain, Esau, Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.

The other doctrines of Marcion were such as naturally flowed from this prominent feature of his system. He condemned marriage, and admitted none who were living in the married state to baptism; for he did not think it right to enlarge, by propagation, a race born in subjection to the harsh rule of the Creator. (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 3.) His followers did not hesitate to brave martyrdom, and boasted of the number of their martyrs. He denied the resurrection of the body; and, according to the very questionable authority of Epiphanius, believed in transmigration. He admitted persons to baptism, Epiphanius says, three times, apparently requiring a repetition of it after any great sin; but as Tertullian does not notice this threefold baptism, it was probably introduced after Marcion's time. His followers permitted women to baptize probably those of their own sex, and allowed catechumens to be present at the celebration of the mysteries. According to Chrysostom, when a catechumen died they baptized another person for him; but even Tillemont supposes that this was not their original practice. They fasted on the Sabbath, out of opposition to the Creator, who had rested on that day.

It was a necessary consequence of these views that Marcion should reject a considerable part of the New Testament. The Old Testament he regarded as a communication from the Creator to his people the Jews, not only separate from Christianity, but opposed to it. He acknowledged but one Gospel, formed by the mutilation of the Gospel of St. Luke, which, it may be reasonably supposed, he believed he was restoring, by such mutilation, to its original purity. He rejected the greater part of the four first chapters, commencing his gospel with the words, "In the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar God came down to Capernaum, a city of Galilee, and he taught on the Sabbath," &c. (as in Luke, iv. 31, &c.). He omitted all those passages in our Lord's discourses in which he recognised the Creator as his father. He received the following Epistles of Paul:—to the Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, and Philemon, and acknowledged certain portions of a supposed Epistle of Paul to the Laodiceans; but the Epistles which he received were, according to Epiphanius, whose testimony in this respect there is no reason to doubt, mutilated and corrupted. Marcion, besides his edition, if we may so term it, of the New Testament, compiled a work entitled Antithesis, consisting of passages from the Old and from the New Testament which he judged to be mutually contradictory. This work was examined and answered by Tertullian, in his fourth book against Marcion. Tertullian also cites (De Carne Christi, c. 2) an epistle of Marcion, but without further describing it. (Justin Martyr and Irenaeus, l. cc.; Tertullian, Adv. Marcion. Libri V. de Praescript. Haeret. passim; Epiphanius, Passiones Haeres. xlii.; the numerous other passages in ancient writers have been collected by Iulgius, de Haeresiarchis, sect. ii. c. 7; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. ii. p. 266, &c.; Beaunobre, Hist. du Manichéisme, liv. iv. ch. v.—viii.; and Lardner, Hist. of Heretics, b. ii. ch. x. See also Neander, Church History (by Rose), vol. ii. p. 119, &c.; Care, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 128, vol. i. p. 54, ed. Oxford, 1740—42.) [J. C. M.]

MARCUS, an Italian seer, whose prophetic verses (Carmina Marciana) were first discovered by M. Atilius, the praetor, in a. c. 213. They were written in Latin, and two extracts from them are given by Livy, one containing a prophecy of the defeat of the Romans at Cannae, and the second, commanding the institution of the Ludi Apollinares. (Liv. xxv. 12; Macrob. Sat. i. 17.) The Marcian prophecies were subsequently preserved in the Capitol along with the Sibylline books, under the guard of the same officers as had charge of the latter. (Serv. ad Verg. Aen. vi. 72.) Livy (l. c.), Macrobius (l. c.), and Pliny (H. N. vii. 33), speak of only one person of this name; but Cicero (de Div. i. 40, ii. 55) and Servius (l. c.) make mention of two brothers, the Marcii. It may well admit of doubt whether this Marcus ever existed; and it is certainly quite useless to inquire into the time at which he lived. (Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. i. p. 129; Götting, Geschichte der Römisch. Staatsverfassung, p. 213; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. n. 688.) Modern scholars have attempted to restore to a metrical form the prophecies of Marcus preserved by Livy. (Camp. Hermann, Elem. Doctr. Metr. iii. 9. § 7; Dacier and Lersch, De Vers. Sat. p. 38.)

MARCUS. 1. C. or Cn. MARCUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 389, the year after Rome had been taken by the Gauls, brought Q. Fabius to trial, because, in opposition to the law of nations, he had fought against the Gauls, to whom he had been sent as an ambassador. (Liv. vi. 1.)

2. C. MARCUS, tribune of the plebs B. C. 311, brought forward with his colleague, L. Atilius, the law which is detailed elsewhere. [ATILIUS, No. 2.] (Liv. ix. 30.) He is probably the same as the C. Marcus, who was chosen in B. C. 300 among the first plebeian augurs. (Liv. x. 9.)

3. M. MARCUS, saddle of the plebs, was the first person who gave corn to the people at one s for the modius. His date is quite uncertain. (Plin. H. N. viii. 3. s. 4.)

4. Q. and M. MARCUS, tribunes of the soldiers of the second legion, fell in battle against the Bæ in B. C. 193. (Liv. xxxv. 5.)

MARCOMANNUS, a Roman rhetorician of uncertain date, wrote a work on rhetoric, of which C. Julius Victor made use in compiling his "Ars Rhetorica." The latter work was first published by A. Mai, from a MS. in the Vatican, written in the 12th century (Rome, 1823), and has been reprinted, with the other scholiasts, in the 5th volume of Orelli's Cicero, p. 195, &c.

MARCUS (Μάρκος), a citizen of Ceryneia, in Achaia, had the chief hand in putting to death the tyrant of Bura, which thereupon immediately joined the Achaean League, then in process of formation. When the constitution of the league was altered, and a single general was appointed instead of two, Marcus was the first who was invested with that dignity, in B. C. 255. In B. C. 229 the Achaeans sent ten ships to aid the Coreyreans against the Illyrian pirates, and, in the battle which ensued, the vessel in which Marcus sailed was boarded and sunk, and he perished with all the rest of the crew. Polybius highly commends his services to the Achaean confederacy. (Pol. ii. 10, 41, 43; Clint. F. H. vol. ii. pp. 240, 241, vol. iii. p. 14.) [E. E.]

MARCUS, the son of the emperor Basiliscus, was created Caesar, and soon afterwards Augustus and co-emperor, by his father, in A. D. 475, and was put to death by Zeno in 477, together with Basiliscus and the rest of his family. In consequence of being emperor along with his father, several of the coins struck by Basiliscus, represent the portraits of both father and son. [BASILISCUS.] (Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 204.) [W. P.]

MARCUS (Μάρκος), literary and ecclesiastical. 1. OF ALEXANDRIA, patriarch of Alexandria early in the thirteenth century, proposed certain questions for solution on various points of ecclesiastical law or practice. Sixty-four of these questions, with the answers of Theodorus Balsamon [BALSAMON], are given in the Jus Orientale of Bonifidius, p. 237, &c. 8vo., Paris, 1573, and in the Jus Graeco-Romanum of Leunclavius, vol. i. pp. 362—394, fol. Frankfurt, 1596. Some MSS. contain two questions and solutions more than the printed copies. Fabricius suggests that Mark of Alexandria is the Marcus cited in a MS. Culena in Matthaei Evangelium of Macarius Chrysoccephalus [CHRYSOCEPHALUS], extant in the Bodleian library at Oxford. (Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 1203, vol. ii. p. 279, ed. Oxford, 1740—42.)

2. OF ARETHUSA, bishop of Arethusa, a city of Syria, on or near the Orontes, was one of three bishops sent to Rome A. D. 342 by the Eastern emperor Constantius II., to satisfy the Western emperor Constantine of the justice and propriety of the deposition of Athanasius of Alexandria and Paulus of Constantinople. Marcus and his fellow-bishops are charged with having deceived Constantine, by presenting to him as their confession of faith, not the Arian or Eusebian confession, lately agreed on at a synod of Antioch, but another confession, of orthodox complexion, yet not fully orthodox, which is given by Socrates. Mark appears to have acted with the Eusebian or Semi-Arian party, and took part on their side, probably in the council of Philippopolis, held by the prelates of the East, after their secession from Sardica (A. D. 347), and certainly in that of Sirium (A. D. 359), where a heterodox confession of faith was drawn up by him. It is to be observed, that the confession which is given as Mark's by Socrates is believed by modern critics not to be his. These critics ascribe to him the confession agreed upon by the council of Ariminum, A. D. 359, and also given by Socrates. During the short reign of Julian Marcus, then an old man, was cruelly tortured in various ways by the heathen populace of Arethusa, who were irritated by the success of his efforts to convert their fellow-townsmen to Christianity. He appears to have survived their cruelty, at least not to have died under their hands; but we read no more of him. His sufferings for the Christian religion seem to have obliterated the discredit of his Arianism; for Gregory Nazianzen has eulogised him in the highest terms, and the Greek church honours him as a martyr. (Athanas. de Synodis, c. 24; Socrates, H. E. ii. 18, 30, 37, with the notes of Valesius; Sozomen, H. E. iii. 10, iv. 17, v. 10; Theodoret, H. E. iii. 7; Gregorius Naz. Oratio IV.; Bolland. Acta Sanctorum Mart. vol. iii. p. 774, &c.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. vi. and vii.)

4. ASCETA. Mark the ascetic, or Mark of Athens, was a recluse, who had fixed his habitation in the Interior Aethiopia, in Mount Thrace, beyond the nation of the Chetaneans, apparently in the course of the fourth century. A life of him is given by the Bollandists in the Acta Sanctorum Martii, vol. iii. in a Latin version, at p. 778, &c., and in the original Greek at p. 40*, &c.

8. DIADOCHUS. A short treatise, entitled τὸ μακάριον τοῦ Μάρκου τοῦ Διαδόχου κατὰ Ἀρειανῶν λόγος, Bouti Marci Diadochi Sermo contra Arianos, was published with a Latin version, by Jo. Rudolph Wetstenius, subjoined to his edition of Origen, De Orulione, 4to. Basel, 1694, and was reprinted, with a new Latin version, in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. v. p. 242. There has been considerable doubt as to the time and place in which the author lived. Some have identified him, but without reason, with Diadochus, bishop of Photicæ, in Epieirus Vetus (Φωτικῆς τῆς ἐν τῇ παλαιᾷ Ἠπείρῳ ἐπισκοπῆς), who wrote a work on the ascetic life which is briefly described by Photius (Bibl. cod. 201), and whom critics, on uncertain ground, assign to the middle of the fifth century. But there is no ground for this identification, as Diadochus of Photicæ does not appear to have been ever called Marcus. Others suppose Marcus Diadochus to have been one of the two Egyptian bishops of the name of Marcus, who were banished by the Arians during the patriarchate of George of Cappadocia (Γεωργίου, No. 7) at Alexandria, and who, having been restored in the reign of Julian, were present (A. D. 362) at a synod held at Alexandria, and are named in the heading of the letter of Athanasius, usually cited as Tonus ad Antiochenus. (Comp. Athanas. Apolog. de Fuga sua, c. 7.) Galland suggests that Marcus Diadochus may have been one of two bishops of the name of Marcus, ordained by Alexander, the predecessor of Athanasius, and who were banished by the Arians, one into the Oasis Magna in Upper Egypt, and the other to the Oasis of Ammon (Athanas. Hist. Arianor. ad Monach. c. 72); but we identify these with the two just mentioned. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 266, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 356, vol. i. p. 217;

• 10. EREMITA or ANACHORETA ('Αναχωρητής, or ASCETA (ὁ Ἀσκητής), or MONACHUS (Μοναχός), the MONK. Palladius in his Historia Lausiaca, c. 21, and, according to the Greek text, as printed in the Biblioth. Patrum (vol. xiii. fol. Paris, 1654) in several passages of c. 20, has recorded some anecdotes, of sufficiently marvellous character, of Marcus, an eminent Egyptian ascetic, who lived to a hundred years, and with whom Palladius had conversed. This Marcus is noticed also by Sozomen (H. E. vi. 29). Palladius, however, does not ascribe to this Marcus any writings; nor should he be confounded, as he is even by Cave and Fabricius, as well as by others, with Marcus, "the much renowned ascetic," (ὁ πολυβούλητος ἀσκητής, Niceph. Callist. H. E. xiv. 30, 54), the disciple of Chrysostom, and the contemporary of Nilus and Isidore of Pelusium: for this latter Marcus must have been many years younger than the ascetic of Palladius. It is to the disciple of Chrysostom that the works extant, under the name of "Marcus Eremita," are to be ascribed; as appears from the express testimony of Nicephorus Callisti, who had met with the following works:—eight treatises (λόγοι δέκα), "equal to the number of the universal passions;" and thirty-two others, describing the whole discipline of an ascetic life. Other works of Marcus must have been extant at that time, but Nicephorus does not mention them: the above were the only ones that had come into his hands.

The eight treatises appear to have been originally distinct, but had been collected into one volume (βιβλίον), and are so described by Photius (Bibl. cod. 200), to whose copy was subjoined a ninth treatise or book, written against the Melchizedekians (κατὰ Μελχιζεδεκιῶν), which showed, says Photius (according to our rendering of a disputed passage), that the writer was no less obnoxious to the charge of heresy than the parties against whom it was written. Photius remarks that the arrangement of the works was different in different copies. A Latin version by Joannes Picus of the eight books was published 8vo. Paris, 1563, and has been repeatedly reprinted in the various editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum. It is in the fifth volume of the edition, Lyon, 1677. The Greek text was also published, 8vo. Paris, 1563, by Guillaume Morel, with the Antirrhetica of Hesychius of Jerusalem. [HESYCHIUS, No. 7.] To the Greek text and the Latin version were respectively prefixed, as if also written by Marcus, the text and version of a homily, Περί παραδείσου καὶ νόμου πνευματικοῦ, De Paradiso et Lege Spirituali, which is one of those extant under the name of Macarius the Egyptian [MACARIUS, No. 1], to whom it more probably belongs, and from whose works those of Marcus have been much interpolated. The last four works are arranged in a different order from that of Photius; and to the end of the fifth, which is addressed to one Nicolaus, a friend of the writer, is subjoined Nicolaus' reply. A tract, Περί νηστείας, De Jejunio, a Latin version of which was first published by Zinus, with some other ascetic tracts, 8vo. Venice, 1574, is probably a part of the sixth book of the printed editions, the seventh of Photius, as it corresponds with the title given by Photius to that book. The Greek text of Morel's edition was reprinted, with the version of Picus, in the 1st vol. of the Anacorum of Dacæus, fol. Paris, 1624, in the 11th vol. of the Bibl. Patrum, fol. Paris, 1654, and in the 8th vol. of the Bibl. Patrum of Galland. Although the eight books as a whole, with the exception, as already noticed, of the Latin supplement of Zinus De Jejunio, first appeared in 1563, the first and second books, namely, Περί νόμου πνευματικοῦ, De Lege Spirituali, and Περί τῶν οὐκ ἐν τῷ ἔργῳ δικαιοσύνης, De his qui putant se Operibus justificari, had been published by Vincentius Opsopoeus, with a Latin version, 8vo. Haguenau, 1531; and the first book of the text and the version had been reprinted in the Microprostylicon, Basel, 1550, and in the Orthodoxographia, Basel, 1555. The work Εἰς τὴν Μελχιζεδεκ, De Melchizedek, which formed the ninth tract in the collection read by Photius, and the Greek text of the Περί νηστείας, De Jejunio, were first published by B. M. Remondinus, bishop of Zante and Cephalonia, with a Latin version, 4to. Rome, 1748, and are reprinted with the other works of Marcus, in the Bibliotheca of Galland. Some other works are extant in MS. (Palladius, l. c.; Sozomen, l. c.; Photius, l. c.; Niceph. Callist. l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 267, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 401, vol. i. p. 372; Oudin, De Scriptor. Eccles. vol. i. col. 902, &c.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. x. p. 201; Galland, Biblioth. Patrum, Proleg. ad Vol. VIII. c. 1.)

11. EUGENICUS. [EUGENICUS.]

12. Of GAZA. Marcus, the biographer of St. Porphyry of Gaza, lived in the fourth and fifth centuries. He was probably a native of Proconsular Asia, from which country he travelled to visit the scenes of sacred history in the Holy Land, where he met and formed an acquaintance with Porphyry, then at Jerusalem, some time before A. D. 393. Porphyry sent him to Thessalonica to dispose of his property there; and after his return Marcus appears to have been the almost inseparable companion of Porphyry, by whom he was ordained deacon, and was sent, A. D. 398, to Constantinople, to obtain of the emperor Arcadius an edict for destroying the heathen temples at Gaza. He obtained an edict to close, not destroy them. This, however, was not effectual for putting down heathenism, and Porphyry went in person to Constantinople, taking Marcus with him, and they were there at the time of the birth of the emperor Theodosius the Younger, A. D. 401. They obtained an imperial edict for the destruction both of the idols of the heathens and their temples; and Marcus returned with Porphyry to Gaza, where he probably remained till his death, of which we have no account. He wrote the life of Porphyry, the original Greek text of which is said to be extant in MS. at Vienna, but has never been published. A Latin version (Vita S. Porphyrii, Episcopi Gazensis), was published by Lippmann, in his Vitæ Sanctorum, by Saris, in his De Probatis Sanctorum Vitæ, and by the Balandists, in the Acta Sanctorum, Februar. vol. iii. p. 643, &c. with a Commentarius Præfatus and notes by Henschenius. It is given also in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. ix. p. 239, &c. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 316; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 421, vol. i. p. 403; Oudin, De Scriptor. Eccles. vol. i. col. 999; Galland, Biblioth. Patrum, Proleg. ad Vol. IX. c. 7.)

13. HARESEIARCHA, the HERESIARCH, a gnostic teacher who appeared in the second century, and probably towards or after the middle of it. The anonymous writer usually cited as Prædestinatus, makes Marcus contemporary with Clement of Rome; but this is placing him too early, as, according to Irenæus, he was a disciple of Valentinus, who probably lived in the first half of the century [VALENTINUS]; and there is reason to think, from the manner in which Irenæus speaks of him, that he was still alive when that father wrote his treatise Adversus Hæreses [IRENÆUS]. He must be placed considerably later than the time of Clement. We have no account in Irenæus of the country of Marcus; Jerome (Comment. in Isai. lxiv. 4, 5) calls him an Egyptian, but modern critics do not adopt this statement; Lardner thinks, but on very precarious ground, that he was an "Asiatic" (i. e. a native of Proconsular Asia), and Neander is induced by some peculiarities of his system to think he was from Palestine. All this, however, is mere conjecture, and we are disposed to accept the statement of Jerome as to this point, especially as it accords with the statement of Irenæus that he was a disciple of Valentinus. That Marcus was in Asia, appears from a scandalous anecdote, related by Irenæus, of his seducing the wife of one Diaconus (or perhaps of a certain deacon), into whose house he had been received; but the circumstances show that he was travelling in that country rather than residing there. Jerome (l. c. and Epist. ad Theodorum, No. 29, ed. Vett., 53, ed. Benedict, 75, ed. Vallarsii) states that he travelled into the parts of Gaul about the Rhône and the Garonne, then crossed the Pyrenees into Spain; but Irenæus, whom he cites, is speaking, not of Marcus himself, but of his followers; and Jerome was probably led into this misunderstanding of his authority by confounding this Marcus with another and later teacher of the gnostic school [No. 14], of the same name and country. Of the history of Marcus nothing more is known. His character is seriously impeached, as already noticed, by Irenæus, who is followed by others of the fathers, and who charges him with habitual and systematic licentiousness.

The followers of Marcus were designated Marcionii (Μαρκωνίται), Marcionians, and a long account of them is given by Irenæus and by Epiphanius, who has transcribed very largely from Irenæus; and a briefer notice is contained in the other ancient writers on the subject of heresies. The peculiar tenets of Marcus were founded on the gnostic doctrine of Aëons; and, according to Irenæus, Marcus professed to derive his knowledge of these Aëons, and of the production of the universe, by a revelation from the primal four in the system of Aëons, who descended to him from the region of the inviolable and ineffable, in the form of a female; but this representation has perhaps been owing to Irenæus interpreting too literally the poetical form in which Marcus developed his views. Neander (Church Hist. by Rose, vol. ii. p. 95) thus characterizes the system of Marcus. "He brought forward his doctrines in a poem, in which he introduced the Aëons speaking in liturgical formulae, and in imposing symbols of worship. . . After the Jewish cabalistic method, he united after mysteries in the number and positions of the letters. The idea of a λόγος τοῦ ὁυτός, of the word as the revelation of the hidden divine being in creation, was spun out by him with the greatest subtlety: he made the whole creation a progressive expression of the inexpressible." The Marcionians are said to have distinguished between the supreme God and the Creator, and to have denied the reality of Christ's incarnation, and the resurrection of the body.

Marcus was charged with using magic, and Irenæus has given a sufficiently obscure description of the modes in which he imposed on the credulity of his votaries, who were commonly women possessed of wealth, and acquired riches at their expense. Irenæus suspected that he was assisted in his delusions by some daemon, by whose aid he appeared both to deliver prophecies himself, and to impart the gift of prophecy to those women whom he deemed worthy to participate in the gift. He is charged also with employing philters and love potions, in order to effect his licentious purposes. Whether any, or what part of these charges is true, it is difficult to say: that of using magical practices, or practices reputed to be magical, is the most probable. It is difficult to judge what foundation there is for the charge of licentiousness. Lardner regards it as unfounded. The Marcionians appear to have acknowledged the canonical Scriptures, and to have received also many apocryphal books, from one of which Irenæus cites a story which is found in the Evangelium Infanticæ. (Iren. Adv. Hæres. i. 8—18; Epiphanius. Hæres. xxxiv. a. ut alii, xiv.; Anon. in the spurious edition to Tertullian, De Præscript. Hæres. c. 50, &c.; Tertullian, Adv. Valenti. c. 4, De Resurrect. Carnis, c. 5; Theodoret. Hæreticorum Fabularum Compend. c. 9; Euseb. *II. 14. HÆRETICUS. Isidore of Seville, in speaking of Idacius Clarus, and Sulpicius Severus, in his Historia Sacra (ii. 61), mention Marcus, a native of Memphis, as being eminently skilled in magic, a Manichean, or perhaps personally a disciple of Manes, and the teacher of the persecuted heresiarch Priscillian. He is noticed here as having been by Jerome and others confounded with the earlier heresiarch of the same name. [No. 13.] (Isidor. Hispal. De Script. Eccles. c. 2; Sulp. Sever. l. c.)

15. HAMARTOLUS. [No. 16.]

16. HIEROMONACHUS. In the Typicum, or ritual directory of the Greek church (Τυπικὸν τὸν Θεῷ ἀγίῳ παρέχον πᾶσαν τὴν διάταξιν τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς ἀκολουθίας τοῦ χρόνου ἡίου, Typicum, sive de Deo, continens integram Officii Ecclesiastici Ordinem per totum Annum. See the description of the work in Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. II. p. 38) is contained a treatise, Σύνογμα εἰς τὰ ἀπορρήματα τοῦ τυπικοῦ, De Dubiis quæ ex Typico oriuntur, arranged in 100 chapters by Marcus Hieromonachus, who calls himself Ἀμαρτωλός, "a sinner." This commentary is adapted to the arrangement of the Typicum, ascribed to St. Saba, but which Oudin supposes to have been drawn up by Marcus himself, and produced by him as the work of St. Saba, in order to obtain for it an authority which, had it appeared in his own name, it would not have possessed. But though Oudin is successful in showing that parts of the Typicum are adapted to practices which did not come into use till several centuries after St. Saba's death, in the sixth century, and therefore that those parts were of much later date than that of Saint [SABA], he does not prove either that the whole work was a forgery, or that, if it was, Marcus was the author of it. The very form of a commentary on doubtful parts implies the previous existence and the antiquity of the work itself. Oudin makes Marcus to have been a monk of the convent of St. Saba, near Jerusalem, in the beginning of the eleventh century. A life of Gregory of Agrigentum [GREGORIUS, No. 2] by Marcus, monk and hegumenus, or abbot of St. Saba, is perhaps by the same author as the commentary on the Typicum. We are not aware that it has been published. Various works are extant in MS., by Marcus Monachus; but the name is too common, and the description too vague, to enable us to identify the writers. (Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Dissert. I. p. 13; Oudin, De Scriptorib. Eccles. vol. ii. col. 584, &c.; Fabric, Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 232, vol. xi. p. 678.)

17. HYDRUNTIS or IDRUNTIS EPISCOPUS, (ἐπισκοπος Ἰδρυντός), BISHOP of OTRANTO. Marcus of Otranto is supposed to have lived in the eighth century. Allatus says he was oeconomus or steward of the great church of Constantinople, before he became bishop, which seems to be all that is known of him. He wrote τῇ μεγάλῃ σαββάτῃ ἡ ἀκροστιχίς, Hymnus Acrostichus in Magnum Sabbatum, &c. In Magno Sabbato Capita Versuum, which was published by Aldus Manutius, with a Latin version, in his edition of Prudentius and other early Christian poets, &c., without mark of date or place; but judged to be Venice, 1501. The hymn is not in metre; the initial letters of the successive paragraphs are intended to make up the words καὶ σήμερον δὲ, which are the opening words of the hymn; but as divided by Aldus, the acrostic is spoiled by the introduction of one or two superfluous letters. A Latin version of the hymn is given in several editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum. (Fabric, Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 177, 677; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 750, vol. i. p. 630.)

21. OF ST. SABA. [No. 16.] [J. C. M.]

MARDO'NIUS (Μαρδόνιος), a Persian, son of Gobryas, who was one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian, in B.C. 521. (See Herod. iii. 70, &c.) In the spring of B.C. 492, the second year from the close of the Ionian war, Mardonius, who had recently married Artazostræ, the daughter of Dareius Hystaspis, was sent by the king, with a large armament, as successor of Artaphernes, to complete the settlement of Ionia, and to punish Eretria and Athens for the aid they had given to the rebels. (Comp. Herod. v. 99, &c.) But while this was the nominal object of the expedition, it was intended also for the conquest of as many Grecian states as possible. Throughout the Ionian cities Mardonius deposed the tyrants whom Artaphernes had placed in power, and established democracy, — a step remarkably opposed to the ordinary rules of Persian policy. He then crossed the Hellespont, and, while his fleet sailed to Thasos and subdued it, he marched with his land forces through Thrace and Macedonia, reducing on his way the tribes which had not yet submitted to Persia. But the fleet was overtaken by a storm off Mount Athos, in which it was said that 300 ships and 20,000 men were lost; and Mardonius himself, on his passage through Macedonia, was attacked at night by the Brygians, a Thracian tribe, who slaughtered a great portion of his army. He remained in the country till he had reduced them to submission; but his force was so weakened by these successive disasters, that he was obliged to return to Asia. His failure was visited with the displeasure of the king, and he was superseded in the command by Datis and Artaphernes, B.C. 490. On the accession of Xerxes, in B.C. 485, Mardonius, who was high in his favour, and was connected with him by blood as well as by marriage, was one of the chief instigators of the expedition against Greece, with the government of which he hoped to be invested after its conquest; and he was appointed one of the generals of the whole land army, with the exception of the thousand Immortals, whom Hydarnes led. After the battle of Salamis (B.C. 480), he became alarmed for the consequences of the advice he had given, and persuaded Xerxes to return home with the rest of the army, leaving 300,000 men under his command for the subjugation of Greece. Having wintered in Thessaly, he resolved, before commencing operations, to consult the several Grecian oracles, for which purpose he employed a man of the name of Mysis, a native of Europus in Caria. Herodotus professes his ignorance of the answers returned, but he connects with them the step which Mardonius immediately afterwards took, of sending Alexander I., king of Macedonia, to the Athenians, whose πρότερον he was, with a proposal of very advantageous terms if they would withdraw themselves from the Greek confederacy. The proposal was rejected, and Mardonius poured his army into Attica and occupied Athens without resistance, the Athenians having fled for refuge to Salamis. Thither he sent Morychides, a Hellespontine Greek, with the same proposal he had already made through Alexander, but with no better success than before. From Attica (a country unfavourable for the operations of cavalry, and full of narrow defiles, through which retreat would be dangerous if he were defeated) he determined to fall back on Boeotia as soon as he heard that the Spartans under Pausanias were on their march against him. But before his departure he reduced Athens to ruins, having previously abstained from damaging the city or the country as long as there had been any hope of winning over the Athenians. On his retreat from Attica he received intelligence that a body of 1000 Lacedaemonians had advanced before the rest into Megara, and thither accordingly he directed his march with the view of surprising them, and overran the Megarian plain, — the furthest point towards the west, according to Herodotus, which the Persian army ever reached. Hearing, however, that the Greek force was collected at the Isthmus of Corinth, he passed eastward through Decelia, crossed Mount Parneæ, and, descending into Boeotia, encamped in a strong position on the southern bank of the Asopus. The Greeks arrived not long after at Erythrae and stationed themselves along the skirts of Mount Cithaeron. Mardonius waited with impatience, expecting that they would descend into the plain and give him battle, and at length sent his cavalry against them under MASISTIS. After their success over the latter the Greeks removed further to the west into Plataea, where they would have a better supply of water, and thither Mardonius followed them. The two armies were now stationed on opposite banks of a tributary of the Asopus, which Herodotus calls by the name of the main stream. After waiting ten days, during which the enemy's force was receiving continual additions, Mardonius determined on an engagement in spite of the warnings of the soothsayers and the advice of Artabaxus, who recommended him to fall back on Thebes, where plenty of provisions had been collected, and to try the effect of Persian gold on the chief men in the several Grecian states; and his resolution of fighting was further confirmed when, the Persian cavalry having taken and choked up the spring on which the Greeks depended for water, Pausanias again decamped and moved with his forces still nearer to Plataea. Mardonius then crossed the river and pursued him. In the battle of Plataea which ensued (September, a.c. 479), he fought bravely in the front of danger with 1000 picked Persians about him, but was slain by Aemnestus or Arimnestus, a Spartan, and his fall was the signal for a general rout of the barbarians. (Herod. vi. 43—45, 94, vii. 5, 9, 82, viii. 100, &c. 113, &c. 133—144, ix. 1—4, 12—15, 38—65; Plut. Arist. 10—19; Diod. xi. 1, 28—31; Just. ii. 13, 14; Strab. ix. p. 412; C. Nep. Paus. 1.) [E. E.]

MARDONTES (Μαρδόντις), a Persian nobleman, son of Bagæus (see Herod. iii. 128), commanded, in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, the forces from the islands in the Persian gulf. (Herod. iii. 93, vii. 80.) On the retreat of Xerxes, he was left behind as one of the admirals of the fleet, and he fell at the battle of Mycale, in a.c. 479. (Herod. viii. 130, ix. 102.) [E. E.]

MARGITES (Μαργίτης), the hero of a comic epic poem, which most of the ancients regarded as a work of Homer. The inhabitants of Colophon, where the Margites must have been written (see the first lines of the poem in Lindemann's Lyra, vol. i. p. 82; Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 914) believed that Homer was a native of the place (Herod. Vit. Hom. 8), and showed the spot in which he had composed the Margites (Herod. et Hom. Certam. in Götting's edit. of Hes. p. 241). The poem was considered to be a Homeric production by Plato and Aristotle (Plat. Alcib. ii. p. 147, c.; Aristot. Ethic. Nicom. vi. 7, Magn. Moral. ad Eudem. v. 7), and was highly esteemed by Callimachus, and its hero Margites as early as the time of Demosthenes had become proverbial for his extraordinary stupidity. (Harpocrat. s. v. Μαργίτης; Phot. Lex. p. 247, ed. Porson; Plut. Demosth. 23; Aeschin. adv. Ctesiph. p. 297.) Suidas does not mention the Margites among the works of Homer, but states that it was the production of the Carian Pigres, a brother of queen Artemisia, who was at the same time the author of the Batrachomyomachia. (Suid. s. v. Πίγρης; Plut. de Malig. Herod. 43.) The poem, which was composed in hexameters, mixed, though not in any regular succession, with Iambic trimeters (Hephaest. Enchir. p. 16; Mar. Victorin. p. 2524, ed. Putsch.), is lost, but it seems to have enjoyed great popularity, and to have been one of the most successful productions of the Homerids at Colophon. The time at which the Margites was written is uncertain, though it must undoubtedly have been at the time when epic poetry was most flourishing at Colophon, that is, about or before a.c. 700. It is, however, not impossible that afterwards Pigres may have remodelled the poem, and introduced the Iambic trimeters, in order to heighten the comic effect of the poem. The character of the hero, which was highly comic and ludicrous, was that of a conceited but ignorant person, who on all occasions exhibited his ignorance: the gods had not made him fit even for digging or ploughing, or any other ordinary craft. His parents were very wealthy; and the poet undoubtedly intended to represent some ludicrous personage of Colophon. The work seems to have been neither a parody nor a satire; but the author with the most naïve humour represented the follies and absurdities of Margites in the most ludicrous light, and with no other object than to excite laughter. (Falbe, de Margite Homeric. 1798; Lindemann, Die Lyra, vol. i. p. 79, &c.; Welcker, der Ep. Cycl. p. 184, &c.) [L. S.]

MARIA, the wife of the emperor Michael VII. Parapinales, some of whose coins have the head of both Michael and Maria. (MICHAEL VII.; Eckhel, vol. viii. p. 259.) [W. P.]

MARIA GENS, plebeian. The name of Marius was not of unfrequent occurrence in the towns of Italy: thus, we find as early as the second Punic war a Marius Blossius and a Marius Alfius at Capua (Liv. xxiii. 7, 35), and a Marius at Præneste (Sil. Ital. ix. 401). But no Roman of this name is mentioned till the celebrated C. Marius, the conqueror of the Cimbri and Teutones, who may be regarded as the founder of the gens. It was never divided into any families, though in course of time, more especially under the emperors, several of the Marii assumed surnames, of which an alphabetical list is given below. [MARIUS.] On coins we find the cognomens Capito and Trogus, but who they were is quite uncertain. [CAPITO; TROGUS.]

MARIAMNE or MARIAMME (Μαριάμνη, Μαριάμμη), a Greek form of Mariam or Miriam.

1. Daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus II., and Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus II., was betrothed to Herod the Great, by her grandfather Hyrcanus, in a.c. 41. Their actual union, however, did not take place till a.c. 38. At this period Herod was besieging Antigonus, son of Aristobulus II., in Jerusalem, and, leaving the operations there to be conducted for a time by trust-worthy officers, he went to Samaria for the purpose of consummating his marriage,—a step to which he would be urged, not by passion only, but by policy and a sense of the importance to his cause of connecting his blood with that of the Amonean princes. In a.c. 36, Herod, moved partly by the entreaties of Mariamne, deposed Ananel from the priesthood and conferred it on her brother, the young Aristobulus. The murder of the latter, however, in a.c. 35, would naturally alienate from Herod any affection which Mariamne may have felt for him; and this alienation was increased when she discovered that, on being summoned to meet Antony at Laodiceia (a.c. 34) to answer for his share in the fate of Aristobulus, he had left orders with his uncle Josephus, that, if he were condemned, his wife should not be permitted to survive him. The object of so atrocious a command was to prevent her falling into the hands of Antony, who had conceived a passion for her from the mere sight of her picture, which her mother Alexandra, by the advice of DALLIUS, had sent to him two years before, in the hope of gaining his favour. On Herod's return in safety, his mother Cypros and his sister Salome, whom Mariamne, proud of her descent from the Maccabees, had taunted overbearingly with their inferiority of birth, excited his jealousy by accusing her of improper familiarity with Josephus; and his suspicions were further roused when he found that she was aware of the savage order he had given on his departure, for he thought that such a secret could never have been betrayed by Josephus had she not admitted him to too close an intimacy. He was on the point of killing her in his fury, but was withheld by his fierce and selfish passion for her,—love we cannot call it,—and vented his revenge on Josephus, whom he put to death, and on Alexandra, whom he imprisoned. In A. C. 30, the year after the battle of Actium, Herod, aware of the danger in which he stood in consequence of his attachment to the cause of Antony, took the bold step of going in person to Octavian at Rhodes, and proffering him the same friendship and fidelity which he had shown to his rival. But, before his departure, he resolved to secure the royal succession in his own family, and he therefore put to death the aged Hyrcanus, and, having shut up Alexandra and Mariamne in the fortress of Alexandrium, gave orders to Josephus and Soëmus, two of his dependants, to slay them if he did not come back in safety. During Herod's absence, this secret command was revealed by Soëmus to Mariamne, who accordingly exhibited towards him, on his return, the most marked aversion, and on one occasion went so far as to upbraid him with the murder of her brother and father, or (as perhaps we should rather read) her grandfather. So matters continued for a year, the anger which Herod felt at her conduct being further increased by the instigations of his mother and sister. At length Salome suborned the royal cup-bearer to state to his master that he had been requested by Mariamne to administer to him in his wine a certain drug, represented by her as a love-potion. The king, in anger and alarm, caused Mariamne's favourite chamberlain to be examined by torture, under which the man declared that the ground of her aversion to Herod was the information she had received from Soëmus of his order for her death. Herod thereupon had Soëmus immediately executed and brought Mariamne to trial, entertaining the same suspicion as in the former case of his uncle Josephus of an adulterous connection between them. He appeared in person as her accuser, and the judges, thinking from his vehemence that nothing short of her death would satisfy him, passed sentence of condemnation against her. Herod, however, was still disposed to spare her life, and to punish her by imprisonment; but his mother and sister, by urging the great probability of an insurrection of the people in favour of an Asmonean princess, if known to be living in confinement, prevailed on him to order her execution, A. C. 29. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 12. § 1, 15, § 14, xv. 2, 3, 6, § 5, 7, Bell. Jud. i. 12, § 3, 17, § 8, 22.) His grief and remorse for her death were excessive, and threw him into a violent and dangerous fever. [HERODES, p. 426.] According to the ordinary reading in Bell. Jud. i. 22, § 5, we should be led to suppose that Mariamne was put to death on the former suspicion of adultery with Josephus; but there can be no doubt as to the text in that place having been mutilated. For the tower which Herod built at Jerusalem and called by her name, see Jos. Bell. Jud. ii. 17, § 8, v. 4, § 3.

Mariamne's overbearing temper has been noticed above. That she should have deputed herself, however, otherwise than she did towards such a monster as Herod, was not to be expected, and would have been inconsistent with the magnanimity for which Josephus commends her. She was distinguished by a peculiar grace and dignity of demeanour, and her beauty was of the most fascinating kind. The praise given her by Josephus for chastity was doubtless well merited in general, and entirely so as far as regards any overt act of sin. But some deduction, at least, must be made from it, if she countenanced her mother's conduct in sending her portrait to Antony.

2. Daughter of Simon, a priest at Jerusalem. Herod the Great was struck with her beauty and married her, A. C. 23, at the same time raising her father to the high-priesthood, whence he deposed Jesus, the son of Phabes, to make room for him. In A. C. 5, Mariamne being accused of being privy to the plot of ANTIPATER and Pheroras against Herod's life, he put her away, deprived Simon of the high-priesthood, and erased from his will the name of Herod Philip, whom she had borne him, and whom he had intended as the successor to his dominions after Antipater. (Jos. Ant. xv. 9, § 3, xvii. 1, § 2, 4, § 2, xviii. 5, § 1, xix. 6, § 2, Bell. Jud. i. 28, § 2, 30, § 7.)

3. Wife of Archelaus, who was ethnarch of Judaea and son of Herod the Great. Archelaus divorced her, and married Glaphyra, daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia, and widow of his brother Alexander. (Jos. Ant. xvii. 13, § 4.) [ARCHELAUS, Vol. I. p. 261, b.]

4. Daughter of Josephus, the nephew of Herod the Great, and Olympias, Herod's daughter. She married Herod, king of Chalcia, by whom she became the mother of ARISTOBULUS [No. 6]. (Jos. Ant. xviii. 5, § 4.)

5. Daughter of Aristobulus [No. 4] by Bernice, and sister to the infamous Herodias. [See Vol. I. pp. 301, 483.] After the death of Aristobulus, Herod repented of his cruelty and strove to atone for it by kindness to the children of his victim. He betrothed Mariamne, so called after her grandmother [No. 1], to the son of Antipater, his eldest son by Doris; but Antipater prevailed on him to alter this arrangement, and obtained Mariamne in marriage for himself, while his son was united to the daughter of Pheroras, Herod's brother, who in the former arrangement had been assigned to the elder son of Alexander, brother of Aristobulus. It is mere conjecture which would identify this Mariamne with No. 3, supposing her to have married Archelaus after the death of his brother Antipater. (Jos. Ant. xvii. 1, § 2, xviii. 5, § 4, Bell. Jud. i. 28; Noldius, de Fide et Ant. Herod. § 245.)

6. Second daughter of Herod Agrippa I., by his wife Cypros, was ten years old when her father died, in A. D. 44. She married Archelaus, son of Helcias or Chelcias, to whom she had been betrothed by Agrippa; but she afterwards divorced him, and married Demetrius, a Jew of high rank and great wealth, and alabarch at Alexandria. (Jos. Ant. xviii. 5, § 4, xix. 9, § 1, xx. 7, § 1, 3.) [L. E.]

MARIANDY'NUS (Μαριανδύνης), a son of Phineas, Titius, or Phrixus, was the ancestral hero of the Mariandynians in Bithynia. (Schol. ad Apollon. ii. 723, 748.) It also occurs as a surname of Bormus. (Æschyl. Pers. 938; Æt. BORMUS.) [L. S.]

MARIANUS (Μαριανός), a poet, was the son of Marsus, a Roman advocate and procurator, who settled at Eleutheropolis in Palestine. He flourished in the reign of Anastasius, and wrote parables (μυθόπαιδες) in iambic verse of several Greek authors, namely, of Theocritus, of the Argonautica of Apollonius, of the Hecale, the Hymns, the Ævia, and the epigrams of Callimachus, of Aratus, of the Theriaca of Nicander, and many others. (Suidas, s. v.) Evagrius (H. E. iii. 42) calls him Μαρίνος.

There are five epigrams in the Greek Anthology ascribed to Marianus Scholasticus, who may, perhaps, have been the same person. Four of these are descriptions of the groves and baths of Eros in the suburbs of Anaseia in Pontus. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 511; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 211, vol. xiii. p. 915.) [P. S.]

MARICA, a Latin nymph who was worshipped at Minturnæ, and to whom a grove was sacred on the river Liris. She was said to be the mother of Latins by Faunus. (Virg. Æn. vii. 47.) Servius (ad Æn. l. c. and xii. 164) remarks that some considered her to be identical with Aphrodite and others with Circe. [L. S.]

MARIDIANUS, C. COSSUTIUS, a contemporary of Julius Caesar, whose name occurs only upon coins, a specimen of which is given below. He was one of the triumvirs of the mint, as we see from the letters A. A. F. F. (i. e. asro argento aeri fando feriendo) on the reverse of the coin. The head on the obverse is Julius Caesar's.

MARINIANA. A considerable number of medals are extant in each of the three metals, all of which exhibit upon the obverse a veiled head, and the words DIVÆ MARINIANÆ, and generally upon the reverse CONSECRATIO. One, however, bears the date of the 15th year of the colony of Minimecium, which proves that it must have been struck A. D. 254. This princess therefore belongs to the reign of Valerian, but we cannot tell whether he was the wife, the sister, or the daughter of that emperor. We know that he was married at least twice, since Trebellius Pollio informs us that Gallienus and Valerianus, jun. were only half-brothers, and since it is probable that the mother of the former was named Galliena, the latter may have been the child of Mariana. This, however, is a mere conjecture. Whoever she may have been, it is at all events certain that she was dead at least four years before the Persian expedition, a fact which at once destroys the story invented by Vaillant. (Trebell. Poll. Valerian. jun., ad Salonic. c. 1; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 388.) [W. R.]

MARINUS, a centurion, who, in the reign of Philippos (A. D. 249), was saluted emperor in Moesia, by the soldiers, who soon after put him to death. A brass medal is extant, struck at Philippopolis, in Thrace, bearing the legend ΘΕΩ. ΜΑΡΙΝΩ; but the Greek coin, quoted by Goltzius as exhibiting the names P. Carvilius Marinus, is regarded with suspicion. (Zonar. xii. 19; Zosim. i. 20; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 373.) [W. R.]

MARINUS (Μαρίνος), of Flavia Neapolis, in Palestine, a philosopher and rhetorician, was the pupil and successor of Proclus, respecting whose life he wrote a work, which is still extant; he also wrote some other philosophical works. (Suid. s. v.) An epigram of his, on his own life of Proclus, is preserved in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 446; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 153, vol. xiii. p. 915.) Proclus died A. D. 485; Marinus, therefore, lived under the emperors Zeno and Anastasius. The publication of his life of Proclus is fixed by internal evidence to the year of Proclus's death; for he mentions an eclipse which will happen when the first year after that event shall have been completed (p. 29; Clinton, Fast. Rom. sub æn.). Marinus's life of Proclus was first published with the works of Marcus Antoninus, Tigr. 1559, 8vo., reprinted Lugd. Bat. 1626, 12mo.; next with the work of Proclus on Plato's theology, Hamburg, 1618, fol.: the first separate edition was that of Fabricius, with valuable Prolegomena, Hamburg, 1700, 4to., reprinted Lond. 1703, 8vo. Boissonade has re-edited the work, with a much improved text, and valuable notes of his own, in addition to the Prolegomena and notes of Fabricius, Lips. 1814, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 370; Vossius, de Hist. Græc. p. 319, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.]

MARINUS (Μαρίνος), of Tyre, a Greek geographer, who lived in the middle of the second century of the Christian era, and was the immediate predecessor of Ptolemy, who frequently refers to him. Marinus was undoubtedly the founder of mathematical geography in antiquity; and we learn from Ptolemy's own statement (i. 6) that he based his whole work upon that of Marinus. The chief merit of Marinus was, that he put an end to the uncertainty that had hitherto prevailed respecting the positions of places, by assigning to each its latitude and longitude. He also constructed maps for his works on much improved principles, which are spoken of under PTOLEMÆUS. In order to obtain as much accuracy as possible, Marinus was indefatigable in studying the works of his predecessors, the diaries kept by travellers, and every available source. He made many alterations in the second edition of his work, and would have still further improved it if he had not been carried off by an untimely death. (Ukert, Geographie der Griechen und Römer, vol. i. pars i. p. 227, &c., pars ii. pp. 194, &c., 278; Forbiger, Handbuch der Alten Geographie, vol. i. p. 365, &c.)

MARINUS (Μαρίνος), a celebrated physician and anatomist, who must have lived in the first and second centuries after Christ, as Quintus, Galen's tutor, was one of his pupils (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136). He wrote numerous anatomical treatises (or else one long work in twenty books), which Galen abridged, and of which he gives a short analysis (De Libris Propriis, c. 3, vol. xix. p. 25). Galen frequently mentions him in terms of commendation, and says he was one of the restorers of anatomical science (De Hippocr. et Plat. Doctr. viii. 1, vol. v. p. 650). He appears also to have written a commentary on the aphorisms of Hippocrates, which is twice quoted by Galen (Comment. in Hippocr. Aphor. vii. 13, 54, vol. xviii. pt. i. pp. 113, 163).

It is uncertain whether this anatomist is the same person as the Postumius Marinus, the physician to the younger Pliny (Plin. Epist. x. 6); and also whether he is the person whose medical formulæ are quoted by Andromachus (Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, vii. 2, vol. xiii. p. 25) and Avicenna (Canon, v. 1, 8. p. 306, ed. 1595).

MARION (Maplov), tyrant of Tyre, which position he obtained through the favour of Cassius, when the latter was in Syria, B.C. 43. Having invaded Galilee, he made himself master of three forts in that country, but was again expelled from it by Herod. (Joseph. Ant. xiv. 12. § 1, B. J. i. 12. § 2.)

MARIUS. 1. C. MARIUS, was born in B.C. 157, at the village of Ceretæ*, near Arpinum. His father's name was C. Marius, and his mother's Fulcinia; and the family, according to the almost concurrent voice of antiquity, was in very humble circumstances. His parents, as well as Marius himself, are said to have been the clients of the noble plebeian house of the Herennii. So indigent, indeed, is the family represented to have been from which the future saviour of Rome arose, that young Marius is stated to have worked as a common peasant for wages, before he entered the ranks of the Roman army (comp. Juv. viii. 246; Plin. H. N. xxiii. 11; Aurel. Vict. Caes. 33). But although Marius undoubtedly sprang from an obscure family, yet it seems probable that his immediate ancestors could not have been in such mean circumstances as is usually represented. From his first entrance into public life, Marius never seems to have been in want of money, and it is difficult to imagine how he could have acquired it so early, except by inheritance from his family. In addition to which, his marriage with Julia, the aunt of the celebrated Julius Caesar, throws discredit upon the common stories about his origin; as it is unlikely that such an ancient patrician family should have given their daughter to one who had been a labourer in the fields. There is, on the contrary, no difficulty in understanding how these stories should have arisen. The Roman nobles would naturally upbraid the aspirant to the higher dignities of the state with his mean and lowly birth; and the latter, instead of betraying that weakness on this point which has often characterized men who have risen from humble life, never attempted to deny the fact, but rather made it a glory and a boast, that mean as was his origin he could excel his high-born adversaries in virtue, ability, and courage. At the same time we can hardly give credit to the statement of Velleius Paterculus (ii. 11) that Marius was of an equestrian family (natus equestri loco); and we ought probably to read agresti in this passage, instead of equestri.

* Plutarch (Mar. 3) calls the village Cirrhaeton, but this is undoubtedly a corruption of Ceretæ.

Still, whatever may have been the exact condition of the Marian family, it was certainly one of no importance. Marius was born at a time when a large number of the Roman aristocracy, of whom the Scipios may be regarded as the type, were introducing into Rome a taste for Greek literature, refinement, and art. These innovations were strongly resisted by the elder Cato and the friends of the old Roman habits and mode of life, as having a tendency to corrupt and degrade the Roman character. If the father of Marius was not a poor man, he certainly belonged to the old-fashioned party, and accordingly brought up his son in his native village, in ignorance of the Greek language and literature, and with a perfect contempt for the new-fangled habits and opinions which characterised the politer society of Rome. Marius thus grew up with the distinguishing virtues and vices of the old Sabine character. He was characterised at first by great integrity and industry; he had a perfect command over his passions and desires, and was moderate in all his expenses; he possessed the stern and severe virtues of an ancient Roman, and if he had lived in earlier times, would have refused, like Fabricius, the gold of Pyrrhus, or have sacrificed his life, like Decius, to save his country. But, cast as he was in the age of growing licentiousness and corruption, the old Roman virtues degenerated into vices; love of country became love of self; patriotism, ambition; sternness of character produced cruelty, and personal integrity unmitigated contempt for the corruption of his contemporaries. The character of Marius needed, above that of most men, the humanizing influences of literature and art, and there is much truth in the remark of Plutarch (Mar. 2), "that if Marius could have been persuaded to sacrifice to the Grecian muses and graces, he would never have terminated a most illustrious career in an old age of cruelty and ferocity."

Marius first served in Spain, and was present at the siege of Numantia in B.C. 134. Here he distinguished himself so much by his courage and his readiness to submit to the severest discipline, that Scipio Africanus introduced into the army, that he attracted the notice of this great general, and received from him many marks of honour. Scipio, indeed, even admitted him to his table; and on a certain occasion, when one of the guests was Scipio, where the Roman people would find another general after his death, he is related to have laid his hand on the shoulder of Marius and said, "Perhaps here." The military genius of Marius must have been very conspicuous to have called forth such a remark from the conqueror of Carthage and Numantia, and his natural abilities for war were no doubt greatly improved by the experience he obtained under so great a master of the art. It happened strangely enough that Jugurtha, who was afterwards to measure his strength against Marius, was serving at the same time of equal distinction in the Roman army.

The name of Marius does not occur again in history for the space of fifteen years, the end of which period, however, we have very little information. He doubtless continued to serve in the army, was unanimously elected military tribune of all the tribes, and became somewhat discontented that he was at length raised to the tribunate of the people, in B.C. 119, but not until he had attained the age of thirty-eight years. Plutarch tells us that that Marius was assisted in gaining this office by Cæcilius Metellus, of whose house the family of Marius had long been adherents, which would almost seem to imply that the relation of clientship to the Herennian family had for all practical purposes fallen into disuse, although Plutarch himself a little further on (c. 5) says that C. Herennius refused to give testimony against Marius, when the latter was accused of bribery, on the ground of his being his client. In his tribunate Marius proposed a law to give greater freedom to the people at the elections. Of the provisions of this law we know nothing, except that it contained a clause for making the pontes narrower which led into the septa or inclosures where the people voted (Cic. De Leg. iii. 17) ; but as its object seems to have been to prevent intimidation on the part of the nobles, it was strongly opposed by the senate. Only four years had elapsed since the death of C. Gracchus, and the aristocratical party at Rome, flushed with victory, and undisputed masters of the state, resolved to put down with a high hand the least invasion of their privileges and power. The senate, accordingly, on the proposition of the consul L. Cotta, summoned Marius before them to account for his conduct, probably thinking that any tribune, and especially one who had no experience in political life, with the fate of the Gracchi before his eyes, might be easily frightened into submission. They little knew, however, with what stern stuff they had to deal. When he appeared before the senate, far from being overawed, as they had anticipated, he threatened to send Cotta to prison, unless the decree was rescinded ; and when the latter asked the opinion of his colleague Metellus, and the latter bade him adhere to the decree, Marius straightway sent for his officer, who was outside the senate-house, and ordered him to carry off Metellus himself to prison. The consul implored in vain the interposition of the other tribunes, and the senate, unprepared for such an act of vigorous determination, dropped their unconstitutional decree, and allowed the law to be carried. The favour, however, which Marius acquired with the people by his firmness in this matter, was somewhat damped a short time after in the same year, by his opposing a measure for the distribution of corn among the people, which, he rightly thought, would have only the tendency of fostering those habits of idleness and licentiousness which were spreading so rapidly among the population of the city.

Still the general conduct of Marius in his tribunate had earned for him the goodwill of the people and the hatred of the aristocracy. The latter resolved to oppose him with all their might ; and accordingly, when he became a candidate for the curule ædileship, they used every effort to frustrate his election. Seeing on the day of election that he had no chance of obtaining the curule ædileship, he offered himself as a candidate for the plebeian ædileship, but likewise failed in obtaining the latter. The proud and haughty spirit of Marius was deeply galled by this repulse ; and it must have tended to foster and augment those feelings of bitter personal hatred to the aristocracy which were constantly apparent in his subsequent life. It was with great difficulty that he gained his election to the prætorship ; he had the smallest number of votes of those who were elected ; and he was still further exasperated by being prosecuted for bribery. Here he had a very narrow escape ; the nobles seem to have felt sure of his conviction, and, contrary to all expectation, he was acquitted, but simply through the votes of the judges being equal. It appears, from a passage of Cicero (de Off. iii. 20. § 79), that seven years elapsed between the prætorship and the first consulship of Marius ; and he must, therefore, have filled the former office in B. C. 115, when he was now forty-two years of age. During his prætorship Marius either remained at Rome as the prætor urbanus or peregrinus, or had some province in Italy ; and as his talents were not adapted for civil life, it is not surprising that he should have gained but little credit in this office, as Plutarch tells us was the case. In the following year he obtained a stage more suitable to his abilities ; for he went as prætor into the province of Further Spain, which he cleared of the robbers and marauders who swarmed in that country.

From the moment that Marius obtained the prætorship, he no doubt kept his eyes steadily fixed upon the consulship ; but he felt that his time was not yet come. The nobles jealously guarded the highest dignity of the state against the intrusion of any new men ; but their venality and corruption, which were shortly to be displayed with more than usual shamelessness in the war with Jugurtha, were gradually raising at Rome a storm of popular indignation, and preparing the way for Marius. Although he possessed neither wealth nor eloquence, by which the Roman people were chiefly influenced, yet he gained much popularity by his well-known energy of character, his patient endurance of toil and hardship, and his simple mode of life, which formed a striking contrast to the extravagant and voluptuous habits of his noble contemporaries. It was about this time too that he strengthened his connections, and gained additional consequence in the eyes of the people, by forming an alliance with the illustrious Julian house, by marrying Julia, the sister of C. Julius Caesar, who was the father of the subsequent ruler of Rome.

We have no information of the occupations of Marius for the next few years, and we do not read of him again till B. C. 109, in which year he went into Africa as the legate of the consul Q. Cæcilius Metellus, who had previously assisted him in obtaining the tribunate of the plebs. Here, in the war against Jugurtha, the military genius of Marius had ample opportunity of displaying itself, and he was soon regarded as the most distinguished officer in the army. The readiness with which he shared the toils of the common soldiers, eating of the same food and working at the same trenches as they did, endeared him to their hearts, and through their letters to their friends at Rome, his praises were in every body's mouth. His increasing reputation fired him with a stronger desire, and presented him with better hopes than he had hitherto had, of obtaining the long-cherished object of his ambition. These desires and hopes were still further inflamed and increased by a circumstance which happened to him at Utica. Marius was not tainted by the fashionable infidelity which was gaining rapid ground among the higher circles at Rome ; he was on the contrary very superstitious, and, in his wars with the Cimbri, always carried with him a Syrian or Jewish prophetess of the name of Martha ; and while he was sacrificing on one occasion at Utica, the officiating priest told him that the victims predicted some great and wonderful events, and therefore bade him, with full reliance upon the aid of the gods, to execute whatever purpose he had in his mind. Marius regarded this as a voice from heaven; he was then, as ever, thinking of the consulship, and he therefore resolved at once to apply to Metellus for leave of absence, that he might proceed to Rome and offer himself as a candidate. This, however, Metellus, who belonged to a family of the highest nobility, would not grant. He at first tried to dissuade him from his presumptuous attempt, by pointing out the certainty of failure; and when he could not prevail upon him to abandon his design, he civilly evaded his request by pleading the exigencies of the public service, which required the presence and assistance of his legate. But, as Marius still continued to press him for leave of absence, Metellus had the imprudence to say to him on one occasion, "You need not be in such a hurry to go to Rome; it will be quite time enough for you to apply for the consulship along with my son." The latter, who was then serving with the army, was only a youth of twenty years of age, and could not, therefore, become a candidate for the consulship for upwards of twenty years more. Such an insult was not likely to be forgotten by a man like Marius. He forthwith began to intrigue against his general, and to represent that the war was purposely prolonged by Metellus to gratify his own vanity and love of military power. He openly declared, that with one half of the army he would soon have Jugurtha in chains; and as all his remarks were carefully reported at Rome, the people began to regard him as the only person competent to finish the war. Metellus, wearied out with his importunity, and perceiving that he was exciting intrigues against him in the army, at last allowed him to go, but, according to Plutarch, only twelve days before the election. Meeting with a favourable wind, he arrived at Rome in time, and was elected consul with an enthusiasm which bore down all opposition before it.

Marius entered upon his first consulship in a.c. 107, at the age of fifty, and received from the people the province of Numidia, although the senate had previously decreed that Metellus should continue in his command. The exultation of Marius knew no bounds. Instead of deserting the popular party, as has been constantly done by popular leaders when they have once been enrolled in the ranks of the aristocracy, Marius gloried in his humble origin, and took every opportunity of insulting and trampling upon the party which had for so many years been trying to put him down. He told them that he regarded his election as a victory over their effeminacy and licentiousness, and that he looked upon the consulship as a trophy of his conquest; and he proudly compared his own wounds and military experience with their indolent habits and ignorance of war. It was a great triumph for the people, and a great humiliation for the aristocracy, and Marius made the latter drink to the dregs the bitter cup which they had to swallow. His was no forgiving temper, but a stern, a fierce, and almost savage one; and he well earned the reputation of being a "good hater." While engaged in these attacks upon the nobility, he at the same time carried on a levy of troops with great activity, and enrolled any persons who chose to offer for the service, however poor and mean, instead of taking them from the five classes according to ancient custom. Having thus collected a larger number of troops than had been decreed, he crossed over into Africa. Metellus, not bearing to see the man who had robbed him of the glory of bringing the war to a conclusion, privately sailed from Africa, and left P. Rutilius, one of his legates, to deliver up the army to Marius. As soon as he had received the army, Marius continued the war with great vigour; but the history of his operations are related elsewhere. [JUGURTHA.] It is sufficient to state here that he was unable to bring the war to a conclusion in the first campaign, and it was not till the beginning of the next year (a.c. 106) that Jugurtha was betrayed by Bocchus, king of Mauritania, into the hands of Marius, who sent his quaestor L. Sulla to receive him from the Mauritanian king. Thus it happened that Marius gave to his future enemy and the destroyer of his family and party, the first opportunity of distinguishing himself; and this very circumstance sowed the seeds of the personal hatred which afterwards existed between them, and which was still further increased by political causes. The enemies of Marius claimed for Sulla the glory of the betrayal of Jugurtha, and the young patrician nobleman appropriated the credit of it to himself, by always wearing a signet-ring on which he had had engraved the surrender of Jugurtha by Bocchus. "By constantly wearing this ring," says Plutarch, "Sulla irritated Marius, who was an ambitious and quarrelsome man, and could endure no partner in his glory."

Though the war against Jugurtha was thus brought to a close, Marius did not immediately return to Italy, but remained nearly two years longer in Numidia, during which time he was probably engaged in completely subjugating the country, and establishing the Roman power on a firmer basis. Meantime, a far greater danger than Rome had experienced since the time of Hannibal was now threatening the state. Vast numbers of barbarians, such as spread over the south of Europe in the later times of the Roman empire, had collected together on the northern side of the Alps, and were ready to pour down upon Italy. The two leading nations of which they consisted are called Cimbri and Teutones, the former of whom are supposed to have been Celts, of the same race as the Cymri (comp. Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 519, &c.; Niebuhr, Lectures on Roman History, vol. i. p. 365), and the latter Gauls; but the exact parts of Europe from which they came is quite uncertain. To these two great races were added the Ambrones, who are conjectured, though on somewhat slight grounds, to have been Ligurians (comp. Plut. Mar. 19) and some of the Swiss tribes, such as the Tigurini. The whole host is said to have contained 300,000 fighting men, besides a much larger number of women and children; and though the exact calculations of the numbers of such barbarians is little worthy of credit, yet it is certain that there was an immense and almost incredible multitude hanging on the frontiers of Italy. The general alarm at Rome was still further increased by the ill success which had hitherto attended the arms of the republic against these barbarians. Army after army had fallen before them. They were first heard of in a.c. 113, in Noricum, whence they descended into Illyricum, but probably did not penetrate into Italy, as is stated by some ancient writers. (Eutrop. iv. 25; Obequ. 98.) The Romans sent an army to defend Illyricum, under the command of Cn. Papirius Carbo, but he was defeated by the barbarians [CARBO, No. 3], who did not, however, follow up their victory, but for some causes unknown to us, retired into Noricum, and marched westward into Switzerland. In the invasion of Illyricum, mention is made of the Cimbri alone; and when and where they were joined by the Teutones is uncertain. In Switzerland their forces were still further augmented by the Tigurini and the Ambrones; and the barbarians now poured over Gaul, and seem to have plundered and ravaged it in every direction. The Romans sent army after army to defend at least the south-western part of the country, which was now a province of the Roman state; but all in vain. In a.c. 109 the consul, M. Junius Silanus, was defeated by the Cimbri; in a.c. 107 the Tigurini cut in pieces, near the lake of Geneva, the army of Marius's colleague, the consul L. Cassius Longinus, who lost his life in the battle; and shortly afterwards M. Aurelius Scaurus was also defeated and taken prisoner. But the most dreadful loss was still to come. In a.c. 105 two consular armies, commanded by the consul Cn. Mallius Maximus and the proconsul Cn. Servilius Cæpio, consisting of 80,000 men, were completely annihilated by the barbarians: only two men are said to have escaped the slaughter. [CÆPIO, No. 7.]

These repeated disasters husbanded all party quarrels. Every one at Rome felt that Marius was the only man capable of saving the state, and he was accordingly elected consul by the unanimous votes of all parties, while he was still absent in Africa. He entered Rome in triumph on the 1st of January, a.c. 104, which was also the first day of his second consulship, leading Jugurtha in chains in the procession. On this day he gave a striking instance of his arrogance, by entering the senate-house in his triumphal robes. Meanwhile, the threatened danger was for a while averted. Instead of crossing the Alps, and pouring down upon Italy, as had been expected, the Cimbri marched into Spain, which they ravaged for the next two or three years. This interval was advantageously employed by Marius in training the new troops, and accustoming them to hardships and toil. It was probably during this time that he introduced the various changes into the organization of the Roman army, which are usually attributed to him. Notwithstanding the sternness and severity with which he punished the least breach of discipline, he gradually became a great favourite with his new troops, who learnt to place implicit confidence in their general, and were especially delighted with the strict impartiality with which he visited the offences of the officers as well as of the privates.

As the enemy still continued in Spain, Marius was elected consul a third time for the year a.c. 103; but since they did not make their appearance again during the latter year, the Romans began to recover a little from their panic, and several candidates of distinction offered themselves for the consulship. Under these circumstances Marius repaired to Rome, where he gained over L. Saturninus, the most popular of the tribunes, who persuaded the people to confer the consulship upon Marius again, who was accordingly elected for the fourth time (a.c. 102), although, to save appearances, he pretended to be anxious to be released from the honour. And fortunate was it for Rome that the supreme command was still entrusted to him; for in this very year the long-expected barbarians at length arrived. The Cimbri, who had returned from Spain, united their forces with the Teutones, though where the latter people had been meantime is quite uncertain. It is, moreover, exceedingly difficult to make out clearly the movements of the different armies, since the records of this period of history are very scanty and often contradictory. It appears, however, that Marius first took up his position in a fortified camp on the Rhone, probably in the vicinity of the modern Arles; and as the entrance of the river was nearly blocked up by mud and sand, he employed his soldiers in digging a canal from the Rhone to the Mediterranean, that he might the more easily obtain his supplies from the sea. From thence he marched northwards, and stationed himself at the junction of the Rhone and the Isara (Isère). (Oros. v. 16.) Meantime, the barbarians had divided their forces. The Cimbri quitted the Teutones and Ambrones, and marched round the northern foot of the Alps, in order to enter Italy by the north-east, crossing the Tyrolean Alps by the defiles of Tridentum (Trent). The Teutones and Ambrones on the other hand marched against Marius, intending, as it seems, to penetrate into Italy by Nice and the Riviera of Genoa. Marius, anxious to accustom his soldiers to the savage and strange appearance of the barbarians, would not give them battle at first. The latter accordingly resolved to attack the Roman camp; but as they were repulsed in this attempt, they broke up their encampment, and pressed on at once for Italy. So great were their numbers, that they are said to have been six days in marching by the Roman camp. As soon as they had advanced a little way, Marius also quitted his station and followed them; and thus the armies continued to march for a few days, the barbarians in the front and Marius behind, till they came to the neighbourhood of Aquæ Sextiæ (Aix). Here the decisive battle was fought. Marius had pitched his camp in a spot which was badly supplied with water, and is said to have done so intentionally. The necessity which the Roman soldiers were under of obtaining their water in the neighbourhood of the barbarians' camp, led to a fierce skirmish between the two armies; and this was followed, after the lapse of two or three days, by a general engagement. The battle was fiercely contested; but an ambush of 3000 soldiers, which Marius had stationed under the command of Claudius Marcellus, in the rear of the barbarians, and which fell upon them when they were already retreating before Marius, decided the fortune of the day. Attacked both in front and rear, and also dreadfully exhausted by the excessive heat of the weather, they at length broke their ranks and fled. The carnage was dreadful; some writers speak of 200,000 slain, and 80,000 taken prisoners (Liv. Epi. 68; Oros. v. 16); others state the number of the slain at 150,000 (Vell. Pat. ii. 12); while another statement reduces the number to 100,000 (Plut. Mar. 21); but whatever may have been the number that fell, the whole nation was annihilated, for those who escaped put an end to their lives, and their wives followed their example. Immediately after the battle, as Marius was in the act of setting fire to the vast heap of broken arms which had been collected together, and which was intended as an offering to the gods, horsemen rode up to him, and greeted him with the news of his being elected consul for the fifth time.

The Cimbri, in the mean time, had forced their way into Italy. The colleague of Marius, Q. Lutatius Catulus, despairing of defending the passes of the Tyrol, had taken up a strong position on the Athesia (Adige); but in consequence of the terror of his soldiers at the approach of the barbarians, he was obliged to retreat even beyond the Po, thus leaving the whole of the rich plain of Lombardy exposed to the ravages of the barbarians. Marius was thereupon recalled to Rome. The senate offered him a triumph for his victory over the Teutones, which he declined while the Cimbri were in Italy, and proceeded to join Catulus, who now commanded as proconsul, B.C. 101. The army of Marius had also marched into Italy, and with their united forces Marius and Catulus hastened in search of the enemy. They came up with them near Vercellæ (Vercelli), westward of Milan, and the decisive battle was fought on the 30th of July, in a plain called the Raudii Campi, the exact position of which is uncertain, but which must have been in the neighbourhood of Vercellæ. The Cimbri met with the same fate as the Teutones; the slain are again spoken of as between one and two hundred thousand; and the women, like those of the Teutones, put an end to their lives. The Tigurini, who had been stationed at the passes of the Tyrolean Alps, took to flight and dispersed, as soon as they heard of the destruction of their brethren in arms. The details of this battle are given elsewhere [CATULUS, No. 3], where it is shown that there are strong reasons for doubting the account of Plutarch, which assigns the glory of this victory to Catulus. At Rome, at all events, the whole credit was given to Marius; he was hailed as the saviour of the state; his name was coupled with the gods in the libations and at banquets, and he received the title of third founder of Rome. He celebrated his victories by the most brilliant triumph, in which Catulus, however, was allowed to share.

Hitherto the career of Marius had been a glorious one, and it would have been fortunate for him, as Niebuhr has remarked, if he had died on the day of his triumph. The remainder of his life is full of horrors, and brings out into prominent relief the worst features of his character. As the time for the consular elections approached, Marius was eager to obtain this dignity for the sixth time, and was therefore obliged, contrary to his inclination and character, to play the part of a popular man, and to court the favour of the electors. He wished to be first in peace as well as in war, and to rule the state as well as the army. But he did not possess the qualities requisite for a popular leader at Rome; he had no power of oratory, and lost his presence of mind in the noise and shouts of the popular assemblies. In order to secure his election, he entered into close connection with two of the worst demagogues that ever appeared at Rome, Saturninus and Glaucia, the former of whom was a candidate for the tribunate, and the latter for the prætorship, and by their means, as well as by bribing the tribes, he secured his election to the consulship for the sixth time. Saturninus and Glaucia also carried their elections; and the former, in order to gain the tribunate, did not hesitate to assassinate A. Nonius, because he was a rival candidate.

Marius in his sixth consulship (B.C. 100) was guilty of an act of the deepest perfidy, in order to ruin his old enemy Metellus. Saturninus had proposed an agrarian law [SATURNINUS], and had added to it the clause, that if the people passed the law, the senate should swear obedience to it within five days, and whoever refused to do so should be expelled from the senate, and pay a fine of twenty talents. In order to entrap Metellus, Marius got up in his place in the senate, and declared that he would never take the oath, and Metellus made the same declaration; but when the tribune summoned the senators to the rostra to comply with the demand of the law, Marius, to the astonishment of all, immediately took the oath, and advised the senate to follow his example. Metellus alone refused compliance, and was in consequence banished from the city. The next act of Marius was one of equal treachery. He had availed himself of the services of Saturninus to gain the consulship and ruin Metellus, and had supported him in all his violent and unconstitutional proceedings; but when he found that Saturninus had gone too far, and had excited a storm of universal indignation and hatred, Marius deserted his companion in guilt; and being applied to by the senate to crush Saturninus and his crew, he complied with the request. Invested by the senate with absolute power, by the well-known decree, Fidetur, neque res publica detrimenti caperet, he collected an armed force, and laid siege to the capitol, where Saturninus, Glaucia, and their confederates, had taken refuge. Marius cut off the pipes which supplied the capitol with water, and obliged the conspirators to surrender at discretion; and though he made some efforts to save their lives, they were put to death immediately they had descended into the forum. By the share which he had taken in this transaction, Marius lost the favour of a great part of the people, without gaining that of the senate; and, accordingly, when the time for the election of the censors came, he did not venture to offer himself as a candidate, but allowed persons of far inferior pretensions to gain this dignity, to which his rank and position in the state would seem to have entitled him.

The sixth consulship of Marius ended in disgrace and shame. In the following year (B.C. 99) he left Rome, in order that he might not witness the return of Metellus from exile, a measure which he had been unable to prevent, and set sail for Cappadocia and Galatia, under the pretence of offering sacrifices which he had vowed to the Great Mother. He had however a deeper purpose in visiting these countries. Finding that he was losing his influence and popularity while the republic was in a state of peace, he was anxious to recover his lost ground by gaining fresh victories in war, and accordingly repaired to the court of Mithridates, in hopes of rousing him to make war upon the Romans. It was during his absence that he was elected æquit.

Marius on his return to Rome built a house near the forum, that the people might not have to come so far to pay their respects to him; but all his efforts were vain to regain his lost popularity; and the hopes he had entertained of obtaining the command of the war in Asia were also frustrated by the ability with which Sulla repressed all disturbances in the East in B.C. 92. The disappointment rich Marius felt at losing his influence in the state was still further exasperated by the growing popularity and power of Sulla; and when Bocchus reigned in the capitol gilded figures, representing the surrender of Jugurtha to Sulla, Marius was so inflamed with rage, that he resolved to pull them down by force. Sulla was making preparations to resist him; and both parties would probably have come to open violence, had not the Social War broken out just at that time (B.C. 90). This war required all the services of all the generals that Rome possessed, and, accordingly, both Marius and Sulla were actively employed in it. But although Marius showed great military abilities in the manner in which he conducted his share of the war, yet he was considered to be over cautious and too slow; and his achievements were thrown into the shade by the superior energy and activity of Sulla. Marius was now in his sixty-seventh year: his body had grown stout and unwieldy, and he was incapable of enduring the fatigue of very active service. He served as the legate of the consul P. Rutilius Lupus; and after the latter had fallen in battle [LUPUS, RUTILIUS], the chief command of the northern scene of the war devolved upon Marius. He defeated the Marii in two successive battles, after which he gave up the command, and returned to Rome, on the ground that his weakness rendered him unable to endure the toils of the campaign. His services, however, had been most important, for he had defeated the most warlike and the most dangerous of all the allies. An anecdote preserved by Plutarch respecting the conduct of Marius in this campaign is characteristic of the veteran general. Marius had strongly entrenched himself in a fortified camp, and neither he strategem nor the taunts of the enemy could notice him from his favourable position. At length Pompeius Silo, the leader of the Marii, endeavoured to draw him out by appealing to his military pride. "If you are a great general, Marius, come down and fight;" to which the veteran replied, "Nay, do you, if you are a great general, compel me to fight against my will."

In B.C. 88 the ambition of Marius at length involved Rome in a civil war, which was attended with the most frightful horrors. Insatiably fond of power and distinction, Marius was anxious to obtain the command of the war against Mithridates; and as he was supposed to be incapable of enduring the fatigues of a campaign, he actually went daily to the Campus Martius, to go through the usual exercises with the young men. It was a melancholy sight to see the old man so lost to all true dignity and greatness; and the wiser part, says Plutarch, "lamented to witness his greediness after aim and distinction; and they pitied a man, who, having risen from poverty to enormous wealth, and to the highest station from a low degree, knew not when to put bounds to his good fortune, and was not satisfied with being an object of admiration, and quietly enjoying what he had; but as if he was a want of every thing, after his triumphs and his conquests were setting out to Cappadocia and the Thracians to oppose himself in his old age to Archelaus and Neoptolemus, the satraps of Mithridates." But all his efforts were in vain: his great enemy Sulla obtained the consulship (B.C. 88), and the senate gave him the command of the war against Mithridates. Thereupon Marius resolved to make a desperate attempt to deprive his rival of this opportunity for distinction, and obtain it for himself. He got the tribune, P. Sulpicius Rufus, to bring forward a law for distributing the Italian allies, who had just obtained the Roman franchise, among all the tribes; and as they greatly exceeded the old citizens in number, they would of course be able to carry whatever they pleased in the comitia. If this law were passed, they would of course, out of gratitude to Marius, annul the resolution of the senate, and give the command of the Mithridatic war to their benefactor. This law met with the most vehement opposition from the old citizens; and the consuls, to prevent it from being carried, declared a justitium, during which no business could be legally transacted. But Marius and Sulpicius were resolved to have recourse to the last extremities sooner than lose their point. They entered the forum with an armed force, and called upon the consuls to withdraw the justitium: in the tumult which followed the young son of Pompeius, the colleague of Sulla, was murdered, and Sulla himself only escaped by taking refuge in the house of Marius, which was close to the forum. To save their lives the consuls were obliged to withdraw the justitium: the law of Sulpicius was carried; and the tribes, in which the new citizens now had the majority, appointed Marius to the command of the war against Mithridates.

Marius had now gained the great object of his ambition; but it was hardly to be expected that a power which had been violently obtained should be peacefully surrendered. The army destined for the Mithridatic war was stationed at Nola, and thither Marius sent two military tribunes, to take the command of the troops and bring them to him. But Sulla, who had previously joined the army, encouraged the soldiers to disobey the orders: they murdered the tribunes whom Marius had sent; and when Sulla declared his intention of marching to the city, and of putting down force by force, they readily responded to his call. Marius had not expected this daring step, and was not prepared to meet it. Sulla was marching at the head of six legions; and in order to obtain troops to oppose the latter, Marius attempted to raise a force by the abominable expedient of offering freedom to all slaves who would join him. But it was all in vain. Sulla entered the city without much difficulty, and Marius, with his son and a few companions, were obliged to take to flight. Sulla used his victory with comparative moderation. Marius, Sulpicius, and a few others, were declared enemies of the state, and condemned to death; their property was confiscated, and a price set upon their heads; but no attempt was made against the lives of any others. Marius and his son left Rome together, but afterwards separated, and the latter escaped in safety to Africa. Marius with his stepson Granius embarked on board ship at Ostia, and thence sailed southward along the coast of Italy, exposed to the greatest dangers, and enduring the greatest hardships. At Circeii Marius and his companions were obliged to land, on account of the violence of the wind and the want of provisions; but they could obtain nothing to eat, and after wandering about for a long time, they learnt from some peasants that a number of horsemen had been in search of them, and they accordingly turned aside from the road, and passed the night in a deep wood in great suffering and want. But the indomitable spirit of the old man did not fail him; and he consoled himself and encouraged his companions by the assurance that he should still live to see his seventh consulship, in accordance with a prediction that had been made to him in his youth: he told them that when a child an eagle's nest with seven young ones had fallen into his lap, and that the soothsayers had informed his parents that the prodigy intimated that he should obtain the supreme command and magistracy seven times. Marius and his friends wandered on to Minturnæ, and when they were within two miles from the city, they saw a party of horsemen galloping towards them. In great haste they hurried down to the sea, and swam off to two merchant vessels, which received them on board. The horsemen bade the sailors bring the ship to land, or throw Marius overboard; but moved by the tears and entreaties of the old man, they refused to comply with the request. As soon, however, as the horsemen had ridden off, the sailors, fearing to keep Marius, and yet not choosing to betray him, landed him at the mouth of the river Liris, and immediately sailed away. Marius was now quite alone amid the swamps and marshes through which the Liris flows, and with difficulty waded through them to the hut of an old man, who concealed him in a hole near the river, and covered him with reeds. But hearing shortly afterwards the noise of his pursuers in the hut of the old man, he crept out of his hiding-place, stripped off his clothes, and threw himself into the thick and muddy water of the marsh. Here he was discovered, dragged out of the water, and covered with mud, and with a rope round his neck was delivered up to the authorities of Minturnæ. They placed him for security in the house of a woman named Fannia, who was supposed to be a personal enemy of his [FANNIA], and then deliberated whether they should comply with the instruction that had been sent from Rome to all the municipal towns, to put Marius to death as soon as they found him. After some consultation they resolved to obey it, but at first they could find no one to carry it into execution. At length a Gallic or Cimbrian horse-soldier undertook the horrible duty, and with a drawn sword in his hand entered the apartment where Marius was confined. The part of the room in which Marius lay was in the shade; and to the frightened barbarian the eyes of Marius seemed to dart out fire, and from the darkness a terrible voice shouted out, "Man, dost thou dare to murder C. Marius?" The barbarian immediately threw down his sword, and rushed out of the house, exclaiming, "I cannot kill C. Marius." Straightway there was a revulsion of feeling among the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They repented of their ungrateful conduct towards a man who had saved Rome and Italy; they got ready a ship for his departure, provided him with every thing necessary for the voyage, and with prayers and wishes for his safety conducted him to the sea, and placed him on board. From Minturnæ the wind carried him to the island of Aenaria (now Ischia), where he found Granius and the rest of his friends; and from thence he set sail for Africa, which he reached in safety, after narrowly escaping death at Eryx in Sicily, where he was obliged to land to take in water. At Carthage Marius landed; but he had scarcely put his foot on shore before the Roman governor Sexilius sent an officer to bid him leave the country, or else he would carry into execution the decree of the senate, and treat him as an enemy of the Roman people. This last blow almost unmanned Marius; grief and indignation for a time deprived him of utterance; and at last his only reply was, "Tell the prætor that you have C. Marius a fugitive sitting on the ruins of Carthage." Meanwhile, the younger Marius, who had been to Numidia to implore the assistance of Hiempsal, had been detained by the Numidian king, but had escaped by the assistance of one of the concubines of Hiempsal, who had fallen in love with him, and joined his father just at this time. They forthwith got on board a small fishing-boat, and crossed over to the island of Cercina, as some Numidian horsemen were riding up to apprehend them.

During this time a revolution had taken place at Rome, which prepared the way for the return of Marius to Italy. The consuls for the year a.c. 87 were Cn. Octavius and L. Cornelius Cinna, of whom the former belonged to the aristocratical and the latter to the Marian party. Sulla, however, had made Cinna swear that he would not attempt to make any alteration in the state; but as soon as the former had left Italy to prosecute the war against Mithridates, Cinna, paying no regard to the oaths he had taken, brought forward again the law of Sulpicius for incorporating the new Italian citizens among the thirty-five tribes. The two consuls had recourse to arms, Octavius to oppose and Cinna to carry the law. A dreadful conflict took place in the forum; the party of Octavius obtained the victory, and Cinna was driven out of the city with great slaughter. The senate forthwith passed a decree, declaring that Cinna had forfeited his citizenship and consulship, and appointing L. Cornelius Merula consul in his stead. But Cinna would not relinquish his power without another struggle; and by means of the new citizens, whose cause he espoused, he was soon at the head of a formidable army. As soon as Marius heard of these changes he set sail from Africa, landed at Telamo in Etruria, and proclaiming freedom to the slaves began to collect a large force. He sent to Cinna, offering to obey him as consul. Cinna accepted his proposal, and named Marius consul, but Marius would not accept the title or the insignia of office, observing that such marks of honour were not suited to his condition and fortune. The sufferings and privations he had endured had exasperated his proud and haughty spirit almost to madness, and nothing but the blood of his enemies could appease his resentment. The old man proceeded slowly to join Sulla, inspiring mingled respect and horror, as he went along: he was clad in a mean and humble dress, and his hair and beard had not been cut from the day he had been driven out of Rome. After joining Cinna, Marius proceeded to prosecute the war with great vigour. He first captured the corn ships, and cut off Rome from its usual supply of food. He next took Ostia, and the other towns on the coast, and moving down the Tiber, encompassed the Janiculus. Famine began to rage in the city, and the senate was obliged to yield. They sent a deputation to Cinna and Marius, inviting them into the city, but entreating them to spare citizens. Cinna received the deputies sitting in his chair of office, and gave them a kind of audience, but his looks spoke louder than words. When the audience was over, they marched to the city. Cinna entered it with his guards; but when Marius came to the gates he affected to have scruples, and observed with contempt, that it was illegal for him as an exile to enter the city, and that if they wished for his presence, they must summon the comitia and repeal the law which banished him. The comitia were accordingly summoned; but before three or four tribes had voted, Marius became tired of the farce, threw off the mask, and entered the city, surrounded by his body-guard, which he had formed out of the slaves who had flocked to him. The most frightful scenes followed. His guards stabbed every one whom he did not salute, and the streets ran with the blood of the noblest of the Roman aristocracy. Every one whom Marius hated or feared was hunted out and put to death; and no consideration either of rank, talent, or former friendship induced him to spare the victims of his vengeance. The great orator M. Antonius fell by the hands of his assassins; and his former colleague Q. Catulus, who had triumphed with him over the Cimbri, was obliged to put an end to his own life. Cinna was soon tired of the butchery; but the appetite of Marius seemed only whetted by the slaughter, and daily required fresh victims for its gratification. Without going through the form of an election, Marius and Cinna named themselves consuls for the following year (B.C. 86), and thus was fulfilled the prediction that Marius should be seven times consul. But he did not long enjoy the honour: he was now in his seventy-first year; his body was quite worn out by the fatigues and sufferings he had recently undergone; and on the eighteenth day of his consulship he died of an attack of pleurisy, after seven days' illness. According to Plutarch, his last illness was brought on by dread of Sulla's return, and he is said to have seen troubled with terrific dreams; but these statements are probably derived from the Memoirs of Sulla, and should be received with great caution. The ashes of Marius were subsequently thrown into the Anio by command of Sulla. Vita*, in the Proxime of the Collège Royal Français, Berlin, 1845; and much useful information is given by Long in the notes to his translation of Plutarch's Life of Marius, London, 1844.

2. C. MARIUS, the son of the great Marius, was by an adopted son. (Liv. Eph. 86; Vell. Pat. 26.) Appian in one passage (B. C. i. 87) calls him a nephew of the preceding, though he had previously spoken of him as his son (B. C. i. 62). He was born in B.C. 109; and the particulars of his life down to the time of his father's death are related in the preceding article. During the three years after the death of the elder Marius Sulla was engaged in the prosecution of the war against the Thracians, and Italy was entirely in the hands of the Marian party. The young Marius followed the footsteps of his father, and was equally distinguished by merciless severity against his enemies. He was elected consul for the year B.C. 82, when he was twenty-seven years of age, and his colleague was Cn. Papirius Carbo. Sulla had landed at Brundisium at the beginning of the preceding year, and was conquering the southern part of the peninsula, appears to have passed the winter in Campania. Marius was stationed on the frontiers of Latium to oppose him; and the decisive battle was fought near Sacriportus (the position of which is quite uncertain). Marius was entirely defeated, and threw himself into the strongly-fortified town of Praeneste, where he had deposited the treasures of the Capitoline temple (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. l. a. 5): Sulla left Lucretius Opella to prosecute the siege while he hastened on to Rome. But Marius, resolving that his enemies should not escape, sent orders to L. Junius Brutus Damasippus, who was then praetor at Rome, to summon the senate under some pretext, and put to death Mucius Scaevola, the pontifex maximus, and many others. [BRUTUS, No. 19.] Various efforts were made to relieve Praeneste, but they all failed; and after Sulla's great victory at the Colline gate of Rome, in which Pontius Telesinus was defeated and slain, Marius despaired of holding out any longer, and, in company with the brother of Telesinus, attempted to escape by a subterranean passage, which led from the town into the open country; but finding that their flight was discovered, they put an end to one another's lives. According to other accounts, Marius killed himself, or was killed by his slave at his own request. Marius perished in the year of his consulship. His head was cut off and carried to Sulla, who contemptuously remarked, in allusion to his youth, that he ought to have worked at the oar before steering the vessel. It was after the death of the younger Marius that Sulla first assumed the surname of Felix. (Plut. Sull. 28—32, Mar. 46; Appian, B. C. i. 87—94; Liv. Eph. 86—88; Vell. Pat. ii. 26, 27; Flor. iii. 21; Oros. v. 20; Val. Max. vi. 8, § 2.)

3. C. or M. MARIUS, whom Appian calls the other (ἕτερος) C. Marius, was a relation of the great Marius, and fled to Cinna, when the latter was driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, B.C. 87. (Appian, B. C. i. 65.) As Appian calls this C. Marius a senator, he is probably the same as the M. Marius who settled some of the Celiberti in a town not far from Colenda, because they had assisted him in a war against the Lusitanians. This happened about the year B.C. 99, when Marius was probably quaestor. (Appian, His. 100.)

4. The False Marius, whose real name was Amatius, pretended to be a son or grandson of the great Marius. [AMATIUS.]

5. M. MARIUS, of Sidicinum, of whom A. Gellius (x. 3) relates a striking tale, which shows the gross indignity with which the Roman magistrates sometimes treated the most distinguished men among the allies. This Marius, who is called by Gellius suas civitatis nobilissimus homo, was a contemporary of C. Gracchus. It has been conjectured that he may have been the father or a near connection of Marius Egnatius, one of the principal leaders of the allies in the Social war. [EGNATIUS, No. 2.]

6. M. MARIUS, a friend of Cicero, whose estate was in the neighbourhood of one of Cicero's, and with whom he was closely united by similarity of political opinions and intellectual tastes and habits. Although Marius constantly suffered from ill health, he was of a lively and cheerful disposition, full of wit and merriment; and accordingly, Cicero's four letters to him, which have come down to us (ad Fam. vii. 1—4), are written in a sportive tone. The estate of Marius was in the neighbourhood of Pompeii, not far from the Pompeianum of Cicero. Almost all that we know about this Marius is contained in the four letters of Cicero already referred to. He is also mentioned by him in a letter to his brother Quintus. (Ad Q. Fr. ii. 10.)

7. L. MARIUS, L. F., was one of those who subscribed the accusation of Triarius against Scaurus, in B. C. 54 (Ascon. in Cic. Scav. p. 19, ed. Orelli). He is probably the same as the Marius who was quaestor in B. C. 50, and succeeded C. Sallustius in the government of the province of Syria. (Cic. ad Fam. ii. 17.)

8. L. MARIUS, was tribune of the plebs with Cato Uticensis, B. C. 62, and in conjunction with him, brought forward a law De Triumphis (Val. Max. ii. 8. § 1).

9. M. MARIUS, whom Cicero calls homo disertus et nobilis, pleaded the cause of the Valentini before C. Verres. (Cic. Verr. v. 16.)

10. SEX. MARIUS, a legate of Dolabella in Syria, in B. C. 43. (Cic. ad Fam. xii. 15.)

11. T. MARIUS, of Urbinum, had risen from the rank of a common soldier to honours and riches, by the favour of the emperor Augustus. A tale is told of him by Valerius Maximus (vii. 8. § 6).

12. SEX. MARIUS, a man of immense wealth, who possessed gold mines in Spain, and lived in the reign of Tiberius. He is called by Tacitus Hispaniarum ditissimus. After escaping an accusation in A. D. 25, which Calpurnius Salvianus wished to bring against him, he was condemned to death in A. D. 33, and thrown down the Tarpeian rock, on the pretext of his having committed incest with his daughter, but in reality because the emperor coveted his riches (Tac. Ann. iv. 36, vi. 19). Dion Cassius, who says that Marius was a friend of Tiberius, and that he was indebted to the emperor for his wealth, gives a different reason for the condemnation of Marius; he relates that the charge of incest was brought against Marius, because he wished to conceal his daughter from the lust of his imperial master. (Dion Cass. lviii. 22.)

MARIUS A'LFIVS, the medix tuticus, or supreme magistrate of the Campanians, was defeated and slain in battle by the Roman consul, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, B. C. 215. (Liv. xxiii. 35.)

MARIUS, M. AURELIUS, one of the thirty tyrants enumerated by Trebellius Pollio [see AUREOLUS], was the fourth of the usurpers who in succession ruled Gaul, in defiance of Gallienus. According to the statements of the Augustan historians and Victor, he was a blacksmith, remarkable only for his extraordinary muscular strength, and deserving to be remembered in history merely on account of the unparalleled shortness of his reign, which lasted for two, or at the most, three days. Although the authorities cited above, together with Eutropius, agree in limiting the duration of his power to this space, it is a singular fact that a considerable number of coins, in each of the three metals, are to be found in various collections, which we can scarcely suppose to have been engraved, struck, and issued within such a period, and Eckhel has acutely pointed out an inconsistency in Victor, who, in the life of Dicoletian, speaks of Marius as having been one of those who, when suddenly elevated, became "superbia atque ambitione inextinctos," feelings and passions which could scarcely be developed within the space of forty-eight hours (Trebell. Poll. Trig. Tyrann. vii.; Victor, de Ces. xxxiii. 39; Eutrop. ix. 7.)

It appears from coins that the full name of this usurper was C. M. Aurelius Marius; but on some coins, as on the one annexed, he is called simply C. Marius. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 454.) [W. R.]

MAROBODUUS, Marbod, afterwards king of the Marcomanni, or men of the Mark (maer) or border, or, according to another etymology, of the Marsh land, was by birth a Suevian. He was born about B. C. 18, of a noble family in his tribe, and was sent in his boyhood with other hostages to Rome, where he attracted the notice of Augustus, and received a liberal education. Marbod seems early to have discerned the relative power of his countrymen and the Romans. The Germans were brave, numerous and enterprising, but weakened by internal feuds, and impatient of government and discipline. Before they could effectually resist or assail the Roman empire they needed the restraints of laws and of fixed property in land. At what time Maroboduus returned to his country is uncertain, but probably soon after he attained manhood, since he died at the age of 22, the last eighteen years of his life were spent in exile, and his kingdom, when it was taken, by the jealousy of Rome, was the work of long and systematic preparation. Crossing the Rhine, he took the head of at least one branch of the Suevi. Maroboduus expelled, or more probably drove out, the Boians, a Celtic race, who inhabited the north and part of Bavaria. The kingdom which Maroboduus established amid the woods and mountains of central Germany extended, though by a slow invasion or gradual encroachments, along the left bank of the Danube, from Regensburg near the borders of Hungary, and stretched far into terior. Its southern frontier was not more than 200 miles from Italy itself, and the half-subdued provinces of Pannonia and Noricum might either become useful allies, or at least divert the attention of the Caesars from the peaceful growth or the hostile preparations of the Marcomannic state. Its capital was Bovisium, and Maroboduus maintained his regal dignity by a regular force of 70,000 foot and 4000 horse, armed and disciplined after the Roman manner, and while he provided for independence or aggression he carefully cultivated the arts of peace. The Romans believed, or affected to believe, that Maroboduus chose this remote seat of empire from dread of their arms. But policy rather than fear probably directed his choice, for if Rome was to be assailed, leisure and security for many years were needful to prepare the Germans for the assault. In A. D. 7, however, his designs, or the strength of the Marcomannic kingdom aroused the jealousy of Augustus. The existence of a free and powerful state was a dangerous spectacle for the subjects of Rome; the disunion of the Teutonic tribes was the security of the empire; and even if Maroboduus was not personally hostile, he was forming a centre of union and a model of polity for the Germanic race. Maroboduus had also touched the pride as well as the fears of Rome. He gave refuge to its discontented subjects; his ambassadors did not always address Augustus as a superior, and if their language was respectful, their demands were frequently arrogant. The operations against Maroboduus were on a wider scale than had hitherto been adopted against the German tribes. Tiberius was directed to cross the Danube at Carnuntum, near the modern Presburg, the eastern extremity of the Marcomannic kingdom; Sentius Saturninus was to lead his forces across the country of the Chatti, and, cutting his way through the Hercynian forest, to join Tiberius on the north bank of the Danube, and both were to make a combined attack within a few leagues from the Marcomannic capital Bovisium. A general revolt of the Cis-Danubian provinces rescued Maroboduus, and Tiberius had the address or the good fortune to persuade him to remain neutral during the Pannonian and Dalmatic war. Maroboduus did not avail himself of the distress of Rome after the disaster of Quintilius Varus, A. D. 9, and marked his friendship for Augustus on that occasion by refusing from his murderers the head of the unfortunate general and sending it for sepulture to Rome. Eight years later (A. D. 17) the disunion which so long paralysed the Teutonic races in their struggle with Rome effected the ruin of the Marcomannic kingdom. The policy of Maroboduus, understood by his countrymen, appeared to them, or may have really degenerated into despotism. The Cheruscan under Arminius [ARMINIUS] prepared to attack; the Semnones and Longobardi, Suevian clans, revolted from him. The salency between Arminius and his uncle Inguionerus [INGUIONERUS], who embraced the Marcomannic alliance, delayed but could not avert the blow, and Maroboduus, defeated in action, sought aid of Rome. In A. D. 19 he had again become formidable, and Drusus prepared to invade him, when Catualda [CATUALDA], a chief of the Isathones, whom Maroboduus had driven into exile, led a detachment through the Bohemian woods into the heart of Maroboduus's kingdom.

As his last resource the Marcomannic king became a suppliant, although a lofty and royal one in his tone, to Tiberius. The emperor assured him of shelter, so long as he needed it, in Italy, and of a free return beyond the Alps when refuge was no longer needful. Maroboduus passed the remainder of his life, eighteen years, at Ravenna. His name was sometimes employed to keep the Suevians in awe, but Tiberius warily guarded a captive whom, before the senate, he compared to Pyrrhus and Antiochus. By his inactivity during the Pannonian war, A. D. 7—9, Maroboduus let slip the opportunity of raising Germany against Rome, and his resignation to an obscure and protracted life in exile lost him the esteem of his own countrymen. He died at the age of 53 years, A. D. 35. (Strab. vii. p. 290; Tac. Ann. ii. 44, 45, 46, 62, 63; Vell. Pat. ii. 108; Suet. Tib. 37.) [W. B. D.]

MARON (Μάρων). 1. A son of Evanthus (some also call him a son of Oenopion, Seilenus, or of Bacchus, and a pupil of Seilenus, Nonn. Dionys. xiv. 99; Eurip. Cyclop. 141, &c.), and grandson of Dionysus and Ariadne, was a priest of Apollo at Maroneia in Thrace, where he himself had a sanctuary. He was the hero of sweet wine, and is mentioned among the companions of Dionysus. (Hom. Od. ix. 197, &c.; Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 1615, 1623; Philostr. Her. ii. 8; Athen. i. p. 33; Diod. i. 18.)

2. A son of Orsiphantus, and brother of Alpheius, a Spartan hero, who had fallen at Thermopylae, and was afterwards honoured with a heroum at Sparta. (Herod. vii. 227; Paus. iii. 12. § 7.) [L. S.]

MARPESSA (Μάρπεςσα), a daughter of Evenus and Alcippe. (Hom. Il. ix. 557; Plut. Parall. min. 40; Apollod. i. 7. § 8; comp. Idas and Evenus.) [L. S.]

MARS, an ancient Roman god, who was at an early period identified by the Romans with the Greek Ares, or the god delighting in bloody war, although there are a variety of indications that the Italian Mars was originally a divinity of a very different nature. In the first place Mars bore the surname of Silvanus, and sacrifices were offered to him for the prosperity of the fields and flocks; and in the second a lance was honoured at Rome as well as at Praeneste as the symbol of Mars (Liv. xxiv. 10), so that Mars resembles more the Greek Pallas Athene than Ares. The transition from the idea of Mars as an agricultural god to that of a warlike being, was not difficult with the early Latins, as the two occupations were intimately connected. The name of the god in the Sabine and Oscan was Mameis [MAMERS]; and Mars itself is a contraction of Mavens or Mavors.

Next to Jupiter, Mars enjoyed the highest honours at Rome: he frequently is designated as father Mars, whence the forms Marspiter and Maspiter, analogous to Jupiter (Gellius, iv. 12; Macrobi. Sat. i. 12, 19; Varro, De Ling. Lat. viii. 33); and Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus, were the three tutelary divinities of Rome, to each of whom king Numa appointed a flamen, whose rank was sometimes thought higher even than that of the great pontiff. (Liv. viii. 9; Festus, p. 188, ed. Müller.) Hence a very ancient sanctuary was dedicated to Mars on the Quirinal hill, near the temple of Dius Fidius, from which he derived his surname of Quirinus (Varro, De Ling. Lat. v. 52; Serv. ad Aen. i. 296), and hence he was regarded as the father of the Roman people, having begotten the founders of Rome by Rhea Silvia, a priestess of Vesta. The rites of the worship of Mars all point to victory, in proof of which we need only direct attention to the dances in armour of the Salii, the dedication of the place of warlike exercises and games to Mars (campus Martius), and that war itself is frequently designated by the name of Mars. But being the father of the Romans, Mars was also the protector of the most honourable pursuit, i.e. agriculture, and hence he was invoked to be propitious to the household of the rustic Roman (Cato, De Re Rust. 141); and under the name of Silvanus, he was worshipped to take care of the cattle (ibid. 83). The warlike Mars was called Gradivus, as the rustic god was called Silvanus; while, in his relation to the state, he bore the name of Quirinus. These are the three principal aspects under which the god appears; and in reference to the second, it may be remarked that females were excluded from his worship, and that accordingly he presided more particularly over those occupations of country life which belonged to the male sex. (Cato, De Re Rust. 83; Schol. ad Juvenal. vi. 446.) But notwithstanding this, Mars was conceived not only accompanied by female divinities, but one of them, Nerio, or Neriene, is even described as his wife. (Gellius, xiii. 22; Plaut. Truc. ii. 6. 34; L. Lydus, De Mens. iv. 42.)

Mars was further looked upon as a god with prophetic powers; and in the neighbourhood of Reate there had been a very ancient oracle of the god (Dionys. i. 41), in which the future was revealed through a woodpecker (picus), which was sacred to him, and was for this reason surnamed Martius. The wolf also was sacred to Mars, and these animals, together with the horse, were his favourite sacrifices. Numerous temples were dedicated to him at Rome, the most important of which was that outside the Porta Capena, on the Appian road (Liv. x. 23, vi. 5, xli. 13; Serv. ad Aen. i. 296), and that of Mars Ultor, which was built by Augustus, in the forum. (Dion Cass. xli. 24; Sueton. Aug. 29; Vitruv. i. 7; comp. Hartung, Die Relig. der Röm. vol. ii. p. 155, &c.) [L. S.]

MARSUS, DOMITIUS, a Roman poet of the Augustan age, of whose life no particulars have come down to us. We may, however, conclude from his surname, Marsus, that he or his ancestors belonged to the Marsian nation, and were adopted by the noble house of the Domitii. He survived Tibullus, who died a. c. 18, and on whom he wrote a beautiful epitaph, which is still extant: his works were therefore probably written about the same time that Horace was in his greatest glory, although he is not mentioned by the latter poet. The year in which Marsus died is uncertain: whether he was alive at the time of Ovid's banishment (A. D. 9) we do not know, but he appears to have been dead when Ovid wrote his elegies in exile. (Ex Pont. iv. 16.)

Marsus wrote poems of various kinds, but his epigrams were the most celebrated of his productions. Hence he is frequently mentioned by Martial, who speaks of him in terms of the highest admiration, and from whose incidental notices we learn that the epigrams of Marsus were distinguished for their licentiousness and wit, and also for the severity of their satire. (Mart. ii. 71, 77, v. 5, vii. 99.) It was in consequence of their last characteristic that one of the books was entitled

Cecata, a few lines of which have been preserved by the scholiast Philargyrius (ad Virg. Ed. iii. 90). Besides these epigrams and the epitaph on Tibullus, which has been already mentioned, and which will be found in most of the editions of Tibullus, Marsus also wrote epic poetry, as appears from the fact that Ovid (Ex Pont. iv. 16. 5) classed him with the epic poet Rabinus, and that Martial (iv. 28) mentions a poem of Marsus called Amazonia. Marsus likewise wrote some erotic elegies, which probably bore the title of Melaenis (comp. Mart. vii. 29), and a collection of fables, the title book of which is cited by the grammarian Charisius.

All that is known of Domitius Marsus is collected and elucidated at great length by Weichert in his treatise De Domitio Marso Poeta, Græmæ, 1828, republished in his Poetarum Latinæ Reliquiæ, pp. 241—269, Lipsæ 1830.

MARSUS, OCTAVIUS, whom Cicero calls "scleratus homo atque egens," was legate of Dolabella in B. C. 43, by whom he was sent into Syria with one legion. He was soon after followed by Dolabella, and was present with the latter at Ladicæa, when the town was betrayed into the hands of C. Cassius Longinus. He followed the example of his general and put an end to his own life. Appian calls him simply Marsus, but Dion Cassius Marcus Octavius, for which, however, we ought undoubtedly to read Marcus Octavius. (Cic. Phil. xi. 2, with the note of Garatoni; Appian, B. C. iv. 62; Dion Cass. xlvii. 30.)

MARSUS, VI'BIUS, whom Tacitus calls (Ann. vi. 47) "vetustis honoribus studiisque illustria," is first mentioned in A. D. 19 as one of the most likely persons to obtain the government of Syria, but he gave way to Cn. Sentius. In the same year he was sent to summon Piso to Rome to stand his trial. His name occurs again in A. D. 26, in the debates of the senate; and just before the death of Tiberius (A. D. 37) he narrowly escaped death, being accused as one of the accomplices of Albi-cilla. In A. D. 47 we find him governor of Syria. (Tac. Ann. ii. 74, 79, iv. 56, vi. 47, 48, xi. 18.) The name of C. Vibius Marsus, proconsul, appears on several coins of Utica in Africa, struck in the reign of Tiberius: they probably relate to the same person as the one mentioned above; and as he was disappointed in obtaining the province of Syria in the reign of Tiberius, he may have been appointed to that of Africa. (Eckhel, vol. iv. pp. 147, 148.)

MARSYAS (Μαρσῖας), a mythological personage, connected with the earliest period of Greek music. He is variously called the son of Hyagnus, or of Oeagrus, or of Olympus. Some make him a satyr, others a peasant. All agree in placing him in Phrygia. The following is the outline of his story, according to the mythographers. Athene having, while playing the flute, seen the reflection of herself in water, and observed the distortion of her features, threw away the instrument in disgust. It was picked up by Marsyas, who no sooner began to blow through it than the flute, having once been inspired by the breath of a goddess, emitted of its own accord the most beautiful strains. Elated by his success, Marsyas was not enough to challenge Apollo to a musical contest, the conditions of which were that the victor should do what he pleased with the vanquished. The Muses, or, according to others, the Nymææ, were the umpires. Apollo played upon the cithara, and Marsyas upon the flute; and it was not till the former added his voice to the music of his lyre that the contest was decided in his favour. As a just punishment for the presumption of Marsyas, Apollo bound him to a tree, and flayed him alive. His blood was the source of the river Marsyas, and Apollo hung up his skin in the cave out of which that river flows. His flutes (for, according to some, the instrument on which he played was the double flute) were carried by the river Marsyas into the Mæander, and again emerging in the Asopus, were thrown on land by it in the Sicyonian territory, and were dedicated to Apollo in his temple at Sicyon. (Apollod. Bibl. i. 4. § 2; Palaeph. de Incredib. 48; Liban. Narrat. 14, p. 1104; Nonn. Narrat. ad Greg. Inveet. ii. 10, p. 164; Diod. iii. 58, 59; Paus. ii. 7. § 9; Herod. vii. 26; Xen. Anab. i. 2. § 8; Plut. de Fluv. 10; Hygin. Fab. 165; Ovid, Metam. vi. 382, 400.) The fable evidently refers to the struggle between the citharoedic and auloedic styles of music, of which the former was connected with the worship of Apollo among the Dorians, and the latter with the orgiastic rites of Cybele in Phrygia. It is easy to apply this explanation to the different parts of the legend; and it may be further illustrated by other traditions respecting Marsyas. He is made by some the inventor of the flute, by others of the double flute. (Plut. de Mus. p. 1132, a.; Suid. s. v.; Athen. iv. p. 184, a., xiv. p. 616, 617; Plin. H. N. vii. 56.) By a confusion between the mythical and the historical, the flute-player Olympus is made his son, or by some his father. He is spoken of as a follower of Cybele (Diod. i. c.), and he occupies, in fact, the same place in the orgiastic worship of Cybele that Seilenus does in the worship of Dionysus; Pausanias (l. c.) actually calls him Seilenus, and other writers connect him with Dionysus.

The story of Marsyas was often referred to by the lyric and epigrammatic poets (Bode, Gesch. d. Lyr. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 296, 297; Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 488, vol. ii. p. 97), and formed a favourite subject for works of art. (Müller, Archæol. d. Kunst, § 362, n. 4.) In the fons of ancient cities there was frequently placed a statue of Marsyas, with one hand erect, in token, according to Servius, of the freedom of the state, since Marsyas was a minister of Bacchus, the god of liberty. (Serv. in Aen. iv. 528.) It seems more likely that the statue, standing in the place where justice was administered, was intended to hold forth an example of the severe punishment of arrogant presumption. (Böttiger, Kleine Schriften, vol. i. p. 28.) The statue of Marsyas in the forum of Rome is well known by the allusions of Horace (Sat. i. 6. 120), Juvenal (Sat. ix. 1, 2), and Martial (ii. 64. 7). This statue was the place of assembly for the courtizans of Rome, who used to crown it with chaplets of flowers. (Plin. H. N. xxi. 3; Senec. de Benef. vi. 32; Lipsius, Antiq. Lect. 3.) [P. S.]

MA'RSYAS (Μαρσύας), general of the Alexandrians in their revolt against Ptolemy Physcon. He was taken prisoner by Hegelochus, the commander of the king's forces, and carried before Ptolemy, who, however, spared his life. (Diod. Ecc. Vales. p. 603.) [E. H. B.]

MA'RSYAS (Μαρσύας), literary. Three historical writers of this name are mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Μαρσύας), but there seems no doubt that this arises either from an error of Suidas himself or a corruption of his text, and that there were in fact only two. (See Bernhardt, ad Suid. l. c.; Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. p. 679.)

1. Son of Perander, a native of Pella, in Macedonia, was a contemporary of Alexander, with whom, according to Suidas, he was educated. The same author calls him a brother of Antigonus, who was afterwards king of Asia, by which an uterine brother alone can be meant, as the father of Antigonus was named Philip. Both these statements point to his being of noble birth, and appear strangely at variance with the assertion that he was a mere professional grammarian (γραμματοδιδάσκαλος), a statement which Geier conjectures plausibly enough to refer in fact to the younger Marsyas [No. 2]. Suidas, indeed, seems in many points to have confounded the two. The only other fact transmitted to us concerning the life of Marsyas, is that he was appointed by Demetrius to command one division of his fleet in the great sea-fight of Salamis, a. c. 306. (Diod. xx. 50.) But this circumstance is alone sufficient to show that he was a person who himself took an active part in public affairs, not a mere man of letters. It is probable that he followed the fortunes of his step-brother Antigonus.

His principal work was a history of Macedonia, in ten books, commencing from the earliest times, and coming down to the wars of Alexander in Asia, when it terminated abruptly with the return of that monarch into Syria, after the conquest of Egypt and the foundation of Alexandria. (Suid. l. c.) It is repeatedly cited by Athenæus, Plutarch, Harpocration, and other writers. Whether the τὰ περὶ Ἀλέξανδρον which are twice quoted by Harpocration (s. v. Ἀριστοίαν, Μαργίτης) formed merely a part of the same work, or were altogether distinct, is uncertain, but the former hypothesis seems the more probable. Some authors, however, assign these fragments to the younger Marsyas.

Suidas also speaks of a history of the education of Alexander (αὐτοῦ τοῦ Ἀλεξάνδρου ἀγωγὴν) as a separate work, and ascribes, moreover, to the elder Marsyas a treatise on the history or antiquities of Athens (Ἀττικὰ), in twelve books, which Bernhardt and Geier consider as being the same with the ἀρχαιολογία, the work of the younger historian of this name.

2. Of Philippi, commonly called the Younger (ὁ νεώτερος), to distinguish him from the preceding, with whom he has frequently been confounded. The period at which he flourished is uncertain: the earliest writers by whom he is cited are Pliny and Athenæus. The latter tells us that he was priest of Heracles. (Athen. xi. p. 467, c.) The works of his which we find cited are, 1. Μακεδονικά, whether a geographical or strictly historical treatise is uncertain; it contained at least six books. (Harpoc. s. v. Ἀττικὰ.) 2. Ἀρχαιολογία, in twelve books, mentioned by Suidas; probably, as suggested by Geier, the same with the Ἀττικὰ attributed by the lexicographer to the elder Marsyas. 3. Μυθικά, in seven books.

The two last works are erroneously attributed by Suidas; according to our existing text, to a third Marsyas, a native of Taba, but it has been satisfactorily shown that this supposed historian is no other than the mythical founder of the city of Taba (Steph. Byz. s. v. Τάβαι), and that the works ascribed to him belong in fact to Marsyas of Philippi.

All the questions concerning both the elder and the younger Marsyas are fully discussed, and the extant fragments of their works collected, by Geier, Alexandri M. Historiar. Scriptores aetate suppres., Lips. 1844, pp. 318—340. (See also Droysen, Hellenism. vol. i. pp. 679—682; Bernhardt, ad Suid. s. v. Μαρσίας.) [E. H. B.]

MA'RTIA and MA'RTIUS. [MARCIA; MARCIUS.]

MARTIA' LIS (Μαρτιάλιος), a physician and anatomist at Rome, who was born about the year 95 after Christ. Galen became personally acquainted with him during his first visit to Rome, about A. D. 165, and speaks of him as an envious and quarrelsome person. He was a follower or admirer of Erasistratus, and wrote some anatomical works, which were in great repute for some years after his death (Galen, De Libris Propriis, c. 1, vol. xix. p. 13). He is probably the same person as the physician named Marcianus, though it is not quite certain which name is correct. [W. A. G.]

MARTIA' LIS, CORNE' LIUS, was deprived of his rank as tribune, apparently in the praetorian guards, on the detection of Piso's conspiracy against Nero, in A. D. 66. He afterwards served in the army of Flavius Sabinus against the troops of Vitellius, and perished in the burning of the Capitol, A. D. 69. (Tac. Ann. xv. 71, Hist. iii. 70, 73.)

MARTIA' LIS, GARGI' LIUS, is quoted as an authority for the private life and habits of Alexander Severus (Lamprid. Alex. Sev. 37), with whom he seems to have been contemporary, and is classed by Vopiscus (Prob. 2) along with Marius Maximus, Suetonius Tranquillus, Julius Capitolinus and Aelius Lampridius, historians of the second class, who recorded the truth, but without eloquence or philosophy.

A short corrupt fragment on veterinary surgery, entitled "Curae Boum ex Corpore Gargilii Martialis," was transcribed under the inspection of Perizonius, at the request of Schoetgen, from a Leyden MS., and published by Gesner in his "Scriptores Rei Rusticae Veteres Latini" (2 vols. 4to. Lips. 1735), vol. ii. p. 1170, but it is impossible to determine whether the compiler of this tract, the antiquity of which has been doubted by critics, is the same person with the historian. The MS. from which it was printed was comparatively recent, but had been copied from one of more ancient date, which once belonged to the monastery of Corvey on the Weser. (See Gesner, Praef. p. xvii. and the dissertation of Schoetgen, p. xlii.)

In the Divine Lectures of Cassiodorus (c. 28) we read "De hortis scriptis pulcherrime Gargilius Martialis, qui et nutrimenta olerum et virtutes eorum diligenter exposuit." This work is frequently quoted by Palladius (e.g. iv. tit. 9. § 9), but not by any older writer, although Servius (ad Virg. Georg. iv. 147), speaks as if Virgil had discerned him from afar with prophetic eye. No portion of it was known to exist until Angelo Mai in 1826 discovered that a palimpsest in the royal library at Naples, which had originally belonged to the celebrated monastery of St. Columbanus at Bobbio, and which was known to contain the grammarian Charisius, fragments of Lucan, and some other pieces, all of which had been examined, contained also some chapters by a writer on rural affairs, treating of quinces (De Cydoniis), peaches (De Persicis), almonds (De Amygdalis), and chestnuts (De Castaneis). Upon closer investigation it was found by comparing these with the references in Palladius to Martialis, that they must actually be regarded as a portion of his essay De Hortis. The remains themselves, together with a full account of the Codex Rescriptus to which they belong, are included in the first volume of the Classici Auctores e Vaticanis Codicibus editi, 8vo. Rom. 1828. Nor was this all. Not long afterwards, the same scholar detected among the treasures of the Vatican, two MSS., one of the tenth, the other of the twelfth century, containing tracts upon medical subjects, in both of which was a section headed INCIPIT LIBER TERTIUS. DE POMIS MARTIALIS, on the sanatory properties of various fruits, and in this the details with regard to the virtues of quinces were found to correspond almost verbatim with the remarks in the Neapolitan MS., thus removing the last shade of doubt with regard to the author. Whether, however, Gargilius Martialis the historian, Gargilius Martialis the horticulturist, and Gargilius Martialis the veterinarian, are all, or any two of them, the same, or all different personages, must in the absence of satisfactory evidence be considered as still an open question. (Mai published the Vatican fragment in the third volume of the collection named above (Rom. 1831), and the whole three pieces were printed together in Germany, under the title "Gargilii Martialis Gargilii quae supersunt. Editio in Germania prima. Luneaburgi, 1832.") [W. R.]

MARTIA' LIS, JU' LIUS, an evocatus, who, from private pique, joined the conspiracy against Caracalla. Having seized a convenient opportunity, he stabbed the emperor while on a journey from Edessa to Carrhae, and was himself slain upon the spot by one of the Scythian guards. The senate testified warm gratitude to their deliverer, and proposed to honour his memory by paegeyral orations and by statues. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 5, 18, comp. 8.) [W. R.]

MARTIA' LIS, M. VALE' RIUS, the epigrammatist. Whatever information we possess regarding the personal history of this writer is derived almost exclusively from his works; for although he often boasts of his own far-spread popularity, and although Aelius Verus was wont to term him "his Virgil," he is not spoken of by any contemporary author except the younger Pliny, nor by any of those who followed after him, except Suetonius, Lampridius, and perhaps Sidonius Apollinarius, until we reach the period of the grammarians, by whom he is frequently quoted. By collecting and comparing the incidental notices scattered through his pages, we are enabled to determine that he was a native of Bilbilis in Spain, that he was born upon the first of March, in the third year of Claudius, A. D. 43, that he came to Rome in the thirteenth year of Nero, A. D. 66, that after residing in the metropolis for a space of thirty-six years, he again repaired to the place of his birth in the third year of Trajan, A. D. 100, and lived there for upwards of three years at least, on the property of his wife, a lady named Marcia, whom he seems to have married after his return to the banks of the Selo, and to whose graces and mental charms he pays a warm tribute. His death, which cannot have taken place before A. D. 104, is mentioned by the younger Pliny, but we are unable to fix the date of the epistle (iii. 20, al. 21) in which the event is recorded. His fame was extended and his books were eagerly sought for, and only in the city, but also in Gaul, Germany, Britain, Getica, and the wild region of the north; he secured the special patronage of the emperors Titus and Domitian, obtained by his influence the freedom of the state for several of his friends, and received for himself, although apparently without family if not unmarried, the highly-valued privileges accorded to those who were the fathers of three children (ius trium liberorum), together with the rank of tribunus and the rights of the equestrian order, distinctions which in his case were probably merely honorary, not implying the discharge of any particular duties, nor the possession of any considerable fortune. His circumstances, however, must have been at one time easy; for he had a mansion in the city whose situation he describes, and a suburban villa near Nomentum, to which he frequently alludes with pride. It is true that Pliny, in the letter to which we have referred above, states that he made Martial a pecuniary present to assist in defraying the expenses of his journey (prosecutus eram viatico accedentem), but when he adds that the gift was presented as an acknowledgment for a complimentary address, he gives no hint that the poverty of the bard was such as to render this aid an act of charity. The assertion that the father of Martial was named Frono and his mother Flaccilla, rests upon a mistaken interpretation of the epigram v. 34; and another curious delusion at one time prevailed with regard to the name of Martial himself. In the biography of Alexander Severus (c. 38) we find the twenty-ninth epigram of the fifth book quoted as "Martialis Cocci Epigramma," and hence Joannes of Salisbury (Curial. Nugar. vii. 12, viii. 6, 13), Jacobus Magnus of Toledo (Sopholog. passim), and Vincentius of Beauvais (Specul. Doctr. iii. 37), suppose Coccus to have been a cognomen of the poet, and designate him by that appellation. The numerous exceptions which everywhere abound in the text of the Augustan historians, and the fact that the word in question is altogether omitted in several MSS. and early editions, while we find etiam substituted for it in two of the Palatine codices, justify us in concluding either that cocci was foisted in by the carelessness of a transcriber, or that the true reading is cocci, i. e. quoque, which will remove every difficulty.

The extant works of Martial consist of an assemblage of short poems, all included under the general appellation Epigrammata, upwards of 1500 in number, divided into fourteen books. Those which form the two last books, usually distinguished respectively as Xenia and Apophoreta, amounting to 350, consist, with the exception of the introductions, entirely of distichs, descriptive of a vast variety of small objects, chiefly articles of food or clothing, such as were usually sent as presents among friends during the Saturnalia, and on other festive occasions. In addition to the above, nearly all the printed copies include 33 epigrams, forming a book apart from the rest, which, ever since the time of Gruter, has been commonly known as Liber de Spectaculis, because the contents relate entirely to the shows exhibited by Titus and Domitian, but there is no ancient authority for the title, and hence the most recent editor restores the proper and simple form Liber Epigrammatum. The "De Spectaculis" is altogether wanting in most of the best MSS., and of those which embrace it two only, both derived from the same archetype, are older than the fifteenth century; but the most judicious critics are of opinion that the greater number of the pieces are genuine, although it is not unlikely that spurious matter may have found its way both into this and the other books, for we find a remonstrance (x. 100) addressed to an unscrupulous pretender, who was attempting to palm his own progeny on the public under the cover of Martial's reputation.

Considerable praise is due to the industry displayed by Loyd and Dodwell in adjusting the chronology of Martial, but the recent labours of Clinton are much more satisfactory. It is clear from the introductory dedication and notices in prose and verse, that the different books were collected and published by the author, sometimes singly and sometimes several at one time. The "Liber de Spectaculis" and the first nine books of the regular series involve a great number of historical allusions, extending from the games of Titus (A. D. 80) down to the return of Domitian from the Sarmatian expedition, in January, A. D. 94. The second book could not have been written until after the commencement of the Dacian war (ii. 2), that is, not before A. D. 86, nor the sixth until after the triumph over the Dacians and Germans (A. D. 91); the seventh was written while the Sarmatian war, which began in A. D. 93, was still in progress, and reaches to the end of that year. The eighth book opens in January, A. D. 94, the ninth also refers to the same epoch, but may, as Clinton supposes, have been written in A. D. 95. The whole of these were composed at Rome, except the third, which was written during a tour in Gallia Togata. The tenth book was published twice: the first edition was given hastily to the world; the second, that which we now read (x. 2), celebrates the arrival of Trajan at Rome, after his accession to the throne (x. 6, 7, 34, 72). Now, since this event took place A. D. 99, and since the twenty-fourth epigram of this book was written in honour of the author's fifty-seventh birthday, we are thus supplied with the data requisite for fixing the epoch of his birth; and since at the close of the book (x. 104) he had been thirty-four years at Rome, we can then calculate the time when he left Spain. The eleventh book seems to have been published at Rome, early in A. D. 100, and at the close of the year he returned to Bilbilis. After keeping silence for three years (xii. proem.), the twelfth book was despatched from Bilbilis to Rome (xii. 3, 18), and in this he refers (xii. 5) to the two preceding books, published, as we have seen, in A. D. 99 and 100. Allowing, therefore, for the interval of repose, the twelfth book must be assigned to A. D. 104. It must be observed, however, that if the Parthenius, to whom book xi. is dedicated, and who is again addressed in book xii. (ep. 11), be the "Palatinus Parthenius," the chamberlain of Domitian (iv. 45, v. 6, viii. 28; comp. Sueton. Domit. 16), and if the statement of Victor (Epit. 12), that this Parthenius was cruelly murdered by the soldiery (A. D. 97) soon after the elevation of Nerva, can be depended upon, it is evident that some pieces belonging to earlier years were included in the later books. It is not necessary, however, to hold with Clinton, that Ep. xi. 4 is in honour of the third consulship of Nerva (A. D. 97), since the words and the name Nerva are equally applicable to the third consulship of Trajan (A. D. 100). Books xiii. and xiv., the Xenia and Apopho- rets, were written chiefly under Domitian (xiii. 4. 14, xiv. 1. 179, 213), although the composition may have been spread over the holidays of many years.

It is well known that the word Epigram, which originally denoted simply an inscription, was, in process of time, applied to any brief metrical effusion, whatever the subject might be, or whatever the form under which it was presented, and in this sense the heterogeneous mass which constitutes the Greek anthology, and all the lighter effusions of Catullus, are called epigrams. In many of these, it is true, the sentiments are pithily worded, and a certain degree of emphasis is reserved for the conclusion; but Martial first placed the epigram upon the narrow basis which it now occupies, and from his time the term has been in a great measure restricted to denote a short poem, in which all the thoughts and expressions converge to one sharp point, which forms the termination of the piece. It is impossible not to be amazed by the singular fertility of imagination, the prodigious flow of wit, and the delicate felicity of language everywhere developed in this extraordinary collection, and from no source do we derive more copious information on the national customs and social habits of the Romans during the first century of the empire. But however much we may admire the genius of the author, we feel no respect for the character of the man. The inconceivable servility of adulation (e. g. ix. 4, v. 8) with which he loads Domitian, proves that he was a courtier of the lowest class, and his name is crushed by a load of cold-blooded filth spread ostentatiously over the whole surface of his writings, too clearly denoting habitual impurity of thought, combined with habitual impurity of expression.

Three very early impressions of Martial have been described by bibliographers, all of them in 4to., all in Roman characters, and all without date and without name of place or of printer. One of these, by many considered as the Editio Princeps, is supposed by Dibdin (Bibl. Spencer. vol. iv. p. 532) to have been the work of Ulric Han. The first edition which bears a date, and which contests the honour of being the Princeps, is that which appeared at Ferraria, 4to. 1471 (Dibdin, Bibl. Spencer. vol. ii. p. 169), and which does not contain the "Liber de Spectaculis." It was followed by the edition of Vindelin de Spira, 4to. Venet., without date, but probably executed about 1472; by that of Sweynheym and Pannartz, fol. Rom. 1473; that of Joannes de Colonia, fol. Venet. 1475; and that of Philippus de Lavanio, fol. Mediol. 1478, the two last being merely reprints from Spira. The text, which was gradually improved by the diligence of Calderinus, fol. Venet. 1474, 1475, 1480, &c., of Aldus, 8vo. Venet. 1501, and Junius, 8vo. Basil. 1559, first assumed a satisfactory form in the hands of Gruterus, 16mo. Francf. 1602, who boasted, not without reason, that he had introduced more than a thousand corrections, and was still further purified by Scriverius, Lug. Bat. 12mo. 1619, Amst. 12mo. 1621, 16mo. 1629, and by Raderus, fol. Mogunt. 1627, Colon. 1628. Schrevelius, in the 8vo Variorum of 1670, exhibited very judiciously the results of the toils of his predecessors, and no important improvements were made from that time until 1842, when Schneidewinn published a new recension (8vo. 2 vols. Grem 1842) founded upon a most careful examination of a very large number of MSS. His prolegomena contain a full and highly valuable account of these and other codices, of the places where they are at present deposited, and of their relative value. No ancient author stands more in need of an ample and learned commentary, but none has yet appeared which will satisfy all the wants of the student. The most useful, upon the whole, is that which is attached to the edition of Lemaire, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1825, but Schneidewinn has promised to publish the notes of Fr. Schmieder, the preceptor of C. O. Müller, of which he speaks in high praise, and expresses a hope that he may be able to add the remarks compiled by Böttiger, which passed after his death into the hands of Weichert.

A great number of translations from Martial will be found dispersed in the works of the English poets, and numerous selections have been given to the world from time to time, such as those by Thomas May, 8vo. Lond. 1629; by Fletcher, 8vo. Lond. 1656; by J. Hughes, in his Miscellanies, 8vo. Lond. 1737; by W. Hay, 12mo. Lond. 1754; by Wright, along with the disticha of Catu, 12mo. Lond. 1763; by Rogers, in his poems, 12mo. Lond. 1782; and finally a complete version of the whole by Elphinstone, 4to. Lond. 1782, a singular monument of dullness and folly. In French we have complete translations into verse, by Marles, 4to. Paris, 1675, a translation into prose having been published previously (1655) by the same author; by Volland, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1807; and by E. T. Simon, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1819. Julius Scaliger rendered a considerable number of the epigrams into Greek, and these translations will be found placed under the original text in the edition of Lemaire. (Plin. Ep. iii. 20. al. 21; Spartian. Ael. Ver. 2; Lamprid. Alex. Sev. 38; Sidon. Apoll. Carm. ix. 33; Martial. i. 1, 2, 3, 62, 101, 117, ii. 92, iii. 95, iv. 10, 72, v. 13, 16, 24, vi. 43, 61, 64, 82, vii. 11, 17, 51, 83, 93, viii. 3, 61, ix. 84, 98, x. 24, 92, 94, 100, 103, 104, xi. 3, 24, xii. 21, 31, xiii. 3, 119. An account of the celebrated MS. of Martial preserved in the Advocates' Library, Edinburgh, will be found in Dalzell, "Some account of an ancient MS. of Martial," &c. 8vo. Edin. 1812.) [W. R.]

MARTIANUS. [MARCINUS.]

MARTINA, a woman in Syria, celebrated for her skill in poisoning, and a favourite of Plautus, the wife of Cn. Piso, was sent to Italy by Cn. Sentius, the governor of Syria, that she might be brought to trial, but she died suddenly upon her arrival at Brundisium, A. D. 20. (Tac. Ann. ii. 74, iii. 7.)

MARTINA. [HERACLIUS, p. 405, b.]

MARTINIANUS, magister officiorum to the emperor Licinius, by whom he was elevated to the dignity of Caesar, when active preparations were in progress for the last great struggle against Constantine. Martinianus was compelled to surrender himself to the conqueror, along with his patron, whose fate he shared towards the end of A. D. 323. A rare coin in third brass is found in some collections bearing the legend D. N. MARTINIANUS P. F. AVG., which would indicate that he was created Augustus; and this conclusion might be drawn from the words of Victor. (De Cæs. 41.) [Compare VALENTIA, AURELIUS VALERIUS.] (Excerpta Vales. 25, 28, 29; Victor, de Cæs. 41, Epit. 41; Zosim. ii. 25, 26, 28.) [W. R.]

MARTINUS, bishop of Tours, hence designated Taromensis, was born in Pannonia, about the year 316, was educated at Pavia, and in the early part of his life served as a soldier, first under Constantine, afterwards under Julian. While yet in the army he embraced the true faith; and after he had obtained his discharge, attached himself closely to Hilarius of Poitiers, by whose advice he returned to his native country, for the purpose of converting his kindred. During the sway of Constantine he was exposed to bitter persecution from the Arians, whose doctrines he steadfastly assailed; but after this storm had in some measure passed away from the church, he returned to Gaul; and about 360 again sought the society of Hilarius, and founded a monastery. From thence he was reluctantly dragged in 371, to occupy the see of Tours, and speedily attained such celebrity on account of his sanctity and power of working miracles, that, to avoid the multitudes attracted by his fame, he sought refuge in a neighbouring monastery; and over this he presided until his death, which took place in his eightieth year, towards the very close of the fourth century. We possess a life of the saint written by Sulpicius Severus, filled with the most puerile fables, from which we gather that he was a man totally devoid of mental culture, whose wild fanaticism and austerities seriously affected his reason; and that, although an object of awe and reverence to the crowd, sober-minded persons considered his sordid apparel, dishevelled hair, and beggarly aspect, as unbecoming in a Christian dignitary. Under the name of Martinus we possess a very short Confessio Fidei de Sancta Trinitate the authenticity of which is doubtful. It will be found in almost all the large collections of fathers and councils, and under its best form in Galland, vol. vii. p. 599; Proleg. c. xviii. p. xxvi. (Schönmann, Biblioth. Patr. Lat. vol. i. § 19.) [W. R.]

MARULLUS, C. EPI'DIUS, tribune of the plebs, A. C. 44, removed, in conjunction with his colleague L. Caesetius Flavius, the diadem which had been placed upon the statue of C. Julius Caesar, and attempted to bring to trial the persons who had saluted the dictator as king. Caesar, in consequence, deprived him of the tribunate, by help of the tribune Helvius Cinna, and expelled him from the senate. (Dion Cass. xlv. 9, 10; Appian, B. C. ii. 108, 122; Plut. Cæs. 61; Vell. Pat. ii. 68; Suet. Cæs. 79, 80; Cic. Philipp. xiii. 15.)

MARULLUS, JU'NIUS, mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xiv. 48), as consul designatus in A. D. 62, must have been one of the consules suffecti in that year, though his name does not occur in the Fasti. (Pighius, Annal. vol. iii. p. 595.)

MASCAMES (Masakmays), a Persian, son of Megastotes or Megalostes, was made by Xerxes governor of Doriscus in Thrace, which he kept with great vigour and fidelity, defying all the efforts of the Greeks, after the failure of the Persian expedition, to expel him. Xerxes honoured him with annual presents, as a reward for his faithful service,—a mark of approbation which Artaxerxes continued to his descendants. (Herod. vii. 105, 106.) [E. E.]

MASCEZEL [GILDO.]

MA'SGABA, a Numidian, son of Masinissa, was sent to Rome by his father as ambassador in A. C. 168. He was received with the utmost distinction, one of the quaestors being sent to meet him at Puteoli, and attend him from thence to Rome. (Liv. xlv. 13, 14.) [E. H. B.]

MASINISSA (Mascardoons), king of the Numidians, celebrated for the conspicuous part he bore in the wars between the Romans and Carthaginians. He was the son of Gala, king of the Massylians, the easternmost of the two great tribes into which the Numidians were at that time divided, but was brought up at Carthage, where he appears to have received an education superior to that usual among his countrymen. (Liv. xxiv. 49; Appian, Pun. 10, 37.) He was still quite a young man*, but had already given proofs of great ability and energy of character, when in B. C. 213 the Carthaginians persuaded Gala to declare war against Syphax, king of the neighbouring tribe of the Massaeisylans, who had lately entered into an alliance with Rome. Masinissa was appointed by his father to command the invading force, with which he attacked and totally defeated Syphax, whom he drove to take refuge in Mauritania, and following him thither carried on the war with unabated vigour, so as effectually to prevent him from crossing into Spain to the assistance of the Romans in that country. (Liv. xxiv. 49.) Of the farther progress of this war in Africa we hear nothing; but the next year (B. C. 212) we find Masinissa in Spain, supporting the Carthaginian generals there with a large body of Numidian horse; and it appears probable that, though only occasionally mentioned, he continued to hold the same post during the subsequent years of the war in that country. In 210, indeed, he is mentioned as being at Carthage, but apparently only for the purpose of obtaining reinforcements for the army in Spain, in which country we again find him in the following year (209), at the time that Hasdrubal set out on his march into Italy. In 206 he is mentioned as present at Silipta, where he shared with Hasdrubal, Gisco, and Mago in their total defeat by Scipio. (Liv. xxv. 34, xxvii. 5, 20, xxviii. 13; Polyb. xi. 21; Appian, Hisp. 25, 27.) But the reverse then sustained by the Carthaginian arms proved too much for the fidelity of Masinissa: shortly after the battle he made secret overtures to Silanus, the lieutenant of Scipio, which, however, led to no immediate result, the Numidian chief being desirous to treat with Scipio in person, an opportunity for which did not for some time present itself. At length, however, the desired interview took place, and Masinissa pledged himself to support the Romans with all the forces at his command as soon as they should carry an army into Africa. (Liv. xxviii. 16, 35.) In addition to the effect produced by the success of the Roman arms, and the great personal influence of Scipio—an influence increased in this case by his generous conduct towards Massiva, a nephew of Masinissa [MASSIVA]—the Numidian prince is said to have been actuated by resentment against Hasdrubal, who had previously betrothed to him his beautiful daughter Sophonisba, but violated his engagement, in order to bestow her hand upon Syphax. (Appian, Pun. 10; Zonar. ix. 11, p. 436.) The chronology of these events is, however, very uncertain: according to Livy, it was not till some time after this that the betrothal of Sophonisba took place. (Liv. xxix. 23.) But the defection of Masinissa still remained a secret; meanwhile, he rejoined Mago at Gades for a time, and then crossed over into Africa, where events had taken place which drew all his attention to his paternal dominions.

* Livy indeed states (xxiv. 49) that he was at this time only seventeen years old; but this is inconsistent with the statement of Polybius (xxxvii. 3), which is followed by Livy himself in another passage (Epit. l.), that Masinissa was ninety years old at the time of his death, B. C. 148. According to this account, he would be at this time about twenty-five years of age.

On the death of his father Gala, which had occurred during the time that he was in Spain, the crown had devolved, according, it is said, to the Numidian custom, on Oesalcea, brother of the late king, and from him descended shortly after to his son Capusa. But the latter being a man of a feeble character, had been overthrown by Mezotulus, who assumed the virtual sovereignty in the name of Lacumaces, the younger brother of Capusa. Against this usurper Masinissa determined to direct his arms, and after having in vain endeavoured to obtain the support of Bocchar, king of Mauritania, he entered the confines of Numidia with a body of only 500 horsemen. But, trifling as this force might appear, he was able to strike a blow in the first instance which had nearly proved decisive—the young king Lacumaces having narrowly escaped falling into his hands while travelling with a small escort to the court of Syphax. The old soldiers and adherents of his father now flocked to the standard of Masinissa, who soon found himself at the head of a respectable army, with which he was able to meet Mezotulus in the field, and having defeated him in a pitched battle, compelled both him and the young king to take refuge in the territories of Syphax. From thence they were induced by the friendly promises of Masinissa to return and take up their abode at his court, in an honourable though private station. (Liv. xxix. 29, 30.) Masinissa now found himself established on his father's throne; but he was aware that a more formidable danger threatened him on the side of Syphax, who, besides the enmity he naturally entertained against his former foe, was urged on by Hasdrubal, who appears to have been conscious that he had offended Masinissa beyond the possibility of forgiveness, and was anxious to crush him before he could receive assistance from Rome. The first attacks of Syphax were completely successful: Masinissa, totally defeated in the first action, fled with a few horsemen to a mountain fastness, from whence he made predatory inroads into the territories both of Syphax and the Carthaginians. Here his followers soon increased both in numbers and boldness, until Syphax, who had at first despised them, found it necessary to send against him one of his generals named Bocchar, whose measures were so efficiently taken that he succeeded in cutting off the whole of Masinissa's force, the king himself escaping from the field with only two followers, and badly wounded. He lay concealed in a cave for some time, but as soon as his wound was partially healed he once more re-appeared among the Masnylians, and quickly gathered around his standard an army of 10,000 men. Syphax now took the field against him in person, and again obtained a decisive victory, Masinissa, with a small body of horsemen, with difficulty cutting his way through the enemy's forces. He, however, effected his escape to the sea-coast, and there hovered about, at the head of a mere predatory band, until the landing of Scipio in Africa B.C. 204, when he instantly joined him with such a force as he had been able to collect. (Liv. xxix. 31—33; Appian, Pun. 10—13.)

The services he was now able to render his Roman allies were neither few nor trifling. Almost immediately after he had joined them he defeated the Carthaginian cavalry under Hanno, the son of Hamilcar [HANNQ, No. 23], and bore an important part in the night attack which ended in the co-flagration of the two camps of Hasdrubal and Syphax. On this occasion, indeed, his intimate acquaintance with the habits of the enemy, and his intelligence of their plans, appear to have been of the most essential service to Scipio. The confidence reposed in the Numidian chief both by that general and Laelius is the strongest testimony to his character as a warrior, as well as to their opinion of his fidelity, a much rarer quality among his countrymen. After the second defeat of the combined forces of Syphax and Hasdrubal, an event in which Masinissa had again taken a prominent part, he was despatched, together with Laelius, to pursue the fugitives: they recovered without opposition the whole country of the Masnylians, and though Syphax with indefatigable energy opposed to them a third army, he was not only again defeated, but himself made prisoner. Following up their advantage, they quickly reduced Cirta, the capital of Syphax, and the stronghold where he had deposited all his treasures. Among the captives that fell into their hands on this occasion was Sophonisba, the wife of the Numidian king, and the same who had been formerly promised in marriage to Masinissa himself. The story of his hasty marriage with her, and its tragical termination, is too well known to require to be here repeated. [SOPHONISBA.] To console him for his loss, as well as to reward him for his obedience, Scipio now bestowed on Masinissa the title and insignia of royalty, and the possession of his hereditary dominions, holding out to him the prospect of eventually obtaining those of his rival also; and these honours were immediately ratified by the senate at Rome. (Liv. xxix. 34, xxx. 3—9, 11—17; Polyb. xiv. 3, 4, 8, 9; Appian, Pun. 14—22, 26—28; Zonar. ix. 12, 13.)

On the commencement of the negotiations for peace between Scipio and the Carthaginians (B.C. 203), Masinissa quitted the Roman camp to establish himself in the possession of his newly-acquired dominions. But the rupture of the treaty, and the landing of Hannibal in Africa, caused Scipio again to summon him in all haste to his assistance. Hannibal it is said made an attempt to detach him from the alliance of the Romans, but without effect, and he joined Scipio, with a force of 6000 foot and 4000 horse, just before the battle of Zama (B.C. 202). In that decisive action he commanded the cavalry of the right wing, and contributed in no small degree to the successful result of the day. After routing the Numidian horse which Hannibal had opposed to him, and pursuing them for a considerable distance, he returned to the field in time to co-operate with Laelius in the decisive charge that finally broke the main body of the Carthaginian infantry. He was now foremost in the pursuit, and pressed so closely with his Numidian horsemen upon the fugitives, that it is said Hannibal himself with difficulty escaped falling into his hands. (Polyb. ix. 4, 5, 9, 12–15; Liv. xxx. 29, 33–35; Appian, Pun. 37, 41, 44–47.) His zealous co-operation on this occasion was rewarded the following year (B.C. 201), on the conclusion of the final peace between Rome and Carthage, when he was not only included in the protection of the treaty as an ally of the former, but obtained from Scipio the possession of Cirta and the greater part of the territories which had belonged to Syphax, in addition to his hereditary dominions. (Polyb. ix. 18; Liv. xxx. 44.)

From this time till the commencement of the third Punic war there elapsed an interval of more than fifty years, during the whole of which period Masinissa continued to reign with undisputed authority over the countries thus subjected to his rule. Ample as those dominions were, he appears to have already cast a longing eye upon the fertile provinces still retained by his neighbours the Carthaginians: the certainty of support from the Romans encouraged his covetousness, and the history of this whole period presents nothing but a continued series of aggressions on the part of Masinissa, ineffectual remonstrances on that of the Carthaginians, and embassies repeatedly sent from Rome to adjust their disputes, and nominally to enforce the observance of the treaty and regulations imposed by Scipio; but these deputies had always secret instructions to favour the cause of the Numidian king, and where the injustice of his pretensions were too flagrant, they in several instances aided Africa without coming to any decision at all. The great object of dispute was the fertile district called Emporia, which Masinissa at length succeeded to occupy with an armed force, but this exceeded the limits of even the Roman indulgence, and he was this time compelled to withdraw his troops. (Liv. xxxiv. 62, xl. 17, 34, xlii. 23, 24; Appian, Pun. 67–69; Polyb. xxii. 2.) But while thus presuming on the favour of his powerful allies, he was careful to secure a continuance of their support by renewed services; and we find him assisting them with an auxiliary force of Numidian horse and elephants, as well as with large supplies of corn in their wars with Philip, Antiochus, and Perseus. In the last of these, especially the Numidian auxiliaries, which were commanded by Misagenes, a son of Masinissa, rendered the most important services. (Liv. xxxi. 19, xxiii. 27, xxxvi. 4, xlii. 29, 35, xlv. 13; Eutrop. iv. 6; Appian, Mac. 9. § 2.)

Meanwhile, Masinissa did not neglect to maintain a party favourable to his views in Carthage itself. But the reviving prosperity and power of that republic appears to have given increased incentive to the party opposed to the Romans and their ally, and at length, in B.C. 150, the principal citizens of Masinissa were driven into exile by a democratic faction. Hereupon the Numidian king at once prepared for war; but before taking any open steps he sent an embassy to Carthage, at the head of which were his two sons, Gulussa and Micipsa, to demand the restoration of the exiles. But the adverse party at Carthage, at the head of which was Hasdrubal, the general (boëtharch) of the republic, refused to admit the ambassadors within the gates of the city, and even attacked them on their return, and slew some of their followers. Hereupon Masinissa invaded the Carthaginian territory, and laid siege to the city of Oroscapa. Hasdrubal immediately took the field against him with a considerable army, which was soon swelled by the desertion of some of the Numidian chiefs, and by other reinforcements, to the amount of 58,000 men. The first general engagement, though favourable to the Numidians, led to no decisive result; and Scipio Aemilianus, who had accidentally arrived at the camp of Masinissa, interposed his good offices to bring about a reconciliation between the two parties. These, however, proved of no effect, Masinissa insisting on the surrender of the Numidian deserters, to which the Carthaginians peremptorily refused to accede. Hostilities were consequently renewed, and Masinissa so effectually surrounded the army of Hasdrubal, in a position where he was cut off from all supplies, that after the greater part of his troops had perished by famine and pestilence, he was compelled to save the rest by an ignominious capitulation. Even this was shamefully violated, and many of the Carthaginians were put to the sword while retreating unarmed and defenceless, so that a very small part of their army returned in safety to Carthage. (Appian, Pun. 70–73.)

This blow had effectually humbled the reviving power of Carthage, and the Romans now determined to seize the opportunity of crushing for ever their once formidable rival. The negotiations which ensued, and which ultimately led to the commencement of the third Punic war (B.C. 149), cannot be here related. The part which Masinissa took in them is not distinctly mentioned, but it is clear that he was by no means satisfied that the Romans should take the matter into their own hands; and however much he might wish to see his old enemies the Carthaginians humbled, was far from desiring to see the Romans established in Africa in their stead. Hence when hostilities had actually commenced, and the Romans called on him for assistance, he hesitated, and delayed to send the required auxiliaries. The following year (B.C. 148) the reverses sustained by the Roman armies compelled the senate to send a fresh embassy to Masinissa, with a more urgent demand for reinforcements, but before the ambassadors arrived at Cirta the aged monarch was no more. (Appian, Pun. 94, 105.) On his deathbed he had sent for Scipio, at that time serving in Africa as a military tribune, but expired before his arrival, leaving it to the young officer to settle the affairs of his kingdom. He died at the advanced age of ninety, having retained in an extraordinary degree his bodily strength and activity to the last, so that in the war against Hasdrubal, only two years before, he not only commanded his army in person, but was able to go through all his military exercises with the agility and vigour of a young man. (Polyb. xxxvii. 3; Appian, Pun. 71, 106; Liv. Epit. 1; Eutrop. iv. 11; Val. Max. viii. 13, ext. § 1; Cic. de Sen. 10; Frontin. Strat. iv. 3. § 11; Lucian. Macrob. 17; Diod. Exa. Phot. p. 523; Plut. Moral. p. 791, f.) His character in other respects has been extolled by the Roman writers far beyond his true merits. He possessed indeed unconquerable energy and fortitude, with the promptness of decision and fertility of resource exhibited by so many semi-barbarian chiefs; but though his Carthaginian education seems to have given him a degree of polish beyond that of his countrymen in general, his character was still that of a true barbarian. He was faithless to the Carthaginians as soon as fortune began to turn against them; and though he afterwards continued steady to the cause of the Romans, it was because he found it uniformly his interest to do so. His attachment to them was never tried, like that of Ilieron, by adversity; and the moment he began to think their farther progress inconsistent with his own schemes his fidelity began to waver. A very just view of his character will be found in Niebuhr (Lect. on Rom. Hist. vol. i. pp. 216, 217, 291—292.)

Masinissa was the father of a very numerous family; some authors even state that he had as many as fifty-four sons, the youngest of whom was born only four years before his death. Many of these, however, were the offspring of concubines, and not considered legitimate according to the Numidian laws. It appears that three only of his legitimate sons survived him, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Gulussa. Between these three the kingdom, or rather the royal authority, was portioned out by Scipio, according to the dying directions of the old king. (Appian, Pun. 105; Zonar. ix. 27; Liv. Epit. l.; Oros. iv. 22; Sall. Jug. 5; Val. Max. v. 2, ext. 4.) Besides these the names of MASGABA and MISAGENES are mentioned in history, and are given under their respective names. [E. H. B.]

MASISTIOS or MACISTIOS (Μακίστιος, Μακίστιος), a Persian, of fine and commanding presence, was leader of the cavalry in the army which Xerxes left behind in Greece under MARDONIUS. When the Persian force, having entered Boeotia, was drawn up on the right bank of the Asopus, with the Greeks opposite them along the skirts of Cithaeron, Mardonius, having waited impatiently and to no purpose for the enemy to descend and fight him in the plain, sent Masistius and the cavalry against them. In the combat which ensued, the horse of Masistius, being wounded in the side with an arrow, reared and threw him. The Athenians rushed upon him immediately, but he was cased in complete armour, which for a time protected him, till at last he was slain by the thrust of a spear in his eye through the visor of his helmet. The Persians tried desperately, but in vain, to rescue his body, which was afterwards placed in a cart and led along the Grecian lines, while the men gazed on it with admiration. His countrymen mourned for him as the most illustrious man in the army next to Mardonius. They shaved their own heads, as well as their horses and their beasts of burden, and they raised a wailing, which, according to Herodotus, was heard over the whole of Boeotia. (Herod. ix. 20—25; Plut. Arist. 14.) This Masistius seems to have been a different person from the son of Siromitres, who commanded the Alarodians and Suspeirians in the army of Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 79.) The breastplate of Masistius was dedicated, as a trophy, in the temple of Athena Polias at Athens. (Paus. i. 27.) [E. E.]

MASO, sometimes written MASSO, the name of a patrician family of the Papiria gens.

1. L. PAPIRIUS MASO, apparently the first person of this name who obtained any of the offices of the state, was aedile about B.C. 312. From Cicero calling him aediliculus, we learn that he did not obtain any higher dignity. (Cic. ad Fam. ix. 21; comp. Pighius, Ara. vol. i. p. 363.)

2. C. PAPIRIUS, C. F. L. N. MASO, consul with M. Pomponius Matho in B.C. 231, carried on war against the Corsicans, whom he subdued, though not without considerable loss. The senate refused him a triumph, and he accordingly celebrated one on the Alban mount. It was the first time that this was ever done, and the example thus set was frequently followed by subsequent generals, when they considered themselves entitled to a triumph, but were refused the honour by the senate. It is related of Maso, that he always wore a myrtle crown instead of a laurel one, when he was present at the games of the Circus; and Paulus Diaconus gives as the reason for his doing so, that he conquered the Corsicans in the "Myrtle Plains." Myrti Caespi. (Zonar. viii. 18. p. 401; Fasti Capitol.; Plin. H. N. xv. 29. a. 38; Val. Max. iii. 6. § 5; Paul. Diac. p. 144, ed. Müller.) From the booty obtained in Corsica, Maso dedicated a temple of Fona. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 20.) He was one of the pontifices, and died in B.C. 213. (Liv. xxv. 2.) Maso was the maternal grandfather of Scipio Africanus the younger, his daughter Papiria marrying Aemilius Paullus, the conqueror of Macedonia. (Plut. Aemil. Paul. 6; Plin. l. c.)

3. C. PAPIRIUS MASO, was, according to some annals, one of the triumviri for founding the colonies of Placentia and Cremona, in Cisalpine Gaul, in B.C. 218. (Liv. xxi. 25.) Asconius (in Cic. Pis. p. 3, ed. Orell.) calls him P. Papirius Maso. He may be the same as the consul [No. 2] or the decemvir sacrorum mentioned below. [No. 4.]

4. C. PAPIRIUS, L. F. MASO, one of the decemviri sacrorum, died in B.C. 213. (Liv. xxv. 2.)

5. L. PAPIRIUS MASO, praetor urbanus B.C. 176. (Liv. xii. 14, 15.) He may have been the L. Papirius, praetor, who is said to have decided, in consequence of the uncertainty of the time of a woman's gestation, that a child born within thirteen months after copulation could be the son. (Plin. H. N. vii. 5. a. 4.)

6. M. PAPIRIUS MASO, disinherited his brother (frater), Aelius Ligur, tribune of the plebs B.C. 57. (Cic. pro Dom. 19, ad Att. v. 4.) This M. Papirius Maso may be the same as the M. Papirius, a Roman knight and a friend of Pompey, who was slain by P. Clodius on the Appian Way. (Cic. pro Mil. 7; Ascon. in Cic. Mil. p. 48; Schol. Bith. pro Mil. p. 284, ed. Orelli.)

7. C. (PAPIRIUS) MASO, was accused of perjurandae by T. Coponius, of Tibur, and condemned. [COFONIUS, No. 1.] (Cic. pro Balb. 21.)

MASSA, BAEBIUS, or BEBIUS, one of the most infamous informers of the latter end of the reign of Domitian, is first mentioned in A.D. 78, as one of the procurators in Africa, when he betrayed Piso, and is described by the great historian as "jam tunc optimo cuique exitium." (Tac. Hist. iv. 50.) He was afterwards governor of the province of Baetica, which he oppressed unmercifully, that he was accused by the inhabitants on his return to Rome. The cause of the provincials was pleaded by Pliny the younger and Herennius Senecio, and Massa was condemned in the same year that Agricola died, A.D. 93; but he seems to have escaped punishment by the favour of Domitian; and from this time became one of the informers and great favourites of the tyrant. (Tac. Agrie. 45; Plin. Ep. vii. 33, comp. iii. 4, vi. 29; Jur. i. 34.)

MASSATHES, a Numidian chief in alliance with the Carthaginians, killed by Masinissa at the battle of Zama. (Appian, Pun. 44.) [E. H. B.]

MASSI'VA. 1. A Numidian, grandson of Gala, king of the Massylians, and nephew of Masinissa, whom he accompanied while yet a mere boy into Spain. At the battle of Baecula (a. c. 209), on which occasion he had for the first time been allowed to bear arms, he was taken prisoner; but Scipio, on learning who he was, treated him with the utmost distinction, and sent him back without ransom to his uncle. This generous conduct of the Roman general is said to have had a great share in gaining over Masinissa to the Roman alliance. (Liv. xxvii. 19, xxviii. 35; Val. Max. v. 1. § 7.)

2. Son of Gulussa, and grandson of Masinissa. Having taken part with Adherbal in his disputes with Jugurtha, he fled to Rome after the capture of Cirta and death of Adherbal (a. c. 112). When Jugurtha himself came to Rome in b. c. 108, Massiva was induced by the unfavourable disposition of the senate towards that monarch, and by the instigations of the consul Sp. Albinus, to put in his own claim to the kingdom of Numidia. Jugurtha, alarmed at his pretensions, determined to rid himself of his rival, and, through the agency of his minister Bomilcar, succeeded in effecting the assassination of Massiva. (Sall. Jug. 35; Liv. Epit. Liv.; Florus, iii. 2.) [E. H. B.]

MASSURIUS SABI'NUS. [SABINUS.]

MASTANABAL or MANASTABAL (the former appears to be the more correct form of the name, see Gesenius, Ling. Phoen. Monum. p. 409), the youngest of the three legitimate sons of Masinissa, between whom the kingdom of Numidia was divided by Scipio after the death of the aged king (a. c. 148). Mastanabal was distinguished for his fondness for literature and his love of justice, on which account Scipio assigned him the administration of the judicial affairs of the kingdom. (Appian, Pun. 106; Zonar. ix. 27; Liv. Epit. l.) We know nothing more of him, except that he died before his brother Micipsa, and that he left two sons, JUGURTHA and GAUDA. (Sall. Jug. 5, 65.) [E. H. B.]

MASTOR (Mástor), two mythical personages, one the father of Lycophron in Cythera (Hom. Il. xv. 430), and the other the father of Hylitherses in Ithaca. (Od. ii. 158, 253, xxiv. 451.) [L. S.]

MATER DEUM. [RHEA.]

MATERNI'ANUS, FLAVIUS, commander of the city guards in the reign of Caracalla, was either put to death or treated with great indignity by Macrinus. A. D. 217. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 4, 7, 15; Herodian. iv. 12.)

MATER'NUS, CURIA'TIUS, one of the speakers in the "Dialogus de Causis Corruptae Eloquentiae." From that piece we learn (cc. 2, 3, 11, 13) that, abandoning rhetorical studies, he had devoted himself with success to the composition of tragedies, that four of these were entitled Medea, Thyestes, Domitius, Cato, and that he had given offence to the ruling powers by the sentiments which he had expressed in the last named. From this circumstance we are led to conclude that he must be the same person with the Mátrapos σφαγίστης, who, we are informed by Dion Cassius (lxvii. 12), was put to death by Domitian on account of his too great freedom of speech (παρρησία). A German scholar has recently endeavoured to prove that the Octavia found among the tragedies of Seneca, but generally considered as spurious, belongs to Maternus. (See "Octavia Praetextata Curatio Materno Vindicata," ed. Fr. Ritter. 8vo. Bonn, 1843.) [W. R.]

MATER'NUS FIRMICUS. [FIRMICUS.]

MATHO (Máthos), an African who served as a mercenary soldier in the army of the Carthaginians in Sicily during the first Punic war. In the mutiny which broke out among the mercenaries after their return to Africa, b. c. 241, he took so prominent a part, that he became apprehensive of being singled out for punishment, in case the mutineers should be induced to disband themselves. Hence when Gisico was at length sent to the camp at Tunia, with full powers to satisfy their demands, Matho united with Spendius, a Campanian deserter, who was influenced by similar motives, in persuading the soldiers to reject the proffered terms. These two leaders quickly obtained so much influence with the mixed multitude of which the army consisted, that the troops would listen to no one else, and Matho and Spendius were soon after formally appointed generals. Their first object was now to render the breach with Carthage irreparable, for which purpose they induced the soldiery to seize on Gisico and the other Carthaginian deputies, and throw them into prison; after which they proceeded to declare open war against Carthage, and Matho sent messengers to the African subjects of that state, calling upon them to assert their independence. The latter were easily induced to avail themselves of an opportunity of throwing off a yoke which they had long felt to be galling and oppressive, and almost universally took up arms, thus at once imparting a national character to the rebellion. The two cities of Utica and Hippo alone refused to join in the revolt, and these were in consequence immediately besieged by the insurgents. Matho and Spendius now found themselves at the head of an army of 70,000 Africans, in addition to the mercenary troops originally assembled; and having the command of the open country, they were abundantly supplied with provisions, while they held Carthage itself effectually blockaded on the land side. Hanno, who was at first appointed to take the command against them, proved no match for troops which had been trained up in Sicily under Hamilcar Barca: the rebels even surprised his camp, and obtained possession of all his baggage. The great Barca himself now took the field, forced the passage of the Bagrada, and restored the communications of the city with the open country. Hereupon the two leaders separated, and while Spendius undertook to oppose Hamilcar in the field Matho continued to press the siege of Hippo. But the successes of Hamilcar, and still more the favourable impression produced by the clemency with which he treated those prisoners who had fallen into his hands, began once more to alarm the chiefs of the insurgents, lest the fidelity of their adherents should be shaken. They in consequence determined to render pardon impossible, by involving them all in still deeper guilt; and Spendius and Matho united with a Gaul named Auturitus in urging the soldiers to the execution of Gisco and all the other Carthaginian captives. Not only was this sanguinary resolution carried out, with circumstances of the utmost barbarity, but the rebels refused to give up the dead bodies, and even threatened to treat in like manner any Carthaginian heralds who should for the future be sent to them. These atrocities quickly led to sanguinary measures of retaliation on the part of the Carthaginian generals, and the war was henceforth marked by a character of ferocity unparalleled in the whole course of ancient history.

Meanwhile, the dissensions between the Carthaginian generals Hamilcar and Hanno prevented their carrying on any effectual operations against the insurgents, and the latter soon after obtained an important accession to their cause in the two powerful cities of Utica and Hippo, which at length abandoned the alliance of the Carthaginians, murdered the garrisons that occupied them, and opened their gates to the rebels. Thus strengthened, Matho and Spendius now ventured to lay siege to Carthage itself; but while they cut off the city from all communications on the land side, they were themselves threatened from without by the army of Hamilcar, who by means of his Numidian horse was now completely master of the open country, and so effectually intercepted their supplies, that they were finally compelled to raise the siege. Not long afterwards Spendius, who had again attempted to oppose Hamilcar in the field, with an army of 50,000 men, was compelled by the superior skill and generalship of his opponent to surrender, and was himself made prisoner, while almost the whole of his army was put to the sword. This catastrophe was followed by the submission of most of the revolted cities, and Matho, with the remainder of his forces, took refuge in Tunis, where he was closely besieged by Hamilcar on the one side and his new colleague Hannibal on the other. But the negligence of the latter soon afforded Matho an opportunity of surprising his camp, which he took, with great slaughter, carrying off an immense booty, and Hannibal himself as a prisoner, whom he immediately caused to be crucified, in revenge for the like cruelty inflicted upon Spendius. This blow compelled Hamilcar to raise the siege of Tunis, but it was the last success obtained by the rebels: a reconciliation being brought about between the two Carthaginian generals, they again took the field in concert, and Matho, after several partial actions, in which he was for the most part worsted, was at length driven to risk a general battle, and was totally defeated. The greater part of his troops fell on the field, and he himself was made prisoner, and carried in triumph to Carthage, where he was shortly after put to death with every species of indignity. (Polyb. i. 69—88; Diod. xxv. Exc. Hoesch. pp. 509, 510, Exc. Vales. pp. 566, 567, Exc. Val. pp. 55, 56; Appian, Pun. 5.) [E. H. B.]

MATHO, a family name of the Naevian and Pomponian gentes, was always pronounced without the aspirate, Mato, as we learn from the authority of Cicero. (Orat. 48.) Sometimes indeed the name was written in that way.

MATHO, a pompous, blustering advocate, ridiculed by Juvenal and Martial. To see such a man stretched out at full length in a new lectica for which he had probably not paid, excited the indignation of the satirist:—

“Nam quis inique

Tam patiens urbia, tam ferreus, ut teneat ee,
Causidici nova quoniam veniat lectica Mathonia, Plena ipso?”

(Juv. i. 30, &c., comp. vii. 129, Matho defici, which refers to his refusing to pay his debts, not to his being poor, as Rupertus interprets it; xi. 34, where he is called becca; Martial, iv. 80, vii. 10. 3, 4, viii. 42, x. 46, xi. 68.)

MATHO, Q. NAEVIUS, praetor a.c. 184, received the province of Sardinia, and also the commission to inquire into all cases of poisoning. He was engaged in this investigation for four months before he set out for his province, prosecuting his inquiries in the various municipia and conciliabula in Italy; and if we may believe Valerius Antias, he condemned two thousand persons in this time. (Liv. xxxix. 32, 38, 41.)

MATHO, POMPONIUS. 1. M. POMPONIUS, M. F. M. N. MATHO, consul a.c. 233, with Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, carried on war against the Sardinians, and obtained a triumph in consequence of his victory over them. (Zonar. viii. 18, p. 401.) The reduction of the Sardinians, however, must have been incomplete, as we find Matho's brother engaged against them two years afterwards, with a consular army. (See below, No. 2.) In a.c. 217 he was magister equitum to the dictator, L. Veturius Philo, and was elected praetor for the following year, a.c. 216. There seems no reason for believing that the M. Pomponius Matho, praetor of this year, was a different person from the consul of a.c. 233, as the Romans were now at war with Hannibal, and were therefore anxious to appoint to the great offices of the state generals who had had experience in war. The lot, however, did not give to Matho any military command, but the jurisdictio inter cives Romanos et peregrinos. After news had been received of the fatal battle of Cannae, Matho and his colleague, the praetor urbanus, summoned the senate to the curia Hostilia to deliberate on what steps were to be taken. (Liv. xxii. 33, 35, 55, xxiii. 20, 24.) At the expiration of his office, Matho received as proprætor the province of Cisalpine Gaul, a.c. 215; for Livy says (xxiv. 10), in the next year, a.c. 214, that the province of Gaul was continued to him. Livy, however, not only makes no mention of Matho's appointment in a.c. 215, but expressly states (xxiii. 25) that in that year no army was sent into Gaul on account of the want of sediciæ. We can only reconcile these statements by supposing that Matho was appointed to the province but did not obtain any troops that year. He died in a.c. 211, at which time he was one of the pontifices. (Liv. xxvi. 23.)

2. M. POMPONIUS M. F. M. N. MATHO, brother of the preceding, consul a.c. 231 with C. Papirius Maso, was also engaged in war against the Sardinians, and employed dogs which he procured from Italy to hunt out the inhabitants, who had taken refuge in woods and caves. (Zonar. viii. 18, p. 401.) For the same reasons which have been mentioned above, in the case of his brother, we believe that he is the same as the M. Pomponius, who, Livy tells us (xxii. 7), was praetor in a.c. 217, the second year of the war with Hannibal. Maso died in a.c. 204, at which time he was both augur and decemvir sacrorum. (Liv. xxix. 38.)

3. MATHO, M. POMPONIUS, probably son of No. 2, plebeian aedile a.c. 206, gave, with his colleague in the aedileship, a second celebration of the plebeian games. Next year, B.C. 205, he was one of the ambassadors sent to Delphi to make an offering to the god from the booty obtained by the victory over Hannibal; the following year, B.C. 204, he was elected praetor. He obtained Sicily as his province, and was ordered by the senate to inquire into the complaints made by the inhabitants of Locri against P. Scipio. The province was continued to Mitho for another year (B.C. 203), and he was appointed to the command of the fleet, which was to protect Sicily, while P. Scipio was prosecuting the war in Africa. (Liv. xxviii. 10, 43, xxix. 11, 13, 20—22, xxx. 2, xxxi. 12.)

MATIDIA, the daughter of Marciana, who was the sister of Trajan, was the mother of Sabina, who was married to Hadrian in the lifetime of Trajan. We do not know the name of her husband, and we have no particulars of her life. She survived Trajan, whose ashes she brought to the city, along with Plotina, the wife of Trajan (Spart. Hadr. 5). We learn from coins and inscriptions that Matidia received the title of Augusta in her lifetime, and was enrolled among the gods after her decease. (Eckhel, vol. vi. p. 469, &c.)

COIN OF MATIDIA.

MATINIENUS. 1. P. MATINIENUS, a tribune of the soldiers in the army of P. Scipio in Sicily, was sent by Scipio with M. Sergius, another tribune, to Q. Pleminius, who commanded as propraetor in Rhegium, to co-operate with him in taking the town of Locri. After the town had been taken a quarrel arose between the soldiers of the tribunes and those of Pleminius, and in the fight which ensued the latter were defeated. Pleminius enraged commanded the tribunes to be scourged; but they were rescued, after receiving a few blows, by their own soldiers, who, in retaliation, fell upon the propraetor and handled him most unmercifully. Scipio arrived a few days after at Locri, and having investigated the case, he acquitted Pleminius of blame, but ordered the tribunes to be put into chains and sent to Rome to the senate. This, however, did not satisfy Pleminius, who burned for revenge; and, accordingly, no sooner had Scipio returned to Sicily, than he commanded the tribunes to be put to death with the most excruciating tortures, and then would not allow their corpses to be buried. (Liv. xxix. 6, 9.)

2. C. MATIENUS, was appointed duumvir navalis with C. Lucretius in B. C. 181, in which year he took thirty-two of the Ligurian ships. (Liv. xl. 26, 28.)

3. M. MATIENUS, praetor B.C. 173, obtained the province of Further Spain, which he plundered and oppressed. On his return to Rome he was accused by the provincials and went into exile at Tibur. (Liv. xli. 28, xlii. 1, xliii. 2.)

P. MATINIUS, was a Roman money-broker who was strongly recommended by M. Brutus to Cicero, when proconsul of Cilicia, in B. C. 51. The citizens of Salamis in Cyprus, were debtors for a large loan to Matinius, who had advanced it in partnership with one M. Scaptius, also a client of Brutus and a money-lender. As Scaptius was principal in this transaction, it is more fully related under SCAPTIUS. (Cic. ad Att. v. 21, vi. 1, 3.) [W. B. D.]

C. MA'TIUS CALVE'NA. [CALVENA.]

МАТО. [Матно.]

ΜΑΤΡΕΑΣ (Ματρίας), called δ πλάσος or λασιάνδος, the Deceiver or Imposter, appears to have been the author of various enigmas or riddles, one of which is mentioned by Athenaeus and Suida. He also wrote a parody of the Problems of Aristotle; for such seems to have been the nature of the work mentioned by Athenaeus. (Athen. i. p. 19, d, with Schweighäuser's note; Suida, s. v.) He must have been a different person from Matreas or Matron of Pitane. [MATRON.]

MATRINIUS. 1. T. MATRINIUS, one of those whom C. Marius presented with the Roman citizenship, was afterwards accused by L. Antistia. (Cic. pro Balb. 21.)

2. C. MATRINIUS, a Roman eques, who had estates in Sicily, was robbed by Verres during his absence in Rome. (Cic. Verr. v. 7, comp. iii. 24.)

3. D. MATRINIUS, a writer of the aediles (scriba aedilicus) was defended by Cicero, about B. C. 69. (Cic. pro Cluent. 45.)

MATRIS (Μᾶτρης), of Thebes, is called Διμογάργος by Ptolemy Hephestion (ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 148, b. 1, ed. Bekker), and may therefore be identified with the Matris mentioned by Athenaeus (x. p. 412, b.) as the author of an encomium upon Heracles. In another passage (ii. p. 44, d.) Athenaeus copies from Hephaestion the story of his great abstemiousness, but calls him an Athenian. Diodorus Siculus (i. 24) refers to his etymology of the name Ἡρακλῆς, as if from the hero's gaining his fame (κλέος) on account of Hera. Longinus (§ 3) criticises his inflated style. [P. S.]

MATRON (Ματρων), of Pitana, a celebrated writer of parodies upon Homer, often quoted by Eustathius and Athenaeus. (Eustath. ad Hom. pp. 1067, 1571, &c.; Ath. i. p. 5, a, p. 31, b, xv. p. 699, e., &c.) Athenaeus (iv. pp. 134—137) quotes a long fragment from a poem of his, in which an Athenian feast was described, beginning

πολλά.

He was probably a contemporary of Hegemon of Thasos, about the end of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth centuries B. C., but at all events he cannot be placed later than the time of Philip of Macedon. Athenaeus calls him Marpas in some places, but this is clearly an error of the transcriber. The fragments of his parodies were printed by H. Stephens, in the Dissertation on Parodies, appended to the Contest of Homer and Hesiod, 1573, 8vo., and in Brunnck's Analecta, vol. ii. p. 245. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 550; G. H. Moser, Ueber Matron den Parodiker, in Daub and Creuzer's Studien, vol. vi. p. 293; Ulrich, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtk. vol. ii. p. 324.) [P. S.]

MATTHAEUS, CANTACUZENUS (Ματθαῖος ὁ Καντακουζηνός), co-emperor of Constantinople, was the eldest son of John VI., who associated him in the supreme government in 1359, with a view of thwarting the schemes of John Palaeologus, who, although then an exile in Tenedos, enjoyed great popularity, and had a fair prospect of seizing the throne. Both John and Matthaeus, however, were unable to prevent John Palaeologus from taking Constantinople in the month of January, 1355, an event which put an end at once to the reign of the father and the son, who both abdicated and retired into a convent. [JOANNES VI.] Matthaeus, who died before his father, or towards the end of the 14th century, was married to Irene Palaeologina, by whom he had six children. [See CANTACUZENUS, genealogical table.] Matthaeus Cantacuzenus was a learned man, and during his protracted residence in one of the convents of Mount Athos wrote different works, mostly commentaries on the Holy Scriptures, of which several are extant in MS., and one of which has been published, viz.—"Commentarii in Cantica Cantiorum," ed. Vincentius Richardus, 1624, fol.; he was perhaps also the author of "Commentarius in Sapientiam Salomonis," extant in MS. (Cave Hist. Lit., Append. p. 37. [W. P.]

MATTHAEUS (Ματθαῖος), literary and ecclesiastical. 1. ANGELUS, surnamed PANARETUS (Ἀγγελὸς ὁ Παναρέτος), was a Byzantine monk, who held the office of ecclesiastical quæstor, but whose time is very uncertain. Cave, however, thinks him to be identical with the monk Panaretus Protovestiarius, mentioned by Pachymeres (v. 17, 21), and who was one of the ecclesiastical ambassadors, whom the emperor Michael VIII. Palaeologus sent in 1273 (74) to pope Gregory X. and the Council of Lyon, for the purpose of effecting a re-union of the Latin and Greek churches. Matthaeus wrote: 1. "Antithesis contra Thomam Aquinatem de Processione Spiritus Sancti." 2. Against the same a treatise on the purgatory, entitled Πῶς ἐστὶν ὁ ἐνδύον τόπος ἐνθα αἱ ψυχὰι καθάρονται πρὶν, &c. 3. "Dissertatio contra Latinos de Primatu Papæ." 4. "Refutatio Sex Capituli a Latinis editorum in Defensionem Processionis Spiritus Sancti ex Patre et Filio." 5. "Demonstratio in quot Absurditates Latini incident dum Spiritum Sanctum etiam a Filio procedere asserunt." 6. "Dissert. de aliis XXII. Latinorum Erroribus." 7. "Dissert. contra Latinos de Asymia." These works are extant in MSS. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 76; Cave, Hist. Liter. Append. p. 174, ed. Geneva.)

2. BLASTARES. [BLASTARES.]

3. CAMARIOTA (ὁ Καμαριώτης), a native of either Constantinople or Thessalonica, was the son of a Greek priest who perished during the capture of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453. Matthaeus, the son, was also present at the capture, but survived the event. He is praised for his knowledge of philosophy and rhetorical talents. He wrote: 1. "Epistola de capta Constantinopoli," a very prolix production, the greater extant portion of which was translated into Latin by Theodore Zygomala, and published with the Greek text by M. Crusius in his "Turco-Graecia." 2. "Epitome in Hermogenem et Rhetoricæ Liber." 3. "Synopsis Rhetorica." [See the following, No. 4.] 4. "Commentarii in Synesii Epistolas." 5. "Encomium in tres Hierarchas, Basilium, Gregorium et Chrysostomum." 6. (perhaps) "Matthæi Monachi et Presbyteri Thessalonicensis de Divina Gratia et Lumine, &c." 7. "Tractatus de iis qui Spuria et Aliena docent." Matthaeus was the tutor of Georgius Scholarius. It would seem that in 1438 he accompanied John VII. Palaeologus to Italy, and was present at the councils of Ferrara and Florence; and if we can trust Phranza (iii. 19), he became, after the fall of the Greek capital, patriarch of Constantinople, under the name of Genadius, but finally abdicated and retired into a convent. (Fabr. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 118, vol. xii. p. 107; Cave, Hist. Liter. Append. p. 110, ed. Geneva.)

4. CAMARIOTA, a contemporary of the former, wrote: 1. "Synopsis Rhetorica," ed. Gr. et Lat. D. Hoeschelius, Augsburg, 1595, 4to.; this work seems rather to be the production of the foregoing Camariota. 2. "Orationes de Sacro Officio Pastoralis." 3. "Tres Canones Iambici a. Hymni." 4. "Canon Iambicus de Christo atque ejus Cruce;" and others extant in MS. (Cave, Hist. Lit. Append. p. 110.)

5. EPISCOPUS (Ioniae et Asiaticæ Terme Episcopus), a Byzantine bishop of uncertain age, wrote: "Epistola ad Magnum Magnæ Ecclesiæ Constantinopolitane Chartophylacem," which begins ἐπιστολὴ τῆς πόλεως ἑλωρτος, and is extant in MS. (Cav. Hist. Lit. Append. p. 175.)

6. HIEROMONACHUS, seems to be the same person as Matthaeus Blastares. [BLASTARES]

7. PANARETUS. [See No. 1.]

8. PATRIARCHA, was removed from the episcopal see of Cyzicus to the patriarchate of Constantinople; abdicated in 1395, and died in 1408. He wrote several treatises on religious subjects, of which are extant in MS.: "Testamentum, sive Ultima Voluntas;" "Hypotyposis sive Informatio ad seipsum et ad Episcopos aibi subjectos." If he wrote this in 1398, as is presumed, he seems to have abdicated after that year, and not as early as 1395. (Cave, Hist. Liter. Append. p. 54, ed. Geneva; Oudin, Comment. de SS. Eccles. vol. iii. p. 2209, &c., ad an. 1400.) [W. P.]

MATURUS, MARIUS, was procurator of the maritime Alps in the war between Otho and Vitellius, A. D. 69, and enlisted on the side of the latter the mountaineers of his district. After Otho's death Maturus retained his post and was for some time faithful to Vitellius. But as he was nearly surrounded by the enemy in Narbonne and Cisalpine Gaul, and could not rely on the valour or fidelity of his Alpine levies, he reluctantly transferred his allegiance to Vespasian. (Tac. Hist. ii. 12, 13, iii. 42, 43.) [W. B. D.]

MATUTA, commonly called Mater Matuta, is usually considered as the goddess of the dawn of morning, and her name is considered to be connected with maturus or matutinus (Lucret. v. 633; August. De Civ. Dei. iv. 8); but it seems to be well attested that Matuta was only a surname of Juno (Liv. xxxiv. 53; P. Victor, Reg. Urb. ii.), and it is probable that the name is connected with mater, so that Mater Matuta is an analogous expression with Hostus Hostilius, Fannus Fannus, Aulus Locutius, and others. If we look to the ceremonies observed at her festival, the Matralia, which took place on the 11th of June, we must infer that they were intended to enjoin that people should take care of the children of deceased brothers and sisters, as if they were their own, and that they should not be left to the mercy of slaves or hirelings, who were in fact so odious to the goddess, that she delighted in their chastisement. (Terent. De Monogam. 17; Plut. Quæst. Rom. 16, 17.) A certain resemblance between these ceremonies and those of the Greek Leucothea led the Romans to identify Matuta and Leucothea, and thus to regard her as a marine divinity. (Plut. Camill. 5; Or. Post. vi. 551, &c.; Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 19, Thur. i. 12.) A temple had been dedicated to Matuta at Rome by king Servius, and was restored by the dictator, Camillus, after the taking of Veii. (Liv. v. 19, 23, xxv. 7, xli. 33.) Frequent mention of a temple of Matuta at Satricum is made by Livy (vi. 33, vii. 27, xxviii. 11). [L. S.]

MAVORS. [MARS.]

MAVORTIUS, the name prefixed to a poem in the Latin Anthology on the judgment of Paris. It is a cento from the writings of Virgil, and breaks off abruptly at the end of 42 lines. The author is believed to be the Vettius Agorius Basilus Mavortius, who was consul A. D. 527, the same who, according to Bentley, arranged the works of Horace in their present form, and who is supposed by a recent critic, whose reasonings will not bear close investigation, to have interpolated a number of spurious pieces, and introduced other organic changes. (Burmman, Antholog. Lat. i. 147, or No. 282, ed. Meyer; Bentley, Præf. in Horat.; Peerlkamp, Præf. ad Horat.) [W. R.]

MAURICIANUS, JUNIUS, a Roman jurist, who wrote, according to the Florentine Index, six books, Ad Leges, by which is meant Ad Leg. Juliam et Papiam (Dig. 33. tit. 2. s. 23). The passage just cited shows that he was writing this work in the time of Antoninus Pius (A. D. 138—161). There is one passage in the Digest from the second book of Mauricianus De Poenis (2. tit. 13. s. 3), which work is not mentioned in the Florentine Index. He also wrote notes on Julianus (2. tit. 14. s. 7 § 2; 7. tit. 1. s. 25. § 1), but in place of Mauricianus some manuscripts have Martianus or Marcianus in the two passages just cited. Mauricianus is sometimes cited by other jurists. There are four excerpts from his writings in the Digest. [G. L.]

MAURICIUS, according to Capitolinus (Gordian. tres. c. 7), was the name of the youth who headed the conspiracy in Africa against Maximinus I. [MAXIMINUS], and proposed the elevation of the provincial, Gordian, and his son. [W. R.]

MAURICIUS (Μαυρίκιος), FLAVIUS TIBERIUS, one of the greatest emperors of Constantinople (A. D. 582—620), was descended from an ancient Roman family which settled in Asia Minor, perhaps some centuries previous to his birth, which took place about A. D. 539, in the town of Arabissus, in Cappadocia. We give the genealogy of his family so far as it is known:—

Pamphus, a native of Arabissus; a man of talent and rank, raised still higher by his son the emperor Maurice; m. Juliana; died 595.

Maurice spent his youth at the court of the emperor Justin II.; and although he undoubtedly served also in the army, his name does not become conspicuous in history previous to 578. At that period he was comes cubicularum; and Tiberius had no sooner succeeded Justin (578) than he appointed Maurice magister militum, and gave him the command in Mesopotamia against the Persians, in place of the general Justinian, with whose military conduct the emperor was not satisfied. As Tiberius was considered to be the greatest captain of his time, he would not have entrusted so important a command to an inexperienced courtier, and consequently one cannot but infer that he was perfectly acquainted with the great capabilities of Maurice. The event fully justified the emperor's choice. A truce of three years had been made between Persia and the empire, extending to the whole of the frontier except Armenia, where war was carried on as before. But Chosroes violated the truce, and invaded Mesopotamia before the Romans were at all aware of his hostile intentions. At this critical moment Maurice arrived in Mesopotamia, and forthwith began by restoring the relaxed discipline of the troops: one of his first measures was the re-establishment of the ancient custom of the legions never going to rest at night before fortifying their camp. This custom had long since been neglected; and the favourite manoeuvre of the Persians of surprising the Romans in the night was thus rendered abortive. At the opening of the campaign, however, the Persian general, Tamchosoos, made himself master of the important fortress of Thomane, and pushed as far as Amida. Maurice soon drove him back, and in his turn invaded the province of Arzanene, sending some detachments beyond the Tigris. The first campaign ended without any decisive battle. In the second campaign, 579, Maurice and his excellent lieutenant Narses—who must not be confounded with Narses, the general of Justinian—made a successful invasion of Media, and took up their winter-quarters in Mesopotamia. In 580 he crossed the Euphrates at Circesium (Circesus or Cercusium), a town situated in the angle made by the Chaboras joining the Euphrates, with a view of marching across the desert upon Ctesiphon. His plan was frustrated through the treachery of some Arab allies, and he found himself unexpectedly compelled to make head against the main army of the Persians. The contest was sharp, and ended with a total overthrow of the Persians, who evacuated whatever places they held in Mesopotamia, and fled in confusion beyond the Euphrates. Now Chosroes offered peace, but Maurice peremptorily demanded the restoration of the great fortress of Dara, the bulwark of the empire, declining to accept any indemnity in money, and the war was renewed with more fury than before (581). A pitched battle, in which the Persian army was almost annihilated, and their commander, Tamchosoos, died the death of a hero, concluded the war, to the advantage of the Romans, and Maurice hastened to Constantinople to surprise the emperor and the nation with the welcome news that the most dangerous enemy of Greece was humbled, and peace restored to the East. This was more than what even Tiberius expected; and Maurice having gained universal popularity by his brilliant victories, the emperor invited him to enter Constantinople in triumph (582).

Soon afterwards the brave Tiberius fell dangerously ill; and feeling his end approach, assembled the senate, and proposed Maurice as his successor. His touching speech met with no opposition; Constantinople was in rapture; and the dying emperor increased the joy of his subjects by giving his eldest daughter Constantina in marriage to Maurice. A few days afterwards Tiberius died (13th of August, 582); and the fortunate Maurice now ascended the throne.

His mature age (43) was a guarantee to the nation that the rapid fortune of their new master was not likely to turn his head; and indeed he did not deceive their expectation, although his reign was an uninterrupted series of wars. We shall first speak of the Persian war.

Maurice had scarcely ascended the throne, and given proof of his forbearance, by pardoning instead of punishing various persons who had been guilty of treason, when news came from the Persian frontier that Hormisdas, the son of Chosroes, had broken the peace, and attacked the empire. Before the end of the year (582) John Mystacon, the commander-in-chief in those quarters, engaged in a pitched battle with the Persians near the junction of the Nymphius and the Tigris; but although the Romans fought with great valour, the day was lost, through the jealousy of one of their generals, Curs, and their army was dispersed. They suffered another defeat at Acbas, and Mystacon was compelled, through misfortune and illness, to spend the whole season of 583 on the defensive. Maurice, dissatisfied with his conduct, recalled him, and sent Philipppus or Philippius in his stead, having previously given him his sister Gordia in marriage. This general would have ventured some decisive blow in 584, but his army was decimated by famine, diseases, and fatigues; he took the offensive in 585, but performed nothing particular. In 586 Philippius at last brought the enemy to a stand at Solacon, not far from Dara, and obtained a decisive victory, which he owed especially to his infantry, which, until the time of Maurice, was made little use of in the later wars in the East. The Persian army was nearly destroyed. A strong body of their veterans, however, reached safely a hill at some distance from the field of battle, where they entrenched themselves, but were routed, with great slaughter, by the Roman, Stephanus. Now Philippius invaded Arzanene. He was in sight of another Persian army, and ready to fight them, when some trifling circumstance caused such a panic among his troops, that they gave way to the impulse, and fled in the utmost confusion. The Persians followed them without loss of time, took and plundered the baggage, and pursued them as far as Amida. Philippius fell ill through grief, for the fruit of his great victory at Solacon seemed to be entirely lost; and being unable to appear in the field, he gave the command to Heraclius, Andreas, and Theodore of Addea. Heraclius, who afterwards became emperor, retrieved the fortune of the Romans, and gave such splendid proofs of his military skill, that, Philippius having been recalled in 588, he was entrusted with the temporary command-in-chief till the arrival of Priscus, whom the emperor had despatched to supersede Philippius. The latter was so extremely jealous of his successor, that he employed treason in order to avenge himself for the insult, and kindled a rebellion among the troops which threatened to ruin the emperor's affairs in the East. They refused to acknowledge Priscus, forced Germanus to take the supreme command, and deposed all officers with whom they were displeased, choosing others in their stead. In this emergency Aristobolus arrived, whom Maurice had sent into Mesopotamia, immediately upon being informed of the mutiny; and this able man having gained some ascendancy over the rioters, availed himself of his advantage, and together with Heraclius led the army, who were then encamped under the walls of Martyropolis (on the Nymphius, in Sophene) against the main body of the Persians, who approached to besiege that great fortress. The Romans carried the day; but in the pride of victory the soldiers once more raised the standard of rebellion. At this critical time, Gregory, bishop of Antioch, arrived, as the emperor's plenipotentiary, and he at last succeeded in soothing the turbulent spirit of the legions, and prevailed upon them to obey Philippius as their commander-in-chief. This was exactly what this ambitious man wished for; but as he was unable to do honour to his important function, when he had obtained it in a fair way, he was found to be still less competent now his mind was inflated by unfair success (589). His first act of incompetency was the loss of Martyropolis, of which the Persians made themselves master by a stratagem; and the recapture of the fortress became next to impossible, when, through his carelessness, a strong body of Persians was allowed to relieve the garrison. Maurice was extremely vexed at these proceedings, and full of rancour against all those who had promoted the mutiny; he showed no further indulgence to his brother-in-law, but deprived him of his post, and appointed Comeniolus in his place. This was the very man who commanded those legions which first mutinied in 588. This faithless and incompetent general would have made a sorry figure but for the aid of the gallant Heraclius; at the battle of Sisarbene he was among the first who took to flight; and the Romans seemed to be lost when Heraclius restored order, and gained one of the most glorious victories ever obtained over the Persians: the camp of the enemy was taken, and an immense booty sent to Constantinople, creating the most unlimited satisfaction and joy in the court as well as in the town. Soon afterwards Acbas was re-taken by Heraclius; and affairs speedily took a turn in favour of the Romans, by a commotion in Persia, which, on account of its important consequences for the empire, deserves a short explanation. While the Roman arms became more and more dangerous, Hormisdas concluded an alliance with the Turks in Bactriana (Turkistan), whose khan consequently came to his apparent relief with a host of some hundred thousand marauders on horseback. They behaved like allies till they had quartered themselves on the frontier of Media, when they altered their conduct, and it became manifest that they had made a secret alliance with Maurice; and being now in the heart of Persia, were ready to fall upon the rear of the royal armies engaged in Mesopotamia. In this extremity Persia was saved by Baram, a general highly distinguished for his former campaigns against the Romans, who attacked the Turks in the passes of the Hyrcanian mountain, and gave them such a bloody lesson, that they desisted from further hostile attempts. Baram was rewarded with ingratitude, for he was deprived of his command, and insulted in a most poignant manner. Compelled to rebel or to lose his head, he took up arms against the king, and a general defection ensued, during which Hormisdas was seized and blinded by Bindoes, a prince of royal blood, who had been ill-treated by his master. Choroë, the son of Hormisdas, now ascended the throne, with the consent of Bindoes, and prepared for marching against Baram. The royal troops were defeated, Choroë fled into the Roman territory, and during the ensuing troubles in Persia the blinded king, Hormisdas, was murdered by Bindoes, or, as Theophylact states, beaten to death by order of his own son, Choroë. Gibbon rejects the latter account. When Choroë, with a few attendants, suddenly arrived at the gates of Circesium, the Roman commander would scarcely trust his own eyes, and immediately requested him to remove to the more stately city of Hierapolis, whence the king sent a touching letter to Maurice, imploring his generous aid for the recovery of his throne. When our pride is flattered, our honour satisfied, and our heart moved at one and the same time, human nature seldom withstands the dictates of its better feelings; Maurice shed tears when he read the letter, and granted his protection to the royal fugitive. A powerful army, under the command of Narses, was assembled on the frontier; loyal Persians flocked to the Roman camp to serve their legitimate sovereign; Narses and Choroë entered Persia; and in a decisive battle at Balarath they routed the rebel Baram, whose troops were dispersed, while he himself fled into Turkestan, where he met with an untimely death, either by poison or grief. Choroë now re-ascended the throne of his ancestors (591), and peace and friendship reigned henceforth between Persia and the empire as long as Maurice sat on the throne. Dara and Martyropolis, the bulwarks of Mesopotamia, and the objects of so many a bloody contest, were given to Maurice as a reward or on condition of his assistance.

We now turn to the war with the Avars, of which our account must be brief. The first war against the chagan or khan of these barbarians, who ruled over an extent of country nearly equal to that which once obeyed Attila, broke out in 587. Comentiulus, who commanded against them, being unfortunate, Mystacon was sent to supersede him, although he could not boast of much success in Persia. But his lieutenant Drocult, a German, who had long served in the imperial armies, watched over the blunders of his chief, and in a pitched battle so utterly discomfited the Avars, that the khan refrained from any incursion during the following five years. The next war broke out some time after the peace with Persia, and Maurice had leisure to withdraw a great portion of his forces from Asia, and employ them against the Avars. He intended to put himself at their head, but it was already customary at the court of Constantinople that the emperor should not command in the field, and he consequently gave way to the remonstrances of the senate, and sent Priscus in his stead, who, however, was soon superseded by the emperor's brother Peter. The choice was a bad one, and as early as 598 Priscus resumed the supreme command. He was less successful than was expected, though he was an excellent general, and in 600 the army received a new commander in the person of Comentiulus, that faithless and cowardly intriguer, whose conduct had been so very suspicious in Asia.

In appointing him, Maurice committed either a great blunder or secretly wished to ruin him. Comentiulus had no sooner taken the field, when he suffered a severe defeat from the chagan: 12,000 Romans remained prisoners of war with the Avars. We shall speak hereafter of their fate, an event intimately connected with that of the emperor. The honour of the Roman arms was restored in five successful battles by the gallant Priscus, but Comentiulus thwarted his plans by intrigues and treacherous manoeuvres, and at last Priscus was again put at the head of the army. In the autumn of 602 he intended to winter along the southern bank of the Danube, when Maurice ordered him to take up his quarters on the northern side, where they would have been exposed to the attacks of the Avars. Some pretend that Maurice gave this order for the purpose of aparing the magazines within the empire; but it would seem as if he rather intended to punish those troops for previous acts of disobedience and mutiny, by assigning them winter-quarters in an inhospitable country. However this may be, the measure was imprudent, and proved the ruin of the emperor.

Gibbon observes with great justness, that, while in the camp alone the emperors ought to have exercised a despotic command, it was only in the camps that his authority was disobeyed and insulted. The spirit of mutiny and arrogance in the army, that hereditary cancer of Roman administration, reigned unalated when Maurice took the reins of government, and he who met with blind obedience when a mere magister militum, had to encounter that dangerous mutiny of his Persian army immediately upon exchanging the baton for the sceptre. Nor was this the only outbreak, though the others were of less magnitude. It has been told above that 12,000 Romans were made prisoners of war by the Avars. The trifling sum of 6000 pieces of gold was demanded for their ransom. Maurice, moved by avarice, as some say, refused to pay it, and now 12,000 veterans were put to death by their captors. The army and the nation were deeply indignant at this atrocious deed, and cursed Maurice for his abominable conduct. However, in acting as he did, the emperor had a powerful though secret motive: those 12,000 were the soldiers of Comentiulus, it was they who had chiefly caused the great mutiny during the Persian war; and in abandoning them to the fury of barbarians, he at once assuaged his resentment and got rid of a band of dangerous mercenaries. But his conscience continually reproached him with this barbarous act. He wrote to the most eminent divines of his realm, to receive consolation from their censure or their indulgence; he tried to forget his pangs by redoubled activity in the cabinet. It was all in vain: he neither recovered the peace of his soul nor the love of his subjects; and the army bore such hatred against him, that they only seemed to wait for a suitable pretext to break out in open rebellion. His own imprudence furnished them with an opportunity, by ordering them, in the autumn of 602, to take up their winter-quarters on the Avarian side of the Danube. They complained that the emperor desired to sacrifice them, like their 12,000 brethren. They held tumultuous meetings, which the emperor's brother Peter tried in vain to counteract; and Phocas having been chosen by them for the command-in-chief, Peter had no alternative left but escaping secretly, and carrying the news of the revolt to the emperor in Constantinople. There the green faction assumed a threatening attitude, and information having reached them that Phocas was marching upon Constantinople, such a commotion arose in the capital, that Maurice thought it best to fly into the provinces, and there to prepare for resistance. He effected his escape by sea, together with his wife and children. A storm compelled him to land near the church of St. Autonomus, not far from Chalcedon. Thence he despatched his eldest son Theodosius to the court of Chosroes, to implore him to confer the same favour upon the emperor which the emperor had once conferred upon the king. Maurice with his family took sanctuary in the church of St. Autonomus: he was tortured by sufferings of body and despair of mind. During this time Phocas arrived in Constantinople, and was proclaimed emperor on the 23d of November, 602. He immediately sent executioners in search of Maurice, who was dragged with his family from the sanctuary to the scaffold. Five of his sons, Tiberius, Petrus, Paulus, Justin, and Justinian, had their heads cut off while their father stood by praying, but not trembling, awaiting the fatal stroke in his turn. He was murdered on the 27th of November, 602; his eldest son Theodosius, who had not proceeded far on his way to Persia, was arrested, and shared his fate soon afterwards. The empress and three of her daughters were thrown into prison, but in 605, or perhaps 607, they were likewise put to death, and their bodies thrown into the sea. The heads of Maurice and his sons were carried on pikes to Phocas, who, after having enjoyed the sight for some time, gave orders for the execution of Petrus, the brother of Maurice, Comentiolus, Constantine Lardys, and a great number of other persons of distinction. [PHOCAS.]

Among the papers of the murdered emperor was found his will, which he had made in the fifteenth year of his reign (597), and by which he left Constantinople and the East to Theodosius; Rome, Italy and the Islands, to his second son Tiberius. Maurice was indeed preparing for wresting Italy from the Lombards, and might have carried his plan into execution, but for the great wars against the Persians and the Avars. Although greater as a general than as a king, Maurice was yet one of the best emperors of the East. Constantly active, he knew no other pleasure than that which arises from doing one's duty; he was firm without being obstinate, bold yet prudent, and both severe or forbearing according to circumstances. He was completely master of his passions and appetites, sober to the extreme, a loving and virtuous husband and father, and full of filial piety. No sooner was he informed of the intentions of the emperor Tiberius towards him, than he entertained his father Paulus and his mother Joanna to come to Constantinople, and they were both present at his marriage with the princess Constantina. They continued to live at his court, and his father became one of his most influential ministers: the fame of Paulus as a wise and well-disposed man spread abroad, and the views of Maurice upon Italy being likely to lead to either an alliance or a war with the Franks in Gaul, their king Childobert wrote a letter to Paulus on that subject, which is given in Hist. Francor. vol. i. p. 869. A natural and timely death in 593 saved Paulus from being involved in the wholesale murder of the imperial family. Maurice is said to have loved money too much; but he was so far from oppressing his subjects from taxes, that, on the contrary, he lowered them considerably; on one occasion he took off one-third of the land-tax. Arts and sciences were protected by this great emperor, who possessed considerable learning. Maurice wrote twelve books on the military art, which have fortunately come down to posterity. They are entitled Στρατηγικὰ, and were published with a Latin version, together with Arrian's "Tactica," by John Scheffer, Upsala, 1664, 8vo. The text contains 382 half pages, and the version as much; the editor added 157 pages of notes, and a few pages with very curious representations of the different battle arrays spoken of in the work. COIN OF MAURICIUS.

MAURICIUS, JUNIUS, called in some manuscripts both of Tacitus and Pliny Marius, was an intimate friend of Pliny, who says (Ep. iv. 22) of him, "quo viro nihil firmitus, nihil verius." Maurice showed his independence by the question which he dared to ask Domitian in the senate, at the accession of Vespasian, A. D. 70 (Tac. Hist. iv. 40), which is the first time that his name is mentioned; and it is therefore not surprising that he was banished during the reign of Domitian. He was recalled from exile by Nerva, and an anecdote related by Pliny (Ep. i. c.) and Aurelius Victor (Epit. 12) shows with what freedom he spoke to the latter emperor. (Tac. Agric. 45; Plin. Ep. i. 5, § 10, iii. 11, § 3.) Maurice was the brother of Arduenus Rusticus (Plin. Ep. i. 14). [RUSTICA.] Three of Pliny's epistles are addressed to Maurice (i. 14, ii. 18, vi. 14).

MAUROPOUS, JOANNES. [JOANNES, No. 58.]

MAUSOLUS (Μαυσώλος or Μακεδνός, the latter form is that found on his coins), king or dynast of Caria, was the eldest son of Hecatomnus, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty. If the chronology of Diodorus be correct, his accession may be placed in B. C. 377. But the first occasion on which he appears in history is not till long afterwards, in B. C. 362, when he took part in the general revolt of the satraps against Artabanus Mnemon. (Diod. xv. 90.) He is said to have at that time already possessed several strong fortresses and flourishing cities, of which his capital, Halcarnassus, was the most conspicuous; but he appears to have availed himself of the opportunity of that war to extend his dominions by conquest, having overrun great part of Lydia and Ionia as far as Miletus, and made himself master of several of the neighbouring islands. (Lucian. Dial. Mort. xxiv.; and comp. Polyæn. vii. 23, § 2.) His ambition was next turned towards the more important acquisitions of Rhodes and Cos; and it was apparently as a preliminary step to that object that he overthrew the democracy in the former island, and established there an oligarchical government in the hands of his own friends. (Dem. de Rhod. Lib. pp. 191, 198.) Shortly after (a. c. 358) he joined with the Rhodians, Byzantians, and Chians in the war waged by them against the Athenians, known by the name of the Social War, of which indeed he was, according to Demosthenes, the prime mover and instigator, though we do not hear of his taking any farther part in it than sending a body of troops to assist in the defence of Chios. (Dem. l. c.; Diod. xvi. 7.) He died, according to Diodorus (xvi. 36) in b. c. 353, after a reign of twenty-four years, leaving no children, and was succeeded by his wife and sister Artemisia. The extravagant grief of the latter for his death, and the honours she paid to his memory—especially by the erection of the costly monument, which was called from him the Mausoleum, and was accounted one of the seven wonders of the world—are well known. [ARTEMISIA.] On occasion of the consecration of that monument, a prize was proposed by Artemisia for the best panegyric of her husband, and the praises of Mausolus were celebrated by rival orators, among whom Theopompus was the successful candidate. (Gell. x. 18.) Nevertheless, the character transmitted to us of the Carian prince is by no means one of un-mixed praise. He is said to have been very greedy of money, which he sought to accumulate by every means in his power, and thus amassed vast treasures at the expense of his subjects. The sums thus accumulated were in great part expended upon the decoration of his new capital, Halicarnassus, to which he had transferred the seat of government from Mylasa, the residence of the former princes of Caria, and where he not only constructed a splendid palace for himself, but adorned the city with a new agora, temples, and many other public works. So much taste and judgment, as well as magnificence, were displayed by him in these improvements, that they are cited by Vitruvius as a model in their kind. (Vitruv. ii. 8. §§ 11, 13.) The reception afforded by him to the astronomer Eudoxus (Diog. Laërt. viii. 87) is also a sign that he was not without tastes of an elevated character. (Strab. xiv. p. 656; Lucian. l. c.; Theopomp. ap. Harpocrat. et Suid. s. vv. Μαύσολος, Ἀρτεμισία; Polyaen. vii. 23. § 1; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 6.) Concerning the chronology of his reign see Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 286. [E. H. B.] dissolute habits, was altogether passed over in the division of the empire which followed the abdication of his father and Diocletian in a. d. 305. A strong feeling of disaffection towards the existing government prevailed at this time in Rome, arising from the pressure of increased taxation upon the nobles and wealthier classes, from the discontent of the praetorians who had been recently deprived of all their exclusive privileges, and from the indignation which pervaded the whole community, in consequence of the degradation of the ancient metropolis by the selection of Nicomedes and Milan as the residences of the Augusti. It proved no difficult task for the neglected prince to turn this angry spirit to his own advantage, and to place himself at the head of the party who styled themselves patriots. A regular conspiracy was soon organised and eagerly supported by men of all ranks, the standard of open revolt was raised, the feeble resistance of the few magistrates who remained true to their allegiance was easily overcome, Maxentius was proclaimed emperor on the 28th of October, a. d. 306, amidst the most enthusiastic demonstrations of zeal by the senate, the populace, and the soldiery; all Italy followed the example of the capital; and Africa, acquiescing in the choice, struck medals in honour of the new ruler. Severus [SEVERUS FLAVIUS VALERIUS], to whom the guardianship of these provinces had been committed, straightway marched upon Rome to suppress what he vainly deemed a trifling insurrection; but a large body of his troops having deserted to their old commander, Maximianus, who, upon the invitation of his son, had quitted his retreat in Lucania, and had again assumed the purple, the Caesar was compelled to retreat in all haste to Ravenna, hotly pursued by the veteran. In an evil hour he was persuaded by treacherous representations to quit this almost impregnable stronghold, and to trust to the clemency of his foe, who, having once obtained possession of his person, granted him nothing save the liberty of choosing the manner of his death (a. d. 307). Galerius, enraged by these disasters, hastened, at the head of a numerous host, drawn from Illyria and the East, to chastise the usurper; but the military talents of Maximianus devised a system of defence which paralysed the energies of his opponent. The invader found himself in a desert, the whole population had quitted the open country, every town capable of resistance shut its gates, and thus, although he penetrated almost unmolested to within less than a hundred miles of the city, the embarrassments by which he was surrounded, from want of supplies, from enemies in his rear, and from the doubtful fidelity of his soldiers, proved so numerous, that he considered it prudent to make overtures of peace; and when they were contemptuously rejected, commenced a hasty retreat. Maxentius, relieved from these imminent dangers, proceeded to disentangle himself from the control which his father sought to exercise; and having succeeded in driving him from the court [MAXIMIANUS], turned his arms against Africa, where a certain Alexander had established an independent sway. The contest was quickly terminated by the destruction of the pretender, and the victory was savagely abused. The whole country was ravaged with fire and sword; Carthage, at that epoch one of the most splendid cities in the world, was made the scene of a general conflagration and massacre, after which the conqueror

MAXENTIUS, Roman emperor a. d. 306—312. M. AURELIUS VALERIUS MAXENTIUS, the son of Maximianus Herulius and Eutropia, received in marriage the daughter of Galerius; but in consequence, it would seem, of his indolent and returned to Rome, there to celebrate a flagitious triumph, and to indulge the worst passions of a depraved nature, at the expense of the citizens.

Elated by these successes, Maxentius now openly aspired to dominion over all the Western provinces; and having first insulted and then declared open war against Constantine, assuming, as a pretext, the conduct of the latter towards Maximianus, he prepared to pass into Gaul with an army numbering not less than two hundred thousand men. But his schemes were frustrated by the prudent boldness of his adversary, who, encouraged by an embassy despatched from Rome imploring relief from the oppression of the despot, determined at once to cross the Alps. The events of this campaign are detailed elsewhere [CONSTANTINUS, p. 834]. The forces of the tyrant, shattered by the defeats of Turin and Verona, retired upon Rome; the decisive battle was fought at Saxa Rubra, not far from the storied stream of the Cremera; the imperial army, cut off from retreat, were driven by thousands into the Tiber; the Milvian bridge broke beneath the fugitives at the very moment when Maxentius was forcing his way through the throng which choked up the passage, and borne down by the weight of his armour, he perished miserably in the stream on the 28th of October, 312, exactly six years from the day on which he was saluted emperor.

All historians agree in representing this prince as a monster of rapacity, cruelty, and lust. The only favoured class was the military, upon whom he depended for safety; and in order to secure their devotion and to gratify his own evil passions, every other portion of his subjects were made the victims of the most revolting licentiousness, and ruined by the most grinding exactions. Various statements have been put forth with regard to his conduct towards the Christians, since by some he is commended for the solitary virtue of tolerance, while by others he is numbered among the most cruel persecutors. The truth seems to be, that neither of these representations is accurate. The Christians suffered in common with all who had the misfortune to own his sway; but while there is no reason to believe that they received any encouragement or patronage, so, on the other hand, there is no evidence to prove that they were at any time the objects of special hostility. COIN OF MAXENTIUS.

MAXENTIUS, JOANNES, whom Cave, apparently without just ground, identifies with JOANNES SCYTHOPOLITANUS (Ἰωάννης ὁ Σκυθopolίτης) [JOANNES, No. 111.], lived in the early part of the sixth century. In the beginning of the reign of the Byzantine emperor, Justin I., who succeeded Anastasius A. D. 518, certain "Scythian monks," as their contemporaries term them, who appear to have come from the bishopric of Tomi and the adjacent bishoprics near the south bank of the Danube, made a great stir at Constantinople, by contending for the propriety of the expression "Unus e Trinitate in carne crucifixus est." This mode of expression was suspected of covering the Monophysite or Eutychian heresy (ΕΥΤΥΧΙΣΜΟΣ); and the formula "Una Persona e Trinitate" was regarded as more orthodox. Here was sufficient cause in that age of logomachy for bitter controversy. Maxentius appeared in Constantinople on the side of the "Scythians;" but whether he was one of them is questionable: he was, or claimed to be, of the monastic profession, and styled himself abbot; but from what place he came is very doubtful. The Magdeburgh Centuriators and Poessevin absurdly identify him with Maxentius, an abbot of Poitou, in France; and Usber, followed by Cave, misunderstanding an expression in one of Maxentius' works, makes him a monk and prebyter of Antioch. Some have confounded him with the Joannes of Antioch mentioned by Gennadius (de Viris Illust. c. 93). From whatever quarter he came, he entered warmly into the contest, which was further inflamed by the addition of the controversy about divine grace, revived in the East by the diffusion of the Semi-Pelagian writings of Faustus of Riez [FAUSTUS RHEGENSIS]. Maxentius became the leader of the Scythians, and presented on their part and his own a confession of faith to the legates of pope Hormisdas, who were at Constantinople on other matters. This confession was designed to vindicate them from the suspicion or charge of Eutychianism, and to obtain the sanction of the legates to the favourite expression "Unus e Trinitate," &c. Failing in this, four of the monks, of whom it is questioned whether Maxentius was one, were despatched to Rome, to try what could be done with the pope himself. But though they strained every nerve, they could effect nothing; and after a stay of a year or more they returned to Constantinople; shortly after which Hormisdas, in a letter to Possessor, an African bishop then in exile at Constantinople, branded them as deceivers and men of the worst character. To this letter Maxentius published a reply; and in order to have more liberty to assail it, chose to regard it as not genuine. Nothing further of Maxentius' history is known.

His works are extant only in a Latin version, and have been published in various collections of the fathers. They first appeared in the Orthodoxographia, fol. Basel, 1555. In the Maximo Bithynæ Patrum, fol. Lyon, 1677, vol. ix. p. 533, &c., they appear in the following order:—1. Joannis Maxentii Confessio suae Fidei, s. de Christo Professio, with a prefatory letter to the legates of the Holy See. This appears to be the confession already noticed. 2. Ejusdem contra Nestorianos Capta, these appear to have been published by the delegates of the Scythian monks at Rome, and consist of twelve brief anathemas against various dogmas. 3. Ejusdem alia Fidei Professio, shorter than No. 1. It is not known on what occasion it was composed. 4. Ejusdem Admonitionis Verbi Dei ad propriam Carnem Ratio. This is followed by the letter of Hormisdas to Possessor, already noticed; and then 5. Maxentius' reply, Joannis Maxenti ad Epistolam Hormisdæ Responsio. The remaining works are: 6. Ejusdem contra Acephalos Iulianus. 7. Ejusdem Dialogorum contra Nestorianos, Libri II. To these several pieces are prefixed, by the editor of the Bibliotheca, short introductions, pointing out their supposed heretical tendency. Baronius also bitterly inveighs against the heresies of Maxentius, who is, however, ably vindicated by Cardinal Noris and by John Forbes of Aberdeen. (Baron. Annales ad ann. 519, 520; Norisius, Histor. Pelagian. ii. 18—20; Forbesius, Instruction. Historico-Theologic. iii. 21; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 520, vol. i. p. 505, ed. Oxf. 1740—1742; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 540.) [J. C. M.]

MAXIMIANUS I., Roman emperor, A. D. 286—305—310. M. AURELIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS, born of humble parents in Pannonia, had acquired such high fame by his services in the army, that when Diocletian carried into effect (A. D. 285) his celebrated scheme for dividing without dismembering the empire [DIOCLETIANUS, p. 1012], he was induced to select this rough soldier for his colleague, as one whose habits and abilities were likely to prove particularly valuable in the actual disturbed state of public affairs, and accordingly created him first Caesar (285), and then Augustus (286), conferring at the same time the honorary appellation of Herculeus, while he himself assumed that of Jovius, epithets which afforded a copious theme to the panegyrist of that epoch for broad adulation and far-fetched conceits. The subsequent history of Maximian is so intimately blended with that of his patron and of Constantine, that almost every particular has been fully detailed in former articles. [DIOCLETIANUS; CONSTANTINUS I.; MAXENTIUS.] It will be sufficient, therefore, to direct attention to the leading acts, that after having been most reluctantly persuaded, if not compelled to abdicate, at Milan, on the first of May, A. D. 305, he eagerly obeyed the invitation of his son Maxentius the following year (306), and quitting his retirement in Lucania, was again invested with all the insignia of the imperial action; that having by his bravery and skill, surmounted the dangers which threatened Italy, having surpassed the death of Severus (307), and having rescued Galerius, he formed a close union with Constantine, on whom he bestowed the title of Augustus and the hand of his daughter Fausta; that on his return to Rome he was expelled by Maxentius, who, having become impatient of his control and dictation, pretended or believed that he had formed a plot for his dethronement; that having taken himself to the court of Galerius, and having been there detected in the prosecution of treasonable intrigues, he sought refuge with his son-in-law, and, to disarm all suspicion, once more formally threw off the purple; that having taken advantage of the temporary absence of his protector and unscrupulously gained possession of the treasures deposited at Arles, by profuse bribery he persuaded a body of soldiers to proclaim him Augustus for the third time; that having been shut up in Marles and compelled to surrender, he was stripped of all his dignities, but permitted to retain his liberty (308); but that, finally, two years afterwards, having vainly endeavoured to induce daughter Fausta to destroy her husband, he was forced to choose the manner of his death, and hanged himself in the month of February, A. D.

The whole history of this stormy period bears testimony to the military talents of Maximianus, and proves with equal certainty that he was totally destitute of all dignity of mind, thoroughly unprincipled, not merely rough and stern, but base and cruel. All authorities agree that he was altogether devoid of cultivation or refinement, and it is said that his features and general aspect were an index of the coarseness and harshness of the mind within. So long as he was guided by the superior genius and commanding intellect of Diocletian, he performed well the work for which he was chosen, but the latter years of his life, when left to the direction of his own judgment, exhibit a melancholy spectacle of weak ambition, turbulence, perfidy, and crime.

Maximianus married Eutropia, a widow of Syrian extraction, by whom he had two children, the emperor Maxentius, and Fausta, wife of Constantine the Great. Eutropia, by her former husband, who is unknown, had a daughter, Flavia Maximiana Theodora, who was united to Constantius Chlorus when he was elevated to the rank of Caesar. COIN OF MAXIMIANUS I.

MAXIMIANUS II., Roman emperor, A. D. 305—311. GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS, born near Sardica in Dacia, was the son of a shepherd, and in early life followed the humble calling of his parent. Hence he is frequently designated in history by the epithet Argentarius, although this must be regarded rather as a familiar than as a formal appellation, since it nowhere appears upon any public monument. Having served in the wars of Aurelian and Probus, he passed through all the inferior grades of military rank in succession, with such distinguished reputation, that when Diocletian remodelled the constitution of the empire [DIOCLETIANUS, p. 1012], he was chosen along with Constantius Chlorus, in A. D. 292, to discharge the dignified but arduous duties of a Caesar, was adopted by the elder emperor, whose daughter Valeria he received in marriage, was permitted to participate in the title of Jovius, and was entrusted with the command of Illyria and Thrace. In A. D. 297 he undertook an expedition against the Persian monarch Narses, and after his failure was treated with the most insulting harshness by his father-in-law. But having fully redeemed his credit by the glorious issue of the second campaign [DIOCLETIANUS, p. 1012], he from this time forward assumed a more haughty bearing, which gradually took the form of arrogant dictation, as the bodily health and mental energies of his superior gradually sunk under the pressure of complicated anxieties. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian (A. D. 305), an event which is said to have been hastened, if not caused, by his intrigues and threats, Galerius having succeeded in nominating two creatures of his own, Daza and Severus [MAXIMINUS II.; SEVERUS], to the posts of Caesars, now vacant in consequence of the elevation of himself and Constantius to the higher rank of Augusti, began to look forward with confidence to the period when the death of his colleague should leave him sole master of the world. But these hopes were destined to be signally frustrated. The news of the decease of Chlorus was accompanied by the intelligence that the troops had enthusiastically proffered their allegiance to his son, Galerius, filled with disappointment and rage, found himself in no condition to resist, and although he refused to concede a higher title than that of Caesar to Constantine, was obliged virtually to resign all claim to the sovereignty of Gaul and Britain. This mortification was followed by the more formidable series of disasters occasioned by the usurpation of Maxentius which led to the destruction of Severus, to the disgrace of Galerius himself, after a most calamitous campaign, and thus to the loss of Italy and Africa [MAXENTIVS], A. D. 307. From this time forward, however, his life passed more tranquilly, for having supplied the place of Severus by his old friend and comrade Licinius [LICINIUS], he seems to have abandoned those schemes of extravagant ambition once so eagerly cherished, and to have devoted his attention to great works of public utility, the draining of lakes and the clearing of forests, until cut off in A. D. 311, by the same terrible disease which is said to have terminated the existence of Sulla and of Herod Agrippa.

Of a haughty and ungovernable temper, cruel to his enemies, ungrateful to his benefactors, a stranger to all the arts which soften the heart or refine the intellect, the character of this prince presents nothing to admire, except the valour of a fearless soldier and the skill of an accomplished general. The blackest shade upon his memory is thrown by his pitiless persecution of the Christians, whom he ever regarded with rancorous hostility, instigated, we are told, by the furious bigotry of his mother, an ardent cultivator of some of the darker rites of the ancient faith. The fatal ordinance of Diocletian, which for so many years deluged the world with innocent blood, is said to have been extorted by the pertinacious violence of Galerius, whose tardy repentance expressed in the famous edict of toleration published immediately before his death, made but poor amends for the amount of misery which he had deliberately caused.

Galerius, by his first wife, whose name is unknown, and whom he was required to repudiate when created Caesar, had one daughter, who was married to Maxentius; by his second, Galeria Valeria, the daughter of Diocletian, he had no children. [VALERIA.] (Zonim. ii. 8, 10, 11; Zonar. xii. 32, 33, 34; Euseb. H. E. viii. 5, 17, Vit. Constant. 18; Auctor. de Mort. Persec. 18, &c., 33, &c.; Amm. Marc. § 3.) [W. R.]

MAXIMIANUS, the poet, whose full name was CORNELIUS MAXIMIANUS GALLUS ETRUSCUS. In the year 1501, Pomponius Gauricus, a Neapolitan youth of nineteen, published at Venice six amatory elegies, little remarkable for purity of thought or of expression, under the title "Cornelii Galli Fragmenta," with a preface, in which he endeavoured to prove from internal evidence that they must be regarded as belonging to the ill-fated Cornelius Gallus, the friend of Virgil and Ovid. [GALLUS, CORNELIVS.] They profess to be written by an old man, and the leading theme is the infirmities and miseries of age. These, as contrasted with the vigour and joys of youth, form the exclusive subject of the first piece; the second, third, and fourth contain an account of three mistresses who had in succession ruled his heart, Aquilina, Candida, and Lycoris; the two former had been the objects of a transient flame; the last, long his faithful companion, had at length forsaken him in declining years; in the fifth he gives the history of a senile passion for a Grecian damsel; and the sixth, which extends to a dozen lines only, is filled with complaints and lamentations called forth by the near approach of death. The points upon which Gauricus chiefly insisted for the proof of his proposition were:—1. That we know from Virgil and other sources that Lycoris was the name under which Gallus celebrated the charms and the cruelty of his loved Cytheria. 2. That the author of these poems describes himself as an Etruscan. 3. That the expressions at the beginning of the fifth elegy evidently allude to his office as prefect of Egypt.

These reasonings were at first freely admitted; the elegies were frequently reprinted with the name of Gallus, and subjoined without suspicion to many of the earlier editions of Catullus, Tibullus, and Propertius, as the works of their contemporary. Upon a more critical examination, however, it was soon perceived that the impure Latinity and faulty versification accorded ill with the Augustan era; that a fictitious name, such as Lycoris, might be regarded as common property; that the fact, which is unquestionable, of the author declaring himself an Etruscan, in itself proves that he could not be Cornelius Gallus who was a native of Forum Julii (Fregius) in Southern Gaul; that the repining at old age were altogether out of place in one who perished while yet in the strength of manhood; and finally, that the terms in which an allusion is made to his political appointment—are such as could never have been employed to designate the duties of the imperial prefect in the most important and jealously guarded of all the Roman provinces. But when, in addition to these considerations, it was discovered that the MAX- which are very numerous, and the early printed impressions, of which two at least, if not three, had appeared in the fifteenth century, exhibited a couplet which was altogether omitted by Gauricus, and that this couplet (iv. 25),

Atque aliqua, cui caeca foret bene nota voluptas, Cantat, cantantem Maximianus amat, actually furnished the name of the real author, a name, be it remarked, prefixed to many MSS., and to these very early editions, it became evident that fraud had been at work, and that Gauricus had been guilty of deliberate imposture. Some time, however, elapsed before the most acute scholars could divest themselves of the impression that Gallus was in some way concerned with these productions. Gyrardus contended that one or two out of the six might be genuine; Julius Caesar Scaliger went farther, and believed that only one was spurious, that on Aquilina; while Barthius imagined that all anomalies might be explained by supposing that the sketches of Gallus had been overlaid and interpolated by a later and unskilful hand. By degrees these and similar positions were found untenable, and the whole fabric was acknowledged to be the workmanship of a semi-barbarous epoch. This being granted, the next task was to discover who Maximianus was, and when he flourished. This investigation cannot be pushed far. From his own words we conclude, as noticed above, that he was by birth an Etruscan: it would appear that he spent his youth at Rome, devoting himself to poetry and rhetoric, that he acquired widespread reputation as a speaker—and that, when far advanced in life, he was despatched to the East on an important mission, involving the peaceful relations of two kingdoms. Beyond this we can scarcely advance. Goldastus, Fontanini, and Wernsdorf have, indeed, proved to their own satisfaction that he is the very Maximianus to whom king Theodoric addressed a letter preserved by Cassiodorus (Variar. i. 21), and they have undertaken to determine the period and the object of the embassy. Their reasoning, however, is so shadowy that it completely eludes the grasp, and is in fact an elaborate attempt to create a substantial reality out of nothing. The most stringent argument which they can find is based upon the couplet (iii. 47),

Orator toto clarus in orbe fui,

Hic mihi, magnarum scrutator maxime rerum,
Solus, Boëti, fers miseratus opem, where it is assumed that the person addressed must be Boëthius the philosopher.

Three out of the four names placed at the head of this article are probably fictitious. The MSS., we are assured, exhibit simply Maximianus, or L. Maximianus. The Editio Princeps, in fol., which, although without date, and without name of place or printer, is known by bibliographers to have been printed at Utrecht about 1473, bears for its title Maximiani Philosphi atque Oratoris clarissimi Ethica suavis et perjocondi, and a second edition, also very old, but without date, printed at Paris in 4to. by S. Jehannot and Petrus le Drou, commences Perjocondius, juvenum quoque mirum in modum delectans animos, Libellus, quem nugarum Maximiani inimitis Alexander intulit, &c. The verses having for a long time after the publication of Gauricus been extensively circulated as the remains of Cornelius Gallus, were eventually allowed to retain his designation along with that of the lawful owner, and Etruscus is merely an epithet attached by some editor.

The present division into six pieces is purely arbitrary, and originated, it would appear, with Gauricus. In many codices the whole are written as one continuous poem, with the following or some similar inscription, Facetum et perjocondum Poema de Amoribus Maximiani, Poetas doctissimi, Oratoris suavisissimi.

Labbe in his Bibliotheca nova Manuscriptorum mentions other poems of Maximianus, which he distinguishes, Super Senectute; Regulam Metricam; Carmen de Virtute et Invidia, de Ira, Patientia, et Avaritia; but of these nothing is known, unless the first be another name for what we now possess. There is no reason to believe that the epigrams in the anthology found among the exercises of the twelve scholastic poets, one of whom is called Maximianus, have any connection with the individual whom we are now discussing. The elegies will be found under their best form in the Poëtæ Latini Minores of Wernsdorf, vol. vi. pars i. p. 269, who gives a detailed catalogue of the different editions. MAXIMILLA, EGNATIA. [EGNATIA.]

MAXIMINUS I., Roman emperor, A. D. 235—238. C. JULIUS VERUS MAXIMINUS was born in a village on the confines of Thrace, of barbarian parentage, his father Mica being a Goth, his mother Ababa a German, from a tribe of the Alani. Brought up as a shepherd, he attracted the attention of Septimius Severus, by his gigantic stature and marvellous feats of strength, was permitted to enlist in the cavalry, was appointed one of the guards in immediate attendance on the person of the emperor, and soon gained the good-will of his officers and the respect of his fellow-soldiers. Under Caracalla he attained to the rank of centurion, and was familiarly designated, from his prowess, Milo, Antaeus, or Hercules. Being regarded with suspicious hatred by Macrinus, the assassin of his patron, he retired for a while to his native province, where he acquired some property, and maintained a cordial intercourse with his barbarian countrymen, to whom he was an object of no small pride and admiration. Returning to Rome upon the accession of Elagabalus, although disgusted by his profligate folly, he accepted the appointment of tribune, studiously absenting himself, however, from court during the whole reign. By Alexander he was received with great distinction, was entrusted with the important task of organising the great host, collected chiefly from the East, for the invasion of Germany, was eventually, if we can trust the desultory and indistinct narrative of the Augustan historian, nominated general-in-chief of all the armies, and hopes were held out that his son would receive in marriage the sister of the emperor. But even these honours did not satisfy his ambition. Taking advantage of the bad feeling which existed among the troops, he artfully contrived to stimulate their discontent, until a regular conspiracy was matured, which ended in the assassination of Severus in Gaul [SEVERUS], and in his own investiture (A. D. 235) with the purple by the mutinous soldiers, whose choice was not resisted by an intimidated senate.

Maximinus immediately bestowed the title of Caesar on his son Maximus, and without seeking to display his new dignity in the metropolis, determined to prosecute with all vigour the war against the Germans, and accordingly crossed the Rhine towards the end of the year A. D. 235. The campaign, which lasted for upwards of eighteen months, was triumphantly successful. The enemy, after having in vain attempted to withstand the progress of the invaders, were compelled to take refuge in their woods and marshes, many thousand villages were destroyed, the flocks and herds were slaughtered or driven off, a vast amount of plunder, including multitudes of prisoners, was secured, and the emperor retired to Pannonia in the autumn of 237, with the resolution of re-crossing the Danube in the following spring, in order that he might subjugate the Sarmatians and carry his arms even to the shores of the ocean. Meanwhile, his administration had been characterised by a degree of oppression and sanguinary excess hitherto unexampled. His maxim, we are assured, was "nisi crudelitate imperium non teneri," and unquestionably his practice seems to have been guided by some such brutal principle. This violence was first called forth by the discovery of an extensive plot, contrived originally, we are told, by a certain Magnus, a consular, in which many officers and men of rank were involved. The vengeance of the tyrant was not glutted until four thousand victims had been sacrificed, the greater number of whom were destroyed upon the most vague suspicion. From this time forward informers were encouraged to ply their trade. An accusation was instantly followed by a sentence of death or confiscation; the most opulent were persecuted with untiring rancour, and numbers of illustrious families reduced to indigence. When the sums lavished on the troops could no longer be supplied by the plunder of private individuals, the next step was to lay violent hands on public property of every description. The sums reserved in the treasury for the purchase of corn, the fund set apart for theatrical exhibitions, the wealth accumulated in the temples, and the very statues of the gods, were all ruthlessly seized,—proceedings which called forth expressions of such deep indignation, that the soldiers were ashamed to enrich themselves from these sources. Against no class did the jealous rage of Maximinus burn so fiercely as against the senate. Remembering with bitterness the insults he had endured in former days from the very slaves of the haughty nobles, he eagerly seized every pretext for pillaging, eviling, and murdering the members of a body so detested. The same ferocity broke forth even against the soldiers, who were subjected for trivial offences to the most horrid tortures, so that history and mythology were ransacked to discover some monstrous prototype for the man whom they had once loved to term Hercules, or Ajax, or Achilles, but who was now more frequently designated as Cyclops, or Busiris, or Sciron, or Phalaris, or Typhon, or Gyges. But this fury was kindled into absolute madness, when, in the beginning of A. D. 238, Maximinus received intelligence of the insurrection in Africa headed by the Gordians, of the favour displayed by the provinces and the senate towards their cause, of the resolutions by which he himself had been declared a public enemy, of the subsequent elevation of Maximus with Balbinus, and of their recognition in Italy by all orders of the state. He is said upon this occasion to have rent his garments, to have thrown himself upon the ground and dashed his head against the wall in impotent fury, to have howled like a wild beast, to have struck all whom he encountered, and to have attempted to tear out the eyes of his own son. Abandoning at once his projected expedition, orders were instantly given to march against Rome. Passing over the Julian Alp, the army descended upon Aquileia. That important city, the chief bulwark of the peninsula on the north-eastern frontier, stimulated by the patriotic zeal of Crispinus and Menophilus, the two consuls entrusted with the defence of the district, shut its gates against the tyrant, who was forced to form a regular siege. The walls were bravely defended, and the assailants suffered severely, not only from the valour of the townsmen, but likewise from the want of supplies, the whole of the surrounding district having been laid waste in anticipation of their approach. The bad passions and ungovernable temper of Maximinus were lashed into frenzy by these delays, the chief officers were put to death, and the most intemperate harshness employed towards the men. At length a body of praetorians, dreading some new outbreak of cruelty, repaired to the tent of the emperor and his son, who were reposing during the mid-day heat, and having forced an entrance, cut off their heads, which were first displayed on poles to the gaze of the citizens on the battlements of Aquileia, and then despatched to Rome. The grisly trophies were exposed for a time to public view, that all might revel in the spectacle, and then burned in the Campus Martius, amidst the insulting shouts of the crowd. These feelings were shared by all the civilized provinces in the empire, although the rude dwellers on the northern frontiers lamented the loss of a sovereign chosen from among themselves.

We have already seen that Maximinus owed his first advancement to his physical powers, which seem to have been almost incredible. His height exceeded eight feet, but his person was not ungraceful, for the size and muscular development of his limbs were in proportion to his stature, the circumference of his thumb being equal to that of a woman's wrist, so that the bracelet of his wife served him for a ring. His fair skin gave token of his Scandinavian extraction, while the remarkable magnitude of his eyes communicated a bold and imposing expression to his features. In addition to his unequalled prowess as a wrestler, he was able single-handed to drag a loaded waggon, could with his fist knock out the grinders, and with a kick break the leg of a horse; while his appetite was such, that in a day he could eat fifty pounds of meat, and drink an amphora of wine. At least such are the statements of ancient writers, though they should doubtless be received with some deductions.

The chronology of this reign, which is extremely obscure, in consequence of the ignorance and carelessness of our ancient authorities, has been elucidated with great skill by Eckhel, whose arguments, founded chiefly upon the evidence afforded by medals, appear quite irresistible. From these it appears certain that the death of Alexander Severus happened not later than the beginning of July, A. D. 235; that Maximinus betook himself to Sirmium, after his successful campaign against the Germans, towards the close of A. D. 237; that the elevation of the Gordians in Africa took place about the commencement of March, A. D. 238, and their death about six weeks afterwards; that Maximinus set out upon his march for Rome early in April, sat down before Aquileia towards the end of the month, and was slain, in all probability about the middle of May.

The names C. Julius Verus, together with the titles Dacicus Maximus and Sarmaticus Maximus, appear in inscriptions only; medals at first exhibit the simple Maximianus, to which Germanicus is added in those struck during A. D. 236, and the following years. (Capitolin. Maximian. duo; Herodian. lib. vii. viii.; Zonar. xii. 16.) [ALEXANDER SEVERUS; GORDIANUS; BALBINUS; QUARTILUS; CRISPINUS; MENOPHILUS.] [W. R.]

COIN OF MAXIMINUS I.

MAXIMINUS II., Roman emperor 305—314. GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMINUS, who originally bore the name of DAZA, was the nephew of Galerius by a sister, and in early life followed the occupation of a shepherd in his native Illyria. Having forsaken this humble calling for the life of a soldier, by force of interest rather than of any conspicuous merit, he rose to the highest rank in the service, and upon the abdication of Diocletian at Nicomedeia in A. D. 305 [DIOCLETIANUS, p. 1013], although altogether undistinguished, and indeed unknown, was adopted by the new emperor of the East, received the title of Jovius, was elevated to the rank of Caesar, and was nominated to the government of Syria and Egypt. Little grateful for these extraordinary and most undeserved marks of favour, he displayed violent indignation upon being passed over in the arrangements which followed the death of Constantius Chlorus in A. D. 307, when Licinius was created Augustus. [LICINIUS; GALERIUS MAXIMIANUS.] Far from being satisfied by the concession of Galerius, who invented the new title of Fili Augustorum to supersede the appellation of Cæsars, he assumed without permission the highest imperial designation, and with much difficulty succeeded in wringing a reluctant acquiescence from his uncle. Upon the death of the latter, in 311, he entered into a convention with Licinius, in terms of which he received the provinces of Asia Minor in addition to his former dominion, the Hellespont and the Bosphorus forming the common boundary of the two sovereignties; but having treacherously taken advantage of the absence of his neighbour, who had repaired to Milan in 313 for the purpose of receiving in marriage the sister of Constantine, he suddenly invaded Thrace, and surprised Byzantium. Having, however, been signally defeated in a great battle fought near Heracleia, he fled first to Nicomedeia and thence to Tarsus, where he soon after died according to some accounts of despair, according to others by poison. His wife and children were murdered, and every imaginable insult heaped upon his memory by the conqueror.

The great military talents of Herculius, Galerius, and Licinius, served in some degree, if not to palliate, at least to divert attention from, their vices and their crimes. But not one quality, either noble or dazzling, relieves the coarse brutality of Maximin, who surpassed all his contemporaries in the profligacy of his private life, in the general cruelty of his administration, and in the furious hatred with which he persecuted the Christians. His elevation, which was the result of family influence alone, must have been as unexpected by himself as by others; but he did not prove by any means such a passive and subservient tool as was anticipated. His extravagant vanity, for we can scarcely dignify the feeling by the name of ambition, was for a while gratified, because Galerius felt unwilling to engage in a civil war with the creature of his own hands; but the arrogance engendered by this success in all probability prompted him to the unprovoked aggression which proved his ruin. COIN OF MAXIMINUS II.

MAXIMINUS, the excellent ambassador of Theodosius the Younger to Attila in A. D. 448. He was already conspicuous in the Persian war in 422, when he was lieutenant of Ardaburius. Theodosius sent him in 448 to Attila; Orestes and Edicon, the Hunnic ambassadors at Constantinople, returned with him to Pannonia. This Edicon had been bribed by the minister, Chrysaphius, to murder Attila, but on his arrival in Pannonia informed his master of the plot, of which Maximin was totally ignorant. Attila was well aware of this, and consequently turned his resentment only against the emperor and the minister at Constantinople, disdaining even to punish Vigilus, who was the entire promoter of the scheme, and who was entrapped in his turn by Attila. This embassy of Maximin is described by his secretary, Priscus, to whom we refer for the interesting details of an event to which we are indebted for nearly all our knowledge of Attila's person and private life. Maximin became afterwards one of the four principal ministers of the emperor Marcian; and in later years held the supreme command in Egypt, whence he made a successful campaign against the Aethiopians. He is invariably represented as a virtuous, firm, and highly talented man. (Priscus, p. 39, 40, 48—70; Socrat. Hist. Eccles., vii. 20; Priscus.) [W. P.]

MA'XIMUS AEGIENSIS (δ Αἰγυῖος), of Aegae in Cilicia, a writer contemporary with Apollonius of Tyana [APOLLONIUS TYANAÆUS], of some of whose transactions he wrote an account, which was part of the materials employed by Philostratus [PHILOSTRATUS] in his biography of that philosopher. (Philostr. Apollon. Vit. l. 3; Euseb. In Hierodem. c. 2, 3; Tetzze, Chilias. II. Hist. 60, vs. 974, Chilias. IX. Hist. 291, vs. 865; Voss. De Hist. Græc. ii. 10.) [J. C. M.]

MAXIMUS ALEXANDRINUS, known also as the cynic philosopher (Κυνικός φιλόσοφος), was a native of Alexandria, the son of Christian parents of rank, who had suffered on account of their religion; but whether from Pagan or Arian violence is not clear. Maximus united the faith of an orthodox believer with the garb and deportment of a cynic philosopher, and was held in great respect by the leading theologians of the orthodox party. Athanasius, in a letter written about A. D. 371 (Epist. ad Maxim. Philosoph. Opp. vol. i. p. 917. &c. ed. Benedict.), pays him several compliments on a work written in defence of the orthodox faith. Tillemont and the Benedictine editor of the works of Gregory Nazianzen (Monitum ad Orat. xxv.), misled by the virulent invectives of that father, attempt to distinguish between our Maximus and the one to whom Athanasius wrote, on the ground that Athanasius could never have spoken so well of so worthless a character. They also distinguish him from the Maximus to whom Basil the Great addressed a letter (Ep. 41, edit. vett. 9, ed. Benedict. vol. iii. p. 90, ejusd. edit. p. 127, ed. Benedict. alteræ, Paris, 1839) in terms of the highest respect, discussing some doctrinal questions, and soliciting a visit from him; but they are not successful in either case. However, the Maximus Scholasticus, to whom Basil also wrote (Ep. 42, edit. vett. 277, ed. Benedict.), was a different person. In A. D. 374, during the reign of the emperor Valens, in the persecution carried on by Lucius, Arian patriarch of Alexandria [LUCIUS, No. 2], Maximus was cruelly scourged, and banished to the Oasis, on account of his zeal for orthodoxy and the promptitude with which he succoured those who suffered in the same cause (Gregor. Nazianz. Orat. xxv. c. 13, 14). He obtained his release in about four years (Id.), probably on the death of Valens; and it was perhaps soon after his release that he presented to the emperor Gratian at Mediolanum (Milan), his work Περὶ τῆς πίστεως, De Fide, written against the Arians (comp. Hieron. De Viris Illustr. c. 127). Tillemont, however, thinks that the work was presented to the emperor when Maximus was in Italy, A. D. 382, after the council of Constantinople. He wrote also against other heretics, but whether in the same work or in another is not clear (Greg. Naz. ib.); and disputed ably against the heathens (Id.). Apparently on his return from Milan he visited Constantinople, where Gregory Nazianzen had just been appointed to the patriarchate (A. D. 379). Gregory received him with the highest honour; and pronounced an oration in his praise (Orat. xxv.), compared with which the sober commendations of Athanasius and Basil are cold and tame. He received him at his table, and treated him with the greatest confidence and regard. He was, however, grievously disappointed in him. Whether the events which followed were the results solely of the ambition of Maximus, or whether Maximus was himself the tool of others, is not clear. Taking advantage of the sickness of Gregory, and supported by some Egyptian ecclesiastics, sent by Peter, patriarch of Alexandria, under whose directions they professed to act, Maximus was ordained, during the night, patriarch of Constantinople, in the place of Gregory, whose election had not been perfectly canonical. This audacious proceeding excited the greatest indignation among the people, with whom Gregory was popular. Nor did the emperor Theodosius, then at Thessalonica, to whom the usurper applied, show them any favour. Maximus therefore withdrew to Alexandria, from which he was in a short time expelled by his patron, Peter. (Gregor. Nazian. Oratio de Vita sua, vs. 750—1029.)

The resignation of Gregory, who was succeeded in the patriarchate of Constantinople by Nectarius, did not benefit Maximus. His election was declared null by the second general (first Constantinopolitan) council, and the presbyters whom he had ordained were declared not to be presbyters. (Concil. CP. dit. can. 3. sec. Dionys. Exiguus; Capital. 6. sec. Isidor. Mercat.; apud Concil. vol. i. col. 809, 810, ed. Hardouin.) He attempted even after this to assert his claims to the patriarchate; but though the Italian bishops for a while seemed disposed to support him, he met with no success. The invectives of Gregory Nazianzen against Maximus (Carmina, ec. De Vita sua, l. c.; In Isidoros, vs. 16, &c.; In Maximum) were written after their struggle for the patriarchate, and contrast singularly with the praises of his twenty-fifth Oration, to which some of Gregory's admirers, to conceal the inconsistency, prefixed the name of Heron or Hero, Εἰς Ἡρώνα, In Laudem Heronis (Hieron. De Viris Illustr. l. c.), which it still bears. The work of Maximus, De Fide, which is well spoken of by Jerome, is lost. (Athanas., Basil., Gregor. Nazianz., Hieronym. l. cc.; Sossamen, H. E. vii. 9. cum not. Valez.; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. ix. p. 443, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 380, vol. i. p. 276, ed. Oxford, 1740—42; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 520.) [J. C. M.]

MA'XIMUS, L. A'PPIUS, a distinguished Roman general in the reigns of Domitian and Trajan. In A. D. 91 Maximus quelled the revolt of Antonius in Germany, and at the same time had the magnanimity to burn all the letters of the latter, that they might not expose others to the vengeance of Domitian. In A. D. 101 he fought with success under Trajan in the Dacian war against Decebalus. In A. D. 115 he was one of Trajan's generals in the Parthian war; but here his good fortune failed him, for he was defeated and perished in this year. We learn from the Fasti that he was consul in A. D. 103. (Dion. Cass. lxxvii. 11. lxxviii. 9, 30.) There is some doubt about the exact form of his name. Dion Cassius names him simply L. Maximus; but Domitian, in a letter contained among those of Pliny (x. 66), and the Fasti call him L. Appius Maximus, which is the form we have adopted. But Martial (ix. 83), and Aurelius Victor (Epit. 11. § 10), give to the conqueror of Antonius the name of Appius Norbanus. These statements can only be reconciled by supposing that his full name was L. Appius Maximus Norbanus.

MA'XIMUS BYZANTIUS. [MAXIMUS EPIROTA.]

MA'XIMUS CAESAR, whose full name was C. JULIUS VERUS MAXIMUS, was the son of Mar-

iminus I., upon whose accession he became Cæsar and Princeps Juventutis; and having accompanied the emperor in the campaigns against the barbarians, he was subsequently styled Germanicus, Sarmaticus, and Dacicus. It does not appear probable, however, that he was invested with the tribunician power or with the consulship, or that he was ever formally associated in the imperial dignity with the title of Augustus, although such legends as VICTORIA AVGVSTORVM and MAXIMVS ET MAXIMVS. AVGVSTI. GERMANICI, are found upon medals. He was murdered, along with his father, by the troops while besieging Aquileia, A. D. 238, at the age of eighteen, or, according to other authorities, twenty-one. From coins and inscriptions we are enabled to pronounce with certainty that his name was Maximus, and not Maximianus, as Capitolinus would lead us to suppose.

This youth was equally celebrated for the surpassing beauty of his person, the elaborate finish of his dress, and the excessive haughtiness of his demeanour. He was, however, educated with much care, was well acquainted with Greek and Latin literature, and seems in many respects to have had a good disposition. It is said that Alexander had at one time some thoughts of bestowing his sister, Theoclia, upon Maximus in marriage; and at a later period he was betrothed to Junia Fadilla, a great-grand-daughter of Antoninus. Capitolinus, Maximin. juv.; Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 291, 297; MAXIMINVS I. [W. R.]

COIN OF MAXIMVS CAESAR.

MAXIMVS, CAESONIUS, was banished from Italy by Nero on the detection of Piso's conspiracy in A. D. 66. (Tac. Ann. xv. 72.) From an epigram of Martial (vii. 44), addressed to one Ovidius, a friend of Caesonius Maximus, we learn that Maximus had been consul, and also that he was one of the friends of Seneca, which was no doubt the cause of his punishment.

MAXIMVS, CARVILIUS. 1. SP. CARVILIUS C. F. C. N. MAXIMVS, was curule aedile B. C. 99, and consul A. C. 293, with L. Papirius Cursor. Their consulship was distinguished by brilliant victories over the Samnites, who had made immense exertions to ensure success, and had penetrated to Campania. Carvilius first took Amitemnum, and then proceeded to assault Cominium, while his colleague engaged with the great Samnite army, the soldiers of which had devoted themselves to quest or death by the most solemn vows. After Carvilius had gained a brilliant victory over this army, Carvilius took Cominium, and then proceeded to attack Palumbinum and Herculaneum, both of which fell into his hands, although he had previously suffered a defeat from the Samnites near the latter town. After this Carvilius was called away into Etruria, where the Faliscans had broken peace.

Here, too, he was successful; he took the towns of Troilium and five other fortified places, defeated the enemy and granted peace to the Faliscans on the payment of a large sum of money. On his return to Rome he celebrated a splendid triumph—according to Livy, over the Samnites and Etruscans, and after the triumph of Papirius; according to the Triumphal Fasti, over the Samnites alone, and a month before the triumph of his colleague. Carvilius acquired great popularity by distributing a large part of the booty among the soldiers, which his colleague had not done; but even after this distribution he paid into the treasury 380,000 pounds of bronze, and applied the remainder to the erection of a temple of Fors Fortuna. With the bronze armour taken from the Samnites he made a colossal statue of Jupiter upon the Capitol, which was of such a height that it could be seen from the temple on the Alban Mount; and with the bronze which fell off in polishing this work he had his own statue cast, which was placed at the feet of the colossus. (Liv. x. 9, 39, 43–45, 46; Zonar. viii. 1; Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 7, a 18; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 392, &c.) In the year after his consulship Carvilius was appointed legate to the consul D. Junius Brutus, as the consuls of that year did not possess military experience, and had been elected in expectation of a state of peace. (Zonar. l. c.)

In B. C. 272, Carvilius was elected consul a second time with his former colleague L. Papirius Cursor, as the people, recollecting their former victories, fully hoped that they would put an end to the Samnite war before Pyrrhus could return again to Italy. They did not disappoint the expectations of the people, though of the details of the war we have no information. They conquered the Samnites, Lucanians, Bruttians, and Tarentines, and celebrated a triumph on account of their victories. (Fasti Capit.; Zonar. viii. 6; Liv. Epit. 14; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome vol. iii. p. 524.) It must be of this Sp. Carvilius that Velleius Paterculus (ii. 128) relates, that, though born of equestrian rank, he arrived at the highest honours of the state, and not of the consul of B. C. 234 [No. 2], as Orelli supposes (Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 133).

2. SP. CARVILIUS, SP. F. C. N. MAXIMVS RUGA, son of No. 1, was consul, A. C. 234, with L. Postumius Albinus, and carried on war first against the Corsicans and then against the Sardinians: according to the Fasti Capitolini he obtained a triumph over the latter people. (Zonar. viii. 18.) He was consul a second time in B. C. 228 with Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, in which year, according to Cicero (Cato, 4), he did not resist, like his colleague, the agrarian law of the tribune C. Flaminius for the division of the lands in Cisalpine Gaul. Polybius (ii. 21), however, places the agrarian law of C. Flaminius four years earlier, in the consulship of M. Aemilius Lepidus, B. C. 232.

Carvilius is not mentioned again till the year of the fatal battle of Cannae, B. C. 216, when he proposed, in order to fill up the numbers of the senate and to unite the Latin allies more closely to the Romans in this their season of adversity, that the vacancies in the senate should be supplied by electing two senators from each one of the Latin tribes, but his proposition was rejected with the utmost indignation and contempt. He died in A. C. 212, at which time he was auctor. (Liv. xxiii. 22, xxvi. 23.)

Carvilius is related to have been the first person who divorced his wife, which he is said to have done on the ground of barrenness, but his conduct was generally disapproved. Whether, however, this was really the first instance of divorce at Rome may be questioned. (Gell. iv. 3; Val. Max. ii. 1. § 4; Dionys. ii. 25; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 355.)

MA'XIMUS CHRYSOBERGES. An account of the only published work of this writer is given elsewhere. [CHRYSOBERGES LUCAS.] He flourished about A. D. 1400, and was, though a Greek, a strenuous defender of the opinions of the Latin church, sending letters to various persons on this subject, especially to the people of Constantinople. Whether the Περὶ διαφόρων κεφαλαίων, Quaestiones Sacras Miscellaneae, by "Maximus the Monk," contained in a MS. of the Imperial Library at Vienna, are by Chrysoberges, is not clear. Maximus Chrysoberges had for his antagonist Nilus Damyla. [NILUS.] (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 679, vol. xi. p. 397; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. ii. Appendix, p. 87; and Dissert. Prima, p. 14.) [J. C. M.]

MA'XIMUS, CLAU'DIUS, a stoic philosopher of the age of the Antonines. He is mentioned by Julius Capitolinus (M. Anton. Philosoph. Vita, c. 3) among the preceptors of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, who has himself made honourable mention of Maximus in his De Rebus suis, lib. i. c. 15 (seu ut alii, c. 12), in the reading of which passage Casaubon conjecturally substitutes Παρὰ Κλ. Μαξιμου for the received lection, Παράκλησις Μαξιμου. He speaks shortly after (c. 16, seu 13, ad fin.) of a sickness of Maximus in the lifetime of Antoninus Pius; and in another place (viii. 25, seu ut alii, 22, sub init.) he speaks of the death of Maximus and of his widow Secunda. If the sickness mentioned in the first of these quotations was the mortal sickness, we must place the death of Maximus before that of Antoninus Pius, A. D. 161; at any rate it occurred before that of the emperor Aurelius (A. D. 180). Some have identified Claudius Maximus with the Maximus who was consul, A. D. 144; and Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 550) identifies him with the Claudius Maximus, "proconsul of Bithynia" (more correctly of Africa), before whom Appuleius defended himself against the charge of magic, brought against him by Pontianus. [APPULEIUS.] Whether the consul of A. D. 144 and the proconsul of Africa are the same person (as Tillemont believes), and whether the stoic philosopher is correctly identified with either, is quite uncertain.

Several learned men, including Jos. Scaliger, Jac. Cappellus, Dan. Heinsius, and Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, vol. ii. p. 550, note 11, sur l'Emp. Titus Antonin) identify Claudius Maximus with Maximus of Tyre [MAXIMUS TYRIUS], but Otaecker and Meric Casaubon (Not. ad Antonin. lib. de Rebus suis, i. 15, a. 12), and Davis (Praef. ad Ed. Maximus Tyrii, secund. fragmentum), have shown that this is not correct. Claudius Maximus was a stoic, the Tyrian was a Platonist: Claudius died, at any rate, before the emperor Marcus Aurelius, while the Tyrian lived under the reign of Commodus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 515.) [J. C. M.]

MA'XIMUS, M. CLO'DIUS. PUP'ENUS, was elected emperor with Balbinus, in A. D. 238, when the senate received intelligence of the death of the two Gordians in Africa. For particulars, see BALBINUS.

MAXIMUS CONFESSOR (ὁ ὁμολογητής), known also as the MONK (ὁ μοναχός), an eminent Greek ecclesiastic of the sixth and seventh centuries. He was born at Constantinople about A. D. 580. His parents were eminent for their lineage and station, and still more for their piety. Maximus was educated with great strictness; and his careful education, diligence, and natural abilities, enabled him to attain the highest excellence in grammar, rhetoric, and philosophy. He gave his especial attention to the last, cherishing the love of truth and seeking its attainment, and rejecting all sophistical reasonings.

His own inclination would have led him to a life of privacy and study, but his merit had attracted regard; and Hermetina, who had obtained the Byzantine sceptre in A. D. 610, made him his chief secretary, and treated him with the greatest regard and confidence. How long Maximus held his important office is not clear; but long before the death of Heraclius (who died A. D. 641), probably about the middle of that emperor's reign, he resigned his post; and leaving the palace, embraced a monastic life at Chrysopolis, on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus, opposite Constantinople. Here he was distinguished by the severity of his ascetic practices, and was soon appointed hegumenus or abbot of his monastery.

Maximus did not spend his life at Chrysopolis: he withdrew into Africa (i. e. the Roman province so called, of which Carthage was the capital); but at what time and on what account is not clear. Whether Maximus returned to Chrysopolis is not known: he was still in Africa in A. D. 645, when he had his disputation with Pyrrhus, the deposed patriarch of Constantinople, in the presence of the patrician, Gregorius [GREGORIUS, historical, No. 4] and the bishops of the province. He had already distinguished himself by his zealous exertions to impede the spread of the Monothelite heresy, which he had induced the African bishops to anathematise in a provincial council. In this disputation so cogent were the arguments of Maximus, that Pyrrhus owned himself vanquished, and recanted his heresy, to which, however, he subsequently returned, and ultimately (A. D. 654 or 655) recovered his see. Maximus, apparently on the accession of Martin I. to the papal throne (A. D. 649), went to Rome, and so successfully stimulated the zeal of the new pope against the Monothelites, that he convoked the council of Lateran, in which the heresy and all its abettors were anathematized. This step so irritated the emperor, Constant II., who had endeavoured to extinguish the controversy by a "Typus" (Τύπος) or edict, forbidding all discussion of the subject [CONSTANS II.], that on various pretexts he ordered (A. D. 653) the pope and Maximus, with two disciples of the latter, Anastasius Apocrisiarius and another Anastasius, and several of the Western (probably Italian) bishops to be sent as prisoners to Constantinople. The pope arrived at Constantinople A. D. 654, and was treated with great severity; and after some time was exiled to Chersonae, in the Chersonesus Taurica or Crimea, where he died A. D. 655. Maximus, the time of whose arrival is not stated, was repeatedly examined, and afterwards sentenced to banishment at Bisya, in Thracia. The two Anastasii were also banished, but to different places; Maximus was not suffered to remain at peace in his place of exile. Theodosius, bishop of the Bithynian Caesarea, and two nobles, Paulus and another Theodosius, and some others, were sent to him apparently to get him to renounce his opposition to the Monothelites. Blows, kicks, and spitting, were resorted to by the messengers and their servants, but in vain; nothing could shake his firmness. He was brought back after some time to Constantinople, and subjected to still greater severities. He was severely scourged; and the two Anastasii, who had been also brought back to the city, were similarly treated, apparently in his presence. They were then all remanded to prison, but were brought out again in a few days, when their tongues were cut out, their right hands cut off, and they were again sent into exile. Maximus, from age and the effects of his tortures, was scarcely able to bear the journey. They were confined in separate places in the Caucasus, where Maximus and one of the Anastasii soon died from the effects of their sufferings, A. D. 662. Anastasius Apocrisiarus survived, and his recital of their sufferings is one of the authorities employed for this article. Various miraculous circumstances were reported to have attended the sufferings of these unhappy men. (Εἰς τὸν βίον, κ. τ. λ., In Vitam ac Certamen S. Patris nostri ac Confessoris Maximi, published by Combéfis in his edition of the works of Maximus. This biography is not by Anastasius Apocrisiarus, as Fabricius has erroneously stated (Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 635, and vol. x. p. 291); but Combéfis has subjoined some other ancient documents, including the narrative of Anastasius Apocrisiarus, already noticed, and has added some valuable notes. Theophan. Chronog. pp. 275, 276, 288, ed. Paris, pp. 219, 229, ed. Venice, vol. i. p. 509, 510, 530, 531, ed. Bonn; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 645, vol. i. p. 585; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 635; Bolland. Acta Sanctor. August. vol. iii. p. 97, &c.)

Maximus is revered as a saint both by the Greek and Latin churches; by the former his memory is celebrated on the 21st of January, and the 12th and 13th August; by the latter on the 13th August.

The writings of this father were in the middle ages held in the highest esteem, and possessed considerable authority. The more discriminating judgment of Photius has severely criticised the style of his Ἀπορηματα γραφικά, Dubia S. Scripturarum, or rather Γραφικὰν ἀπορημάτων λύσεις, Dubiorum S. Scripturarum Solutiones. He notices his long, spun-out sentences, his frequent transpositions and circumlocutions, and his metaphors, so carelessly and awkwardly employed as to render his meaning often very obscure, and making his works very wearisome to read. He charges him with wandering from his subject, and indulging in irrelevant and abstract speculations. Photius, however, is less severe in criticising his other works, and observes that all his writings in every part manifest the purity and earnestness of his piety. (Phot. Bibl. Cod. 192.—195.) His orthodoxy on some points is questionable.

Various of his pieces were published in the course of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, either separately or in the different collections of the writings of the fathers, sometimes in the original, sometimes in a Latin version. The only considerable collection of his works is that of Combéfis, S. Maximi Confessoris, Græcorum Theologi, etiamque Philosophi Opera, 2 vols. fol. Paris, 1675. An introduction contains the ancient biography of Maximus, and some other ancient pieces relating to his history; and the works are in some cases accompanied by ancient anonymous Greek scholia, as well as by the notes of the learned editor. This edition is not complete: a third volume was in preparation by Combéfis at the time of his death, A. D. 1679; but no successor undertook to complete the unfinished labour.

The works are too numerous, and many of them too unimportant for distinct notice. The following are the most important:—1. Πρὸς Θαλάσσιον τὸν δούτατον πρεσβύτερον καὶ ἡγουμένον περὶ διαφόρων ἀπορῶν τῆς ὁδοῦ γραφῆς, Ad Sanctissimum Presbyterum ac Praspositum Thalassium, de variis Scripturas Sacras Quæstionibus ac Dubiis. This is the work already noticed as severely criticised in respect of style by Photius: it contains the solution of sixty-five scriptural difficulties, and is accompanied by the Scholia of an anonymous commentator, apparently of the close of the eleventh or beginning of the twelfth century. 2. Εἰς τὴν προσευχὴν τοῦ Πάτρὸς ἡμῶν πρὸς τινὰ φιλόχριστον ἑρμεία συντομος, Orationis Dominicæ brevis Expositio, ad quandam Christo devotum. 3. Δόγος δασκητικὸς κατὰ πνεῦσιν καὶ ἀσκήσιον, Liber ad Pietatem exercens per Interrogationem et Responsionem. This piece had been published by Fl. Nobilius, with some small pieces of Chrysostom and Basil, Rome, 1578. 4. Κεφάλαια περὶ ἀγάπης, Capita de Charitate. This work, to which an ancient Greek writer has added Scholia, was published by Vicentius Oposopoens (who ascribed the work to Maximus of Turin), with a Latin version, 8vo. Haguenau, 1531, and was repeatedly reprinted in the course of the same century; and a Latin version was given in most of the editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum. 5. Περὶ Θεολογίας καὶ τῆς ἀσκήσεως οἰκονομίας τοῦ υἱοῦ Θεοῦ σ', Ad Theologiam Deique Filii in Carne Dispensationem spectantia Capita Ducenta. 6. Κεφάλαια διδασκαλίας Θεολογικῆς τε καὶ οἰκονομικῆς, καὶ περὶ ἀρετῆς καὶ κακίας, Di versa Capita ad Theologiam et Oeconomiam spectantia, deque Virtute ac Vitio, first published by Joannes Picus. 8vo. Paris, 1560. 7. Περὶ τῆς ὁδοῦ Τριῶδος διὰ λόγους ε', Dialogi quinque de Sancta Trinitate. These are ascribed to Maximus in several MSS., and by various ancient Greek writers who have cited them. Other writers have, however, ascribed them to Athanasius, in some editions of whose works they consequently appear. The opinion of Garnier, that they are the production of Theodoret, has been generally rejected; and the preponderance of evidence seems to be decidedly in favour of the authorship of Maximus. 8. Μυσταγωγία περὶ τοῦ τίνων σύμβολα καὶ τὰ τὴν ἁγίαν ἐκκλησίαν ἐπὶ τῆς συνδήσεως τελοῦμενα καθέστηκε, Mystagogia qua explicantur quorundam Signa sint quas in Sacra Ecclesia peraguntur in Divina Synaxi a Collecta. This was published by David Hoeschelius, Augsburg, 1599; and afterwards in the Actuarium of Ducaeus, vol. ii. fol. Paris, 1624. 9. Κεφάλαια Θεολογικῆς, ἥτοι ἐκλογαὶ ἐκ διαφόρων βιβλίων τῶν τε καθ' ἡμᾶς καὶ τῶν ὑπερβαίνοντων, Capita Theologica, id est scilicet dicta atque electa ex Diversis tum Christianorum tum Gentilium ac Profanorum Libris; or more briefly, Sermones per Excerpta, or Loci Communes. This selection of sentences is arranged in seventy-one λόγοι, Sermones, and has been repeatedly published. It first appeared, with the similar compilation of Antonius Melissa [ANTONIUS No. 2], under the care of Conrad Geener, fol. Zurich, 1546; and a Latin version was given in the first edition of De la Bigne's Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Paris, 1579. 10. Παρασημασίως τῆς γενομένης ἡγρέσεως, κ. τ. λ., Acta Disputationis, &c.; a record of the discussion between Pyrrhus and Maximus in the presence of the patrician Gregory in Africa, already referred to. It was published by Baronius, with a Latin version by Turrianus, as an appendix to the 8th vol. of his Annales Ecclesiastici; and reprinted from thence in the Concilia. 11. Epistolae, partim communes, partim dogmaticae et polemicae. The other works given in the edition of Combéfis are shorter and of little value, except as materials for a history of the Monothelite controversy, to which several of them refer.

The following works of Maximus, not included in the collection of Combéfis, have been published elsewhere:—12. Fragments, incorporated in the Cutnae of the Fathers on the Sacred Books, and especially on the expository paraphrase of Solomon's Song (Expositio Cantici Canticoorum per Paraphrasin collecta ex Gregorii Nysseni, Nili, et Maximi Commentariis), contained in the Auctarium of Ducaeus, vol. ii. fol. Paris, 1624. 13. Scholae on the works of the pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita, first published with the works of Dionysius, 8vo. Paris, 1562, and repeatedly reprinted. Maximus earnestly contends that these are the genuine works of the Areopagite converted by St. Paul. 14. Ἐξήγησις κεφαλαιώδης περὶ τοῦ κατὰ Χριστὸν τὸν Θεὸν ἡμῶν σωτηρίου πύργου, τὸ διαγραφὴν κακόντων ἐμπνεύοντα, Brevis Enarratio Christiani Paschalis, quae descripti Laterculi ratio declaratur, or Computus Ecclesiasticus. This calculation of Easter was drawn up by Maximus, according to his own declaration (pars iii. cap. 9), in the fourteenth indiction, in the thirty-first year of Heraclius (i. e. A. D. 640). Scaliger, in his Emendatio Temporum, lib. vii. p. 736, gave considerable extracts from the work, and it was first published entire in the Uranologion of Petavius, p. 313, fol. Paris, 1630. 15. Ἄνωρα, Ambigua sive Difficilia Loca in Oratationibus quibusdam Gregorii Nazianzeni explanata, ad Joannem Cyzici Episcopum. These Ἄνωρα were translated into Latin by Joannes Scotus Erigena about the middle of the ninth century; and the work itself, with the version, or perhaps only a part of them, was edited by Thomas Gale, with some of the works of Erigena, folio, Oxford, 1681. It is preceded by a letter of Maximus to Joannes of Cyzicus. Gale also added the following work of Maximus, 16. Περὶ διαφόρων ἀνθρώπων τῶν δυνάμεων διανοούτων καὶ Γρηγορίου, De variis Difficilibus Locis Dionysii Areopagitae et Gregorii Nazianzeni, with a Latin version by the editor himself. 16. A Fragment, thought to be from the Ἄνωρα just mentioned (No. 15), is given in the Appendix to the fourteenth volume of Galland's Bibliotheca Patrum, fol. Venice, 1781. The fragment is entitled Θεωρία σύντομος πρὸς τοὺς λέγοντας προὔπαρχειν καὶ μεθὑπαρχειν τῶν σωματικῶν τὰς ψυχὰς, Animadversio brevis ad eos qui dicunt Animas ante vel post Corpora existere. There are some other works of Maximus either lost, or at least unpublished, which are enumerated by Fabricius. (Combéfis, S. Maximi Opera; Phot. l. c.; Cave, l. c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 430, vol. ix. pp. 599, &c., 635, &c., vol. x. pp. 238, 736, vol. xii. p. 707; Concilia, vol. v. ed. Labbe, vol. iii. ed. Hardouin, vol. x. ed. Mansi; Oudin, De Scriptor. et Script. Eccles. vol. i. col. 1635, &c.; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacrés, vol. xvii. p. 689, &c.; Galland, Biblioth. Patrum. Proleg. ad Append. Vol. XIV. c. 10.) [J. C. M.]

MA'XIMUS, Q. CORNELIUS, a Roman jurist, a contemporary of Servius Sulpicius, and the teacher of C. Trebatius Testa, who was the friend of Cicero. (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 45; Cic. ad Fam. vii. 8 and 17.) He is once quoted in the Digest and by Alfennus (33. tit. 7. s. 16), as having given an opinion on the meaning of the word "instrumentum," in a legacy of "a vineyard and the instrumentum thereof." Servius considered that the word instrumentum had here no meaning. Maximus said that the term included the stakes, poles, rakes, and spades; which Alfennus considers to be the better opinion, and so in fact it seems to be. [G. L.]

MA'XIMUS, EGNATIUS, is mentioned by Cicero in B. C. 45 (ad Att. xiii. 34), and the same person is probably intended in one or two other passages of Cicero, where the name of Egnatius occurs without any surname (ad Att. xiii. 45, &c.). The acquaintance of Cicero may perhaps be the same as the C. EGNATIUS Cn. F. Cn. N. MAXIMUS, whose name occurs on several interesting coins which seem to have been struck in the time of Julius Caesar, and of which three specimens are given below. The head of Venus which appears on the obverse of the first, and that of Cupid on the obverse of the second, probably have reference to the descent of Julius Caesar from Venus.

An Egnatia Maximilla belonging to the family of the Egnatii Maximi is mentioned in the time of Nero. [EGNATIA.]

COINS OF EGNATIUS MAXIMUS.

MAXIMUS EPHE'SIUS, one of the teachers of the emperor Julian, who is not to be confounded with Maximus Epirota, whose name is likewise conspicuous among the learned of that emperor. Maximus, the subject of this notice, was a native of either Ephesus or Smyrna and belonged to a rich and distinguished family. He early embraced the doctrine of the Pythagoreans.

Ptolemais, and obtained great reputation by his lectures on philosophy and Pagan divinity. Ammonius Marcellinus, quoted below, calls him "Maximus ille philosophus, vir ingenti nomine doctrinatus." The philosopher Aedesius, whose disciple he was, recommended him to prince Julian, afterwards emperor, who came to Ephesus for the sole purpose of hearing Maximus. Julian held him in high esteem, and it is said as well as believed that chiefly through him he was induced to abjure Christianity. Besides philosophy, Maximus excelled in magic, and there is a story that he foretold Julian his subsequent elevation to the throne, which, after all, did not require a very considerable degree of supernatural knowledge. In 361, Maximus and the philosopher Chrysanthus were invited by Julian to repair to his court at Constantinople. They consulted the stars before they set out, and the signs having been found unfavourable, Chrysanthus refused to go, but Maximus sought, probably, that the favour of an emperor as a better augury than the constellation of the stars, and hastened to make his court to Julian. At this time the philosophy of Maximus proved sound, as he rose to great eminence at court; but he nevertheless injured his reputation, among the heathens no less than among the Christians, by leaning too much to flattery. It was this, perhaps, which Chrysanthus had read in the stars. When Julian set out on his campaign against the Persians, Maximus prophesied a fortunate issue, and accompanied him on the expedition, from which we might infer that Maximus believed in the truth of his prophecies. As it happened, however, that the issue was most lamentable, he, on his safe return, was sadly ridiculed by the inhabitants of Antioch, who were by no means a dull people, as Julian found to his cost. For some time Maximus was honoured by the emperors Valens and Valentinian, till the public voice accused him of Priscus of having caused by their sorceries the loss which befell the two emperors in the month April, 364. They were consequently summoned to Constantinople, where Priscus cleared himself, but Maximus less fortunate was condemned to pay heavy fine, and, being unable to raise the money, was sent to Ephesus, where he was kept in prison till the end of 365. During all the time he was exposed to such cruel tortures that he requested his wife to bring him poison, which she did; but instead of giving it to her husband she swallowed it and died instantly. He owed his delivery to the philosopher Themistius, who spoke on his behalf in Constantinople, and to Clearchus, who held the same command in Asia, and he even recovered a portion of his property which had been confiscated. In 371 Maximus was accused of being an accomplice in a conspiracy against the life of Valens, but it seems that he was guilty, inasmuch as he was one of the plot but did not reveal it. He was accused of sorcery and sentenced to death, and his head was accordingly struck off, philosophy going with him, as Libanius says. Julian wrote several letters to Maximus which are extant (15, 38, 39). Maximus had two brothers, — Claudius, who taught philosophy at Alexandria, and Amphichanus, who lectured at Smyrna; both of whom gained fame. Maximus of Ephesus is believed by some to be the author of Περὶ καταρχῶν ἀστρολογίας, De Electionum Auspiciis, an astrological poem in hexameter verse which was first published by Fabricius, quoted below, with a Latin version by Joh. Rentdorf. The beginning of it is lost; 610 verses are extant. This poem, however, is ascribed with more justice, as it seems, to Maximus Epirota; but Ruhnken thinks that it was composed by Callimachus, a contemporary of Apollonius Rhodius. Maximus of Ephesus is frequently mentioned by the historians of the time. (Maximus, in Eunapius, Βίοι φιλοσόφων καὶ σοφιστῶν; Liban. Orat. v. xii.; Amm. Marc. xxix. i.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. pp. 499, 527, vol. iv. p. 158, vol. ix. p. 322, &c.; Tillemont, Hist. des Emp. vol. vi. pp. 490, &c., 512, 560, 568, gives a critical review of the life of Maximus.) [W. P.]

MAXIMUS EPIROTA (Μάξιμος Ἐπειρώτης), a native of Epeirus, or perhaps Byzantium, whence he is also called Byzantius, was one of the instructors of the emperor Julian in philosophy and heathen theology. He must not be confounded with Maximus of Ephesus, who was likewise one of the teachers of Julian. Maximus, of whose life we know very little, wrote, 1. Περὶ πάντων ἀντιθέσεων, De insolubilibus Oppositionibus, published Græc. et Lat. by H. Stephanus, Paris, 1554, 8vo. ad calcem Operum Minor. Critic. Dionysii Halicarn.; 2. Τρομυήματα πρὸς Ἀριστοτέλην, Commentaria in Aristotelem; 3. Περὶ ἀθιδῶν, De Numeris; 4. Some epistles and essays addressed to the emperor Julian; 5. Περὶ καταρχῶν ἢ ἀρχαίων, which is also ascribed to Maximus Ephesius, in whose life the reader will find a further account of this work. (Suidas, s. v. Μάξιμος; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 499.) [W. P.]

MAXIMUS, FABIVS. In the Fabia gens the surname of Maximus was first borne by Q. Fabius Rullianus, consul in B.C. 322, and supplanted the previous cognomen Ambustus. [FABIA GENÆ.]

1. Q. FABIVS, M. F. N. N. MAXIMVS, with the agnomen RULLIANVS or RULLVS, was the son of M. Fabius Ambustus, consul B.C. 360. (Liv. viii. 33.) He was curule ædile in B.C. 331, when, through the information of a female slave, he discovered that the mortality prevailing at Rome arose from poison administered by women to their husbands. (Liv. viii. 18; Val. Max. ii. 5. § 3; Oros. iii. 10.) Fabius was master of the equites to L. Papirius Cursor in B.C. 325, whose anger he incurred by giving battle to the Samnites near the Imbrivian or Simbrivian hills during the dictator's absence, and contrary to his orders. Victory availed Fabius nothing in exculpation. The rods and axes were ready for his execution, and a hasty flight to Rome, where the senate, the people, and his aged father interceded for him with Papirius, barely rescued his life, but could not avert his degradation from office. (Liv. viii. 29—35; Dion. Cass. Fr. Mai.; Val. Max. ii. 7. § 8; Front. Strat. iv. 1. § 39; Aurel. Vict. Vit. Ill. 31, 32; Eutrop. ii. 8.) In B.C. 322 Fabius obtained his first consulate, probably at an early age. (Cic. Phil. v. 17; comp. Val. Max. viii. 15. § 5.) It was the second year of the second Samnite war, and Fabius was the most eminent of the Roman generals in that long and arduous struggle for the empire of Italy. He was, as Dr. Arnold remarks, "the Talbot of the fifth century of Rome, and his personal prowess, even in age, was no less celebrated than his skill as a general." Yet nearly all authentic traces are lost of the seat and circumstances of his numerous campaigns. His defeats have been suppressed or extenuated; the achievements of others ascribed to him alone; and a moderation in seeking and refusing honours imputed to him equally foreign to his age, his nation, and character. Where so much has been studiously falsified (Liv. viii. 40), probably in the first instance by chroniclers of the Fabian house—a house unusually rich in annalists—and where our only guides, the Fasti, Livy, and Diodorus, are not only irreconcilable with one another, but often inconsistent with themselves, a bare outline of his military and political life is alone desirable. In his first consulate, B.C. 322, Fabius was stationed in Apulia, where he defeated the Samnites, and triumphed "de Samnitibus at Apuleis." (Liv. viii. 38, 40; comp. Zonar. vii. 26; Aurel. Vict. Vir. Ill. 32; Appian, Samn. Fr. 4.) In the following year, after the disaster at the Caudine Forks, he was interrex (Liv. ix. 17), and in 315 dictator, and was completely defeated by the Samnites at Lautulae, a narrow pass between the sea and the mountains east of Terracina. (Diod. xix. 72; Liv. ix. 22, 23.) To this or the next year belongs probably an anecdote preserved by Valerius Maximus (viii. 1. § 9). A. Atilius Calatinus [ATILIUS CALATINUS, No. 3], son-in-law of Fabius, was accused of betraying Sora to the enemy. His condemnation was arrested by Fabius declaring that had he believed Calatinus guilty, he would have exercised his paternal power, and taken his daughter from him. In B.C. 310 Fabius was consul for the second time. (Liv. ix. 33; Diod. xx. 27; Fasti.) Of this, as of his former consulate, the accounts are conflicting. Unable to relieve Sutrium, which the Etruscans were besieging, Fabius struck through the Ciminian wood till he reached the western frontier of Umbria. He there formed an alliance with the people of Camerinum or Camerta, and by his ravages in northern Etruria effected a diversion favourable to Rome, and compelled Arretium, Cortona, and Perugia, to conclude a truce for thirty years with the republic. His victories at Perugia, the Lake Vadimon, and Sutrium, may be placed in the same catalogue with the apocryphal perils of the Ciminian forest. The senate meanwhile, alarmed at the withdrawal of the army from Sutrium, sent to prohibit Fabius marching into Etruria. He met the deputation on his return when his success had justified his disobedience. The war south of the Tiber, however, required a dictator, and Fabius was directed to appoint his old enemy, Papirius Cursor. He heard the mandate of the senate in moody silence, obeyed it in the solitude of midnight, and when, next morning, the envoys thanked him for preferring the public good to his private enmity, he dismissed them without reply. A triumph de Etruscis recompensed this campaign. (Liv. ix. 33, 35, 36, 37, 38, 40; Dion Cass. Fr. 35; Fasti.) According to the Fasti a year intervened between the second and third consulates of Fabius; but Livy (ix. 41) and Diodorus (xx. 37) make them immediately succeed one another. Fabius, as consul in B.C. 308, had Samnium for his province. He quelled a revolt of the Marsians, the Pelignians, and Hernicans; recovered Nuceria Alfaterna in Campania, which seven years before had joined the Samnite league; and was able, before the expiration of his office, to leave his province and hasten into Umbria. He is said to have defeated the Umbrians at Mevania, but no triumph followed either this Samnite or Umbrian campaign. His command in Samnium, with the title of proconsul, was continued during B.C. 307, and he defeated the Samnites near Allifae. The campaign also is liable to suspicion, since Fabius obtained no triumph. (Liv. ix. 42; Diod. xx. 44.) In B.C. 304 Fabius was censor. Upon Livy's brief and uninformative words (ix. 46) a pile of hypothesis has been raised by modern and recent scholars. We can only refer to Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 320—350), Zumpt (Die Centurien, Berlin, 1836), Huschke (Staatsverfassung. Serv. Tull. Breslau, 1838), and Walther (Geschicht. Röm. Recht, vol. i. p. 136). Fabius seems to have cancelled the changes introduced by Appius the Blind in his censorship, B.C. 312 [ARR. CLAUDIUS, No. 10], by confining the libertini to the four city tribes: he also probably increased the political importance of the equites. (Liv. ix. 46; Val. Max. ii. 2. § 9; Aurel. Vict. Vir. Ill. 32; Plin. H. N. xv. 4; comp. Dionys. vi. 13, 15.) Fabius does not appear again till B.C. 297, when he was consul for the fifth time, according to Livy (x. 13), against his own wishes; but the annalist of the Fabian house whom Livy copied probably veiled or suppressed in this year a strong opposition to his re-election by the Appian party. (Liv. x. 13.) Samnium was again his province, but the result of his campaign is doubtful. In the following year Fabius was consul for the sixth time, and commanded at the great battle of Sentinum, when the combined armies of the Samnites, Gauls, Etruscans, and Umbrians, attacked the Romans and their allies. At the beginning of the year a dispute with P. Decius Mus, who had been thrice before Fabius' colleague in the consulship, and once in the censorship, and the withdrawal of Appius Claudius from the seat of war, and his appointment to the city praetorship, are probably tokens of strong party-struggles at Rome. (Liv. x. 21, 22, 24.) For his victory at Sentinum Fabius triumphed on the 4th of September in the same year. (Fasti: Liv. ib. 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30.) For the remainder of the year he was employed in Etruria. In 293 he acted as legatus to his son [MAXIMUS FABIUS, No. 2], and rode beside his triumphal chariot, delighting in the honours of his son, whom he had rescued from disgrace and degradation and crowned with victory. (Liv. Epit. xi.; Dion Cass. Fr. Peiresc. xxxvi.; Oros. iii. 22; Plut. Fab. Max. 24; Val. Max. ii. 2. § 4, v. 7. § 1; Zonar. viii. 1.) Fabius succeeded his father, Ambustus, in the honourable post of Princeps Senatus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 41.) On his death, which happened soon after, the people subscribed largely for the expenses of his funeral; but as the Fabian house was wealthy, his son Fabius Gurgus employed the money in giving a public entertainment (epulae), and in a distribution of provisions (viceratio) to the citizens of Rome. (Aurel. Vict. Vir. Ill. 32.) The cause of his obtaining the cognomen Maximus is uncertain. Livy (ix. 46) says that his political services in the censorship of B.C. 304 were the cause. But he makes a doubt (xxx. 26) whether the cognomen were not originally conferred on his great grandson, Q. Fabius, the dictator in the second Punic war [No. 4]; and Polybius (iii. 87) says that the latter Fabius was the first of the Fabian house who was denominated Maximus.

2. Q. FABIUS, Q. F. M. N. MAXIMUS, one of the preceding, acquired the agnomen of Gurgus, or the Glatton, from the dissoluteness of his youth. His mature manhood atoned for his early steps larices. (Macrob. Sat. ii. 9; comp. Juv. Sat. vi. 267, xi. 40.) In B.C. 295 Fabius was curule ædile, and fined certain matrons of noble birth for their disorderly life; and with the produce of the fines built a temple to Venus near the Circus Maximus. (Liv. x. 31; Victor. Region. xi.) He was consul in B.C. 292, and was completely defeated by the Pentrian Samnites. The adversaries of the Fabian house, the Papirian and Appian parties, took advantage of this defeat to exasperate the people against Fabius, and he escaped degradation from the consulate only through his father's offer to serve as his lieutenant for the remainder of the war. Victory returned with the elder Fabius to the Roman arms. In a second battle the consul retrieved his reputation, stormed several Samnite towns, and was rewarded with a triumph of which the most remarkable feature was old Fabius riding beside his son's chariot. (Plut. Fab. 24; Dionys. xvi. 15; Oros. iii. 22; Eutrop. ii. 9.) For his success in this campaign Fabius dedicated a shrine to Venus obsequens, because the goddess had been obsequious to his prayers. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 720.) In B.C. 291 Fabius remained as proconsul in Samnium. He was besieging Cominium when the consul, L. Postumius Megellus, arbitrarily and violently drove him from the army and the province. (Dionys. xvi. 16.) The Fasti ascribe a triumph to Fabius for his proconsulate. He was consul for the second time in B.C. 276, when he obtained a triumph de Samnitibus Lucanis et Brutii (Fasti). Shortly afterwards he went as legatus from the senate to Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt. The presents which Fabius and his colleagues received from the Egyptian monarch they deposited in the public treasury on their return to Rome. But a decree of the senate directed that the ambassadors should retain them. (Val. Max. iv. 3. § 10; comp. Dion. Cass. Fr. 147; Liv. Epit. xiv.; Zonar. viii. 6.) Fabius was elain in his third consulship, while engaged in quelling some disturbances at Vulturni in Etruria. (Zonar. viii. 7; Flor. i. 21; Obsequ. 27; comp. Vict. Vir. III. 36.) Like his father and grandfather, Fabius Gurgus was princeps senatus. (Plin. H. N. vii. 41.)

3. Q. FABIVS (Q. F. Q. N. MAXIMUS?). From the date alone of the only recorded fact of his life (Val. Max. vi. 6. § 5), it is probable that he was a son of the preceding, and father of Fabius the Great Dictator in the second Punic war. Fabius was ædile in B.C. 265, and, for an assault on its ambassadors, was sent in custody of a quaestor to Apollonia in Epeirus to be dealt with at pleasure. The Apollonians, however, dismissed him unpunished. (Liv. Epit. xv.; Dion. Cass. Fr. 43; Zonar. viii. 8.)

4. Q. FABIVS Q. F. Q. N. MAXIMUS, with the cognomen VERREUCOSUS, from a wart on his upper lip, OVICULA, or the Lamb, from the mildness oropathy of his temper (Plut. Fab. 1; comp. Varr. 2. R. ii. 1), and CUNCTATOR, from his caution in war, grandson of Fabius Gurgus, and, perhaps, son of the preceding, was consul for the first time in B.C. 233. Liguria was his province, and it afforded him a triumph (Fasti) and a pretext for dedicating a temple to Honour. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 23.) He was censor in B.C. 230; consul a second time in 228; opposed the agrarian law of C. Flaminius in 227 [FLAMINIUS, No. 1]; was dictator for holding the comitia in 221, and in 218 against the senate to Carthage, to demand reparation for the attack on Saguntum. In B.C. 217, immediately after the defeat at Thrasymenus, Fabius was appointed dictator, or rather, since no consul was at hand to nominate him, pro-dictator. From this period, so long as the war with Hannibal was merely defensive, Fabius became the leading man at Rome. His military talents were not perhaps of the highest order, but he understood beyond all his contemporaries the nature of the struggle, the genius of Hannibal, and the disposition of his own countrymen. Cicero says truly of Fabius (Rep. i. 1), bellum Punicum secundum eum variis, a more appropriate eulogy than that of Ennius, qui cunctando restituit rem, since Marcellus and Scipio restored the republic to its military eminence, whereas Fabius made it capable of restoration. His first act as dictator was to calm and corroborate the minds of the Romans by solemn sacrifice and supplication to the gods; his next to render Latium and the neighbouring districts untenable by the enemy. On taking the field he laid down a simple and immutable plan of action. He avoided all direct encounter with the enemy; moved his camp from highland to highland, where the Numidian horse and Spanish infantry could not follow him; watched Hannibal's movements with unrelaxing vigilance, cut off his stragglers and foragers, and compelled him to weary his allies by necessary exactions, and to dishearten his soldiers by fruitless manoeuvres. His enclosure of Hannibal in one of the upland valleys between Cales and the Vulturinus, and the Carthaginian's adroit escape by driving oxen with blazing faggots fixed to their horns up the hill-sides, are well-known facts. But at Rome and in his own camp the caution of Fabius was misinterpreted. He was even suspected of wishing to prolong the war that he might retain the command; of cowardice, of incapability, and even of treachery, although he gave up the produce of his estates to ransom Roman prisoners. Hannibal alone appreciated the conduct of Fabius. But his own master of the horse, M. Minucius Rufus, headed the clamour against him, and the senate, incensed by the ravage of their Campanian estates, joined with the impatient commonalty in condemning his dilatory policy. Minucius, during a brief absence of Fabius from the camp, obtained some slight advantage over Hannibal. A tribune of the plebs, M. Metilius, brought forward a bill for dividing the command equally between the dictator and the master of the horse, and the senate and the tribes passed it. Minucius was speedily entrapped, and would have been destroyed by Hannibal, had not Fabius generously hastened to his rescue. Hannibal, on his retreat from Fabius, is reported to have said, "I thought you could would one day break from the hills in a pelting storm." Minucius, who though rash was magnanimous, resigned his command, but Fabius scrupulously laid down his office at its legal expiration in six months, bequeathing his example to the consuls who succeeded him. Aemilius copied, Varro disregarded his injunctions, and the rout at Cannæ illustrated the wisdom of Fabius' warning to Aemilius.—"Remember, you have to dread not only Hannibal but Varro." Fabius was, however, among the first on Varro's return from Cannæ to thank him for not having despaired of his country; and the defensive measures which the senate adopted in that season of dismay were dictated by him. After the winter of B.C. 216—215, the war gradually assumed a new character, and, though still eminent, Fabius was no longer its presiding spirit. He was elected pontifex in 216, was already a member of the augural college, which office he held sixty-two years (Liv. xxx. 26); dedicated by public commission the temple of Venus Erycina, and opposed filling up with Latins the vacancies which the war had made in the senate. In B.C. 215 he was consul for the third time, when he ravaged Campania and began the siege of Capua. On laying down the fasces he admonished the people and the senate to drop all party feelings, and to choose such men only for consuls as were competent to the times. His advice led to his own re-election, B.C. 214. In this year he made an inroad into Samnium and took Casilinum. In 213 Fabius served as legatus to his own son, Q. Fabius [No. 5], consul in that year, and an anecdote is preserved (Liv. xxiv. 44; Plut. Fab. 24) which exemplifies the strictness of the Roman discipline. On entering the camp at Suessula Fabius advanced on horseback to greet his son. He was passing the lictors when the consul sternly bade him dismount. "My son," exclaimed the elder Fabius alighting, "I wished to see whether you would remember that you were consul." On Hannibal's march upon Rome, in B.C. 211, Fabius was again the principal stay of the senate, and earnestly dissuaded abandoning the siege of Capua, which would have been yielding to the Carthaginian's feint on the capital. Fabius was consul for the fifth time in B.C. 209, was invested with the almost hereditary title of the Fabii Maximi—Princeps senatus,—and inflicted a deadly wound on Hannibal's tenure of Southern Italy by the recapture of Tarentum. The citadel of Tarentum had never fallen into the hands of the Carthaginians, and M. Livius Macatus, its governor, some years afterwards, claimed the merit of recovering the town. "Certainly," rejoined Fabius, "had you not lost, I had never retaken it." (Plut. Fab. 23; Cic. de Orat. ii. 67.) The plunder of the town was given up to the soldiers, but, a question arising whether certain colossal statues and pictures of the tutelary deities of Tarentum should be sent to Rome, "Nay," said Fabius, "let us leave to the Tarentines their angry gods." (Liv. xxvii. 16; Plut. Fab. 22.) He removed thither, however, a statue of Hercules, the mythic ancestor of the Fabii, and placed it in the Capitol. M. Livius Salinator and C. Claudius Nero, consuls elect for B.C. 208, were at open enmity (Liv. xxvii. 35, xxix. 37; Val. Max. iv. 2); and their reconciliation, of the highest moment to the commonwealth, was principally the work of Fabius. In the closing years of the second Punic war Fabius appears to less advantage. The war had become aggressive under a new race of generals. Fabius, already in mature manhood at the close of the first, was advanced in years in the later period of the second Punic war. He disapproved the new tactics; he dreaded, perhaps he envied, the political supremacy of Scipio, and was his uncompromising opponent in his scheme of invading Africa. Fabius did not live to witness the issue of the war and the triumph of his rival. He died in B.C. 203, about the time of Hannibal's departure from Italy. His wealth was great; yet the people defrayed by contribution the funeral charges of their "father," the "great dictator," "who singly, by his caution, saved the state."

Fabius had two sons; the younger survived him

(Liv. xxxiii. 42); he pronounced the funeral oration of the elder (Laudatio) (Cic. de Sen. 4), and though, strictly speaking, not eloquent, he was neither an unready nor an illiterate speaker. (Cic. Brut. 14, 18.) He adopted, probably on account of the tender age of his younger, and after the decease of his elder son, a son of L. Paullus Aemilius, the conqueror of Perseus. (Plut. Paull. Aem. 5.)

Besides the life, by Plutarch, which is probably a compilation from the archives of the Fabian family, the history of Fabius occupies a large space in all narratives of the second Punic war. (Polyb. iii. 87, 88, 89, 90, 92, 93, 94, 101, 103, 105, 106, x. 1. § 10, xviii. Fr. Hist. 18; Liv. ix. xxi. xxii. xxiii. xxiv. xxvi. xxvii. xxviii. xxx. xxx.; Florus, Eutropius, and the epitomists generally; Cic. Brut. 18, Leg. Agrar. ii. 22, Tuscul. iii. 28, Nat. Deor. iii. 32, In Terr. Acc. v. 10, De Sen. 4, 17, De Off. i. 30; Sall. Jug. 4; Varr. Fr. p. 241, ed. Bipont.; Dion Cass. Fr. 48, 55; Appian, Annib. 11—16, 31; Quint. Inst. vi. 3 §§ 52, 61, viii. 2. § 11; Plin. H. N. xxii. 5; Sen. de Ben. ii. 7; Sil. Ital. Ponic. vii.)

5. Q. FABIVS Q. F. Q. N. MAXIMVS, elder son of the preceding, was curule aedile in B.C. 215, and praetor in 214. He was stationed in Apulia (Liv. xxiv. 9, 11, 12), in the neighbourhood of Luceria (ib. 12, 20), and co-operated ably with the other commanders in the second Punic war. (Cic. pro Rab. Post. 1.) He was consul in B.C. 213, when Apulia was again his province (Liv. xxiv. 43, 46). His father in this year served under him as legatus at Suessula. (Liv. xxiv. 43, 44; Plut. Fab. 24.) The younger Fabius was legatus to the consul M. Livius Salinator B.C. 207. (Liv. xxviii. 9.) He died soon after this period, and his funeral oration was pronounced by his father. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 32, Tuscul. iii. 28, De Sen. 4, ad Fam. iv. 6.)

6. Q. FABIVS Q. F. Q. N. MAXIMVS, second son of No. 5, was elected augur in the room of his father, B.C. 203 (Liv. xxx. 26), although he was then very young, and had borne no office previously. He died in B.C. 196. (Liv. xxxiii. 42.)

7. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS, praetor peregrinus in B.C. 181 (Liv. xl. 18), was probably the same person with Q. Fabius, quaestor of the provincial L. Manlius in Spain, B.C. 185. (Liv. xxxix. 29.) His relation to the preceding Maximus is uncertain.

8. Q. FABIVS Q. F. Q. N. MAXIMVS AEMILIANVS, was by adoption only a Fabius Maximus, being by birth the eldest son of L. Paullus Aemilius, the conqueror of Perseus, consul in B.C. 182. Fabius served under his father (Aemilius) in the last Macedonian war, B.C. 168, and was despatched by him to Rome with the news of his victory at Pydna. (Polyb. xxix. 6.) Fabius was praetor in Sicily B.C. 149—148, and consul in 145. Spain was his province, where he encountered, and at length defeated Viriathus. (Liv. xlv. 35; Appian, Hispan. 65, 67, 90, Maced. 17; Plut. Paull. Aem. 5; Cic. de Amic. 25.) Fabius was the pupil and patron of the historian Polybius, who has recorded some interesting and honourable traits of his filial and fraternal conduct, and of the affection entertained for him by his younger brother, Scaevola Aemilianus. (Polyb. xviii. 18. § 6, xxxi. 4 § 4, 9. § 9, 10. § 3, 14, xxxiii. 6 § 3, 9. § 3 xxxviii. 3. § 8; Cic. De Amic. 19, Paradoxa. 6 § 2.)

9. Q. FABIVS Q. AEMILIANVS, F. Q. N. MAXIMVS, surnamed ALLOBROGVVS, from his victory over the Allobroges and their ally, Bituitus, king of the Arverni (Auvergne), in Gaul, son of the preceding, was consul in B.C. 121. His campaign was brilliant, and his triumph, De Allobrogibus et Rege Arvernorum Bituito (Fausti), was rendered famous by the spectacle of the Arvernian king riding in the chariot, and wearing the silver armour he had borne in battle. [BITUITUS.] From the plunder of Auvergne Fabius erected the Fornix Fabianus crossing the Via Sacra, and near the temple of Vesta at Rome, and placed over the arch a statue of himself. (Pseud-Ascon. ad Cic. Verr. i. 7, p. 133, Orelli; Schol. Gron. pp. 393, 399; comp. Cic. de Orat. ii. 66; Plin. H. N. vii. 50.) Fabius was censor in B.C. 108. He was an orator and a man of letters. (Cic. Brut. 28, pro Font. 12.) On the death of Scipio Aemilianus, in B.C. 129, Fabius gave a banquet to the citizens of Rome, and pronounced the funeral oration of the deceased, a fragment of which is still extant. (Cic. pro Muraena. 36; Schol. Bob. in Milonian. p. 283, Orelli; Appian, Gall. 2; Vell. Pat. ii. 10.) Plin. (H. N. xxxiii. 11) confounds this Fabius with the preceding.

10. Q. FABIVS Q. F. Q. ARMIANI N. MAXIMVS ALLOBROGICVS, son of the preceding, was remarkable only for his vices. The city praetor interdicted him from administering to his father's estate; and the scandalous life of Fabius made the prohibition to be universally approved. (Cic. Tuscul. i. 33; Val. Max. iii. 5. § 2.)

11. Q. FABIVS Q. F. Q. N. MAXIMVS, with the agnomen SERVILIANVS, was adopted from the gens Servilia, by Fabius Aemilianus (No. 8). He was uterine brother of Cn. Servilius Caepio, consul in B.C. 141. (Appian, Hispan. 70.) He was consul in B.C. 142. His province was Lusitania, and the war with Viriathus. (Appian, Iber. 67; Oros. v. 4; Cic. ad Att. xii. 5; comp. de Orat. i. 26.) Valerius Maximus (vi. i. § 5, viii. 5. § 1) ascribes to Fabius a censorship which the Fausti do not confirm.

12. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS EBURNVS, was city praetor in B.C. 118, when he presided at the impeachment of C. Papirius Carbo, accused of majestas by L. Crassus. (CARBO, PAPIRIUS, No. 2; Cic. de Orat. i. 26.) Fabius was consul in B.C. 116. He condemned one of his sons to death for immorality; but being subsequently accused by Cn. Pompeius Strabo of exceeding the limits of the "patris potestas," he went into exile, and probably to Nuceria. (Cic. pro Balb. 11; Val. Max. vi. i. § 5; Oros. v. 16.)

COIN OF FABIVS MAXIMVS.

13. Q. FABIVS Q. F. Q. N. MAXIMVS, was joined with Q. Caelius Rufus in B.C. 59, in the execution of C. Antonius Hybrida [ANTONIUS, No. 10] for extortion in his province of Macedonia. (Cic. in Vat. 11; Schol. Bob. in Vatian. p. 321, Orelli.) For his services as legatus to Caesar in Spain, B.C. 45 (Caes. B. H. 2, 41), he obtained a triumph and the consulship of that year on Caesar's deposition of it in September. Fabius died on the last day (December 31) of his official year. (Dion Cass. xliiii. 42, 46; Plin. H. N. vii. 53; Cic. ad Fam. vii. 30; Liv. Epit. 116; comp. Macroh. Sat. ii. 3.)

To which of the Fabii Maximi the preceding coin belongs is quite uncertain. [W. B. D.]

MAXIMVS, FVLVIVS CENTVMALVS. [CENTVMALVS, No. 1.]

MAXIMVS HIEROSOLYMITANVS, or of JERUSALEM, of which city he was bishop, a Greek ecclesiastical writer of the latter part of the second century. Jerome (De Viris Illust. c. 47) mentions Maximus, an ecclesiastical writer who wrote on the questions of the origin of evil and the creation of matter, as having lived under the emperors Commodus (A.D. 180—193) and Severus (A.D. 193—211), but he does not say what office he held in the church, or whether he held any; nor does he connect him with any locality. Honorius of Autun (De Scriptor. Eccles. i. 47), extracting from Jerome, reads the name Maximinus; and Rufinus, translating from Eusebius, who has a short passage relating to the same writer (H. E. v. 27), gives the name in the same form; but it is probably incorrect. There was a Maximus bishop of Jerusalem in the reign of Antoninus Pius or Marcus Aurelius, or the earlier part of that of Commodus, i.e. somewhere between A.D. 156 and A.D. 185, and probably in the early part of that interval: another Maximus occupied the same see from A.D. 185; and the successive episcopates of himself and seven successors occupy about eighty years, the length of each separate episcopate not being known. The date therefore of this latter Maximus of Jerusalem accords sufficiently with the notice in Jerome respecting the writer; but it is remarkable that though both Eusebius and Jerome mention the bishop (Eusebius, Chron. and Hieron. Euseb. Chron. Interpretatio), they do not either of them identify the writer with him; and it is remarkable that in the list given by Eusebius of the bishops of Jerusalem in his Hist. Eccles. (v. 27), the names of the second Maximus and his successor, Antoninus, do not appear. It must be considered therefore uncertain whether the writer and the bishop are the same person, though it is most likely they were. The title of the work of Maximus noticed by Jerome and Eusebius (for the two questions of the origin of evil and the creation of matter appear to have been comprehended in one treatise) was Περὶ τῆς ὄλης, De Materia. Eusebius has given a long extract from it. (Præp. Evang. vii. 21, 22.) The same extract, or a portion of it, is incorporated, without acknowledgment, in the Dialogus Adamantii de rectis in Deum Fide, or Contra Marcionitas, sect. iv. commonly ascribed to Origen, but in reality written or compiled long after his time. It is also quoted in the Philocalia, c. 24, compiled by Gregory Nazianzen and Basil the Great, almost entirely from the works of Origen. In the short inscription to the chapter they are said to be from the Præparatio Evangelion of Eusebius; and their being contained also in the supposed work of Origen, De Recta Fide, is affirmed in a probably interpolated sentence of the concluding paragraph of the chapter. (Delarue, Opera Origenis, vol. i. p. 800, seq.) This passage, apparently the only part of Maximus' work which has come down to us, is given in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland (vol. ii. p. 146), who identifies the author with the bishop, and gives his reasons for so doing in the Prolegomena to the volume, c. 6; see also Cave, Hist. Litt. ad ann. 196, vol. i. p. 95; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. ii. p. 760, &c., note xiii. sur Origène.

Beside the two bishops of Jerusalem of this name already noticed, there was a third in the reign of Constantine the Great and his sons. He suffered in one of the later persecutions of the heathen emperors, apparently under Maximian Galerius. (Philostorg. H. E. iii. 12.) He suffered the loss of his right eye, and some infliction, possibly ham-stringing, in his right leg. (Theodoret. H. E. ii. 26.) His sufferings in the cause of Christianity and the general excellence of his character so endeared him to the people of Jerusalem, among whom he officiated as priest, that when he was appointed by Macarius, bishop of that city, to the vacant bishopric of Diopolis, the multitude would not allow him to depart; and Macarius was obliged to forego the appointment, and nominate another in his place. According to some accounts, Macarius repented almost immediately of the nomination of Maximus to Diopolis, and readily consented to his remaining at Jerusalem, taking him for his assistant in the duties of the episcopal office, and his intended successor, fearing lest Eusebius of Caesarea and Patrophilus of Scythopolis should procure the election of a favourer of Arianism. (Sozomen, H. E. ii. 20.) On the decease of Macarius some time between A. D. 331 and 335, Maximus succeeded him, and was present at the council of Tyre, A. D. 335, when Athanasius was condemned. Sozomen records (H. E. ii. 25) that at this council Paphnutius, a bishop of the Thebais or Upper Egypt, and himself a confessor, took Maximus by the hand, and told him to leave the place: "For," said he, "it does not become us, who have lost our eyes and been hamstrung for the sake of religion, to join the council of the wicked." This appeal was in vain, and Maximus was induced by some unfairness to subscribe the decree condemning Athanasius. However, he soon repented of this step, and at a synod of sixteen bishops of Palestine joyfully admitted Athanasius to communion when returning from the council of Sardica, through Asia, to Alexandria. Sozomen relates (H. E. iv. 20) that Maximus was deposed by the influence of Aencius of Caesarea and Patrophilus, A. D. 349 or 350, and Cyril [CYRILLUS, ST., of Jerusalem] appointed in his place; but if there is any truth in this statement, of which Jerome, in his Chronicle, does not speak, the death of Maximus must have very shortly succeeded his deposition. MAXIMUS, LABERIUS. [LABERIUS.]

MAXIMUS, MAGNUS CLEMENS, Roman emperor, A. D. 383—388, in Gaul, Britain, and Spain, was a native of Spain (Zosim. iv. p. 247), but not of England, as modern authors assert. He boasted of being a relation of his contemporary, the emperor Theodosius the Great, though the fact is that he had merely lived some years in the household of that emperor in a subordinate capacity. He was of obscure parentage; an uncle of his, however, is mentioned in history, and also a brother, Marcellinus, whose name will appear again in the course of this sketch. Maximus accompanied Theodosius on several of his expeditions, was promoted, and, perhaps as early as A. D. 368, proceeded with his master to Britain, where he remained many years in the quality of a general, as it seems, but decidedly not as governor of that province, as some modern writers of eminence pretend. It is said that he married Helena, the daughter of Eudde, a rich noble of Caernegont (Caernarvon in Wales), but the authority is more than doubtful. (Comp. Gibbon, c. xxvii. p. 7, note k. ed. 1815, 8vo.) The predilection of the emperor Gratian for foreign barbarians excited discontent among the legions in Britain, which were the most turbulent in the whole Roman army. Maximus is said to have secretly fomented their disaffection, and thus a terrible revolt broke out which led to the accession of Maximus and the ruin of Gratian. Zosimus, though by no means a detractor of Maximus, charges him with having acted thus; but Orosius and Sulpicius Severus both state that the troops had forced Maximus, who was known as a man of principle and merit, to accept the imperial dignity, which was offered him by the rebels; and Orosius says that he solemnly protested his innocence. However this may be, Maximus was proclaimed emperor in A. D. 383 (not in 381 as Prosper states in his Chronicon). A short time before his accession he had adopted the Christian religion.

Maximus immediately gave orders to all the troops stationed in Britain to assemble as soon as possible, and he lost no time in attacking Gratian in Gaul. It is related in the life of Gratian that he was defeated by the usurper near Paris, deserted by his general Merobaudes, a Frankish chief, and finally slain near Lyon, on his flight to Italy, by Andragathius, who pursued him by order of Maximus. The sudden overthrow of the power of Gratian was followed by the as sudden and complete establishment of the power of Maximus: Gaul, Spain, and Britain did homage to the fortunate usurper, who associated his son Victor with him, proclaiming him Caesar, and perhaps Augustus; and the new emperor took up his residence at Trèves, where there are still some monuments evi-tant of his reign. No persecutions were instituted against the adherents of Gratian, except Merobaudes and Balio or Vallio, who lost their heads on account of their ambiguous conduct, and it seems that, with these exceptions, Maximus was not wrong when, in later times, he boasted that his elevation had caused no loss of Roman life except on the field of battle. Yet even Merobaudes and Vallio were not Romans but barbarians. When the news of the downfall of Gratian and the success of Maximus reached Theodosius, he resolved to wrest the crown from the usurper, but ambassadors arrived from Maximus with peaceful offers, backed by stern declarations of sacrificing every thing for the maintenance of his power; and as Theodosius was then unable to wage war with a rebel who was popular among the experienced and hard veterans of the West, he accepted the propositions made to him. Maximus was, in consequence, re-conquered by Theodosius and Valentinian as Augustus and sole emperor in Gaul, Spain, and Britain, while the new emperor in his turn promised not to molest Valentinian in the possession of Italy and Illyricum, which he had held already in the time of his brother Gratian.

Nothing now prevented Maximus from enjoying his power, and promoting the happiness of his subjects, but two circumstances, each of which was sufficient to foretell a future commotion. The professed friendship of Theodosius was not real, and the unparalleled success of Maximus swelled his ambition so much that he stepped beyond those limits of wisdom within which he ought to have kept his future plan. Italy was governed by a feeble youth, but who might become dangerous when a man, unless he forgot that he was the brother of a murdered emperor. The possession of Italy was therefore the great object at which Maximus aimed; and the revenues of his vast dominions were exhausted to form an army, the contingents of which were raised among the most warlike barbarians of the time. Yet less confident in arms than in intrigues, Maximus prevailed upon the ministers of young Valentinian to accept from him auxiliaries for an intended war in Pannonia; and, although his motives were seen through by St. Ambrose and the other councillors of Valentinian, the forces of Maximus were allowed to cross the passes of the Alps (387). In their rear followed Maximus with his main army, and while the inhabitants of Milan, where the imperial court of Italy then resided, expected to welcome allies, they and their master were terrified by the sudden and unaccountable appearance of a hostile army under their walls. Flight was the only means of safety for Valentinian. Without loss of time he escaped with his mother Justina to Aquileia, and thence by sea to Thessalonica, whence he despatched messengers to Constantinople to apprise Theodosius of his fate. Maximus entered Milan in triumph, and Rome and the rest of Italy soon submitted to him almost without a struggle.

The alarm of Theodosius at hearing at once of the loss of Italy, the disgrace of a weak yet beloved colleague, and the triumph of a hated rival, may be easily imagined. Instead of inviting Valentinian to proceed to Constantinople, he hastened, without losing any time, to Salonica, accompanied by his principal ministers, and then, with the fugitive emperor and his mother Justina, concerted measures to check the threatening course of the British conqueror. His love for Valentinian's sister Galla added wings to his resolution: in the midst of his preparations for bloodshed and war he married that beautiful princess, and then set out to encounter the legions of Gaul. Maximus, meanwhile, prepared for resistance by sea and land. Andragathus covered the coast of Italy with a powerful fleet, and the emperor concentrated his troops near Aquileia, despatching his van into Noricum and Pannonia, in order to receive Theodosius in that quarter if he should choose to come by land. Theodosius did come by land, and in the first engagement at Siscia, on the Save, the Western troops were completely defeated: they suffered a second defeat, being then commanded by Marcellinus, the brother of Maximus; and now Theodosius broke through the Noric Alps into Italy. Maximus, flying before him, took refuge within the walls of Aquileia, arriving there nearly at the same time as his pursuers. The troops of Theodosius immediately stormed the city, and with such energy that they took it at once, and seized Maximus, it is said, while seated on his throne. Theodosius was waiting the issue at his head-quarters, three miles from Aquileia. Thither Maximus was carried, loaded with chains. With a stern yet calm voice Theodosius reproached him for his rebellion against Gratian and unbounded ambition, and then gave orders for his decapitation, which took place on the same day (27th or 28th of August, 388). Victor, the son of Maximus, being then engaged in Gaul against the Franks, Arbogastes marched against him with a strong force. Victor was defeated and taken prisoner, and shared the fate of his father. Andragathus, the commander of the fleet of Maximus, upon hearing of the death of his master, threw himself in a fit of despair into the sea and was drowned. Theodosius was merciful and generous towards the mother and sisters of his fallen rival; but he nullified all the laws issued by Maximus. Valentinian nominally succeeded Maximus in the possession of Italy and the country beyond the Alps, but the real emperor was Theodosius. (Zosim. iv. p. 247, &c. ed. COIN OF MAXIMUS MAGNUS.

MAXIMUS, CN. MAILLIUS, was consul in B. C. 105, when he carried his election against Q. Catulus [CATULUS, No. 5]. Cicero represents Mallius as an utterly worthless man. (Pro Planc. 5, pro Muræna. 36.) Mallius obtained Transalpine Gaul for his province, and, principally through dissensions with his colleague, the proconsul Q. Servilius Cæpio [CÆPIO, SERVILIUS, No. 7], he was utterly defeated by the Boian Gauls. His two sons perished in the action, and on his return to Rome he was impeached, and defended by M. Antonius, the orator. (Sall. B. J. 114; Liv. Epit. 67; Cic. de Orat. 28.) [W. B. D.]

MAXIMUS, MARIUS, is repeatedly cited as a weighty authority by the Augustan historians. He appears to have written at great length the biographies of the Roman emperors, beginning with Trajan and ending with Elagabalus, and very probably, as Casaubon conjectures, flourished under Alexander Severus. He is named with great respect by Ammianus Marcellinus, but is termed by Vopiscus (Firm. c. 1) "homo omnium verbaissimus qui et mythistoricis ac voluminibus implicavit." (See Spartian. Hadrian. 2, Casaubon's note; Lamprid. Alex. Sev. 30; Vulcat. Gall. Avid. Cuss. 6, 9; Lamprid. Commod. 13, 15; Spartian. S. Sever. 15; Capitolin. Albin. 3, 9, 12; Spartian. Get. 2; Lamprid. Alex. Sev. 3, 65, Elagab. 11.)

No distinct idea can be formed of the arrangement of the work from the manner in which it is quoted by Spartianus (Get. 2), "de cuius vita et moribus in vita Severi Marius Maximus primo seipensario satis copiose retulit." [W. R.]

MAXIMUS, ME'SSIUS, one of the most intimate friends of the younger Pliny, seems to have been a native of Verona, and certainly possessed considerable influence in the neighbourhood of that town, to which his wife belonged. (Plin. Ep. ii. 14.) Hence Pliny recommends to him Arrianus, of Altinum, a town near Venice (iii. 2). Maximus was subsequently sent into Achaia to arrange the affairs of the free towns in the province, on which occasion Pliny addressed him a letter, in imitation of Cicero's celebrated epistle to his brother Quintus, to teach him how he ought to discharge the duties of his new appointment (viii. 24). Maximus was an author, and one of his works is praised by Pliny in the most extravagant terms (iv. 20). Pliny appears to have frequently consulted him respecting his own literary compositions. The following letters of Pliny are addressed to Maximus: ii. 14, iii. 2, 20, iv. 20, 25, v. 5, vi. 11, 34, vii. 26, viii. 19, 24, ix. 1, 23.

MAXIMUS, PETRONIUS (ANICIUS?), Roman emperor, A. D. 455. His long and meritorious life as an officer of state forms a striking contrast with his short and unfortunate reign. He belonged to the high nobility of Rome, and was a descendant, or at any rate a kinsman, of Petronius Probus, who gained so much power in Rome towards the end of the fourth century of our era; it is doubtful whether he was the son of a daughter of the emperor Maximus Magnus; nor is his title to the Anician name sufficiently established, although Tillemont says that there are two inscriptions on which he is called Anicius. Maximus Petronius was born about A. D. 388, or perhaps as late as 395. At the youthful age of 19 he was admitted to the council of the emperor Honorius in his double quality of tribune and notary (407 or 414). In 415 he was comes largitionum, and in 420 he filled the important office of praefectus Romae, discharging his duty with such general satisfaction that, in 421, on the solicitation of the senate and people of Rome, the emperors Honorius and Arcadius caused a statue to be erected to him on the Campus Trajani. In 433 he was second consul, the emperor Theodosius II. being the first. During the years 439 till 441, and afterwards in 445, he was praefectus Italiae. In 443 he was again chosen consul, being the first: his colleague was Paternus. Valentinian III. held him in such esteem that he ordered a medal to be struck in honour of him, which represented on the obverse the head and name of the emperor, and on the reverse the name and image of Maximus dressed in the consular garb. Maximus was in every respect what we now understand under the French term, a "grand seigneur": he was of noble birth, rich, generous, well educated, with a strong turn for literature, fine arts, and science, full of dignity yet affable and condescending, a professed lover and practiser of virtue, yet with a sufficient smack of fashionable follies and amiable vices to secure him an honourable rank among the gay companions of the corrupt Valentinian. Maximus found no scruple in secretly helping the emperor in his intrigues against Aëtius, which ended in the murder of that great man in 454; but he was now to experience that while it is only dangerous to be disliked by men like Valentinian, it is at once dangerous and disgraceful to be liked by them, because their attachment is neither guided by principles nor ennobled by esteem. Maximus had a beautiful and virtuous wife of whom Valentinian was enamoured. One day, having lost a great deal of money to the emperor, while playing with him, he gave him his seal ring as a pledge for the debt. Valentinian sent this ring to the wife of Maximus in the name of the empress Eudoxia, with a request to join her and her husband at the palace. The unsuspecting lady proceeded thither forthwith, and was ushered into a solitary room where, instead of her husband and the empress, she found the emperor, who began by a declaration of love. Meeting with an indignant repulse he forced her person. The disgraced woman returned to her mansion, almost dying with shame, and accused Maximus of having had a hand in this infamous transaction. The feelings of her husband need no description. His wife died soon afterwards. He brooded revenge, and the numerous friends of the murdered Aëtius being animated by the same feelings, he joined them joyfully. On the 16th of March 455, Valentinian was amusing himself in the Campus Martius; suddenly a band of armed men rushed upon him, and the emperor was murdered.

Maximus was now proclaimed emperor, and he accepted the crown, but never enjoyed it. On the very day of his accession he was a prey to grief and remorse, and, fully aware of the danger that surrounded the master of Rome, he compared his fate with that of Damocles. Anxious to secure himself on his bloody throne he appointed his friend Avitus commander-in-chief, and he contrived a marriage between his son Palladius and Eudoxia, the daughter of the late Valentinian. He then forced Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, to marry him. This proved his ruin. Eudoxia, twice empress, yet disdained her condition, and full of hatred against Maximus, entered into intrigues with Genseric, the king of the Vandals, at Carthage, the result of which was that the barbarian equipped a fleet for the conquest of Rome. Maximus was apprised of the fact, but did nothing to prevent the approaching storm: he was incompetent as an emperor. Suddenly news came that the Vandals were disembarking at the mouth of the Tiber. Rome was in commotion and fear, and the trembling people looked up to Maximus for relief. He advised flight to those who could fly, resignation to those who could not, and then set out to abandon his capital and his people. But he had not yet left Rome when he was overtaken by a band of Burgundian mercenaries, commanded by some old officers of Valentinian; they fell upon him, and he expired under their daggers. His body was dragged through the streets of Rome, mutilated, and then thrown into the Tiber. Three days afterwards Genseric made his entry into Rome and sacked the city. The reign of Maximus lasted between two and three months, but there are great discrepancies regarding the exact number of days. The reader will receive ample information on this point from not. xii. to page 628 of the "Ed

vol. of Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs. (Procop. Bell. Vand. i. 4, 5; Sidon. Apollin. Ep. i. 9, ii. 13; Passagyr. Aviti, v. 359, &c., 442, &c.; Prosper, Victor, Idatius, Marcellinus, Chronica; Evagr. ii. 7; Jornand. De Rob. Goth. p. 127, ed. Lindenbrog.) [W. P.]

MA'XIMUS PLANU'DES. [PLANUDES.]

MA'XIMUS, QUINTILIUS, the brother of Quintilian Condianus, of whom an account is given under CONDIANUS.

MA'XIMUS, RUTILIUS, a Roman jurist of uncertain age. He is only known from the Florentine Index and a single excerpt in the Digest (30. a. 125), as the author of a treatise in a single book, Ad Legem Falcidiam, which was enacted a. c. 40. [G. L.]

MA'XIMUS, SANQUINIUS, is first mentioned towards the latter end of the reign of Tiberius, a. d. 32, when he is spoken of as a person of consular rank. (Tac. Ann. vi. 4.) We learn from Dion Cassius (lix. 13) and the Fasti that he was consul a. d. 39, in the reign of Caligula, but from the passage of Tacitus quoted above, he must have been consul previously, though his first consulship does not occur in the Fasti. He also held the office of præfectus urbi in the reign of Caligula. (Dion Cass. l. c.) In the reign of Claudius he had the command in Lower Germany, and died in the province, a. d. 47. (Tac. Ann. xi. 18.) He seems to have been a different person from Sanquinius, the accuser of Arruntius. (Tac. Ann. vi. 7.)

MA'XIMUS SCAURUS. [SCAURUS.]

MA'XIMUS, SULPICIUS GALBA. [GALBA, No. 1.]

MA'XIMUS TAURINENSIS, so called because he was bishop of Turin, flourished about the middle of the fifth century. He subscribed in a. d. 451 the synodic epistle of Eusebius, bishop of Milan, to Leo the Great; and from the circumstance that in the acts of the council of Rome, held in a. d. 465, by Hilarius, the successor of Leo, the signature of Maximus immediately follows that of the chief pontiff, taking precedence of the metropolitans of Milan and Embrun, we may conclude that he was the oldest prelate present. It has been inferred from different passages in his works that he was born about the close of the fourth century, at Vercelli, that he was educated in that city, that he there discharged the first duties of the sacred office, and that he lived to a great age; but it is impossible to speak with certainty upon these points.

Gennadius, who is followed by Trithemius, states that Maximus composed a great number of tracts and homilies upon various subjects, several of which he specifies. Many of these have been preserved in independent MSS., while the Lectioaria of the principal monasteries and cathedrals in Europe, investigated with assiduity from the days of Charlemagne down to our own times, have yielded so many more which may with confidence be ascribed to this bishop of Turin, that he must be regarded as the most voluminous compiler of discourses in the Latin church. Little can be said in praise of the quality of these productions, most of which were probably delivered extemporaneously. They are so weak and so destitute of grace, eloquence, and learning, that we wonder that they should ever have been thought worthy of preservation at all. The only merit they possess is purely antiquarian, affording as they do incidentally considerable insight into the ecclesiastical ceremonies and usages of the period to which they belong, and containing many curious indications of the state of manners.

In the complete and sumptuous edition superintended by Bruno Brunus, published by the Propaganda at Rome (fol. 1784), under the especial patronage of Pope Pius the Sixth, and enriched with annotations by Victor Amadeus, king of Sardinia, the various pieces are ranked under three heads.

I. Homiliae. II. Sermones. III. Tractatus.

The Homiliae and the Sermones, the distinction between which is in the present case by no means obvious or even intelligible, amounting in all to 233, are divided each into three classes, De Tempore, De Sanctis, De Diversis; the discourses In Tempore relating to the moveable feasts, those De Sanctis to the lives, works, and miracles of saints, confessors, and martyrs; those De Diversis to miscellaneous topics.

The Tractatus, in No. 6, are I. II. III. In Baptismo. IV. Contra Paganos. V. Contra Judæos. VI. Expositiones de Capitulis Evangeliorum.

Besides the above, we find in an appendix thirty-one Sermones, three Homiliae, and two Epistolæ, all of doubtful authenticity; and it is, moreover, proved that a vast number of sermons and homilies have been lost.

Sermons by Maximus were first printed at Spirea, by Peter Drach, fol. 1482, in the Homiliarium Doctorum, originally compiled, it is said, by Paulus Diaconus, at the command of Charlemagne. Seventy-four of his homilies were published in a separate form by Joannes Gymnicus at Cologne, 8vo. 1535. The number was gradually increased by the Benedictines in their editions of Augustin and Ambrose, by Mabillon (Museum Italicum, 1687), by Muratori (Anecdol. vol. iv. 1713), by Martene and Durand (Collectio amplissima, &c., 1733—1741), and by Galland (Biblioth. Patrum, vol. ix. &c.), who, however, merely collected and arranged the contributions of preceding scholars; but all editions must give way to that of Brunus mentioned above. (Schönemann, Biblioth. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 25; Galland, Bibl. Patr. Proleg. ad vol. ix. c. ix.; and Brunus, in the life of Maximus, prefixed to his edition.) [W. R.]

MA'XIMUS TYRANNUS, Roman emperor, was raised to the supreme power, in a. d. 408, by Gerontius when this general rebelled in Spain against Constantine. Olympiodorus says that Maximus was the son of Gerontius, but it seems more probable that he was only an officer in the army and his tool, and in the latter quality he behaved during the short time he bore the imperial title. When immediately after his revolt Gerontius marched into Gaul, Maximus remained at Tarragona, but could not prevent the Alans, Suevians, Vandals, and other barbarians from invading Spain in 409. After the defeat of Gerontius at Arles, and his death, in 411, Maximus was compelled to yield to the victorious Constantine, who forced him to renounce the imperial title, but granted him life and liberty on account of his incapacity for important affairs. Maximus retired among the barbarians and lived an obscure life in a corner of Spain. As Orosius speaks of him as a living person, he was consequently alive in 417, the year in which that writer composed his work. Prosper states that in 419 (418?) he rebelled and made himself master of the Roman portion of Spain; but this rebellion was a trifling affair, and he perhaps only got possession of some small district. Failing in his enterprise he was seized, carried to Italy, and, in 422, put to death at Ravenna together with Jovinus. [GERONTIUS.] (Sozom. ix. 12—15; Orosius, vii. 42, 43; Olympiodorus apud Phot. Biblioth. cod. 80; Greg. Turon. i. ii. c. 9; Prosper, Marcellinus, Idatius, Chronica.) [W. P.]

MAXIMUS TYRIUS, a native of Tyre, a Greek writer of the age of the Antonines, was rather later, therefore, than Maximus the Rhetorician, mentioned by Plutarch (Symp. ix. probl. 4), and rather earlier than the Maximus mentioned by Porphyry (apud Euseb. Evang. Praep. x. 3) as having been present at the supper given by Longinus at Athens in honour of Plato. It is disputed whether Maximus of Tyre was one of the tutors of the emperor Aurelius. The text of the Chronicon of Eusebius, in which he is mentioned, being lost, we have to choose between the interpretation of his translator Jerome, according to whom Maximus is not mentioned as tutor to the emperor, and the reading of Georgius Syncellus [GEORGIUS, No. 46], who appears to have transcribed Eusebius, and according to whom Maximus held that office in conjunction with Apollonius of Chalcedon [APOLLONIUS, No. 11], and Basilides of Scythopolis [BASILIDES, No. 2]. Even if we accept the reading of Syncellus, as representing the genuine text of Eusebius, it is not improbable that the statement may have arisen from the latter confounding Claudius Maximus, the Stoic, with Maximus of Tyre. Tillemont contends earnestly (Hist. des Empereurs, vol. ii. p. 550, note 11, sur l'Emp. Tit. Antonin.) for the identity of the two persons, following in this the judgment of Jos. Scaliger, Jac. Cappellus, Dan. Heinsius, and Barthius. According to Suidas (s. v. Μάξιμος Τύριος) Maximus resided at Rome in the time of the emperor Commodus, and the title of the MS. of the Dissertationes Maximi, in the King's Library at Paris, used by Heinsius, Μαξίμου Τυρίου Πλατωνικοῦ φιλοσόφου τῶν ἐν Ῥώμῃ διαλέξεων τῆς πρώτης ἐπιδημίας λόγος μ', Maximi Tyrii Platonici Philosophi Dissertationum Romae, quum ibi primo versaretur, compositarum, &c., gives reason to believe that he resided there at least twice. Davis, indeed, disputes this, and conjectures from intimations contained in the work itself that only a few of the dissertations (five or perhaps seven) were written at Rome, that others were written in Greece, in which country he thinks Maximus passed a longer period of his life than at Rome. Certainly, while his works contain abundant allusions to Grecian history, there is scarcely a single reference to that of Rome. In one passage (Dissert. viii. 8), Maximus states that he had seen the sacred rivers Marsyas and Maeander at Celaenae in Phrygia. He probably also had visited Paphos, in the isle of Cyprus, Mount Olympus, in Asia Minor, and perhaps Aetna, in Sicily, with which he contrasts Olympus; and as he had seen also the quadrangular stone which the Arabs worshipped as an image or emblem of their deity, it is most likely that he had been in Arabia. (Maxim. Dissert. ibid.) But he does not appear to have resided in these places, but only to have visited them in the course of his travels, which must have been extensive. The time of his death is not known.

The title of his only extant work is variously given as Διαλέξεις, Dissertationes, or Λόγοι, Sermones. It consists of forty-one dissertations on theological, ethical, and other philosophical subjects. Heinsius thinks that the author arranged them in ten Tetralogias, or sets of four each, according to the subjects; and in one of his notes he conjecturally gives what he regards as their correct order. The Dissertatio "Ὅτι πρὸς πάσαν ἀνθρώπου ἀρμόσεται ὁ τοῦ φιλοσόφου λόγος, Omni subjecto philosophiam convenire, he considers to have been the proem or introduction to the whole work. The work was first printed in the Latin version of Cosmus Paccius, archbishop of Florence, made from a MS. of the original which Janus Lascaris had brought from Greece into Italy to Lorenzo de' Medici. This version was published fol. Rome, 1517, by Petrus Paccius, the translator's brother: again, fol. Basil. 1519, and in a smaller form at Paris, 1554. The Greek text was first printed by Hen. Stephanus, 8vo. Paris, 1557, accompanied, but in a separate volume, by the version of Paccius. The edition of Heinsius, from a MS. in the King's Library at Paris (with the title quoted above), with a new Latin version and notes by the editor, was printed 8vo. Leyden, 1607 and again 1614, and without the notes, A. D. 1630. It has been reprinted once or twice since then. In the first edition the Latin version and the notes formed separate volumes. Heinsius did not follow either the arrangement of his MS. or his own suggested arrangement in Tetralogias. The first edition of Davis, fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge, with the version of Heinsius, whose arrangement he adopted, and short notes, was published, 8vo. Cambridge, 1703; the second and more important edition, in which the text was carefully revised and a different arrangement of the Dissertationes was adopted, was published after the editor's death by Dr. John Ward, the Gresham professor, with valuable notes, by Jeremiah Markland, 4to. London, 1740. This second edition of Davis was reprinted with some corrections and additional notes by Jo. Jac. Reiske, 2 vols. 8vo. Lips. 1774—5. The works Περὶ Ὁμήρου καὶ τῆς ἐν παρ' αὐτῷ ἀρχαίας φιλοσοφίας, De Homero et quae sit apud eum antiqua Philosophia, and Εἰ καλῶς Σωκράτης οὐκ ἀτελογράφει, Rectene Socrates fecerit, quod accusatus non responderit, mentioned by Suidas (l. c.), appear to be two of the Dissertationes, Nos. 16 and 39, in the editions of Heinsius and first of Davis, and Nos. 32 and 9 in Davis's second and Reiske's editions. Some Scholias in Cratylus Platonis, by Maximus of Tyre, were formerly extant in the Palatine Library. Fed. Morellus conjectured, but on insufficient grounds, that Maximus was the Tyrian sophist mentioned by Libanius (Orat. xix. pro Saltatoribus) as having written an Ἐνθάφιος λόγος, Oratio Funebria, for the Trojan Paris.

The merits of Maximus of Tyre have been variously estimated. Reiske, who undertook the charge of the Leipzig edition, at the request of the bookseller, when worn down by increasing years and long literary labours, especially in editing Plutarch, speaks of Maximus as a tedious, affectual writer, who degraded the most elevated and important subjects by his trivial and puerile mode of treating them. But Markland, while admitting and blaming the haste and inaccuracy of Maximus, praises his acuteness, ability, and learning. He thinks that Maximus published two editions of his

Dissertationes; in the second of which (represented by the version of Paccius, the Parisian MS. followed by Heinsius, and the Harleian MS., one of those employed by Davis for his second edition) he corrected the errors in argument of the first edition, but left uncorrected the numerous errors as to historical facts. (Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. vol. i. p. 516, vol. iii. p. 77, vol. v. p. 515, &c.; Heinsius, Davis, Markland, alii, Præfat. Notæ &c. ad Opera Marimi Tyrii.) [J. C. M.]

MAXIMUS, VALERIUS. 1. M. VALERIUS (VOLUM F.) VOLUSUS MAXIMUS, was the first of the Valerian house who bore the surname of Maximus. He was a brother of P. Valerius Poplicola, and was dictator in B. C. 494, when the dissensions between the burghers and commonalty of Rome de Nebris were at the highest. Valerius was popular with the plebs, and induced them to enlist for the Sabine and Aequian wars, by promising that when the enemy was repulsed, the condition of the debtors (sestis) should be alleviated. He defeated and triumphed over the Sabines; but unable to fulfil his promise to the commons, resigned his dictatorship. The plebs, seeing that Valerius at least had kept faith with them, escorted him honourably home. As he was advanced in life at the time of his dictatorship, he probably died soon after. (Dionys. vi. 39—45; Liv. ii. 30, 31; Cic. Brut. 14.)

2. M. VALERIUS M. F. VOLUM N. LACTUCA MAXIMUS, son of the preceding, was consul in B. C. 456. He opposed Icilius, tribune of the plebs, in his efforts to assign the Aventine hill to the commons. (Dionys. x. 31—33; Liv. iii. 31.) The agnomen Lactuca, lettuce, a favourite esculent of the early Romans (Mart. Ep. x. 14) belongs to the same class of surnames as Cicero (Cicero) (Plin. H. N. xviii. 3; Plut. Cic. 1) and Stolo in the Licinian family. (Varr. R. R. i. 2.)

3. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. LACTUCINUS MAXIMUS, was one of the military tribunes, with consular power, in B. C. 398 and 395. (Liv. v. 14, 24.)

4. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MAXIMUS, was four times praetor and consul in B. C. 312. His province was Samnium, and it afforded him a triumph, De Samnitibus Soranisque (Fasti). He was legatus to the dictator, Papirius Cursor, in B. C. 308, and censor in B. C. 307, when he extended or improved the roads through the demesne lands. (Liv. ix. 29, 40, 41, 43.)

5. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MAXIMUS, with the agnomen CORVINUS, derived from his father, M. Valerius Corvus, who was five times consul in the Samnite wars. He was consul in B. C. 289 (Fasti). From the loss of Livy's second decade, the history of his consulship is lost.

6. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, with the agnomen POTTUS, was consul in B. C. 286. The agitation attending the Hortensian laws occupied the consuls of this year. (Fasti; Plin. H. N. xvi. 10.)

7. M. VALERIUS MAXIMUS, was consul in A. D. 253, 256. (Fasti.) [W. B. D.]

MAXIMUS, VALERIUS, to whom the praenomen Marcus is assigned in one of the best MSS., and that of Publius in another, is known to us as the compiler of a large collection of historical anecdotes, entitled De Factis Dictisque Memorabilibus Libri IX., arranged under different heads, the sayings and doings of Roman worthies being, moreover, kept distinct in each division from those of foreigners. No reasonable doubt can be entertained with regard to the period when he flourished. The dedication is indeed couched in such general terms, that the adulation might apply to almost any Caesar; but when we find the writer speaking of himself as removed by two generations only from M. Antonius the orator (vi. 8. § 1), when we remark the studied abhorrence everywhere expressed towards Brutus and Cassius (vi. 4. § 5, i. 8. § 8), and the rager flattery so lavishly heaped upon the Julian line, we at once conclude that he lived under the first emperors. The description of the reigning prince as one descended from both of the two illustrious censors, Claudius Nero and Livius Salinator (ix. 2. § 6), distinctly marks out Tiberius; and, this point being fixed, we can determine that the parricide, whose treason and destruction form the theme of a glowing invective (ix. 11. § 4), must be the notorious Sejanus. The opinion hazarded by some of the earlier scholars, that we ought to regard this Valerius Maximus as the same person with the consul of that name who held office for the first time under Volusianus in A. D. 253, and for a second time under Gallienus in A. D. 256, seems to be totally devoid of any foundation, and is directly contradicted not only by the evidence recited above, but also by the fact that the Valerius Maximus whom we are now considering is referred to by the elder Pliny (H. N. i. ind. lib. vii.), by Plutarch (Marcell. sub fin.), and by Aulus Gellius (xii. 7), the testimony of the last especially being quite impregnable. Of his personal history we know nothing, except the solitary circumstance, recorded by himself, that he accompanied, but in what capacity we are not told, Sex. Pompeius into Asia (ii. 6. § 8), the Sextus Pompeius apparently who was consul A. D. 14, at the time when Augustus died, and who was the first to render homage to his successor.

The subjects treated of are of a character so miscellaneous, that it would be impossible, without transcribing the short notices placed at the head of each chapter, to convey a clear idea of the contents. In some books the topics selected for illustration are closely allied to each other, in others no bond of union can be traced. Thus the first book is entirely devoted to matters connected with sacred rites, and we have a succession of narratives: De Religione Observata, De Religione Neglecta, De Religione Simulata, De Religione Peregrina Rejcta, De Auspiciis, De Ominibus, De Prodigis, De Somniis, De Miraculis; the second book relates chiefly to certain remarkable civil institutions; the third, fourth, fifth and sixth, to the more prominent social virtues; but in the seventh the chapters De Strategematis, De Repuliis, are abruptly followed by those De Necessitate, De Testamentis Revisis, De Ratis Testamentis et Insuperatis. Upon observing the symmetry which prevails in some places with the disorder so perceptible in others, we feel strongly disposed to conjecture that particular sections may have been at one time circulated separately, and afterwards collected without due attention being paid to their proper collocation; while at the same time we are impressed with the conviction that a much more suitable and natural disposition of the different parts might be introduced. In this way something like a general plan would become visible; for without going so far as to assert that the whole ought to be regarded in the light of a formal treatise on morality, taught by examples, it is even now very evident that the greater number of the stories are designed to illustrate some great moral principle. In an historical point of view the work is by no means without value, since it preserves a record of many curious events not to be found elsewhere; but from the errors actually detected upon points where we possess more precise information, it is manifest that we must not repose implicit confidence in the statements unless where they are corroborated by collateral testimony. The writer is much too eager to make a strong impression, and is willing to sacrifice both simplicity and probability for the sake of astonishing and confounding his readers. The style, in like manner, although not destitute of force and point, is throughout constrained and ambitious, full of violent antitheses and harsh metaphors, cumbrous and obscure. The Latinity which was pronounced by Erasmus to bear no more resemblance to that of Cicero than a mule does to a man, is of such an inferior stamp that many critics have been unable to persuade themselves that it could have proceeded from one who bordered closely upon the Augustan age, and hence have been driven to adopt the hypothesis that what we now possess is not really the production of Valerius Maximus, but a series of extracts from him, collected and compressed by a later hand, according to the plan pursued by Justin towards Trogus Pompeius (JUSTINUS); and Vossius supposes that this task was performed by a certain Julius Paris. Without dwelling upon the à priori argument, which is, however, very convincing, that the pages now before us contain many ornaments, many diffuse descriptions, and many grandiloquent periods, which would have been omitted, curtailed, and tamed down by an epitomator, we must make some inquiries into the extent of the original work, and these will be found to bear directly upon the origin and plausibility of the theory which we have just stated.

All the most important MSS. and the earliest printed editions present us with nine books and no more. But to a few codices a short tract is found appended on the history and import of the praenomen among the Romans. To this are usually prefixed two brief introductions, first published from MSS. by Pighius. One professes to be C. Titi Probi in Epitomen suam Praefatio, the other is anonymous; but both regard this fragment as belonging to an abridgment of a tenth book of Valerius Maximus, which is supposed to have discussed all the different names in use; and the second preface ascribes the abridgement expressly to "Julius Paris, the abbreviator of Valerius," who, it is added, entitled it Liber Decimus de Praenominibus et similibus. Now, although the "Epitome de Nominum Ratione," as it is sometimes called, does not, as it stands, bear the slightest resemblance in form or in substance to the Memorabilia, and although it is hard to understand how it could, from whatever source derived, have been in any way connected with it, we are fully entitled to infer from these little prefaces that Valerius Maximus had been abridged by a Titus Probus, and by a Julius Paris; and, in addition to these two, a letter published by Labbe (Biblioth. MSS. vol. i. p. 669) furnishes us with the name of a third epitomator, Januarius Nepotianus. The belief, however, that what now passes as the work of Valerius Maximus was, in truth, one of these abridgements, has been completely overthrown, in so far as Paris and Nepotianus are concerned, by the researches of Angelo Mai, who detected in the library of the Vatican MSS. of these very abridgements, and printed them in his "Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio e Vaticanis Codicibus edita," 4to. Rom. 1828, vol. iii. pt. iii. p. 1—116. The abridgement of Julius Paris includes the whole of the nine books, and also the Liber Decimus de Praenominibus, which terminates, it would seem, abruptly, for the index at the beginning of the MS. promises six chapters, De Praenominibus, De Nominibus, De Cognominibus, De Agnominibus, De Appellationibus, De Verbis, of which the first only is extant. There is a dedication likewise to a Licinius Cyriacus, in which Paris declares "decem Valerii Maximi libros dictorum et factorum memorabilium ad unum volumen epitomae coegi." This piece was unquestionably executed at a very early period, for the phraseology is very pure, and is by no means a close transcript of the original, from which the epitomator departs not only in words, but occasionally in facts also, as may be seen from the examples quoted in Mai (præf. xxi.). The abridgement of Nepotianus again is very imperfect, breaking off in the second chapter of the third book: it belongs to a later epoch than the former, but is quite independent of it, it is more brief, passes over several of the examples given by Valerius, and substitutes others in their room. We are led to surmise that the same MS. may at one time have embraced the abridgement of Probus also, for subjoined to the conclusion of Julius Paris we read the title C. TITI PROBI FINIT EPIITOMA HISTORIARUM DIVERSORUM EXEMPLORUMQUE ROMANORUM. FELICITER EMENDAVI DESCRIP- TUM RABENNAE RUSTICIUS HELPIDIUS DON- NULUS, V. C. If these words stand upon a separate leaf, which is not quite certain from the description of Mai, we should be induced to conclude that a large number of sheets had been left out in binding up the MS., and that these had comprehended the five missing sections, "De Nominum Ratione," together with the whole abridgement of Probus. Although the question with respect to the tenth book of Valerius is involved in greater obscurity than ever by the result of the above investigations, we may now feel certain that the second and third of the three propositions by which Vossius endeavoured to get rid of the difficulties by which the subject is embarrassed, cannot be maintained. These were: 1. That Julius Paris was the epitomator of the nine books of Valerius Maximus; 2. That he was the author of the essay "De Nominum Ratione;" 3. That Probus merely drew up an epitome of the essay by Julius Paris.

Finally, we must not omit to point out that even before the discovery of Mai the abridgment by Paris was not altogether unknown. There is a blank in the MSS. of Valerius Maximus extending from i. 1. § 5, of the "externa exempla," down to the end of chapter IV. This hiatus Aldus filled up by an extract supplied to him by Cuspinianus, from the epitome of Paris then existing at Vienna; and this has been retained in all subsequent editions, so that what we now read within the above limits are not the words of Maximus, but of Paris.

Besides the abridgements already specified, Mai found no less than three more among the MSS. of the Vatican, two of them anonymous; the third by "John the son of Andrew;" and so late as the end of the fifteenth century Robert de Valle and

J. Honorius arranged similar excerpts, which were published, the former in 4to., without date and without name of place or printer, but about 1500, the latter at Leipzig, 4to. 1503. These facts prove how highly the Memorabilia was valued as a storehouse where rhetoricians could at all times find a large and varied stock of striking illustrations ready for use; and Paris informs us that his epitome was intended to render these treasures more available to debaters and declaimers.

The Editio Princeps of Valerius Maximus, according to the best bibliographers, is a folio in Gothic characters, without date and without any name of place or printer, but which is known to have been the work of J. Mentelin of Strasburg, and to have appeared about 1470: this and two other very old impressions, one by Peter Schoyfer, fol. Mogunt. 1471, the other by Vindekin de Spira, fol. Venet. 1471, contest the honour of being the first, and in addition, upwards of fourteen distinct editions, were published before 1490, a sure indication of the high estimation in which the book was held.

The first critical edition was that of Aldus, 8vo. Venet. 1502; and the text was gradually improved by the labours of Paulus Manutius, 8vo. Venet. 1534; of Steph. Pighius, who filled up many blanks from MSS., but did not bestow sufficient time upon his task, 8vo. Antv. Plantin. 1637; of Verstius, 8vo. Berol. 1672; and especially of Torrenius, 4to. Leid. 1726, whose text is still the standard, although some improvements were introduced by Kappius, 8vo. Lips. 1782; and much still remains in a most unsatisfactory condition.

We have an English translation, "The History of the Acts and Sayings of the Ancient Romans, written by Valerius Maximus, translated into English by W. Speed, 8vo. Lond. 1678;" another by Charles Lloyd was advertised in 1814; but it seems doubtful whether it was ever published. There is a very old half translation, half commentary, in French, by Simon de Hesdin and Nicolas de Gonesse, commenced by the former as early as 1364, finished by the latter about 1405, and printed without date or name of place about 1476. See Mémoires de l'Académie de Belles Lettres, vol. xxxvi. p. 165. There are also several translations into French, Italian, and German, the most recent in the three languages respectively being those by Fremion, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1827; by Michael Battaglia, 2 vols. 8vo. Treviro, 1821; and by Hoffmann, 5 vols. 16mo. Stuttgart, 1828. [W. R.]

MAZAEUS (Μαζαῖος), a Persian, satrap of Egypt. He appears to have succeeded Sabaces, after the latter fell at the battle of Issus. When Amyntas with his Greek troops and some Egyptians who had joined him, appeared before Memphis, Mazaces was at first defeated; but afterwards rallied forth at the head of his forces, while they were scattered about in search of plunder, and slew Amyntas with most of his men. [AMYNTAS.] On the approach of Alexander, Mazaces, who had no Persian troops at his command, and finding resistance hopeless, voluntarily submitted, and gave up to Alexander 800 talents, and all the royal stores, B. C. 332. (Arrian, iii. 1; Curt. iv. 1. § 30, &c., 7. § 4.) [C. P. M.]

MAZAEUS (Μαζαῖος). 1. Satrap of Cilicia, who, with Belesys, satrap of Syria, made head against the revolted Phoenicians, in the reign of Ochus, while the latter was preparing to march against them in person, B. C. 351 (Diod. xvi. 42).

2. A Persian officer who was sent by Dareius, at the head of a small force, to guard the passage of the Euphrates, at Thapsacus, and ravage the district through which Alexander was likely to pass. He prevented the troops sent forwards by Alexander from completing the bridges which they had begun to throw across the river, but retired on the approach of Alexander himself, and rejoined Dareius. His name occurs several times in the account of the manoeuvres which preceded the battle of Gaugamela, and in the battle itself he headed the Persian cavalry, with which he sorely pressed Parmenio, while a detachment by his orders assaulted the Macedonian camp. After the flight of Dareius he retreated with the remnants of the army to Babylon, but made a voluntary surrender on the approach of Alexander, who appointed him satrap of Babylon, B. C. 331. (Arrian, iii. 7. § 2, iv. 18. § 4, vii. 18. § 1; Curt. iv. 9. §§ 7, 12, 14, iv. 12. §§ 1, 15, iv. 15. § 5, iv. 16. §§ 1, 7, v. 1. §§ 17, 43, v. 8. § 12.) [C. P. M.]

MAZARES (Μαζάρης), a Mede, was sent by Cyrus into Lydia, about B. C. 545, to carry into effect there the suggestion of Croesus, that the Lydians should be prevented from bearing arms and be rendered as effeminate as possible. Mazares was also commissioned to bring Pactyas, the rebel, back to Cyrus, as a prisoner. He compelled the Lydians to submit to the new regulations of the conqueror, and he succeeded in getting Pactyas into his power. He then went against the rebels, who had besieged Tabalus, the Persian governor, in the citadel of Sardis; and, having enslaved the Prieniens, he overran the region about the Maeander and the Maeonian plain. Soon after he was attacked by a disease which proved fatal. (Herod. i. 156—161.) [E. E.]

MEBARSAPES (Μεβάρσπης), king of Adiabene, a province of Assyria, was attacked by Trajan in his expedition against the Parthians. (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 22, with the note of Reimar.)

MECHANES (Μηχανεύς), skilled in inventing, was a surname of Zeus at Argos (Paus. ii. 22, § 3). The feminine form, Mechanitis (Μηχανίτις), occurs as a surname of Aphrodite, at Megalopolis, and of Athena, in the same neighbourhood. (Paus. viii. 31, § 3, 36, § 3.) [L. S.]

MECHOPHANES, a disciple of Pausias, and apparently a distinguished painter of the Sicynian school, is thus described by Pliny:—"Sunt quibus et Mechophanes, ejusdem Pausiae discipulus, placeat diligenter, alias durus in coloribus, et sile multus." (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. a. 40. § 31.) [P. S.]

MECISTEUS (Μηκίστος). 1. A son of Talauus and Lysimache, brother of Adrastus, and father of Euryalus of Thebes. (Hom. II. ii. 566; Apollod. iii. 6. § 3; comp. EURYALUS.)

2. A son of Echius, and one of the companions of Teucer at Troy. (Hom. II. viii. 333; comp. Herod. v. 67.) Mecisteus also occurs as a surname of Heracles. (Lycoph. 651.) [L. S.]

MECON (Μήκων), i. e. a poppy, is said to have been the name of an Athenian whom Demeter loved, and who was metamorphosed into a poppy plant. (Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 212; Callim. Hymn. in Cer. 45; Theocrit. vii. in fin.) [L. S.]

MEDEIA (Μήδεια), a daughter of Aëtes by the Oceanid Idyia, or, according to others, by Hecate, the daughter of Peres (Apollod. i. 9 § 23; Hea. Theog. 961; Diod. iv. 45). She was the wife of Jason, and the most famous among the mythical sorcerers. The principal parts of her story have already been given under ANSVRTVS, ARGONAVTAE, and JASON. After her flight from Corinth to Athens, she is said to have married king AEGEVS (Plut. Thes. 12), or to have been beloved by SIAPHNA. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 74.) Zeus himself is said to have sued for her, but in vain, because Medeia dreaded the anger of Hera; and the latter rewarded her by promising immortality to her children. Her children are, according to some accounts, Mermerus, Pheres, or Thessalus, Alcimenus and Tisander, and, according to others, she had seven sons and seven daughters, while others mention only two children, Medus (some call him Polixemus) and Eriopis, or one son Argus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Diod. iv. 54; Ptolem. Heph. 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 276.) Respecting her flight from Corinth, there are different traditions. Some say, as we remarked above, that she fled to Athens and married AEGEVS, but when it was discovered that she had laid snares for Thesus, she escaped and went to Asia, the inhabitants of which were called after her Medes. (Medi, Paus. ii. 3. § 7; Ov. Met. vii. 391, &c.) Others relate that first she fled from Corinth to Heraclæa at Thebes, who had promised her his assistance while yet in Colchia, in case of Jason being unfaithful to her. She cured Heraclæa, who was seized with madness, and as he could not afford her the assistance he had promised, she went to Athens. (Diod. iv. 54.) She is said to have given birth to her son Medus after her arrival in Asia, where, after her flight from Athens, she had married a king; whereas others state that her son Medus accompanied her from Athens to Colchia, where her son slew Pseus, and restored her father Aeetes to his kingdom. The restoration of Aeetes, however, is attributed by some to Jason, who accompanied Medeia to Colchia. (Diod. iv. 54—56; Hygin. Fab. 26; Justin. xlii. 2; Tac. Ann. vi. 34.) There is also a tradition that in Thessaly Medeia entered into a contest with Thetis about her beauty, which was decided by Idomeneus in favour of Thetis (Ptolem. Heph. 5), and another that Medeia went to Italy, and there taught the Marubians the art of fascinating and subduing serpents, whence she is said to have been called Anguitia or Angitia. (Serv. ad Aen. vii. 750; comp. ANGITIA.) At length Medeia is said to have become immortal, to have been honoured with divine worship, and to have married Achilles in Elysium. (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 10, ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 814; comp. Müller, Orchom. p. 264, 2d edit.) [L. S.]

MEDIUS (Μῆδιος), another form for Medus, the son of Medeia, from whom the Medes in Asia were believed to have derived their name. (Hea. Theog. 1001; Cic. De Off. i. 31.) [L. S.]

MEDION (Μηδίων), a son of Pylades and Electra, from whom the town of Medeon in Phocia was believed to have received its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

MEDESICASTE (Μηδειακστὴ), a daughter of Priam, and the wife of Imbrus, at Pedaeus. (Hom. Il. xiii. 173; Paus. x. 25, in fin.) [L. S.]

MEDITRINA, a Roman divinity of the art of healing, in whose honour the festival of the Meditrinalia was celebrated in the month of October. (Varro, De L. L. vi. 21; Paul Diac. p. 123, ed.

Müller.) Varro connects the name with the verb mederi, to heal, and this seems to accord well with the rites observed at the festival of the goddess. (Dict. of Ant. s. v. Meditrinalia.) [L. S.]

MEDIUS FIDIUS. [Fidivus.]

MEDIUS (Μῆδιος). 1. Dynast of Larissa in Thessaly, who was engaged in a war with Lycophron, tyrant of Phæria, in the year a.c. 395. In this he was assisted by the Boeotians, who had just concluded an alliance with the Argives, Corinthians, and Athenians, against the power of Sparta, and with their assistance he took the city of Pharsalus (Diod. xiv. 82). These events are omitted by Xenophon.

2. Son of Oxythemis, a native of Larissa in Thessaly, and a friend of Alexander the Great. He is mentioned as commanding a trireme during the descent of the Indus (Arrian, Ind. 18), but with this exception his name does not occur in the military operations of the king. He appears, however, to have enjoyed a high place in the personal favour of the monarch, and it was at his house that Alexander supped just before his last illness. Hence, according to those writers who represented the king to have been poisoned, it was at this banquet that the fatal draught was administered, and not without the cognizance, as it was said, of Medius himself. Others more plausibly ascribed the illness of Alexander to his intemperance upon the same occasion (Arrian, Anab. vii. 24, 25; Plut. Alex. 75; Diod. xvii. 117; Athen. x. p. 434 c.). Plutarch speaks in very unfavourable terms of Medius, whom he represents as one of the flatterers to whose evil counsels the most reprehensible of the actions of Alexander were to be ascribed (De Adul. et Amic. 24). But no trace of this is to be found in the better authorities.

After the death of Alexander, Medius followed the fortunes of Antigonus, whose fleet we find him commanding in a.c. 314, when he defeated and took thirty-six ships of the Pydnæans, who had espoused the party of Cassander (Diod. xiv. 69). The following year (313) he took Miletus, and afterwards relieved the city of Oreus in Eubœa, which was besieged by Cassander himself (ib. 75). Again, in 312, he was despatched by Antigonus with a fleet of 150 ships, to make a descent in Greece, and landed a large army in Boeotia under Ptolemy; after which he returned to Asia to co-operate with Antigonus himself, at the Helicopont (ib. 77). In 306 we find him present at the great sea-fight off Salamis in Cyprus, on which occasion he commanded the left wing of the fleet of Demetrius (Id. x. 50). It appears also that he accompanied Antigonus on his unsuccessful expedition against Egypt in the same year (Plut. Demetr. 19), but after this we hear no more of him. His authority is cited by Strabo (xi. p. 530) in a manner that would lead us to conclude he had left some historical work, but we find no further mention of him as a writer. The Medius who is quoted by Lucian (Macrob. 11) concerning the ap of Antigonus Gonatas, must evidently have been a different person, and one otherwise unknown. (See Geier, Alexandri M. Histor. Scriptores. p. 344, &c.) [E. H. B.]

MEDIUS (Μῆδιος), a Greek physician who was a pupil of Chrysippus of Cnidus (Galen. De Vir. Sect. ado. Erasistr. Rom. Deg. c. 2, De Cur. R. ad. per Ven. Sect. c. 2, vol. xi. pp. 197, 252), and who lived therefore probably in the fourth and third centuries B.C. Galen says he was held in good repute among the Greeks (l. c. p. 252), and quotes him apparently as a respectable authority on an anatomical question (Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136). Like the other pupils of Chrysippus, he entirely abstained from blood-letting (Galen, l. c.). He was, perhaps, the brother of Cretoxena, the mother of Erasistratus (Suid., in "Erasistr."), but could not have been much his senior. [W. A. G.]

MEDOCUS. [AMADOCUS.]

MEDON (Μέδων). 1. A herald in the house of Odysseus. (Hom. Od. iv. 677, xxii. 357.)

2. A son of Oileus and Rhene, and a brother of the lesser Ajax. Having slain Eriopis, one of his mother's kinsmen, he left his father's house, and fled to Phylace. He commanded the Pythians in the war against Troy, and when Philoctetes was wounded, Medon commanded the Methonians in his place. He was slain by Aeneas. (Hom. Il. ii. 727, &c., xiii. 693, &c., xv. 332.)

Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Ovid (Met. xii. 303), and Hyginus (Fab. 134).

MEDON (Μέδων). 1. King of Argos, was son of Ceisus, and grandson of Temenus the Heraclid. (Paus. ii. 19; Clint. F. H. vol. i. p. 249, note v.)

2. A citizen of Beroea, was one of the ambassadors whom Perseus, king of Macedonia, sent with a proposal of peace to the Romans after he had defeated them, under P. Licinius Crassus, on the banks of the Peneus, in B.C. 171. Licinius, however, adhered to the regular Roman policy, of never granting peace but after a victory. (Polyb. xvi. 8; Liv. xlii. 62.) [E. E.]

MEDON (Μέδων), a Lacedaemonian statuary, the brother of Dorycleidas, and the disciple of Dipoenus and Seyllis, made the gold and ivory statue of Athena in the Heraeum at Olympia (Paus. v. 17. § 1). He flourished about A.C. 550. [P. S.]

MEDO'SADES (Μηδοσάδης), a man employed by Suthes, king of Thrace, to conduct his negotiations with Xenophon and the troops under his command, after their return from their Asiatic expedition. (Xen. Anab. vii. 1 § 5, vii. 2. § 10, 24, vii. 7. § 1, &c.) [C. P. M.]

MEDULLINUS, a family-name of the gens Furia, a very ancient patrician house at Rome. [FURIA GENs.] Medullia, from which the surname comes, was a Latin town very early incorporated with Rome (Dionys. iii. 1; Liv. i. 33, 38), and, since Medullinus appears on the Fasti in B.C. 488, only five years after the Cassian treaty of isopoly with the Latin league, this branch of the Furii was doubtless Latin. The Tullii Hostilii also were originally from Medullia. (Dionys. l. c.; Macroh. Sat. i. 6.)

1. SEXT. FURIUS MEDULLINUS FUSUS, was consul in B.C. 488, the year in which, according to the common story, Coriolanus led the Volscians against Rome. (Dionys. viii. 16, 63; Liv. ii. 39.)

2. SP. FURIUS MEDULLINUS FUSUS, was consul in A.C. 481. Livy says that his consulate was occupied by tribunitian dissensions, and an inroad into the territory of Veii (ii. 43). Dionysius represents him as a popular consul (δημότης), and assigns him a successful campaign against the Aequians (ix. 1, 2).

3. L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS FUSUS, was consul in B.C. 474. He opposed a revival of the agrarian law of Sp. Cassius, and, on laying down his office, was therefore impeached by Cn. Genucius, one of the tribunes of the plebs. (Liv. ii. 54; Dionys. ix. 36, 37.)

4. P. FURIUS MEDULLINUS FUSUS, was consul in B.C. 472, and opposed the rogation of Publius Volero, tribune of the plebs, that the tribunes should be chosen by the comitia of the tribes, instead of the comitia of centuries. (Liv. ii. 56; Dionys. ix. 40, 41.)

5. SP. FURIUS MEDULLINUS FUSUS, was consul in B.C. 464. He was defeated, wounded, and besieged in his camp by the Aequians. (Dionys. ix. 62—67; Liv. iii. 4, 5.)

6. P. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, brother and legatus of the preceding, was slain in the Aequian war. (Dionys. ix. 63; Liv. iii. 5.)

7. AGRIPPA FURIUS MEDULLINUS, was consul in B.C. 446. He was engaged in the Volscian and Aequian wars, and protested against the unjust decision of the curies at Rome respecting a tract of land claimed by Ardea on the one side and by Aricia on the other. (Dionys. xi. 51; Liv. iii. 66, 70, 71.) The praenomen Agrippa was probably derived from some accident at the birth of Medullinus (Plin. H. N. vii. 6), as it was not a family name in the Furia gens.

8. L. FURIUS SP. F. MEDULLINUS FUSUS, was thrice military tribune, with consular authority: I. B.C. 432 (Liv. iv. 25). II. B.C. 425 (id. ib. 35). III. B.C. 420 (id. ib. 45).

9. L. FURIUS MEDULLINUS, was twice consul, B.C. 413, 409. In his first consulate he conducted the Volscian war and took Ferentinum (Liv. iv. 51); in his second both the Aequian and Volscian, when he captured Carventum (id. ib. 54, 55).

10. L. FURIUS L. F. SP. N. MEDULLINUS, was seven times military tribune with consular authority: I. B.C. 407 (Liv. iv. 57); II. 405, in the year the siege of Veii began (id. ib. 61); III. B.C. 398 (Liv. v. 12); IV. 397 (Liv. v. 14); V. 395 (id. ib. 24); VI. 394 (id. ib. 26); VII. B.C. 391 (id. ib. 32; Fasti).

11. SP. FURIUS L. F. SP. N. MEDULLINUS, tribune of the soldiers with consular authority, B.C. 400. (Fasti.)

12. L. FURIUS SP. F. L. N. MEDULLINUS (son of the preceding), was twice military tribune with consular authority, B.C. 381, 370. In his first consular tribunate he was joined in the command of the Volscian war with M. Furius Camillus. [CAMILLUS, No. 1.] Medullinus was through his own rashness defeated by the enemy. Camillus, however, rescued him, and afterwards named him his colleague in a second campaign. Medullinus was censor in B.C. 363. (Liv. vi. 22—25, 36; Fasti.)

13. SP. FURIUS SP. F. L. N. MEDULLINUS, brother of the preceding, was military tribune B.C. 378. He commanded in the war with the Volscians of Antium. (Liv. vi. 31.) [W. B. D.]

MEDULLINUS, MAENIUS. [MAENIUS, No. 8.]

MEDUS (Μῆδος), a son of Medea and Jason. [See MEDREA and MEDRIVA.] A second personage of the same name is mentioned by Plutarch. (De Furo. 24.) [L. S.]

MEDUSA (Μέδουσα). 1. A daughter of Phoecys and Ceto, and one of the Gorgons. [GORGONES, PERSEUS.]

2. A daughter of Sthenelus and Nicippe, and a sister of Eurystheus. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5.)

3. A daughter of Priam. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5; Paris. x. 26. § 1.) [L. S.]

MEGABATES (Μεγαβάτης). 1. A Persian of the royal family of the Achaemenidae, cousin of Darius and of Artaphernes, was appointed by the latter to the command of the expedition sent to assist Aristagoras in the reduction of Naxos; but, in consequence of a quarrel with Aristagoras, Megabates betrayed the object of the expedition to the Naxians, who, thus forewarned, defended themselves successfully. (Herod. v. 32—34.) According to Herodotus, Pausanias designed to marry the daughter of Megabates; but the letter of Pausanias to Xerxes, as given by Thucydides (i. 128), contains an offer to marry the daughter of the king himself.

2. In the narrative just quoted Thucydides mentions Megabates, governor of Daecylitis, who is perhaps the same person (c. 129).

3. See MEGABAZUS, No. 5. [P. S.]

MEGABAZUS (Μεγαβάζος), and MEGABYZUS (Μεγαβύζος), are Persian names, which are so intermixed by Herodotus, Ctesias, and other writers, as to make it nearly certain that they are only different forms of the same name. Thucydides, however, applies the names respectively to two different persons (i. 109); but this is not a certain proof that the names were really different. For a further discussion of the two forms, see Duker and Poppo, ad Thucyd. l. c.; Hemsterh. ad Lucian. Tim. 22; Perizon. ad Aelian. V. H. ii. 2; Dorville. ad Charit. p. 472 (pp. 446, 447, orig. ed.) Aeschylus (Pers. 22) gives the form Μεγαβάτης, and Xenophon confounds Μεγαβάζος and Μεγαβάτης. [See below, No. 5.]

1. One of the seven Persian nobles who formed the conspiracy against the Magian Smerdis, B. C. 521. In the discussion put into the mouths of the conspirators by Herodotus, after the death of the Magian, Megabazus recommends an oligarchical form of government. (Herod. iii. 70, 81.) Darius, who held him in the highest esteem, left him behind with an army in Europe, when he himself recrossed the Hellespont, on his return from Scythia, B. C. 506. (Id. iv. 143, 144.) Megabazus subdued Perinthus and the other cities on the Hellespont and along the coast of Thrace, which had not yet submitted to the Persian rule, and removed the Paeonians, who dwelt about the Strymon, into Phrygia. (Id. v. 1—16, comp. 98.) He also sent to Amyntas, the king of Macedonia, and demanded earth and water, in token of his submission to Darius. [For what followed see ALEXANDER I. Vol. I. p. 118.] On his return to Sardis he advised Darius to recall Histiaeus from Myrcinus. [HISTIAEUS.] Herodotus mentions a celebrated saying of his in praise of the situation of Byzantium (iv. 144). He was the father of Zopyrus. (Id. iii. 153.) Xenophon (Cyrop. viii. 6. § 7) mentions a Megabyzus who was appointed by Cyrus as satrap of Arabia.

2. Megabyzus, the son of Zopyrus, and grandson of the above, was one of the commanders of the land forces in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece, B. C. 480. (Herod. vii. 82.) Megabyzus was the commander of the army which Cimon defeated on the Eurymedon, in B. C. 466. (Diod.

xii. 3.) [CIMON.] When the Athenians made their expedition against Egypt, Megabyzus was sent against them with a large army; and having driven them out of Memphis, he shut them up in the island of Prosopitis, which he at last took, after a siege of eighteen months, A. C. 457. (Herod. iii. 160; Thuc. i. 109; Diod. xi. 74. § 6.) Ctesias informs us that he was the son-in-law of Xerxes, having married his daughter Amytis; and he ascribes to Megabyzus the service which Herodotus attributes to Zopyrus, namely, the taking of Babylon, after its revolt from Xerxes. (Pers. 22; Diod. x. 17. § 2; comp. Herod. iii. 153.) Several other incidents of his life are related by Ctesias. (Pers. 27, 30, 33—40.) Two sons of his are mentioned, Zopyrus and Artyrphus. (Ctes. 37; Herod. iii. 160.) He is always called Μεγαβύζος, except in a quotation from Ctesias by Stephanus (A. C. Κυράνα), who gives the name in the form Μεγαβάζος; but even in this passage Westermann has printed it Μεγαβύζος.

3. Megabazus, the son of Megabates, one of the commanders of the fleet of Xerxes. (Herod. vii. 97.) Diodorus calls him Megabates (xi. 12, 13). Perhaps he was the same person as

4. Megabazus, a Persian, who, at the time of the revolt of Inarus and the Athenian expedition to Egypt, was sent by Artaxerxes to Lacedaemon, to bribe the Peloponnesians to invade Attica; but his mission altogether failed. (Thuc. i. 109.)

5. The son of Spithridates, was beloved by Agesilaus. (Xen. Hell. i. 4. § 28, Ages. 5; Plut. Ages. 11, Apoph. Lacom. p. 787; in which passages the name varies between Μεγαβάζος, Μεγαβύζος, Μεγαβάτης, and Μεγαβύτης.)

6. The priest or keeper (πρεσβυτερος) of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. (Xen. Anab. v. 3. § 6, 7.) It appears from Strabo (xiv. p. 641) that the Megabyzi, or, as he calls them, the Megalobyzi, were eunuch priests in the temple of Artemis. Another of these priests is mentioned by Appian (B. C. v. 9) as having incurred the anger of Cleopatra. [P. S.]

MEGABERNES (Μεγαβέρνης), a grandson of Astyages, according to the account of Ctesias (Pers. 2, 8.) [P. S.]

MEGABOCCHUS, C. is mentioned by Cicero in his oration for Scaurus (c. 2. § 40) as condemned along with T. Albucius on account of his crimes in the government of Sardinia. He is, perhaps, the same as the Megabacchus who perished along with Crassus in the expedition against the Parthians (Plut. Crass. 25). The Megabocchus spoken of by Cicero, in one of his letters (ad Att. ii. 7. § 3), is supposed by Manutius and others to be a nickname given to Pompey on account of his victories in the war between Sulla and the Marian party, and this supposition is also maintained by Drmann (Geogr. Rom., vol. vi. p. 44). But as there was evidently a Roman at that time of the name of Megabocchus, and Cicero in the letter referred to speaks of "Megabocchus et haec sanguinaria juvenut," the opinion of Gronovius appears the more probable, that this Megabocchus was one of the reputed conspirators of Catiline; and he may, therefore, have been the same as the one mentioned in the oration for Scaurus, and by Plutarch.

MEGABYZUS. [MEGABAZUS.]

MEGACLEIDES (Μεγακλείδης). 1. A Greek writer, from whom Athenaeus has quoted some important remarks respecting the mythology of Pericles. (Athen. xii. p. 512, 513.)

2. A native of Eleusis, brought forward by Demosthenes as a witness in his speech against Callippus. He had had a dispute about some money transactions with Lycon. (Dem. in Callipp. p. 1241, ed. Reiske.) [C. P. M.]

MEGACLES (Μεγακλῆς). 1. A Syracusan, brother of Dion the son of Hipparchus, and brother-in-law of the elder Dionysius, to whose government he lent his support, and on one occasion when the tyrant was inclined to despair, urged him not to abandon the sovereignty until absolutely compelled to do so (Diod. xx. 78; but see Wesseling's note). He, however, in common with his brother, became discontented at the government of the younger Dionysius, and accompanied Dion in his flight from Syracuse, B. C. 358 (Diod. xvi. 6). He afterwards also took part with him in his expedition to Sicily, and when Dion made himself master of Syracuse, Megacles accompanied him on his triumphal entry into the city, and was associated with him in the chief command (Plut. Dion. 28, 29). But from this period his name is not again mentioned.

2. An officer in the service of Pyrrhus, who accompanied that monarch on his expedition to Italy, B. C. 280. He is mentioned as accompanying Pyrrhus when he reconnoitred the Roman camp previous to the battle of Heracleia; and in that action was the means of saving the king's life, by exchanging armour with him, and thus directing the efforts of the assailants upon himself, instead of Pyrrhus. He fell a victim to his devotion, being slain by a Roman named Decius. (Plut. Pyrrh. 16, 17; Zonar. viii. 3.) [E. H. B.]

MEGACLES (Μεγακλῆς). 1. A name borne by several of the Athenian family of the Alcmaeonidae. They are enumerated in the genealogical table of that family in Vol. I. p. 105; and what is known respecting those of any historical importance will be found in the articles CYLON, PRISISTRATUS, ALCIBIADES, &c., which are referred to in the article ALCMAEONIDAE.

2. A native of Mytilene, who, with the assistance of his friends, overthrew the Penthalidae, a ruling family in Mytilene. (Arist. Pol. v. 10. p. 1311, ed. Bekker.)

3. A Greek writer, the author of a treatise on illustrious men, quoted by Athenaeus (x. p. 419, a). [C. P. M.]

MEGACLES (Μεγακλῆς), an architect of unknown country and date, who, together with Antiphilus and Pothaeus, built the treasury of the Carthaginians at Olympia. (Paus. vi. 19. § 4.) [P. S.]

MEGAERA. [ERINNYES.]

MEGALEAS (Μεγαλέας), was chief secretary to Antigonus Doson, king of Macedonia, who appointed him, by his will, to the same office under Philip V., his ward and successor (B. C. 220). Megaleas was entirely under the influence of Apelles, and readily entered into his treasonable designs (B. C. 218), to baffle the operations of Philip in his war against the Aetolians. Their treachery, however, was counteracted by Aratus, and the latter accordingly was assailed with personal violence by Megaleas, Leontius, and Crinon, at Limnaea, in Acarnania, when Philip had returned thither from his successful campaign in Aetolia. For this offence Megaleas and Crinon were thrown into prison till they should find security for a fine of twenty talents, but Megaleas was released on the bail of Leontius, who had contrived to escape in the tumult for which his accomplices were punished. In the same year (218) Megaleas and Leontius excited a mutiny at Corinth among the troops of Philip. It was soon quelled; and, though the king knew who had been the authors of it, he dissembled his knowledge, and Megaleas and his chief accomplices were still holding high military rank when Apelles returned to court from Chalcis. The reception, however, of the latter proved that he had quite lost his master's confidence, and Megaleas fled in alarm to Athens; and being refused refuge there, betook himself to Thebes. Here he continued his impotent and rancorous course of treason by writing letters to the Aetolians, filled with abuse of Philip, and with strong exhortations to them to persevere in the war against him, as his finances were exhausted. The letters were intercepted and brought to the king, who thereupon despatched ALEXANDER [Vol. I. p. 112] to Thebes, to sue Megaleas for the amount of his fine; and the traitor, not venturing to abide the issue of the trial, put an end to his own life. (Pol. iv. 87, v. 2, 14—16, 25—28.) [E. E.]

MEGALOSTRATA (Μεγαλοστράτα), a Lacedaemonian poetess, beloved by Alcman, the following fragment from whom contains all that is known of her:

Τούτ' δδ' εὖν Μωσῶν ἔδειξε δάρων μάκαιρα παρθένον
δ' ἐνθάδ' Μεγαλοστράτα.

(Alcman, Fr. op. Ath. xiii. p. 600. f., No. 27 in Welcker, 18 in Schneidewin's Delect. Poes. Graec., 21 in Bergk's Poet. Lyr. Graec.) [P. S.]

MEGAMÉDE (Μεγαμήδη), a daughter of Arnaeus, and the wife of Thestius, by whom she became the mother of fifty daughters. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 10.) [L. S.]

MEGANEIRA (Μεγάνειρα). 1. A daughter of Crocon, and the wife of Arcaea. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1; comp. ARCAEA.)

2. The wife of Celeus. (Paus. i. 39. § 1; comp. ΜΕΤΑΝΕΙΡΑ.) [L. S.]

MEGAPENTHES (Μεγαπένθης). 1. A son of Proetus, was king of Argos, and father of Anaxagoras and Iphianaira. (Paus. ii. 18. § 4; Diod. iv. 68.) He exchanged his dominion for that of Perseus, so that the latter received Tiryns instead of Argos. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 4; Paus. ii. 16. § 3.) He is said to have afterwards slain Perseus. (Hygin. Fab. 244.)

2. A son of Menelaus by an Aetolian slave, Pieris or Teridae. Menelaus brought about a marriage between Megapenthes and a daughter of Alector. (Hom. Od. iii. 188, iv. 11, xv. 100; Apollod. iii. 11. § 1.) According to a tradition current in Rhodes, Megapenthes, after the death of his father, expelled Helen from Argos, and she fled to Polyxo at Rhodes. (Paus. iii. 19. § 2; comp. ii. 18. § 5, iii. 18. § 7.)

A third personage of this name occurs in Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 1480). [L. S.]

MEGARA (Μεγάρα), a daughter of king Creon of Thebes, and wife of Heracles. (Hom. Od. xi. 269; Eurip. Herc. Fur. 9; Apollod. ii. 4. § 11; Paus. i. 41; Pind. Isthm. i. 82.) Respecting her history see HERACLES. [L. S.]

MEGAREUS (Μεγαρεύς), a son of Onchestus, is also called a son of Poseidon by Oenope, of Hipp ponenes, Apollo, or Aegeus (Apollod. iii. 15. § 8; Paus. i. 39. § 5; Ov. Mét. x. 605; Hygin. Fab. 157; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μέγαρες). He was a brother of Abrote, the wife of Nisus, and the father of Euippus, Timalcus, and Eusechme, to whom Ovid adds a fourth, Hippomenes. (Paus. i. 41. § 4; Plut. Quæst. Græc. 16.) According to a Boeotian tradition, Megareus with his army went to the assistance of Nisus, king of Megara, against Minos; but he fell in battle, and was buried at Megara, which was called after him, for its previous name had been Nisa. (Apollod. l. c.; Paus. i. 39. § 5, 42. § 1.) According to a Megarian tradition, which discarded the account of an expedition of Minos against Megara, Megareus was the husband of Iphinoë, the daughter of Nisus, and succeeded his father-in-law in the government of Megara, which he left to Alcathous, because his own two sons had died before him. (Paus. i. 39. § 5; comp. ALCATHOUS.) [L. S.]

MEGARUS (Μέγαρος), a son of Zeus, by a Sithian or Megarian nymph. In the Deucalionian flood he is said to have escaped to the summit of Mount Gerania, by following the cries of cranes. (Paus. i. 40. § 1.) [L. S.]

MEGASTHENES (Μεγασθένης). 1. A Greek writer, to whom the subsequent Greek writers were chiefly indebted for their accounts of India. Megasthenes was a friend and companion of Seleucus Nicator (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 305, d), and was sent by that monarch as ambassador to Sandracottus, king of the Prasii, whose capital was Palibothra, a town, probably, near the confluence of the Ganges and Son in the neighbourhood of the modern Patna.* (Strab. ii. p. 70, xv. p. 702; Arrian, Anab. v. 6, Ind. 5; Plin. H. N. vi. 17. s. 21.) We know nothing more respecting the personal history of Megasthenes, except the statement of Arrian (Anab. l. c.), that he lived with Sibyrtius, the satrap of Arachosia, who obtained the satrapies of Arachosia and Gedrosia, in B. C. 323. (Diod. xviii. 3.) Whether Megasthenes accompanied Alexander or not in his invasion of India, is quite uncertain. The time at which he was sent to Sandracottus, and the reason for which he was sent, are also equally uncertain. Clinton (Fasti Hell. vol. iii. p. 482, note s) places the embassy a little before B. C. 302, since it was about this time that Seleucus concluded an alliance with Sandracottus; but it is no where stated that it was through the means of Megasthenes that the alliance was concluded; and as the latter resided some time at the court of Sandracottus, he may have been sent into India at a subsequent period. Since, however, Sandracottus died in B. C. 288, the mission of Megasthenes must be placed previous to that year. We have more certain information respecting the parts of India which Megasthenes visited. He entered the country through the district of the Pentapotamia, of the rivers of which he gave a full account (Arrian, Ind. cc. 4, 8, &c.), and proceeded thence by the royal road to Palibothra, but appears not to have visited any other parts of India. (Comp. Strab. xv. p. 689.) Most modern writers, from the time of Robertson, have supposed, from a passage of Arrian (πολλὰς δὲ λόγους (Μεγασθένους) ἀκούσθαι παρὰ Σανδράκοττον τὸν Ἰνδῶν βασιλέα, Anab. v. 6), that Megasthenes paid several visits to India, but since neither Megasthenes himself, nor any other writer, alludes to more than one visit, these words may simply mean that he had several interviews with Sandracottus during his residence in the country.

The work of Megasthenes was entitled Ἰνδικὰ, and was probably divided into four books (Athen. iv. p. 153, c.; Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 305; Strab. xv. p. 687; Joseph. c. Apion. i. 20, Ant. x. 11. § 1). It appears to have been written in the Attic dialect, and not in the Ionic, as some modern writers have asserted; for in the passage of Eusebius (Præp. Ev. ix. 41), which has been quoted to prove that Megasthenes employed the Ionic dialect, the quotation from Megasthenes concludes with the word κατωκίον, and the remaining words are an extract from Abydenus (comp. Clinton, Fast. Hell. vol. iii. p. 483, note b). Megasthenes is repeatedly referred to by Arrian, Strabo, Diodorus, and Pliny. Of these writers Arrian, on whose judgment most reliance is to be placed, speaks most highly of Megasthenes (Arrian, Anab. v. 5, Ind. 7), but Strabo (ii. p. 70) and Pliny (l. c.) treat him with less respect. Although his work contained many fabulous stories, similar to those which we find in the Indica of Ctesias, yet these tales appear not to have been fabrications of Megasthenes, but accounts which he received from the natives, frequently containing, as modern writers have shown, real truth, though disguised by popular legends and fancy. There is every reason for believing that Megasthenes gave a faithful account of every thing that fell under his own observation; and the picture which he presents of Indian manners and institutions is upon the whole more correct than might have been expected. Every thing that is known respecting Megasthenes and his work, is collected with great diligence by Schwanbeck, in a treatise entitled "Megasthenis Indica. Fragmenta collegit, commentationem et indices addidit E. A. Schwanbeck, Bonnæ, 1846."

2. Of Chalcis in Eubœa, was, along with Hippocles, the founder of Cumæ in Italy. (Strab. v. p. 243; Vell. Pat. i. 4.)

MEGELLUS, a family-name of the Postumii gens at Rome.

1. L. POSTUMIUS L. F. S. P. N. MEGELLUS, who as curule ædile built, and in his second consularship dedicated, a temple to Victory with the produce of the fines levied by him for encroachments on the demesne-land. The year of his ædileship is unknown. Megellus was consul for the first time in B. C. 305, according to the Fasti, although some of the annalists placed this consulate two years earlier. It was towards the close of the second Samnite war, and Megellus, after defeating the Samnites in the field, took Bovianum, one of their principal fortresses on the north side of the Matese. On their march homeward Megellus and his colleague Minucius recovered Sora and Arpinum in the valley of the Liris, and Cereñnia or Cosenza (Liv. ix. 44; Diod. xx. 90), whose site is unknown. For this campaign Livy ascribes a triumph to Megellus, which the Fasti do not confirm. Megellus was prætor in B. C. 295, when Rome was awaiting a combined invasion of the Gauls and Samnites, the Etruscans and Umbrians. Megellus was stationed in the Vatican district, on the east bank of the Tiber, to cover the approaches to the city. He probably remained there till after the great battle at Sentinum, when he was recalled the senate and his legions disbanded. In B. C. 294, Megellus was consul for the second time. Ill health detained him awhile at Rome, but a victory of the Samnites obliged him to take the field, and he signalled himself by taking in Samnium Milionia and Ferentinum, and Rusellae in Etruria, and by ravaging both territories. The accounts of both these consulships of Megellus are very obscure and contradictory—some assign to him different fields of action, and defeats instead of victories. It is, however, probable that some illegal or contemptuous conduct in his second consulship—for the temper of Megellus was obstinate and arbitrary in the extreme, and the Postumian gens notorious for its patrician pride—brought upon Megellus, at the expiration of his office, an impeachment by M. Scantius, tribune of the plebs, from which his services as the lieutenant of Sp. Carvilius in the campaign with Samnium, in B. C. 293, and the popularity of his general, rescued him. The third consulship of Megellus (B. C. 291) is better known: his impetuous, perhaps his insane, extravagances made it remarkable. At the close of A. C. 292, Megellus was appointed interrex to hold the consular comitia. He followed the example of Appius Claudius Caecus in A. C. 297 (Liv. xxvii. 6), and nominated himself. His administration was answerable to his assumption of office. He refused to wait for the usual allotment of the consular provinces, and took Samnium for himself. He employed his legionaries, not in quenching the embers of an expiring war, but in levelling the woods on his own demesne. He violently, and in defiance of a deputation from the senate, expelled the proconsul Q. Fabius Gurges from his command at Cominium, and undertook the siege. There his military talents once more displayed themselves; he took Cominium and several other places, and acquired the important post of Venusia, where he recommended the senate to establish a numerous colony. His counsel was followed (Vell. i. 14), but the name of Megellus was carefully excluded from the list of commissioners for establishing it. In revenge he divided among his soldiers the whole of the booty he had taken without making any reserve for the treasury, and he disbanded his soldiers without awaiting the arrival of his successor. The senate refused him a triumph. Megellus appealed to the people who faintly supported him, and, although only three tribunes favoured while seven opposed his claim, he triumphed in despite of the senate. For his many delinquencies Megellus, as soon as he went out of office, was prosecuted by two of the tribunes and condemned by all the three-and-thirty tribes. He was fined the sum of 500,000 asses, the heaviest mulct to which any Roman had been hitherto sentenced. (Comp. Plut. Camill. 39.) According to the Fasti, indeed, Megellus triumphed in his second consulship—March 24th, A. C. 294, “De Samnitibus et Etruscis” and Livy refers his dispute with the senate to this period. (Liv. ix. 44, x. 26, 27, 32, 33, 34, 36, 37, 47, id. Epit. xi; Dionys. xvi. 15—18; Frontin. Strat. i. 6, § 3.)

2. L. POSTUMIUS L. F. L. N. MEGELLUS, son of the preceding, was praetor, according to the Fasti, but in what year is unknown. His father's unpopularity and disgrace had no effect on the fortunes of the younger Megellus. He was consul in A. C. 262, the third year of the second Punic war. Sicily was assigned to both Megellus and his colleague, and the siege of Agrigentum, which they took after six arduous months of blockade, employed them during their whole period of office. Megellus was censor in A. C. 258, the year of his death. (Fasti; Polyb. i. 17—20; Zonar. viii. 10; Diod. Fr. Hoerschel. xxiii. 5; Oros. iv. 7; Liv. Epit. xvi.) [W. B. D.]

MEGES (Μέγης), a son of Phyleus by Eustyoche, Cimene, or Timandra, and a grandson of Augias. He is mentioned among the suitors of Helen, and in forty ships he led his bands from Dulichium and the Echinades against Troy. (Hom. Il. ii. 625, &c., v. 69, xiii. 692, xv. 520, &c., xix. 269; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 303; Paus. x. 25. § 2; Strab. x. pp. 456, 459.) Polygnotus had painted him in the Lesche at Delphi as a wounded man. According to Dictys Cretensis (iii. 10) he was killed in the Trojan war. [L. S.]

MEGES (Μέγης), an eminent surgeon, born at Sidon in Phoenicia (Galen, De Meth. Med. vi. 6, vol. x. p. 454), who practised at Rome with great reputation and success, shortly before the time of Celsus, and therefore probably in the first century A. C. (Cels. De Medic. vii. praef.) He wrote some works which are highly praised and several times quoted by Celsus, but of which nothing remains. He is, perhaps, the same person who is quoted by Pliny (H. N. xxxii. 24), Galen (De Compos. Medicam. s. c. Locos. iii. 3, v. 3, vol. xii. pp. 684, 845), and Scribonius Largus (De Compos. Medicam. c. 70. § 203, p. 227). A Greek fragment by Meges is preserved by Oribasius (Coll. Medic. xlv. 14), and was first published by Cardinal Mai in his collection entitled “Classici Auctores a Codicibus Vaticanis editi,” vol. iv. p. 27, Rome, 8vo. 1831, and is also to be found in Dr. Bussemaker's edition of the forty-fourth book of Oribasius, p. 72, Groning. 1835, 8vo. [W. A. G.]

MEGILLUS or MEGELLUS (Μέγίλλος, Μέγελλος), a man of Eleia, in Lucania, was one of those who, under the auspices of Timoleon, recolourised Agrigentum, and gathered together the remnant of its citizens, about A. C. 338. (Plut. Timol. 35; Diod. xvi. 82, 83.) This was the first attempt to restore the city after its desolation by the Carthaginians in A. C. 406. (Diod. xiii. 81, &c.) [E. E.]

MEGILLUS (Μέγίλλος), a Lacedaemonian, was one of the three commissioners for ratifying the short and hollow truce with Tissaphernes on behalf of Agesilaus, who had just crossed over to Asia, A. C. 396. (Xen. Hell. iii. 4. § 6.) The more common readings in Xenophon are Megialius and Megialus. One of the interlocutors in the “Laws” of Plato is Megillus, a Lacedaemonian. [E. E.]

MEGILLUS (Μέγίλλος), a writer on arithmetic, mentioned in the Θεολογούμενα Ἀριθμητικῆς, p. 28. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 852, vol. v. p. 649.) [C. P. M.]

MEGI'STIAS (Μεγίστιας), a celebrated soothsayer, a native of Acarnania, who traced his descent up to Melampus. He was present at the battle of Thermopylae; and though he foresaw by his art the fatal issue of the conflict, refused to quit his post, though requested to withdraw by Leonidas. He sent away his only son, but himself remained and was killed. A separate monument was erected to his memory with an inscription by his friend Simonides, which is quoted by Herodotus. (Herod. vii. 219, 221, 228.) Plutarch (Apophth. Lacon. vol. ii. p. 221, c.) gives the name Themistaeas to the soothsayer whom Leonidas wished to send away. [C. P. M.]

MEGISTO (Μεγιστώ), is in some writers another form for Callisto, the mother of Arcas, who is also called Themisto. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀρκάς; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 300; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 1.) [L. S.]

MEGI'STONUS or MEGISTONOUS (Μεγιστόνους), a Spartan of rank and influence, whom Cratesicleia, the mother of Cleomenes III., took for her second husband, with the view, as it would seem, of securing him to her son's party; and we find him accordingly entering readily into the plans of Cleomenes for the reformation of the state. In B. C. 226 he was taken prisoner by Aratus in a battle near Orchomenus in Arcadia; but he must have been soon released, for he appears again not long after at Sparta, co-operating with Cleomenes in the measures which he proposed after the murder of the Ephori, and setting an example to his countrymen by the voluntary surrender of his property. In B. C. 223, when Cleomenes took Argos, Megistonous induced him to adopt no steps against those citizens who were suspected of an attachment to the Achæan party, beyond the requisition of twenty hostages. In the same year Cleomenes, having taken possession of Corinth, and besieged the citadel, sent Megistonous and Tripylus, or Tritymallus, to Aratus, then at Sicyon, with an offer of terms, which, however, were rejected. Not long after this, the Achæan party in Argos excited an insurrection against the Spartan garrison; and Megistonous, being sent by Cleomenes with 2000 men to quell the revolt, was slain in battle soon after he had thrown himself into the city. (Plut. Cleom. 6, 7, 11, 19, 21, Arat. 38, 41, 44; comp. Polyb. ii. 47, 52, 53; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. ii. b. ii. ch. 4.) [E. E.]

MEHERDATES, the grandson of Phraates IV., king of Parthia, lived at Rome as a hostage, but was sent by the emperor Claudius, about A. D. 50, into Parthia at the request of the inhabitants, who were disgusted at the cruelty of their reigning sovereign Gotarzes. Cassius Longinus, the governor of Syria, received orders to support Meherdates in his attempt to gain the crown; but Meherdates was defeated in battle, and taken prisoner by Gotarzes, who spared his life but cut off his ears. (Tac. Ann. xi. 10, xii. 10—14.) The name Meherdates is merely another form of Mithridates.

MEIDIAS (Μεΐδιος), a native of Scepsis, and son-in-law of Mania, satrapess of the Midland Aeolia, whom he strangled, and added to the crime the murder of her son, a boy about sixteen years old. He then seized the towns of Scepsis and Gergis, where the greater part of Mania's treasures was deposited. The other cities, however, of the satrapy refused to acknowledge him as their ruler, and, when he sent presents to Pharnabazus with a request to be invested with the government which his mother-in-law had held, he received a threatening answer and an assurance that the satrap would rather die than leave Mania unrevenge. At this crisis Dercyllidas, the Spartan general, arrived in Asia (B. C. 399), and, having proclaimed freedom to all the Aeolian towns and received several of them into alliance, advanced against Scepsis, where Meidias was. The latter, equally afraid of Pharnabazus and of the Scepsians, sent to Dercyllidas to propose a conference on receiving hostages for his safety. These he obtained; but, when he asked on what terms he might hope for alliance, the Spartan answered, "on condition of giving freedom and independence to the citizens." He then entered Scepsis and proclaimed liberty amidst the joy of the inhabitants. Meidias, accompanying him thence on his march to Gergis, begged leave to retain the town, and received for answer, that he should have his due. Having taken possession of the place, Dercyllidas deprived Meidias of his guards, and seized the treasures of Mania as his by right of conquest over Pharnabazus, leaving to Meidias nothing beyond his private property. The murderer, alarmed with good reason for his safety, asked where he was to live? "Even where it is most just you should,"—was the answer,—"in Scepsis, your native city, and in your father's house."—words which could have conveyed to him no other meaning than, "Even where you will be exposed unprotected to the indignation and vengeance of your countrymen." (Xen. Hell. iii. 1. §§ 14—28; Polyæn. ii. 6.) [MEIDIAS.] [E. E.]

MEILA'NION (Μεΐλανιον), a son of Amphidamas, and husband of Atalanta, by whom he became the father of Parthenopeus. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 2; comp. ATALANTE.) [L. S.]

MEIL'CHIUS (Μεΐλχιος), i. e. the god that can be propitiated, or the gracious, is used as a surname of several divinites. 1. Of Zeus, as the protector of those who honoured him with propitiatory sacrifices. At Athens cakes were offered to him every year at the festival of the Diania. (Thucyd. i. 126; Xenoph. Anab. vii. 7. § 4.) Altars were erected to Zeus Meilichius on the Cephissus (Paus. i. 37. § 3), at Sicyon (ii. 9. § 6), and at Argæ (ii. 20. § 1; Plut. De colib. Gr. 9). 2. Of Dionysus in the island of Naxos. (Athen. iii. p. 78.) 3. Of Tyche or Fortune. (Orph. Hymn. 71. 2.) The plural Seol meilichios is also applied to certain divinites whom mortals used to propitiate with sacrifices at night, that they might avert all evil, as e. g. at Myonia in the country of the Ozolian Locrians. (Paus. x. 38. § 4; comp. Orph. E. 30.) [L. S.]

MELA, or MELLA, M. ANNAEUS, was the youngest son of M. Annaeus Seneca, the rhetorician, and Helvia [HELVIA], and brother of L. Seneca and Gallio [GALLIO] (et docti Senecæ ter annuanda domus. Mart. Ep. iv. 40). He was born at Corduba, and, although raised to senatorial rank, he always preferred the name and station of an eque. (Sen. Consol. ad Helv. xvi. Contr. ii. Proem.; comp. Tac. Ann. xvi. 17.) Mela studied rhetoric with success; but, leaving to his brothers the dangerous honours in Nero's reign of the state and the forum, he adhered to a life of privacy. His first occupation was that of steward to his father's estates in Spain; and through his brother L. Seneca's influence with Nero, he afterwards held the office of procurator or agent to the imperial demesnes. Mela married Acilia, daughter of Acilius Lucanus of Corduba, a provincial lawyer of some note. By Acilia he had at least one son, the celebrated Lucan, A. D. 40. [LUCANIA] After Lucan's death, A. D. 65, Mela laid claim to his property; and the suit arising from this claim proved ultimately his own destruction. Faustus Romanus, who opposed him, had been his son's intimate friend, and was thought to have inserted among the papers of the deceased forged letters involving Mela in at least a knowledge of Paul's conspiracy, A. D. 65. (Tac. Ann. xv. 48, &c.) Mela was rich, Nero was needy and rapacious, and the former anticipated a certain sentence by suicide.

A.D. 66. To save a part for his family, Mela bequeathed to Tigellinus and his son-in-law, Cossutianus Capito [CAPITO], a large portion of his wealth. Codicils, believed however to be spurious, were annexed to Mela's will, accusing Anicius Cerialis [CERIALIS] and Rufius Crispinus [CRISPINUS] of participation in Piso's plot. The character and studies of Mela are agreeably sketched by the elder Seneca in the prooemium to his 2d book of Controversiæ, which book is also especially addressed to Mela. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 17; Dion Cass. xii. 25; Sen. Controv. ii. v. prooem., Cons. ad Helv. xvi.) [W. B. D.]

MELA, FABIVS, a Roman jurist, who is often cited in the Digest; but there is no excerpt from his writings there. The fact that he is cited by Africanus (Dig. 46. tit. 3. a. 39, and 50. tit. 16. a. 37) shows that he was at least his contemporary. But it may be collected from another passage (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 11) that he was prior to Proculus, or at least his contemporary; for in that passage Ulpian cites Mela before Proculus. In another passage Ulpian (Dig. 19. tit. 1. a. 17) cites Mela as the authority for an opinion of Gallus Aquilius who was a friend of Cicero, and prætor B.C. 66; and again (Dig. 19. tit. 9. a. 3) as authority for an opinion of Servius Sulpicius. He is often cited in connection with Labeo and Trebatius. As Africanus wrote under Hadrian, who died A.D. 138, and in the reign of Pius, the successor of Hadrian, we cannot with certainty fix the period of Mela as earlier than that of Antoninus Pius; but from the other citations here mentioned it has been inferred that he was a contemporary of Labeo and Trebatius. We are not acquainted with the title of any of Mela's writings, though he wrote at least ten books about something. (Dig. 46. tit. 3. a. 9.) [G. L.]

MELA, POMPO'NIUS, the first Roman author who composed a formal treatise upon Geography. From one passage in his work (ii. 6. § 74) we learn that he was born at a town situated on the bay of Algeiras, and the name of the place seems to have been Tingentera or Cingentera; but the text is here so corrupt, that it is impossible to speak with certainty. From a second passage (iii. § 23, comp. Sueton. Claud. 17) it is highly probable that he flourished under the emperor Claudius; but at all events it is certain that he must have written after the campaigns of Augustus in Spain, for he speaks of the ancient Jol as having been ennobled by the appellation of Caesareia (i. 6. 5), and mentions two towns in the country of the Cantabri which had been named after their conqueror. Beyond these particulars our knowledge does not extend. Fancius indeed conjectures that the designation Pomponius was acquired by adoption, and that he is in reality the L. Annaeus Mela of Corduba, who was the son of Seneca the reticent—the brother of Seneca the philosopher, and of Junius Gallio—and the father of the poet Mela; but there appears to be no evidence in favour of this hypothesis beyond the bare facts that both of these personages were Spaniards, and that both bore the surname of Mela. (Senec. betrov. lib. ii. præf.; Tac. Ann. xvi. 17; Hieron. Chron. Euseb. Olymp. cxi.; comp. Plin. H. N. l. 33, who, probably by mistake, wrote Tiberio e Nerone.)

a short prooemium, in which he dwells upon the importance and the difficulties of the undertaking, and states the manner in which he proposes to execute his task, he proceeds to define the cardinal points, and to explain the division of the world into two hemispheres and five zones. The northern hemisphere is that portion of the earth which is known, and is separated by the impassable torrid zone from the southern hemisphere, which is altogether unknown, and is the abode of the Antichthones. The northern or known hemisphere is completely surrounded by the ocean, which communicates with the four great seas: one on the north, the Caspian; two on the south, the Persian and the Arabian; one on the west, the Mediterranean, with its subdivisions of the Hellespont, the Propontis, the Thracian Bosphorus, the Euxine, the Cimmerian Bosphorus, and the Palus Maeotis. By this sea and the two great rivers, the Tanais and Nile, the whole of the northern hemisphere is portioned out into three great divisions. All to the north of the Mediterranean and the west of the Tanais constitute Europe; all to the south of the Mediterranean and the west of the Nile constitute Africa; what remains is Asia. Next follows a brief general description of the three continents, and an enumeration of the chief tribes by which they are inhabited. These preliminaries being discussed, the author enters upon more minute details, and makes a complete circuit of the known world, tracing first the coast of the Mediterranean and the shores of the ocean. Thus commencing at the straits of Hercules with Mauritania, he passes on in regular order to Numidia, Africa Proper, the Cyrenaica, Egypt, Arabia, Syria, Phœnicia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Caria, Ionia, Aeolis, Bithynia, Paphlagonia, the Asiatic nations on the Euxine and the Palus Maeotis, European Scythia, Thrace, Macedonia, Greece, the Peloponnesus, Epirus, Illyricum, Italy from the head of the Adriatic round by Magna Græcia to the Ligurian Gulf, Gallia Narbonnensis, and the eastern coast of Spain. (Hispaniæ ora cæterior.) The tour of the Mediterranean being now completed, a chapter is devoted to its islands. Passing beyond the Straits, we stretch along the western coast of Spain (Hispaniæ ora exterior), the western coast of Gaul (Galliæ ora exterior), the islands of the Northern Ocean, Germany, Sarmatia, the shores of the Caspian, the Eastern Ocean and India, the Mare Rubrum and its two gulfs, the Persian and Arabian, Aethiopia, and those portions of Aethiopia and Mauritania bordering upon the Atlantic, which brings him round to the point from which he started. It will be seen from the above sketch that the existence of the northern countries of Europe and of the northern and eastern countries of Asia were unknown, it being supposed that these regions formed part of the ocean, which, in like manner, was supposed to occupy the whole of Central and Southern Africa.

As might be expected in a tract which consists chiefly of proper names, the text is often excessively and hopelessly corrupt, but the style is simple, unaffected, and perspicuous; the Latin is pure; all the best authorities accessible at that period, especially Eratosthenes, appear to have been carefully consulted; and although everything is compressed within the narrowest limits, we find the monotony of the catalogue occasionally diversified by animated and pleasing pictures.

The Editio Princeps of Pomponius Mela appeared at Milan, in 4to. 1471, without any printer's name. Numerous editions were published before the end of the fifteenth century, but the text first began to assume an improved appearance in those superintended by Vadianus, fol. Vienn. 1518, and fol. Basil. 1522, especially in the second. Further emendations were introduced by Vinetus, 4to. Paris, 1572; by Schottus, 4to. Antv. 1582; but the great restorers of this author were Vossius, 4to. Hag. Com. 1658; Jac. Gronovius, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1685, 1696; and Abr. Gronovius, Lug. Bat. 8vo. 1722, and especially 1728. This last edition gives a completely new recension, and remained the standard until superseded by that of Tzschuckius, 7 parts, 8vo. Lips. 1807, which is executed with the greatest care, presents us with the labours of former critics in their best form, is enriched by the collation of several new MSS., contains an ample collection of the most valuable commentaries, and supplies everything which either the scholar or the student can require. We have an old translation into English: "The rare and singular Work of Pomponius Mela, that excellent and worthy Cosmographer, of the Situation of the World, most orderly prepared, and divided every parte by its self: with the Longitude and Latitude of everie Kingdome, Regent, Province, Rivers, &c. Whereunto is added, that learned Worke of Julius Solinus Polyhistor, with a necessarie Table for this Booke; right pleasant and profitable for Gentlemen, Merchants, Mariners, and Travellers. Translated into Englyshe by Arthur Golding, Gent." 4to. Lond. The Mela was first published in 1585, the Solinus in 1587, and then both were bound up in one volume, and reissued with the above title in 1590. There is a translation into French by C. P. Fradin, 3 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1804, and with a new title-page 1827; into Italian by Porcacchi, 8vo. Venet. 1547; and into German by J. C. Dietz, 8vo. Giessen, 1774, which is said to be very bad. (Bähr, Gesch. der Röm. Litterat. § 362, 3d ed.) [W. R.]

MELAENEUS (Μελαίνεύς), a son of Lycaon, who is said to have built the Arcadian town of Melaeneae. (Paus. viii. 26. § 5; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μελαίνεαί.) [L. S.]

MELAENIS (Μελαίνις), i. e. the dark, a surname of Aphrodite, under which she was worshipped at Corinth. (Paus. ii. 2. § 4; comp. viii. 6. § 2, ix. 17. § 4; Athen. xiii. p. 588.) [L. S.]

MELAMPODES (Μελαμπόδης). 1. A Greek grammarian, the author of a treatise which is still extant, though unpublished, addressed to Dionysius the Thracian. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 345.)

2. A writer on astrology, the author of an extant, though unpublished treatise, entitled Methodus Praedictionum Lunarum. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 160.) [C. P. M.]

MELAMPUS (Μελαμπος), a son of Amythaon by Eidomene, or according to others, by Aglaia or Rhodope (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Diod. iv. 68; Schol. ad Theocr. iii. 43), and a brother of Bias. He was looked upon by the ancients as the first mortal that had been endowed with prophetic powers, as the person that first practised the medical art, and established the worship of Dionysus in Greece (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2). He is said to have been married to Iphianassa (others call her Iphianeira or Cyriannassa,—Diod. iv. 68; Serv. ad Virg. Ecl.

vi. 48), by whom he became the father of Mantia and Antiphates (Hom. Od. xv. 225, &c.). Apollodorus (i. 9. § 13) adds a son, Abas; and Diodorus calls his children Bias, Antiphates, Manto, and Pronoe (comp. Paus. vi. 17. § 4). Melampus at first dwelt with Neleus at Pylos, afterwards he resided for a time at Phylace, near Mount Othrys, with Phylacus and Iphiclus, and at last ruled over a third of the territory of Argos (Hom. I. c.). At Aegosthena, in the north-western part of Megaris, he had a sanctuary and a statue, and an annual festival was there celebrated in his honour. (Paus. i. 44. § 8.)

With regard to his having introduced the worship of Dionysus into Greece, Herodotus (ii. 49) thinks that Melampus became acquainted with the worship of the Egyptian Dionysus, through Cadmus and the Phoenicians, and his connection with the Dionysiac religion is often alluded to in the ancient writers. Thus, we are told, for example, that he taught the Greeks how to mix wine with water (Athen. ii. p. 45; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1816). Diodorus (i. 97) further adds that Melampus brought with him from Egypt the myths about Cronos and the fight of the Titans. As regards his prophetic power, his residence at Phylace, and his ultimate rule over a portion of Argos, the following traditions were current in antiquity. When Melampus lived with Neleus, he dwelt outside the town of Pylos, and before his house there stood an oak tree containing a serpent's nest. The old serpents were killed by his servants, and burnt by Melampus himself, who reared the young ones. One day, when they had grown up, and Melampus was asleep, they approached from both sides and cleaned his ears with their tongues. Being thus roused from his sleep, he started up, and to his surprise perceived that he now understood the language of birds, and that with their assistance he could foretell the future. In addition to this he acquired the power of prophesying, from the victims that were offered to the gods, and, after having had an interview with Apollo on the banks of the Alpheus, he became a most renowned soothsayer (Apollod. i. 9. § 11; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1683). During his stay with Neleus it happened that his brother Bias was one of the suitors for the hand of Pero, the daughter of Neleus, and Neleus promised his daughter to the man who should bring to him as a gift for the maiden, the oxen of Iphiclus, which were guarded by a dog whom neither man nor animal could approach. Melampus undertook the task of procuring the oxen for his brother, although he knew that the thief would be caught and kept in imprisonment for one whole year, after which he was to come into possession of the oxen. Things turned out as he had said; Melampus was thrown into prison, and in his captivity he learned from the wood-worms that the building in which he was would soon break down. He accordingly demanded to be let out, and as Phylacus and Iphiclus became thus acquainted with his prophetic powers, they asked him in what manner Iphiclus, who had no children, was to become father. Melampus, on the suggestion of a vulture, advised Iphiclus to mix the rust from the knife with which Phylacus had once cut his son, and drink it in water during ten days. This was done, and Iphiclus became the father of Podarces. Melampus now received the oxen as a reward for his good services, and drove them to Pylos; he thus gained Pero for his brother.

and henceforth remained in Messenia (Apollod. i. 9. § 12; Paus. iv. 36. § 2; Schol. ad Theocr. ii. 43). His dominion over Argos is said to have been acquired in the following manner. In the reign of Anaxagoras, king of Argos, the women of the kingdom were seized with madness, and named about the country in a frantic state. Melampus cured them of it, on condition that he and his brother Bias should receive an equal share with Anaxagoras in the kingdom of Argos (Paus. ii. 18. § 4; Diod. iv. 68). Others, however, give the following account. The daughters of Proetus, Iphinoe, Lysippe and Iphianassa, were seized with madness, either because they opposed the worship of Dionysus (Diod. l. c.; Apollod. i. 9. § 12), or because they boasted of equalling Hera in beauty, or because they had stolen the gold from the statue of the goddess (Serv. ad Virg. Eccl. vi. 48). Melampus promised to cure the women, if the king would give him one-third of his territory and one of his daughters in marriage. Proetus refused the proposal: but when the madness continued, and also seized the other Argive women, messengers came to Melampus to request his aid; but he now demanded two-thirds of the kingdom, one for himself, and the other for his brother. The demand was complied with, and with a band of youths, he pursued the women as far as Sicyon, with Bacchic shouts. Iphinoe died during the pursuit, but the surviving women were cured by purifications in a well, Anigrus, or in a temple of Artemis near Lusi, or in the town of Sicyon itself; and Melampus and Bias married the two daughters of Proetus. (Apollod. ii. 2. § 2; Strab. viii. p. 346; Ov. Met. xv. 323; Paus. ii. 7. § 8, viii. 18, in fin.; Herod. ix. 34; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ix. 30.)

MELAMPUS (Μελάμπος), the author of two little Greek works still extant, one entitled Περὶ Πλάμης Μαντικῆς, Divination ex Palpitatione, the other Περὶ Ἑλαίων τοῦ Σαύματος, De Nævis Oleaceis in Corpora. He lived probably in the third century B. C., as the former of these works is addressed to "king Ptolemy," who is supposed by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. i. p. 99, ed. vet.) to have been Ptolemy Philadelphus. Both the works (as might be anticipated from the titles) are full of superstitions and absurdities. They were first published in Greek by Camillus Perusinus, in his edition of Acilian's Varis Historia, &c., Rom. 1545, 4to. They were translated into Latin by Nicolaus Petreius, and published together with Meletius, De Natura Hominis, Venet. 1552, 4to. They have also been translated into French and German. The last and best edition is that by J. G. F. Franz, in his "Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres," Altenburg, 1780, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. i. p. 99, ed. vet.; Choulant, Handb. d. Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin, p. 415.) [W. A. G.]

MELAMPUS, an architect, of little note, who wrote Præceptis Symmetriarum. (Vitruv. vii. Præf. § 14.) [P. S.]

MELANAEGIS (Μελαναγίς), i. e. armed or clad with a black ægis, occurred as a surname of Dionysus at Eleutherae (Suid. s. v. Ἐλευθερος; Paus. i. 38. § 8), and at Athens (Suid. s. v. Ἀνατορία; Conon, Narrat. 39; Paus. ii. 35. § 1; comp. MELANTHUS), and of the Erinyes. (Aeschyl. Sept. 700.) [L. S.]

MELANCOMAS (Μελανόμας), an Ephesian, and NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος), a Rhodian, were the two men whom ACHAEUS, the rebellious general of Antiochus the Great, employed to carry on his negotiations with Ptolemy IV. (Philopator), as well as all his other transactions with foreign powers. It was chiefly through recommendatory letters from Melancomas and Nicomachus that Bolis, of whose treachery they had no suspicion, was enabled to gain, to a great extent, the confidence of Achæus, and so to betray him to Antiochus, in A. C. 214. (Polyb. viii. 17, 18, 20, 21.) [E. E.]

ME'LANEUS (Μελανεύς), a son of Apollo, and king of the Dryopes. He was the father of Eurytus and a famous archer. According to a Messenian legend Melaneus came to Perieres who assigned to him a town as his habitation which he called Oechalia, after his wife's name. (Paus. iv. 2. § 2; Anton. Lib. 4.)

Two other mythical personages of this name occur in Ovid (Met. xii. 306) and in the Odyssey (xxiv. 103). [L. S.]

MELANIPPE (Μελανίππη). 1. A daughter of Cheiron, is also called Euippe. Being with child by Aeolus, she fled to mount Pelion; but Cheiron made search after her; and in order that her condition might not become known, she prayed to be metamorphosed into a mare. Artemis granted the prayer, and in the form of a horse she was placed among the stars. (Eratosth. Catal. 18; Aristoph. Thesm. 512; Hygin. Fab. 86.) Another account describes her metamorphosis as a punishment for having despised Artemis or divulged the counsels of the gods. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 18.)

2. The wife of Hippotes and the mother of Aeolus. (Diod. iv. 67.)

3. A daughter of Aeolus, or, according to others, of Hippotes or Desmontes. (Schol. ad Hom. Od. x. 2; Hygin. Fab. 186.)

4. A queen of the Amazons, whom Heracles, in his fight with the Amazons, restored to freedom in consequence of a present she gave him. (Diod. iv. 16; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. iii. 64; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 966.) For two other mythical personages of this name, see BOBOLUS and MELAGER. [L. S.]

MELANIPPIDES (Μελανίπιδης), of Melos, one of the most celebrated lyric poets in the department of the dithyramb. Suidas (s. v.) distinguishes two poets of this name, of whom the elder was the son of Criton, and flourished about Ol. 65 (B. C. 520), and wrote numerous books of dithyrambs, and epic poems, and epigrams, and elegies, and very many other things; he was the grandfather, on the mother's side, of the younger Melanippides, whose father's name was also Criton. No other ancient writer recognises this distinction, which, therefore, probably arises out of some confusion in the memory of Suidas. At all events, it is better to place under one head all that we know of Melanippides.

The date of Melanippides can only be fixed within rather uncertain limits. He may be said, somewhat indefinitely, to have flourished about the middle of the 5th century B. C. He was younger than Lasus of Hermione (Plut. Mus. p. 1141, c.), and than Diagoras of Melos (Suid. s. v. Διαγόρας). He was contemporary with the comic poet Pherecrates (Plut. l. c.). He lived for some time at the court of Perdiccas, of Macedonia, and there died (Suid. s. v.). He must therefore have died before B. C. 412.

His high reputation as a poet is intimated by Xenophon, who makes Aristodemus give him the first place among dithyrambic poets, by the side of Homer, Sophocles, Polycleitus, and Zeuxis, as the chief masters in their respective arts (Xenoph. Mem. i. 4. §. 3), and by Plutarch, who mentions him, with Simonides and Euripides, as among the most distinguished masters of music (Von poss. suav. civ. sec. Epic. p. 1095, d.). He did not, however, escape the censures which the old comic poets so often heap upon their lyric contemporaries, for their corruption of the severe beauties of the ancient music. Pherecrates places him at the head of such offenders, and charges him with relaxing and softening the ancient music by increasing the chords of the lyre to twelve (or, as we ought perhaps to read, ten: see Ulrich, Gesch. d. Hellen. Dichtk., vol. ii. p. 605, n. 104), and thus paving the way for the further licences introduced by Cinesias, Phrynis, and Timotheus (Plut. de Mus. p. 1141; comp. Meineke, Frag. Com. Graec. pp. 326—335). According to Aristotle, he altogether abandoned the antistrophic arrangement, and introduced long preludes (ἀναβολαί), in which the union, which was anciently considered essential, between music and the words of poetry, seems to have been severed (Aristot. Rhet. iii. 9). Plutarch (or the author of the essay on music which bears his name) tells us that in his flute-music he subverted the old arrangement, by which the flute-player was hired and trained by the poet, and was entirely subordinate to him (De Mus. l. c.); but there is probably some mistake in this, as the fragment of Pherecrates, which the author quotes in confirmation of his statement, contains not a word about flute-music, but attacks only the alterations in the lyre; while, on the other hand, Athenaeus cites a passage from the Marsyas of Melanippides, which seems to show that he rejected and despised flute-music altogether (Athen. xiv. p. 616, e.).

According to Suidas, Melanippides wrote lyric songs and dithyrambs. Several verses of his poems are still preserved, and the following titles, Marsyas, Persephone, The Danaids, which have misled Fabricius and others into the supposition that Melanippides was a tragic poet, a mistake which has been made with respect to the titles of the dithyrambs of other poets. The fragments are collected by Bergk (Poët. Lyr. Graec. pp. 847—850). We learn from Meleager (v. 7) that some of the hymns of Melanippides had a place in his Garland:—

ἠρόκιστον τε τοῶν Μελανιππίδου ἔγκυον ὕμνον.

(Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 129, 130; Ulrich, Hellen. Dichtk. vol. ii. pp. 26, 141, 590—593; Schmidt, Diatribe in Dithyramb. pp. 77—85, who maintains the distinction of Suidas, and attempts to distinguish between the extant fragments of the two poets.) [P. S.]

MELANIPPUS (Μελανίππος). I. A son of Agrius, was slain by Diomedes. (Apollod. i. 8. § 6; comp. OENEUS.)

2. A son of Astacus of Thebes, who, in the attack of the Seven on his native city, slew Tydeus and Mecisteus. His tomb was shown in the neighbourhood of Thebes on the road to Chalcis, (Aeschyl. Sept. 409; Apollod. iii. 6. § 8; Herod. v. 67; Paus. ix. 18. § 1.)

3. A son of Theseus and Perigone, and father of Ioxus. (Paus. x. 25. § 2; Plut. Thes. 8.)

4. A son of Ares and Tritaea, the daughter of Triton. (Paus. vii. 22. § 5.)

5. One of the sons of Priam. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.)

6. A youth of Patrae, in Achaea, who was in love with Comaetho, a priestess of Artemis Triclaria. As the parents on both sides would not consent to their marriage, Melanippus profaned the temple of the goddess by his intercourse with Comaetho. The goddess punished the two offenders with instantaneous death, and visited the whole country with plague and famine. The oracle of Delphi revealed the cause of these calamities, and ordered the inhabitants to sacrifice to Artemis every year the handsomest youth and the handsomest maiden. (Paus. vii. 19. § 2.) A seventh mythical personage of this name is mentioned by Homer. (Il. xv. 547, 576.) [L. S.]

MELANIPPUS (Μελανίππος), a youth of Agrigentum, who, having been treated with injustice by Phalaris, proposed to his friend Chariton to form a conspiracy against the tyrant. Chariton, alarmed for the safety of Melanippus, urged him to say nothing to any one of his intention, and promised to devise a fitting opportunity for the enterprise. Having then resolved to take the whole risk upon himself, he attempted the life of Phalaris, and, being apprehended, was put to the torture, which he bore resolutely, refusing to confess that he had any accomplices. Melanippus hereupon came to Phalaris and avowed himself the instigator of the design, and the tyrant, struck with their mutual friendship, spared the lives of both on condition of their leaving Sicily. (Ael. V. H. ii. 4.) [E. E.]

MELANOPUS (Μελανόππος), a son of Laches, the Athenian general, was one of three ambassadors (the other two being Glaucias and Androton) who were sent to remonstrate with Mausolus, king of Caria, on his attempt to subject to himself the islands on the eastern coast of the Aegean. On their way they fell in with and captured a merchant ship of Naucratis, which was brought into the Peiraeus, and condemned by the Athenians as an enemy's vessel. The prize-money, however, was retained by Melanopus and his colleagues; and, when the time drew near at which they would have to surrender it on pain of imprisonment, Timocrates proposed a law exempting public debtors from that penalty on their giving security for payment. A prosecution was hereupon instituted against Timocrates by Diodorus and Ectemon (private enemies of Androton); and for them Demosthenes wrote the speech, still extant, which was delivered by Diodorus in a. c. 353. Before the trial came on, Melanopus and his colleagues paid the money. In the speech against Timocrates Melanopus is mentioned as having been guilty of treason, of embezzlement, of misconduct in an embassy to Egypt, and of injustice towards his own brothers. (Dem. c. Tim. p. 740.) [E. E.]

MELANOPUS (Μελανόππος), of Cyme, a part of the mythical period, whom Pausanias places between Olen and Aristaeus, is said by that author to have composed a hymn to Opis and Hecegera, in which he stated that those goddesses came from the Hyperboreans to Delos before Achaea. (Paus. v. 7. § 4. s. 8.) In some of the old genealogies Melanopus was made the grandfather of Homer (Procl. and Pseudo-Herod. l. c.) [P. S.]

MELANTHIUS (Μελάνθιος), also called Melantheus, a son of Dolius, was a goat-herd of Odysseus, sided with the suitors of Penelope, and was cruelly killed by Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xvii. 212, &c. xxi. 176, xxii. 474, &c.) [L. S.]

MELANTHIUS (Μελάνθιος), an Athenian tragic poet, who seems to have been of some distinction in his day, but of whom little is now known beyond the attacks made on him by the comic poets. Eupolis, Aristophanes, Pherecrates, Leucon, and Plato, satirised him unmercifully; and it is remarkable that he was attacked in all the three comedies which gained the first three places in the dramatic contest of B. C. 419, namely, the Klaxakes of Eupolis, the Ελρήνη of Aristophanes, and the Φρότοπος of Leucon (Athen. viii. p. 343; Schol. ad Aristoph. Pac. 804). He is again attacked by Aristophanes in the Ὀρνίθες, B. C. 414. In addition to these indications of his date, we are informed of a remark made by him upon the tragedies of Diogenes Oenomaus, who flourished about B. C. 400 (Plut. de Aud. p. 41, c.). The story of his living at the court of Alexander of Phœræ, who began to reign B. C. 369, is not very probable, considering the notoriety which he had acquired fifty years earlier, and yet the allusion made to his position and conduct there is quite in keeping with all that we know of his character (Plut. de adul. et amic. p. 50, e.).

The most important passage respecting Melanthius is that in the Peace of Aristophanes (796, &c.), which we subjoin in the form in which Welcker gives it:

Τούδε χρὴ Χαρίτων δαίμονα καλλικόνων τὸν
σοφὸν ποιητὴν
ἴκναι, ὅταν ἥρῃ μὲν φανερὴ χελιδὼν ἰσομενὴ κελαδῆ, χορὸν δὲ μὴ χρὴ Μόρσιμος, μηδὲ Μελάνθιος, οὐδ' ὅν πικροτάτην ὅσα γηρύσαν-τος ἤκουσ', ἤλικα τῶν τραγῳδῶν τὸν χρόνον εἶχον ἀδελφὸς τε
καὶ αὐτὸς δμοῦ.
Γύργονες ἰσφοῦάροι, βαττισκοῦχοι, ἄρπυιαι, τρασσοδαί, μυαροὶ, τραγομύσχαλοι, ἰχθυολύμαι.

It has been much doubted whether the fifth line means that Melanthius and Morsimus were brothers, or whether we should understand the word ἀδελφός to refer to some brother of Melanthius, whose name is not mentioned. The two ancient scholiasts held opposite opinions on the point (comp. Suid. c.); while among modern scholars, the former view is held by Ulrich, Meineke, Welcker, and Kayser, and the latter by Elmsley, Büchh, Müller and Clinton (comp. Elms. ad Eurip. Med. 96, with Welcker, die Griech. Tragöde. p. 1029). The character given of Melanthius in the above extract, is worthlessness as a poet, his voracious gluttony, his profligacy, and his personal offensiveness, is confirmed by several other passages of the comic poets and other writers (Aristoph. Pax. 999, Av. 152, and Schol.; Archippus, ap. Athen. viii. p. 343; Athen. p. 6, c.). He was celebrated for his wit, of which several specimens are preserved (Plut. de aud. Poët. p. 20, c., de Aud. p. 41, c., de adul. et amic. p. 50, d., Conjug. Præc. p. 144, b., Sympos. 631, d., p. 633, d.). Aristophanes has preserved his title and two lines, somewhat parodied, of one of his dramas, the Medæa, for it is absurd to suppose the Medæa of Euripides is meant (Pax. 999); and Plutarch has more than once (De coh. Ira. 453, f., de sera Num. Vindict. p. 551, a.) quoted lines, in which Melanthius says that ὁ Σουῆς

Τὰ δευρα πρᾶττει τὸς φρένας μετουκίας

Athenæus informs us that Melanthius also wrote elegies (viii. p. 343, d.), and Plutarch (Cim. 4) refers to the epigrammatic elegies of Melanthius on Cimon and Polygnotus, of which he quotes one distich. But if the Melanthius quoted by Plutarch lived and wrote in the time of Cimon, as he seems clearly to mean, he could not have been, as Athenæus supposed, the same person as the tragic poet. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 310; Ulrich, Hellen. Dichtkunst. vol. ii. p. 572; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. pp. 1030—1032; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Græc. pp. 59—65.) [P. S.]

MELANTHIUS or MELANTHUS (Μελάνθιος, Μελάνθος), an eminent Greek painter of the Sicyonian school, was contemporary with Apelles (B. C. 332), with whom he studied under Pamphilus, and whom he was considered even to excel in one respect, namely, in composition or grouping (dispositio). Quintilian praises his ratio, by which perhaps he means the same thing. (Plin. xxxv. 10, s. 36, §§ 8, 10, adopting in the latter passage the reading of the Bamberg MS., which Brotier had previously suggested, Melanthio for Amphioni; Quintil. xii. 10.)

He was one of the best colourists of all the Greek painters: Pliny mentions him as one of the four great painters who made "immortal works" with only four colours. (H. N. xxxv. 7, s. 32; comp. Dict. of Ant. & v. Colores.) The only one of his pictures mentioned is the portrait of Aristatus, tyrant of Sicyon, riding in a triumphal chariot, which was painted by Melanthius and his pupils, and some parts of which were said to have been touched by the hand of Apelles; and respecting the fate of which a curious story is quoted from Polemon by Plutarch (Arat. 13); from whom also we learn the high esteem in which the pictures of Melanthius were held. (Ibid. 12; comp. Plin. H. N. xxxv. 7, s. 32.) Melanthius wrote a work upon his art (περὶ ζωγραφικῆς), from which a passage is quoted by Diogenes (iv. 18), and which Pliny cites among the authorities for the 35th book of his Natural History. [P. S.]

MELANTHO (Μελάνθω). 1. A daughter of Dolius, and sister of Melanthius; she was a slave in the house of Odysseus; and having sided, like her brother, with the suitors, she was hanged by Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xviii. 321; Paus. x. 25, § 1.)

2. A daughter of Deucalion, became the mother of Delphus, by Poseidon, who deceived her in the form of a dolphin. (Tzet. ad Lyc. 208; Ov. Met. vi. 120.) [L. S.]

MELANTHUS (Μελάνθος). 1. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who wanted to carry off young Bacchus, but were metamorphosed into dolphins. (Ov. Met. iii. 671, &c.)

2. One of the sons of Laocoon. (Serv. ad Aen. ii. 211.) In Lycophron (767) the name occurs as a surname of Poseidon. [L. S.]

MELANTHUS or MELANTHIUS (Μελάνθος, Μελάνθιος), one of the Neleidae, and king of Messenia, whence he was driven out by the Heraclidae on their conquest of the Peloponnese, and, following the instructions of the Delphic oracle, took refuge in Attica. In a war between the Athenians and Boeotians, Xanthus, the Boeotian king, challenged Thymoetes, king of Athens and the last of the Theseidae, to single combat. Thymoetes declined the challenge on the ground of age and infirmity. So ran the story, which strove afterwards to disguise the violent change of dynasty; and Melanthus undertook it on condition of being rewarded with the throne in the event of success. He slew Xanthus, and became king, to the exclusion of the line of Theseus. According to Pausanias, the conqueror of Xanthus was Andropompus, the father of Melanthus; according to Aristotle, it was Codrus, his son. To the period of the reign of Melanthus Pausanias refers the expulsion of the Ionians from Aegialus by the Achaeans, and their settlement at Athens as a place of refuge. (Her. i. 147, v. 65; Paus. ii. 18, iv. 5, vii. 1, 2; Strab. viii. p. 359, ix. p. 393, xiv. p. 633; Con. Narr. 39; Aristot. Pol. v. 10, ed. Bekk.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ach. 146, Pac. 855; Suid. s. v. Ἀνατορία; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Ἀνατορία.) [E. E.]

MELAS (Μέλας.) 1. A son of Poseidon by a nymph of Chios, and brother of Angelus. (Paus. vii. 4. § 6.)

3. A son of Phrixus and Chalciope, was married to Eurycleia, by whom he became the father of Hyperes. (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1158; Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 221.)

4. A son of Porthaon and Euryte, and brother of Oeneus. (Hom. Il. xiv. 117; Apollod. i. 7. § 10; comp. OENEUS and TYNDUS.)

5. A son of Antasus, at Gonussa, near Sicyon. He joined the Dorians on their march against Corinth. His services were at first declined, but he was afterwards allowed to fight in the ranks of the Dorians. He was the ancestor of the family of Cypselus. (Paus. ii. 4. § 4, v. 18. § 7, 20, in fin.)

There are three other mythical personages of this name. (Paus. vii. 4. § 6, viii. 23. § 3; Apollod. ii. 7. § 7.) [L. S.]

MELEA'GER (Μελέαγρος), a son of Oeneus (whence he is called Οἰνέϊδης), and Althaea, the daughter of Thestius, and was married to Cleopatra, by whom he became the father of Polydora. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Paus. iv. 2 in fin.; Orph. Argon. 157.) Other accounts call Meleager a son of Area, by Althaea (Plut. Parall. Min. 26; Or. Met. viii. 437; Hygin. Fab. 171); and Hyginus calls Parthenopaeus a son of Meleager. (Fab. 99, 270.) His brothers and sisters were Phereus or Thyreus, Agelaus, Toxeus, Periphas, Gorge, Eurymede, Deianeira, Melanippe. Meleager is one of the most famous Aetolian heroes of Calydon, and distinguished himself by his skill in throwing the javelin, as one of the Argonauts, and in the Calydonian hunt. Thus he gained the victory at the funeral games of Acastus (Hygin. Fab. 273; Athen. iv. p. 172); and the spear with which he had slain the Calydonian boar he dedicated in the temple of Apollo at Sicyon. (Paus. ii. 7. § 8.) In the expedition of the Argonauts he was said in some legends to have slain Aetes in the contest for the golden fleece. (Diod. iv. 48.) While Meleager was at Calydon, Oeneus, the king of the place, once neglected to offer up a sacrifice to Artemis, whereupon the angry goddess sent a monstrous boar into the fields of Calydon, which were ravaged by the beast, while no one had the courage to hunt it. At length Meleager, with a band of other heroes, whose number and names are different in the different accounts (Apollod. i. 8. § 2; Or. Met. viii. 300, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 174; Paus. viii.

45. § 4), went out to hunt the boar, which was killed by Meleager. Artemis, however, created a dispute about the animal's head and skin among the Calydonians and Curetes. Late writers represent Atalante as taking part in this famous hunt; but the huntsmen refused to go out with her, until Meleager, who loved her, prevailed upon them. According to Ovid (Met. viii. 380), Atalante inflicted the first wound upon the animal; while, according to others, Meleager first struck and killed it. He gave his prize, the boar's skin, to Atalante, who was deprived of it by the sons of Thestius; but Meleager slew them. (Apollod. Or. ii. cc.; Diod. iv. 34.) During the war between the Calydonians and Curetes, the former were always victorious, so long as Meleager went out with them. But on one occasion he killed his mother's brothers; and his mother pronounced a curse upon him, in consequence of which he became indignant, and stayed at home, so that the victorious Curetes began to press Calydon very hard. It was in vain that the old men of the town made him the most brilliant promises if he would again join in the fight, and also the entreaties of his own friends remained without effect. At length, however, he yielded to the prayers of his wife, Cleopatra: he put the Curetes to flight, but never returned home, for the Erinyes, who had heard the curse of his mother, overtook him. (Hom. Il. ix. 527—600; comp. ii. 641.) The post-Homeric account gives a different cause of his death. When Meleager was seven days old, it is said, the Moerae appeared, declaring that the boy would die as soon as the piece of wood that was burning on the hearth should be consumed. When Althaea heard this, she extinguished the firebrand, and concealed it in a chest. Meleager himself became invulnerable; but after he had killed the brothers of his mother, she lighted the piece of wood, and Meleager died, whereupon Althaea and Cleopatra hung themselves. (Apollod. i. 8. § 2, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 171; Diod. iv. 34; Or. Met. viii. 450, &c., 531.) The sisters of Meleager wept unceasingly after his death, until Artemis changed them into guinea-hens (μελεαγρίδες), who were transferred to the island of Lerou. Even in this condition they mourned during a certain part of the year for their brother. Two of them, Gorge and Deianeira, through the mediation of Dionysus, were not metamorphosed. (Anton. Lib. 2; Or. Met. viii. 532, &c.; Apollod. i. 8. § 3.) The story of Meleager, his hunt of the Calydonian boar, his contest with the sons of Thestius, and other scenes of his life, were frequently represented by ancient artists. (Paus. iii. 18. § 9, viii. 45. § 4.) He usually appears as a robust hunter, with curly hair, the Aetolian chlamys, and a boar's head. (Philost. Icon. 15; comp. Welcker, Zeichn. für die alt. Kunst. p. 123, &c.) [L. S.]

MELEA'GER (Μελέαγρος). 1. Son of Neoptolemus, a Macedonian officer of distinction in the service of Alexander the Great. He is first mentioned in the war against the Getae (a. c. 335); and at the passage of the Granicus in the following year, we find him commanding one of the divisions (τάξεις) of the phalanx, a post which he afterwards held apparently throughout the campaigns in Asia. He was appointed, together with Coenus and Ptolemy the son of Seleucus, to command the newly-raised troops which were sent home from Caria to spend the winter in Macedonia, and rejoined Alexander at Gordium in the following summer (a. c. 333). We afterwards find him present at the battles of Issus and Arbela; associated with Craterus in the important task of dislodging the enemy who guarded the passes into Persia; and again bearing a part in the passage of the Hydaspes, and in various other operations in India (Arrian, Anab. i. 4, 14, 20, 24, ii. 3, iii. 11, 18, v. 12; Curt. iii. 24, v. 14, vii. 27; Diod. xvii. 57). But notwithstanding this long series of services we do not learn that Alexander promoted him to any higher or more confidential situation, nor do we find him employed in any separate command of importance. Already, before the king's death, Meleager had given evidence of an insolent and factious disposition, and these qualities broke out in their full force during the discussions which ensued after the death of Alexander. His conduct on that occasion is differently related. According to Justin, he was the first to propose in the council of officers, that either Arrhidaeus or Hercules the son of Barsine should at once be chosen king, instead of waiting for the chance of Roxana bearing a son. Curtius, on the contrary, represents him as breaking out into violent invectives against the ambition of Perdiccas, and abruptly quitting the assembly, in order to excite the soldiery to a tumult. Diodorus, again, states that he was sent by the assembled generals to appease the clamours and discontent of the troops, but instead of doing so he himself joined the mutineers. In any case it is certain that Meleager early assumed the lead of the opposition to Perdiccas and his party; and placed himself at the head of the infantry, who had declared themselves (probably at his instigation) in favour of the claims of Arrhidaeus to the vacant throne. Meleager even went so far as to order the execution of Perdiccas, without any express authority from his puppet of a king; but this project was disconcerted by the boldness of the regent: and the greater part of the cavalry, together with almost all the generals, sided with Perdiccas, and, quitting Babylon, established themselves in a separate camp without the walls of the city. Matters thus seemed tending to an open rupture, but a reconciliation was effected, principally by the intervention of Eumenes, and it was agreed that the royal authority should be divided between Arrhidaeus and the expected son of Roxana, and that in the mean time Meleager should be associated with Perdiccas in the regency. It was, however, evidently impossible that these two should long continue on really friendly terms, and Meleager proved no match for his wily and designing antagonist. Perdiccas contrived by his profound dissimulation, to lull his rival into fancied security, while he made himself master both of the person and the disposition of the imbecile Arrhidaeus, of which he immediately took advantage, and hastened to strike the first blow. The whole army was assembled under pretence of a general review and lustration, when the king, at the instigation of Perdiccas, suddenly demanded the surrender and punishment of all the leaders in the late disorders. The infantry were taken by surprise, and unable to offer any resistance; 300 of the alleged mutineers were singled out, and instantly executed; and though Meleager himself was not personally attacked, he deemed it necessary to provide for his safety by flight, and took refuge in a temple, where he was quickly pursued and put to death by order of Perdiccas. (Curt. x. 21—29; Justin. xiii.

2—4; Arrian, op. Phot. p. 69, a; Diod. xviii. 2.)

2. An ilarch or commander of a squadron of cavalry in the army of Alexander at the battle of Arbela. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 11; Curt. iv. 50.) He is certainly distinct from the preceding, and is probably the same person whom we afterwards find mentioned among the friends and adherents of Pithon, who participated in his projects of revolt against Antigonus, b. c. 316. [PITHON.] After the death of their leader, Meleager and Menoetius broke out into open insurrection, but were speedily defeated by Orontobates and Hippostratus, who had been left by Antigonus in the government of Media, and Meleager was slain in the battle. (Diod. xix. 47.)

3. A son of Ptolemy Soter and Eurydice, daughter of Antipater, succeeded his brother Ptolemy Ceraunus on the throne of Macedonia, after the latter had fallen in battle against the Gauls (b. c. 280); but was compelled by the Macedonian troops to resign the crown, after a reign of only two months. (Euseb. Arm. pp. 156, 157; Dexippus, ap. Syncell. pp. 267, 270.) His reign is omitted by Justin. [E. H. B.]

MELEA'GER (Μελέαγρος), son of Eucrates, the celebrated writer and collector of epigrams, was a native of Gadara in Palestine, and lived about b. c. 60. There are 131 of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology, written in a good Greek style, though somewhat affected, and distinguished by sophistical acumen and amatory fancy. (Brunek, Anac. vol. i. pp. 1—38; Jacobs, Anth. Græc. vol. i. pp. 1—40, vol. xiii. pp. 639, 698, 915, 916; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. pp. 416—420.) Besides the various editions of the Greek Anthology, there are separate editions of the epigrams of Meleager, for which see Fabricius. An account of his Στέφανος, or collection of epigrams, is given under PLANUDEUS. [P. S.]

MELES (Μέλης), an Athenian, who was beloved by Timagoras, but refused to listen to him, and ordered him to leap from the rock of the acropolis. Timagoras, who was only a metoikos at Athens, did as he was bid; but Meles, repenting of his cruel command, likewise threw himself from the rock; and the Athenians from that time are said to have worshipped Anteros, as the avenger of Timagoras. (Paus. i. 30. § 1.)

Meles is also the god of the river Meles, near Smyrna; and this river-god was believed by some to have been the father of Homer. (Vit. Script. Græc. p. 27, ed. Westermann.) [L. S.]

MELES (Μέλης). 1. Of Colophon, the father of the poet Polymnestus (Plut. de Mus. p. 1133, a.)

2. Of Athens, the father of the dithyrambic poet Cinesias, was himself also a dithyrambic poet, and is ranked by Pherecrates as the worst of all the citharœdic poets of his day (Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 858). Plato also tells us that his performances annoyed the audience (Gorg. p. 502). [P. S.]

MELESA GORAS. [AMELESAGORAS.]

MELESIPPUS (Μελεσίππος), a Lacedæmonian, son of Diacritus, was one of the three ambassadors sent to Athens in b. c. 432, just before the commencement of the Peloponnesian war, with the final demand of Lacedæmon for the restoration of the independence of all the Greek states. By the advice of Pericles, the Athenians refused compliance. In the following year, when Archidamus was on his march to invade Attica, he again sent Melesippus to Athens, in the hope of effecting a negotiation; but the Athenians would not even admit him to a hearing. (Thuc. i. 139—145, ii. 12.) [E. E.]

ME'LETE (Μελέτη), the name of one of the Muses. (Pausanias, ix. 29. § 2; compare Μουσάει.) [L. S.]

MELETIUS (Μελέτιος), literary and ecclesiastical.

1. Of ANTIOCH, an eminent Greek ecclesiastical of the fourth century. He was born at Melitene, near the right bank of the Euphrates, in the district of Melitene, in Armenia Minor. His parents were persons of rank, at least of respectable condition (Gregor. Nyssen. Oratio habil. in funere Meletii), and he probably inherited from them an estate which he possessed in Armenia. (Basil. Epist. 187, edit. vett., 99, ed. Benedict.) His gentleness of disposition, general excellence of character, and persuasive eloquence, acquired for him a high reputation: but his first bishopric, that of Sebaste, in Armenia, in which he succeeded Eustathius [EUSTATHIUS, No. 7], apparently after the latter had been deposed in the council of Melitene (A. D. 357), proved so troublesome, through the contumacy of his people, that he withdrew from his charge and retired to Beroea, now Aleppo in Syria, of which city, according to one rendering of a doubtful expression in Socrates, he became bishop. The East was at this time torn with the Arian controversy; but the character of Meletius won the respect of both parties, and each appears to have regarded him as belonging to them, a result promoted by his dwelling, in his discourses, on practical rather than polemical subjects. According to Philostorgius he feigned himself an Arian, and subscribed the Confession of the Western bishops, probably that of Ariminum; and, according to Socrates, he subscribed the creed of the Acacians, at Seleucia in A. D. 359. These concurrent testimonies fix on him the charge either of instability or dissimulation. Still his real tendency to the Homoousian doctrine was known to or suspected by many; and, therefore, when, by the influence of Acacius and the Arians, he was appointed to the see of Antioch (A. D. 360 or 361), all the bishops, clergy, and people of the city and neighbourhood, Arians and Orthodox, went out to meet him. Even the Jews and Heathens flocked to see a person who had already attained so great celebrity. For a time, but apparently a very short time, he confined himself to practical subjects, avoiding or speaking ambiguously on the doctrines in dispute between the contending parties, but presently gave more open indications of his adherence to the orthodox party. It was probably to draw out his sentiments more distinctly that he was desired by the emperor Constantius to give an exposition of the passage, Prov. viii. 22. [GREGORIUS, No. 29.] He was preceded in the pulpit by George of Laodicea and by Acacius of Caesarea, who gave explanations more or less heterodox; and when Meletius in his turn came to speak, and avowed his adherence to the orthodox doctrine, a scene of great excitement ensued, the people applauding, and the Arians among the clergy, especially the archdeacon, attempting to stop his mouth. Determined now to get rid of him, the Arians charged him with Sabellianism, and persuaded the emperor to depose him and banish him, apparently on a charge either of perjury or of having violated the discipline of the church, to his native country, Melitene, while Euzoius was appointed bishop of Antioch in his room (A. D. 361). This step led to an immediate and extensive schism: the orthodox party broke off from the communion of the Arians, and met in the church of the Apostles, in what was called the old town of Antioch. There had been a previous secession of the more zealous part of the orthodox on occasion of the deposition of Eustathius (A. D. 331), but the two seceding bodies remained separate, the Eustathians objecting that Meletius had been ordained by Arians. On the accession of the emperor Julian Meletius returned to Antioch (A. D. 362), and the most earnest endeavours were made to reconcile the two sections of the orthodox party; but though the death of Eustathius seemed to present a fair opportunity for such reconciliation, all the efforts made were frustrated by the intemperate zeal of Lucifer of Cagliari [ΛΥΚΙΦΡΗΣ], who ordained Paulinus bishop of the Eustathians. Meanwhile, the Arians appear to have retained possession of most of the churches, the orthodox having one or two assigned for their use, of which, however, on the accession of the emperor Valens, they were deprived, and Meletius was again (A. D. 365?) banished from the city. According to Tillemont, who grounds his assertion on two passages of Gregory Nyssen (ibid.), Meletius was twice banished under Valens, or three times in all, which supposes a return from his first banishment under that prince. Gregory's assertion, however, is not corroborated by any of the ecclesiastical historians; and we have no means of determining the dates of Meletius's return and subsequent exile, if they really took place. Tillemont thinks he was recalled in A. D. 367 at latest, and places his last banishment in A. D. 371. During his exile his party were directed by Flavian and Diodorus. [FLAVIANUS, No. 1; DIODORUS, No. 3.] He was recalled on the death of Valens A. D. 378, but the edict of Gratian, which recalled all those who were in exile, allowed the Arians (who had chosen Dorotheus their bishop in the room of Euzoius, now deceased) to retain the churches which they occupied; however they were after a time delivered up to Meletius, who again manifested his anxiety to heal the schism between his own party and the Eustathians; but his equitable offers were rejected by his more tenacious rival Paulinus. In A. D. 381 Meletius was at Constantinople at the second general council, and died in that city during its session. His body was conveyed with great honour to Antioch, and deposited close to the tomb of the martyr Babylas. His funeral oration, pronounced by Gregory Nyssen, is extant. There is no reason to doubt the truth of the encomiums bestowed on the gentleness of his temper and general kindness of his disposition: that these very qualities, combined perhaps with indifference to the points in dispute, rendered him more pliant in the earlier part of his life than was consistent with strict integrity, at least with consistency. But from the time of his elevation to the see of Antioch, there is no need to doubt his consistent adherence to what he judged to be the truth. In the Western church, indeed, which fraternized with the ultra party of the Eustathians, his reputation was lower: he was regarded as an Arian, and it was long before the imputation was removed. A short piece, ascribed to Athanasius, and published with his works (vol. ii. p. 30, ed. Benedict.), but the genuineness of which is very doubtful, charges him with hypocrisy. He enjoyed the friendship of Basil and other leading men of the orthodox party. Epiphanius has spoken favourably of him, but Jerome is less favourable, owing, probably, to his connection with Paulinus. A part of the first sermon preached by Meletius at Antioch has been preserved by Epiphanius, and is given in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. v. A synodical epistle to the emperor Julian, given by Socrates (H. E. iii. 25), and Sozomen (H. E. vi. 4), and reprinted in the Concilia, vol. i. col. 741, ed. Hardouin, and in the Bibliotheca of Galland, vol. v., may perhaps be ascribed to him. The Greek Church honours his memory on February the 12th, and the Latin Church at last received him into the calendar on the same day.

Meletius was succeeded in the see of Antioch by Flavian [FLAVIANUS, No. 1], under whom the Eustathian schism was at length healed, and the suppression of the Arians under Theodosius the Great restored for a while the unity of the see. (Socrates, H. E. ii. 43, 44, iii. 6, 9, iv. 2, v. 3, 5, 9; Sozomen, H. E. iv. 25, 28, v. 12, 13, vi. 7, vii. 3, 7, 8, 10; Theodoret, *H. ## 2. IATROSOPHISTA. [No. 6.]

3. Of LYCOPOLIS, a schismatical bishop of the third and fourth centuries. There is a remarkable discrepancy in the accounts given of this person. According to Athanasius, whose contests with the Meletians render his testimony less trustworthy, Meletius, who was bishop of Lycopolis in Upper Egypt at the time of the persecution under Diocletian and his successors, yielded to fear and sacrificed to idols; and being subsequently deposed, on this and other charges, in a synod, over which Petrus or Peter, bishop of Alexandria, presided, determined to separate from the church, and to constitute with his followers a separate community. Epiphanius, on the other hand, relates that both Peter and Meletius being in confinement for the faith, differed concerning the treatment to be used toward those who, after renouncing their Christian profession, became penitent and wished to be restored to the communion of the Church. He states that Peter, who was willing to receive them, was opposed by Meletius, who was next to Peter in influence, and had, in fact, the larger number of followers on this question: and the schism which arose on this account he represents as owing rather to the former than to the latter. Although the ecclesiastical historians Socrates and Theodoret have adopted, wholly or partially, the account of Athanasius, the statement of Epiphanius is the more probable. Had Meletius been convicted, as Athanasius states, it is hardly probable that either he would have been able to raise and keep up so formidable a schism, or that the Council of Nice

(which left him the title of bishop, though it deprived him of the power to ordain) would have dealt so leniently with him. The Council allowed those whom he had ordained to retain the priestly office, on condition of re-ordination, and of their yielding precedence to those whose first ordination had been regular. The schism begun in prison was continued in the mines of Phaenon, in Arabia Petraea, to which Meletius and others were banished, and after their release. Meletius ordained bishops, presbyters, and deacons, and kept his followers a distinct body, under the title of "the Church of the Martyrs." He even extended his sect into Palestine, where he visited Jerusalem, Eleutheropolis, and Gaza, and ordained many in those towns to the priesthood. In this state matters remained till the Nicene Council (A. D. 325), the sentence of which has been already mentioned. The synodical letter to the Egyptian clergy, which notifies the sentence, gives no information as to the origin of the schism: it describes, indeed, Meletius as disorderly, hasty, and headstrong; characteristics more in harmony with the conduct ascribed to him by Epiphanius, than with the charges of Athanasius.

There is no dispute that the theological sentiments of the Meletians were at first what is deemed orthodox; and, according to Epiphanius, Meletius was the first to detect the heretical teachings of Arius, and to report them to Alexander, bishop of Alexandria. Meletius died very shortly after the Council of Nice, for Alexander, who himself only survived the council about five months, lived long enough to persecute the followers of Meletius after their leader's death, because, deeming Meletius ill-treated, they would not accept the terms of reconciliation offered by the Council. The schism continued under the leadership of John Arcaph, whom Meletius had appointed to succeed him [JOANNES, No. 16]; and the Meletians co-operated with the Arians in their hostility to Athanasius [ATHANASIOS]; an alliance more conducive to the gratification of their revenge than to the maintenance of their orthodoxy. (Athanas. Apol. contra Arian. c. 59; Epiphani. Haeres. lxxviii. 1—5; Socrat. H. E. i. 6, 9; Sozomen, H. E. i. 24, ii. 21; Theodoret. H. E. i. 9; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. v. p. 453, &c.; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus. vol. ii. col. 598.)

7. Of MOPSUESTIA, an ardent supporter of the unfortunate Nestorius [NESTORIUS], of Constantinople. He succeeded the celebrated Theodore as bishop of Mopsuestia, in Cilicia [THEODORUS MOPSUESTENUS], probably in or about A. D. 427. He supported John, patriarch of Antioch [JOANNES, No. 9], in his opposition to the hasty and unjust deposition of Nestorius by Cyril of Alexandria and his party [CYRILLUS, Sr. of ALEXANDRIA], in the third general (Ephesian) council, A. D. 431; and when John was induced to come to terms with Cyril and to join in condemning Nestorius, Meletius persisted in supporting the cause of the deposed patriarch, and refused to hold communion with either Cyril or John, denouncing such communion as diabolical; and when the latter sent a conciliatory letter to him, he threw it in the messenger's face. Being forcibly expelled from his see by the emperor Theodosius II., at the desire of John, on account of his pertinacious support of Nestorius, he induced many persons to secede from the church, and, forming them into separate communities, continued to exercise the priestly office among them. This being regarded as an aggravation of his offence, he was banished by the emperor's order, issued at John's instigation, to Melitene in Armenia Minor, and placed in the charge of Acacius, bishop of that city, from whom he endured much hard usage. In this exile Meletius died, retaining his zeal for the cause of Nestorius till the last. Various epistles of Meletius were published in a Latin version, in the Ad Ephesinum Concilium Variorum Patrum Epistolae of Christianus Lupus of Ypres, 4to. Louvain, 1682; and were republished by Baluzius, in his Nova Conciliorum Collectio, by Garnier, in his Aecularium Theodoroti, fol. Paris, 1684, and by Schulze, in his edition of Theodoret, 5 vols. 8vo., Halse, 1769—1774. From these letters of Meletius, and from other letters in the same collection, the foregoing facts of his history are derived. The letters of Meletius are contained in Cap. seu Epist. 92 (not 82, as Cave has it), 119, 124, 141, 145, 155, 158, 163, 171, 174, and 177, in the work of Lupus. The memorandum of his death is in Cap. 190. In the editions of Garnier and Schulze they are Epist. 76, 101, 105, 121, 125, 133, 136, 141, 149, 152, 155. The memorandum of Meletius' death is inserted after Epist. 164. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 428, vol. i. p. 414; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, vol. ii. col. 891; Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. ix. p. 305, vol. x. p. 348; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xiv.)

8. PHILOSOPHUS. [See below.]

9. SCRIPTOR DE AZYMIA. There are extant two short treatises, Περὶ τῶν ἀζύμων, De Azymis, one of them being a compendium or abridgment of the other, which in the MSS. are ascribed to Joannes Damascenus [DAMASCENUS], and are consequently inserted by Le Quien in his edition of the works of that father (Opera Damasceni, fol. Paris, 1712, vol. i. p. 647.) But Le Quien has observed that they are not his: they distinctly deny the general tradition of the fathers, that our Lord celebrated the passover with his disciples the day before the regular time, which tradition Damascenus certainly held. But this is not the only evidence; an anonymous preface to the larger tract states, that it was written by "one Meletius, a pious man (θεόφορος), and a diligent student of the Scriptures," and was addressed to one Syncellus, who had asked his opinion on the subject. Of the time or place where this Meletius lived nothing is known. (Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. vol. ix. p. 307.)

10. OF TIBERIOPOLIS. [See below.] [J. C. M.]

MELETIUS (Μελέτιος), the author of a short Greek work, entitled Περὶ τῆς τοῦ Ἀνθρώπου Κατασκευῆς, De Natura (or Fabrica) Hominis. He appears from the inscription at the beginning of the work to have been a Christian and a monk, and to have belonged to the city of Tiberiopolis in Phrygia Magna. The time at which he lived is unknown, but he probably cannot be placed earlier than the sixth or seventh century after Christ. His work (the subject-matter of which is sufficiently indicated by the title) is interesting, and evidently written by a religious man, but is of no particular value in a physiological point of view. It was first published in a Latin translation by Nicolaus Petreius, Venet. 1552, 4to. The Greek text, though existing in MS. in several European libraries, remained unpublished till 1836, when Dr. Cramer inserted it in the third volume of his "Anecdota Graeca," 8vo. Oxon. It is badly edited, and the text contains numerous errors, some arising from the editor's evident ignorance of the subject-matter of the treatise, and others apparently from haste and carelessness. The beginning of the work was published by Fred. Ritschel, Vratislav. 4to. 1837; and there is an essay by L. E. Bachmann, entitled "Quaestio de Meletio Graece inedito, ejusque Latino Interprete Nic. Petreio," Rostoch. 4to. 1833.

It is uncertain whether this is the same person who wrote a commentary on the Aphorisms of Hippocrates, some extracts from which are inserted by Dietz in the second volume of his "Scholia in Hippocratem et Galenum," Regim. Prusa. 8vo. 1834. It is indeed doubtful whether the commentary is the work of Meletius or Stephanus Atheniensis.

(One of the letters of St. Basil, dated A. D. 375 (Epist. 193, vol. iii. p. 285, ed. Bened.) is addressed to a physician named Meletius, who is called by the title Archiatros, but of whom no particulars are known. [W. A. G.]

MELETUS (Μελέτιος), an obscure tragic poet, but notorious as one of the accusers of Socrates, was an Athenian, of the Pitthean demus (Pat. Euthyph. p. 2, b.). At the time of the accusation of Socrates, he is spoken of by Plato (L. c.) as young and obscure (comp. Apol. p. 25, d., 26, e.). But the fact that he was mentioned by Aristophanes in the Γεωργίῳ, gives rise to a difficulty (Schol. in Plat. Apol. p. 330, Bekker). For the Γεωργία was evidently acted during the life of Nicias (Plat. Nic. 8); and not only so, but the passage cited by Plutarch seems to have been rightly understood by him, as referring to the affair of Sphacteria, and on this and other grounds Meineke assigns the play to the year B. C. 425 (Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 983—985). Supposing Meletus to have been only twenty at this time, he must have been upwards of forty-five when he accused Socrates. Meineke attempts to get rid of the difficulty, by a slight change in the text of the scholiast, which would then imply that Meletus was still a boy when alluded to in the Γεωργίῳ (Frag. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 993). At all events, if Meletus thus referred to was really the same person as the accuser of Socrates, he must at the latter period have been between thirty and forty; and in that case he might still have been called ῥεός by Socrates. In fact, though the attack upon Socrates was his first essay as a public politician, and was indeed made, as Plato insinuates, in order to bring himself into some notoriety (Euthyph. p. 2, 3, Apol. p. 25, d.), yet it is clear from Plato himself that Meletus was already known as a poet; for he imputes to Meletus, as another motive for the accusation, the resentment felt by him and the other poets for the strictures made upon them by Socrates (Apol. p. 23, e.; Diog. Laërt. ii. 39). Besides, when Plato calls him ῥεός, he perhaps refers rather to his being a man of no merit than to his being altogether unknown in the city. With respect to his tragedies, we are informed by the scholiast on Plato (L. c.), on the authority of Aristotle in the De poeticis, that Meletus brought out his Οἰκόμενος in the same year in which Aristophanes brought out his Πελαργός, but we know nothing of the date of that play. His Scolia are referred to in the Frags. (1302), B. C. 405; and in the Ευφρομένης, which was probably acted a few years after the Frags.

which it was similar in its argument, Aristophanes makes him one of the ambassadors sent by the poets on earth to the poets in Hades (Athen. xii. p. 551). He was also ridiculed by Sannyrion in his Γέλωες (Athen. l. c.); and his erotic poetry was referred to by Epicrates in his Ἀντιόχης (Athen. xiii. p. 605, c.). Suidas (s. v.) calls him an orator as well as a poet, no doubt on account of his accusation of Socrates, and perhaps of Andocides. (See below.)

The character of Meletus, as drawn by Plato and Aristophanes and their scholiasts, is that of a bad, frigid, and licentious poet, and a worthless and profligate man,—vain, silly, effeminate, and grossly sensual. Plato makes Socrates call him τετασθόριχα καὶ οὐ πᾶν εὐχέσιν, ἐπὶ γυμνῶν δέ. Aristophanes, in the Γενουδάτης, ridiculed him for his excessive thinness, and light weight, and his natural tendency to the infernal regions, where, as Thirlwall remarks, "to understand the point of the sarcasm, we must compare the balancing scene in the Frogs, and the remarks of Aeschylus, 867, ὅτι ἡ πόλις οὐχὶ συντίθηται μοι, τούτῳ δὲ συντίθηται" (Hist. of Greece, vol. iv. p. 275, note). Aristophanes again, in the Πελαργῶν, calls him the son of Laius, a designation which not only contains an allusion to his Oedipodeia, but is also meant to insinuate a charge of the grossest vice (see Meineke, ad loc., Frag. Com. Græc. vol. ii. pp. 1126, 1127). Misled by this passage, Suidas (s. v. Μέλιτος) makes him a son of Laius (as Clinton has corrected the word from Ἀδρῶν); the real name of his father was Meletus, as we learn from Diogenes Laërtius, on the authority of Phavorinus, in whose time the deed of accusation against Socrates was still preserved in the Metroum at Athens (Diog. Laërt. ii. 40). The epithet Θῷξ, applied to him by Aristophanes, in the fragment just referred to, probably alludes to the foreign origin of his family.

In the accusation of Socrates it was Meletus who laid the indictment before the Archon Basilus; but in reality he was the most insignificant of the accusers; and according to one account he was bribed by Anytus and Lycon to take part in the affair. (Liban. Apol. pp. 11, 51, ed. Reiske.) Soon after the death of Socrates, the Athenians repented of their injustice, and Meletus was stoned to death as one of the authors of their folly. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 43; Diod. xiv. 37; Suid. s. v. Μέλιτος: it may here be observed that the article in Suidas is a mass of confusion; there is evidently in it a mixing up of the lives of two different persons, Melissus of Samos and Meletus.)

There is room for some doubt whether the accuser of Socrates was the same person as the Meletus who was charged with participation in the profanation of the mysteries, and in the mutilation of the Hermæ, B. C. 415, and who was an active partisan of the Thirty Tyrants, both as the executioner of their sentence of death upon Leon of Salamis, and as an emissary to Lacedæmon on their behalf, and who was afterwards one of the accusers of Andocides in the case respecting the mysteries, A. C. 400 (Andoc. de Myst. pp. 7, 18, 46, Reiske; Xen. Hell. ii. 4. § 36): but as all this is perfectly consistent with the indications we have noticed above respecting the age of Meletus, there seems no good ground for distinguishing the two persons, though they cannot be identified with absolute certainty. (Droysen, Rhein. Mus. vol. iii. p. 190.)

Respecting the form of the name, Μέλιτος is almost universally adopted by modern scholars, though Welcker defends Μέλιτος. For the arguments on both sides, and respecting Meletus in general, see Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. xxxvi.; Welcker, die Griech. Trag. pp. 872—874; Kayser, Hist. Crit. Trag. Græc. pp. 284, 285. Plato makes Socrates pun upon the name several times in the Apology (p. 24, c. d., 25, c., 26, d.). [P. S.]

MELIA (Μελία), a nymph, a daughter of Oceanus, became by Inachus the mother of Phoroneus and Aegialeus or Pegæus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 1; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 920.) By Seilenus she became the mother of the centaur, Pholus (Apollod. ii. 5. § 4), and by Poseidon of Amycna. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 4; Serv. ad Aen. v. 873.) She was carried off by Apollo, and became by him the mother of Iamēnius (some call her own brother Iamēnus, Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. xi. 5; Tzet. ad Lyc. 1211), and of the seer Tenerus. She was worshipped in the Apollinian sanctuary, the Ismenium, near Thebes. (Paus. ix. 10. § 5, 26, § 1; Strab. p. 413.)

In the plural form Μελαι or Μελιάδες is the name of the nymphs, who, along with the Gigantes and Erinnyes, sprang from the drops of blood that fell from Uranus, and which were received by Gaia. (Hes. Theog. 187.) The nymphs that nursed Zeus are likewise called Meliae. (Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 47; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1963.) [L. S.]

MELIADES (Μελιάδες), the same as the Meliades, or nymphs of the district of Melis, near Trachis. (Soph. Philoct. 715.) [L. S.]

MELIBOEIA (Μελίβοια). 1. A daughter of Oceanus, and, by Pelasgus, the mother of Lycæon. (Apollod. iii. 8. § 1.)

2. A daughter of Magnæ, who called the town of Meliboea, in Magnesia, after her. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 338.)

3. One of the daughters of Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Paus. ii. 21, § 10.)

4. An Ephesian maiden who was in love with a youth of the name of Alexis. As, however, her parents had destined her for another man, Alexis quitted his native place; and on the day of her marriage Meliboea threw herself from the roof of her house. But she was not injured, and escaped to a boat which was lying near, and the ropes of which became untied of their own accord. The boat then carried her to her beloved Alexis. The united happy lovers now dedicated a sanctuary to Aphrodite, surnamed Automate and Epidaetia. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 724.)

5. The mother of Ajax, and wife of Theseus. (Athen. xiii. p. 557.)

Meliboea occurs also as a surname of Persephone. (Laus, op. Athen. xiv. p. 624.) [L. S.]

MELICERTES (Μελικέρτης), a son of Athamas and Ino, was metamorphosed into a marine divinity, under the name of Palaemon. (Apollod. i. 9. § 5; comp. ATHAMAS, PALAEMON, and LEUCOTHEA.) [L. S.]

MELINAEIA (Μελιναιία), a surname of Aphrodite, which she derived from the Argive town Melinae. (Steph. Byz. s. v.; Lycoph. 403.) [L. S.]

MELINE (Μελίνη), a daughter of Thespis, became by Heracles the mother of Laomedon. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

MELINNO (Μελιννώ), a lyric poetess, the author of an ode on Rome in five Sapphic stanzas, which is commonly ascribed to Erinna of Lesbos. Nothing is known of her with certainty, except what the ode itself shows, namely, that she lived in the flourishing period of the Roman empire. The ode is printed, with an admirable essay upon it, by Welcker, in Creuzer's Meletemata, 1817, p. 1, and in Welcker's Kleine Schriften, vol. ii. p. 160. [P. S.]

MELISANDER (Μελισάνδρος), of Miletus, is said to have written an account of the battles of the Lapithae and Centaurs, and is classed by Aelian with the poets Oroebantius and Dares, who are stated to have been the predecessors of Homer. (Aelian, V. H. xi. 2.)

MELISSA (Μέλισσα), that is, the soother or propitiator (from μελίσσω or μελίσσω), occurs, 1. As the name of a nymph who discovered and taught the use of honey, and from whom bees were believed to have received their name, μέλισσαι. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. iv. 104.) Bees seem to have been the symbol of nymphs, whence they themselves are sometimes called Melissae, and are sometimes said to have been metamorphosed into bees. (Schol. ad Pind. l. c.; Hesych. s. v. Ὀποδευνιάδες; Columell. ix. 2; Schol. ad Theocrit. iii. 13.) Hence also nymphs in the form of bees are said to have guided the colonists that went to Epheus (Philostr. Icon. ii. 8); and the nymphs who nursed the infant Zeus are called Melissae, or Melissae. (Anton. Lib. 19; Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 47; Apollod. i. 1. § 3.)

2. From the nymphs the name Melissae was transferred to priestesses in general, but more especially to those of Demeter (Schol. ad Pind. l. c.; Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 110; Hesych. s. v. Μελισσαι), Persephone (Schol. ad Theocrit. xv. 94), and to the priestess of the Delphian Apollo. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 106; Schol. ad Eurip. Hippod. 72.) According to the scholiasts of Pindar and Euripides, priestesses received the name Melissae from the purity of the bee. Comp. a story about the origin of bees in Serv. ad Aen. i. 434.

3. Melissae is also a surname of Artemis in the goddess of the moon, in which capacity she alleviates the suffering of women in childbed. (Porphyr. De Antr. Nymph. p. 261.)

4. A daughter of Epidamnus, became by Poseidon the mother of Dyrrhachia, from whom the town of Dyrrhachium derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Δυρράχιον.) [L. S.]

MELISSA (Μέλισσα), the wife of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. She was the daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus, and Eristheneia; and, according to Diogenes Laërtius (i. 94), was called Lysis before her marriage, and received the name Melissa from Periander. She bore two sons, Cypselus and Lycophron, and her husband was passionately attached to her; but in a fit of jealousy, produced by the slanderous tales of some courtesans, he killed her in a barbarous manner. [PERIANDER.] From the story of the appearance of the shade of Melissa to the ambassadors sent by Periander to consult the oracle of the dead among the Thesprotians, and the mode in which Periander sought to appease her, we may gather that he sought to still his remorse by the rites of a dark and barbarous superstition: he took a horrible revenge on those who had instigated him to the murder of his wife. (Herod. iii. 50, v. 92; Athen. xiii. p. 589, f.; Diog. Laërt. i. 94; Plut. Sept. Sap. Conv. p. 146.) Pausanias (ii. 28. § 8) mentions a monument in memory of Melissa, near Epidaurus. [C. P. M.]

MELISSEUS GREGORIUS. [MAMMAE.]

MELISSEUS (Μελισσέος or Μέλισσος), an ancient king of Crete, who, by Amalthea, became the father of the nymphs Adrastea and Ida, to whom Rhea entrusted the infant Zeus to be brought up. (Apollod. i. 1. § 6; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 13.) Other accounts call the daughters of this king Melissa and Amalthea. (Lactant. i. 22.) [L. S.]

MELISSEUS (Μελισσέος), a Greek writer of uncertain date, wrote a work entitled Δεσμός (Tzet. Chil. vi. 90; Schol. in Hesiod. p. 29, ed. Oxon.)

MELISSUS (Μέλισσος), of Samos, a Greek philosopher, the son of Ithageneus, is said to have been likewise distinguished as a statesman, and to have commanded the fleet which first conquered a part of the Athenian armament which blockaded the island under the command of Pericles; but it is stated afterwards that he was conquered by Pericles, in Ol. 85. Thucydides does not mention Melissus. (Plut. Peric. 26, 27; comp. Thuc. 2, adv. Colot. 32.) This account is supported by the statement of Apollodorus, that Melissus flourished in Ol. 84; but it is irreconcilable with the account which represents him as personally connected with Heraclitus, who lived at a much earlier period. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 24.) There seems to be less reason for doubting that he was a disciple of Parmenides, and it is quite certain that he was acquainted with the doctrines of the Eleatics, which in fact he completely adopted, though he took up the letter rather than the spirit of their system, as is proved by the fragments of his work, which was written in prose, and in the Ionic dialect. They have been preserved by Simplicius, and their genuineness is attested by the work of Aristotle or Theophrastus. He proves that the coming into existence and the annihilation of any thing that exists are both inconceivable, whether it be supposed that it arises from a non-existence or from some existence. But even here Melissus is unable to maintain the pure idea of existence, which we find in Parmenides, for he denies that existence, and still more absolute existence (ἡ ἀνάλωτος ἰδὴν) can arise from non-existence. Parmenides could not have admitted the difference of degrees of existence, which is here assumed, any more than the parts of existence which Melissus assumes as possible, or at least as not absolutely opposed to the idea, since he thinks it necessary to prove that no part of existence could have come into existence any more than existence itself (Simplic. in Aristot. Phys. f. 22, b; Aristot. de Xenoph. Gorg. et Meliss. 1.) The inference of Melissus which now follows, that things which have neither beginning nor end must be infinite and unlimited in magnitude, and accordingly so (ibid. and Simplic. f. 23, b. fragm. 2 and 7—10; in Brandis, Commentat. Eleatic.), is manifestly erroneous, since, without even attempting a refutation, he assumes infinitude of space in things which have no beginning or end in time. The simplicity of existence he infers from its unity, and he appears to have endeavoured very minutely to show that no change could take place either in quantity or quality, and neither internal nor external motion (Fr. 4. 11, &c.; Aristot. l. c.) From this he then argued backwards, and assumed the impossibility of finding existence in the actual world. (Simplic. De Coelo, f. 138, and the corrected text of the Schol. in Aristot. ed. Brandis, p. 509, b.) He then made the first, though weak attempt, which was afterwards carried out by Zeno with far more acuteness and sagacity, to prove that the foundations of all knowledge derived from experience are in themselves contradictory, and that the reality of the actual world is inconceivable. The fragments of Melissus are collected by Ch. A. Brandis, Commentationum Eleaticarum, pars prima, p. 185, &c., and by Mullach, Aristotelis de Melisso, Xenophane, et Gorgia Disputationes, cum Eleaticorum philosophorum fragmentis, &c., Berol. 1846. [L. S.]

MELISSUS (Μελισσος). 1. A Theban, the son of Telesides, of the family of the Cleonymidae, who conquered in the chariot race at the Nemean games, and in the pancratium at the Isthmian games. The dates of his victories are uncertain. Pindar's third Isthmian ode is written to celebrate the latter of his victories.

2. A Greek writer, a native of Euboea, who wrote a work explaining various mythological stories by the facts of natural history. (Fulgent. ii. 16.) He is probably the same as the Melissus referred to by Palaephates (Proëm.) and by Servius (ad Virg. Aen. iv. 146).

3. A Roman writer mentioned by Pliny among those from whom he drew materials for his 7th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 35th books. [C. P. M.]

MELISSUS, AE'LIUS, a distinguished Roman grammarian mentioned by Aulus Gellius (xviii. 6). He was the author of a work, De loquendi Proportione. [C. P. M.]

MELISSUS, C., MAECENAS, a native of Spolietum. He was of free birth, but was exposed in his infancy, and presented by the person who found and reared him to Maecenas. Though his mother declared his real origin, he refused to leave Maecenas. He was, however, speedily manumitted, and obtained the favour of Augustus, who commissioned him to arrange the library in the portico of Octavia. At an advanced period of life he commenced the composition of a collection of jokes and witticisms. He also wrote plays of a novel sort, which he called Trabeculae. (Suet. de Illust. Gramm. 21; Or. ad Pont. iv. 16. 30.) Suetonius, in the passage already referred to, calls him C. Melissus, but in another place (de Illust. Gramm. 3), he terms him Leneas Melissus, for which it has been conjectured we ought to read Cilnius Melissus. By Pliny (H. N. xxviii. 6. 17) he is called Maecenas Melissus. [C. P. M.]

ME'LITE (Μελίτη). 1. A nymph, one of the Nereides, a daughter of Nereus and Doria. (Hom. Il. xviii. 42; Hes. Theog. 246; Apollod. i. 2. § 7; Virg. Aen. v. 825.)

2. A Naia, a daughter of the river-god Aegaeus, who became, by Heraclæ, the mother of Hyllus, in the country of the Phaeacians. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 538.)

3. A daughter of Erasinus of Argos, was visited by Britomartis. [BRITOMARTIS.] [L. S.]

MELITEUS (Μελιτεύς), a son of Zeus by an Othreian nymph. He was exposed by his mother in a wood, lest Hera should discover the affair. But Zeus took care that he was reared by bees, and the boy grew up. At length he was found by his step-brother Phagous, who took him with him, and gave him the name of Meliteus, from his having been reared by bees. The town of Melite in Phthia was said to have been built by him. (Anton. Lib. 13.) [L. S.]

ME'LITO (Μελίτων), a Christian writer of considerable eminence, who lived in the second century. He was contemporary with Hegesippus, Dionysius of Corinth, Apollinarius of Hierapolis, and others (Euseb. H. E. iv. 21). Of his personal history very little is known. The epithets Asianus and Sardensis, given to him by Jerome (De Vir. Illust. c. 24), indicate the place of his episcopal charge, not, so far as appears, of his birth. Polycrates of Ephesus, a writer of somewhat later date, in his letter to Victor, bishop of Rome (apud Euseb. H. E. v. 24), calls him "Eunuchus," but it is not clear whether this term is to be understood literally, or is simply expressive of his inviolate chastity. At what time he became bishop of Sardes is not known: he probably was bishop when the controversy arose at Laodiceia respecting the observance of Easter, which occasioned him to write his book on the subject (Clem. Alexandr. apud Euseb. H. E. iv. 26). This controversy arose when Servilius Paulus was proconsul of Asia, and at the time of the martyrdom of Sagaris, who is thought to have suffered in the persecution under M. Aurelius. During the same persecution, Melito composed his Apologia, which, as it was addressed to Aurelius alone, appears to have been written after the death of Lucius Verus, in A. D. 169. The Chronicon of Eusebius places its presentation in A. D. 169—170: it must have been written then or between those years and A. D. 180, in which Aurelius himself died [AURELIUS MARCUS]. The Chronicon Paschale seems to ascribe to Melito two apologies, one presented to Aurelius and Verus, A. D. 165, the other to Aurelius alone, A. D. 169. Tillemont is disposed to place the Apology as late as the year 175; Pearson and Dodwell between 170 and 175; and Basnage (Annales Politic. Eccles.) and Lardner as late as A. D. 177. The time, place, and manner of Melito's death are not accurately and certainly known: from the silence of Polycrates (apud Euseb. l. c.) it may be inferred that he was not a Martyr; the place of his death may be conjectured from that of his interment, which Polycrates states to have been Sardes; and as for the date of it, Polycrates, whose letter to Victor was apparently written about 196, speaks of it in a way which indicates that it was not then recent.

The works of Melito are enumerated by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 26) as follows:—1. Περὶ τοῦ πάσχα δόξαι, De Pascha Libri duo. 2. Περὶ πολιτείας καὶ προφητῶν, De Recta Vivendi Ratione (s. de Recta Conversatione) et de Prophetis. Some interpreters, including Rufinus, have inaccurately rendered this passage, as if it spoke of two distinct works. Jerome (De Viris Illust. c. 24) gives the title of this work in Latin, De Vita Prophetarum, which his translator, the so-called Sophronius, re-translates into Greek, Περὶ βίου προφητικῶς, giving reason to think that the original text of Eusebius was Περὶ τῆς πολιτείας τῶν προφητῶν; but all the MSS. and the text of Nicephorus Callisti support the common reading. 3. Περὶ ἐκκλησίας, De Ecclesia. 4. Περὶ κυριακῆς, De Die Dominica. 5. Περὶ φύσεως ἀνθρώπου, De Natura Hominis. Rufinus appears to have read Περὶ πύστεως ἀνθρώπου, for he renders it De Fide Hominis. 6. Περὶ πλάσεως, De Creatione, or according to Jerome, De Plasmate and according to Rufinus, De Fumento. Nicephorus Callisti, who, like Rufinus, read πύστεως in the title of No. 5, speaks of Nos. 5 and 6 as one work, Περὶ πύστεως ἀνθρώπου καὶ πλάσεως, De Fide Hominis et Creatione. 7. Περὶ θαλακῆς πύστεως also Θηρηρίων, De Obedientia Sensuum Fidei præstanda a. De Obedientia Sensuum Fidei. Nicephorus Callisti speaks of two works, Περὶ ὁρακῆς πίστεως, and Περὶ αἰσθητηρίων; and Jerome, in his catalogue of the works of Melito, enumerates consecutively De Sensibus and De Fide, which Sophronius renders Περὶ διαβολῆς and Περὶ τῶν πιστῶν. Rufinus also gives two titles as of separate books, De Obedientia Fidei and De Sensibus, which two titles represent the one title given in the present text of Eusebius. 8. Περὶ ψυχῆς καὶ σώματος ἡ νόδς, De Anima et Corpore seu de Mente: or, as Rufinus renders it, De Anima et Corpore et Mente. Jerome has only De Anima et Corpore. 9. Περὶ λουτροῦ, De Baptismate a. De Lavacro. One MS. of Eusebius, supported by Nicephorus Callisti, speaks of this work as a portion of No. 8. 10. Περὶ ἀληθείας, De Veritate. 11. Περὶ κτίσεως καὶ γενέσεως Χριστοῦ, De Creatione et Generatione Christi. Some MSS. read πίστεως instead of κτίσεως; but this reading was probably introduced after the rise of the Arian controversy caused the word κτίσεως to be regarded as heterodox. Rufinus has De Fide (as if he had read Περὶ πίστεως instead of Περὶ κτίσεως) and De Generatione Christi as the titles of two separate books. Jerome has only De Generatione Christi, omitting to render the obnoxious word κτίσεως. 12. Περὶ προφητείας, De Prophetia. Jerome renders the title De Prophetia sua. Rufinus, who has De Prophetia ejus, connects this title by the conjunction et with the title of the latter work mentioned under No. 11, De Generatione Christi et de Prophetia ejus. It may be mentioned, in vindication of Jerome's version, that according to the testimony of Tertullian (in a work now lost, but which Jerome (l. c.) cites, and which was written after he became a Montanist), Melito was regarded by many persons (whether among the Montanists or the Catholics, is not clear) as a prophet. 13. Περὶ φιλοξενίας, De Philoxenia a. De Hospitalitate. 14. Ἡ κλέις, Claritas; of which we shall speak presently. 15. Περὶ τοῦ διαβόλου καὶ τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως Ἰωάννου, De Diabolo et de Apocalypsi Joannis. Both Rufinus and Jerome speak of two books, one De Diabolo, the other De Apocalypsi; they are perhaps right. 16. Περὶ ἐσωμάτων Θεοῦ, De Deo Corpore induto. From a passage in Origen, quoted by Theodoret (Quæst. in Genesim, c. 20), Melito appears to have believed that God possessed a bodily form, and to have written in support of that doctrine. This work was probably the one referred to by Origen; and it is in vain that some modern critics have argued that it was written on the incarnation of Christ. Anastasius Sinaita, in his Ὁδηγός, Dux Viæ adversus Acephalos, c. 13, has, indeed, quoted a passage from Melito's book, Περὶ σαρκοσέως Χριστοῦ, De Incarnatione Christi, but this appears to be a different work from the present, and is not mentioned by Eusebius. 17. Πρὸς Ἀντωνίνον Βιβλίδιον, Libellus (sc. supplex) ad Antoninum. This was the Apologia or defence of Christianity already mentioned. 18. Ἐκλογαί, Elogues, sc. ex Libris Vet. Testamenti, comprised, according to Jerome, in six books. This last work is not mentioned by Eusebius when enumerating the works of Melito, but he afterwards gives a quotation from it. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 26.) To this catalogue, furnished by Eusebius, we may add the following works on the authority of Anastasius Sinaita, who lived in the middle of the sixth century. 19. Περὶ σαρκοσέως Χριστοῦ, De Incarnatione Christi, consisting of at least three books, and directed, partly or wholly, against Marcion. (See above, No. 16.) 20. Ἀγῶν εἰς τὸ πάθος, Oratio in Passionem. Besides these genuine writings of Melito, another has been ascribed to him, De Transitu Beatæ Virginis, which is extant in Latin, and appears in most editions of the Bibliotheca Patrum, but it is generally allowed to be spurious. It is mentioned, but without the author's name, in the Decretum of Pope Gelasius I., in which it is placed among the spurious books; and is mentioned as extant, under the name of Melito, by the venerable Bede (Retractat. in Acta, cap. 8, Opera, vol. vi. col. 13, ed. Col. 1612), who describes it as a forgery, and points out its inconsistencies with the Scripture narratives.

The number of his genuine works sufficiently shows the industry of Melito, and their subjects indicate the variety of his attainments; and the eulogies of the most learned fathers, and their testimony of the high reputation which Melito enjoyed, make us regret that of all these writings only a few fragments have descended to our times. It is, however, to be observed that these eulogies are qualified by intimations of his gross error as to the Deity. The express declaration of Origen as to his belief that God had a bodily form is supported by the testimony of Gennadius of Massilia (Lib. Dogm. Eccles. c. 4). Modern writers seek in vain to exculpate him; and Tillemont, though unwilling to conclude positively that a writer so eminent could have held so gross an error, admits that, possibly, this imputation, or the ascription to him of the book De Transitu B. Virginis, may have prevented the church from honouring his memory by an appointed office. Modern Roman Catholics, as Bellarmine, Baronius, Hallouix, Tillemont, Ceillier, &c., do not hesitate to give him the title of "Saint," and Tillemont pleads that they are in this only following the tradition of the Asiatic church.

The book published in French (12mo. 1662), under the title of Apocalypses de Meliton, was a satire against the monks.

The fragments of Melito's writings are as follows. We prefix to the notice of each the number of the work, from which it is taken, in the catalogue of the works of this father already given. 1. A fragment of the work De Pascha, preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 26), showing when Melito wrote it. 17. Several fragments of the Apologia, all but one, preserved by Eusebius (l. c.), and the remaining one in the Chronicon Paschale (p. 238, ed. Paris, 207, ed. Venice, and vol. i. p. 463, ed. Bonn). 18. A very valuable passage preserved by Eusebius (l. c.) from the Elogues, or rather from the introductory letter to the Elogues addressed to "Onesimus, my brother" (whether his natural brother, or simply a fellow-Christian, is not clear), containing the earliest catalogue of "the books of the Old Covenant (or Testament)," given by a Christian writer. His catalogue agrees with the received canon of the Old Testament, except that it omits the books of Nehemiah and Esther; but Nehemiah is perhaps included under the title Ezra or Esdra. None of the books of the Apocrypha are mentioned: the book of Wisdom has been thought to be included, but, according to the testimony of several ancient MSS. of Eusebius, supported by Rufinus and Nicephorus Callisti, the name is mentioned as a second title of the Book of Proverbs. From Melito's use of the term τὰ τῆς παλαιᾶς διαθήκης βιβλία, "Veteris Testamenti (s. Foederis) Libri," Lardner infers that the Christian Scriptures had been already collected into a volume under the title of The New Testament. 19. An extract from the work De Incarnatione Christi, preserved by Anastasius Sinnita (Hodeg. s. Dua Viae, c. 13), and exultingly appealed to by Cave (Hist. Litt.) as showing Melito's orthodoxy as to the two natures of Christ. The quotation, however, appears to be a summary of Melito's statements rather than an exact citation of his words. That Melito wrote in support of the two natures of Christ is affirmed by an anonymous writer cited by Eusebius (H. E. v. 28). It is further observable that Melito extends our Lord's ministry to three years, contrary to the more general opinion of his day. 20. A very brief extract from the Oratio in Passionem, "God suffered by the right hand of Israel," is also preserved by Anastasius (ibid. c. 12). Four extracts, perhaps from the Elogae, in an ancient MS. Catena in Genesis.

These fragments have been collected by the diligence of successive writers. Those preserved by Eusebius, and the Chronicon Paschale, are given by Halloix, in his Illustr. Eccles. Orient. Script. Sacr. II. together with three of the fragments from the Catena in Genesis. These fragments from the Catena were enlarged by the diligence of Woog (Dissert. II. de Melitone) and Nicephorus (Catena in Octateuch. 2 vols. fol. Lips. 1772—3). The passages from Anastasius Sinaita are added in the Biblioth. Patrum of Galland, but he omits those from the Catena. The whole of the fragments of Melito are given in the Reliquiae Sacrae of Routh (vol. i. p. 109, &c. 8vo. Oxon. 1814, &c.), in which the extracts from the Catena are fuller than in any previous edition. The notes to this edition are very valuable.

Labbe, in his book De Scriptorib. Ecclesiast. (vol. ii. p. 87), mentions a Latin version of the Clavis of Melito, as being in his time extant in MS. in the College of Clermont, at Paris. From a transcript of this MS. (collated with another), which is among the papers of Grabe, in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, it appears to be much interpolated, if indeed any part of it is genuine. It is a sort of vocabulary of the figurative terms of Scripture, somewhat similar to the De Formulis Spiritualis Intelligentiae of Eucherius of Lyon. Crusius, and after his death Woog, had intended to publish it; but it remains still in MS. Woog, in his Dissert. Secunda de Melitone, has given a syllabus of the Capita, and printed the first Caput as a specimen. In the MS. in the Clermont College the author is termed Melitus or Miletus. It is possible that the fourth extract, given by Routh from the Catena, is from the original Clavis of Melito. (Euseb. Hieronym. Chron. Paschale, ll. cc.; Halloix, l. c.; Cave, *Hist. MELITO'DES (Μελιτώδης), i. e. sweet as honey, occurs as a Euphemic surname of Persephone. (Theocrit. xv. 94; Porphyr. Antr. Nymph. p. 261.) [L. S.]

MELIUS (Μήλιος), the name of two mythical personages, the one a son of Priam (Apollod. iii. 12, § 5), and the other is commonly called Melus. [MELUS.] [L. S.]

MELLA, ANNAEUS. [MELA.]

MELLOBAUDES or MALLOBAUDES, one of the Frankish kings of the time of the emperor Gratian. He becomes known to us first as an officer under the emperor Constantius in Gaul. (Amm. Marc. xiv. 11, xv. 5.) He was afterwards distinguished by his victory over Maricianus, king of the Alemanni, the date of which is unknown. (Amm. Marc. xxx. 3.) In the campaign of Gratian against the Alemanni, A. D. 377, he was Comes domesticorum, and shared with Nannienus the chief military command, and had a principal part in the victory of Argentaria. [GRATIANUS, No. 2.] Mellobaudes is sometimes identified, it is difficult to say whether correctly or not, with Merobaudes, an active officer of the emperors Valentinian I. and Gratian. It was by his advice that on the death of Valentinian I. his son of the same name, a child of four years old, was made colleague in the empire with his brother Gratian [GRATIANUS, No. 2], much to the dissatisfaction of the latter. (Amm. Marc. xxx. 10.) Merobaudes was twice consul, A. D. 377 and 383. In the latter year he commanded the army of Gratian against the usurper Maximus, and is commonly charged with betraying his master [GRATIANUS, No. 2], from which charge Tillemont (Hist. des Emp. vol. v. p. 723) defends him. At any rate he gained little by his treason, being soon put to death by Maximus. (Pacatus, Panegyria ad Theodos.) [J. C. M.]

MELLO'NA or MELLO'NIA, a Roman divinity, who was believed to protect the honey, but is otherwise unknown. (Aug. De Civ. Dei. iv. 34; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7, 8, 11.) [L. S.]

MELO'BIUS (Μηλόβιος), was one of the thirty tyrants established at Athens in B. C. 404, and was among those who were sent to the house of Lysias and Polemarchus to apprehend them and seize their property. (Xen. Hell. ii. 3, § 2; Lys. c. Erid. p. 121.) [E. E.]

MELO'BOSIS or MELO'BOTE (Μηλόβωσις or Μηλόβότη), a nymph, said to have been a daughter of Oceanus. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 420; Hes. Theog. 354; Paus. iv. 30, § 3; comp. DEXETER.) [L. S.]

MELPO'MENE (Μελπομένη), i. e. the singing (goddess), one of the nine Muses, became afterwards the Muse of Tragedy. (Hes. Theog. 77; comp. MURAR.) [L. S.]

MELPO'MENUS (Μελπόμενος), or the singer, was a surname of Dionysus at Athens, and in the Attic demos of Acharne. (Paus. i. 2, § 4, 31, § 3.) [L. S.]

MELUS (Μήλος). 1. A son of Mantus, from whom the sanctuary of Apollo Mallois in Leabos was believed to have derived its name. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Μαλλόβεις.)

2. A Delian who fled to Cinyras in Cyprus. Cinyras gave him his son Adonis as a companion, and his relative Peleia in marriage. The fruit of this marriage was a son, who was likewise called Melus, and whom he caused to be brought up in the sanctuary of Venua. On the death of Adonis, the elder Melus hung himself from grief, and his wife followed his example. Aphrodite then metamorphosed Melus into an apple (μήλον), and his wife into a dove (πέλεια). The younger Melus was ordered by the goddess to return with a colony to Delos, where he founded the town of Delos. There the sheep were called from him μήλα, because he first taught the inhabitants to shear them, and make cloth out of their wool. (Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. viii. 37.)

3. A son of the river-god Scamander. (Ptolem. Ileph. ap. Phot. Bibl. 152.) [L. S.]

MEMBLIARUS (Μεμβλιάρης), a son of Poecilus, a Phoenician, and a relation of Cadmus. Cadmus left him at the head of a colony in the island of Thera or Calliste. (Herod. iv. 147; Paus. iii. 1. § 7.) [L. S.]

MEMMIA, SULPICIA, one of the three wives of Alexander Severus. Her father was a man of consular rank; her grandfather's name was Catulus. (Lamprid. Alex. Sev. c. 20.) [W. R.]

MEMMIA GENS, a plebeian house at Rome, whose members do not occur in history before B. C. 173. But from the epoch of the Jugurthine war, B. C. 111, they held frequent tribunates of the plebs; and in the age of Augustus they must have been a conspicuous branch of the later Roman nobility, since Virgil derives the Memmii from the Trojan Mnestheus (Aen. v. 117; comp. Tac. Ann. xiv. 47). The Memmia Gens bore the cognomens Gallus, Gemellus, Pollio, Quirinus, Regulus: all the members of the gens are given under MEMMIUS. [W. B. D.]

MEMMIUS. 1. C. MEMMIUS C. F. QUIRINUS, was the aedile who first exhibited the Cerealia at Rome, as we learn from the annexed coin; but the name does not occur in any ancient writer. The obverse has C. MEMMI. C. F. QUIRINVS, with a head which may be that of Quirinus: the reverse has MEMMIVS. AED. CEREAIA. PRIMVS. FECT, and represents Ceres sitting; a serpent at her feet; in her right hand, three ears of corn; in her left, a distaff. The date of the introduction of the Cerealia at Rome (Dionys. vii. 72; Liv. xxii. 56; Ovid. Fast. iv. 397), and consequently of the aedileship of Memmius Quirinus, is unknown, though it must have been previous to B. C. 216. (Liv. l. c.)

COIN OF C. MEMMIUS QUIRINUS.

2. C. MEMMIUS GALLUS, was praetor for the second time in B. C. 173. Sicily was his province, and he remained in it as propraetor during the next year. (Liv. xlii. 9, 10, 27.) The annexed coin of the Memmia gens, which bears on the reverse L. MEMMI. GAL., may have been struck by some relation of C. Memmius Gallus.

COIN OF L. MEMMIUS GALLUS.

3. T. MEMMIUS, was sent by the senate in A. C. 170 as its commissioner to hear the complaints of the provincials in Achaia and Macedonia against the Roman magistrates in those districts. (Liv. xliii. 5.)

4. Q. MEMMIUS, was legatus from the senate to the Jewish nation about A. C. 163—2 (Maccab. ii. 11.)

5. C. MEMMIUS, tribune of the plebs in A. C. 111, was an ardent opponent of the oligarchical party at Rome during the Jugurthine war. His exposure of its venality, incompetence, and traffic with Jugurtha first opened the command of the legions to the incorruptible Metellus Numidicus, and finally to the low-born but able C. Marius, and thus laid the foundation of ultimate victory and triumph. (Sall. Jug. 27, 30—34.) Among the nobles impeached by Memmius were L. Calpurnius Bestia [BESTIA, No. 1], and M. Aemilius Scaurus. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 70, pro Font. 7.) Memmius was slain with blindness by the mob of Saturninus and Glaucia, while a candidate for the consulship in B. C. 100. (Cic. in Cat. iv. 2; Appian, B. C. i. 32; Liv. Epit. 69; Flor. iii. 16.) Sallust (Jug. 31) gives a speech of Memmius which, however, is rather a dramatic than an authentic version of the original, and he had a higher opinion of the tribune's eloquence than Cicero (Brut. 36) altogether sanctions. In the "Life of Terence" (3), ascribed to Suetonius, is preserved a fragment of Memmius's speech "de Se."—the defence, probably, at which the judges rejected the evidence of Memmius's enemy M. Aemilius Scaurus (Cic. pro Font. 7), and there is another doubtful fragment in Priscian (viii. 4). (Compare Elendt, Proleg. in Cic. Brut. lxi.; Meyer, Fragm. Rom. Orat. p. 138.) From some forensic writings of L. Licinius Crassus [CRASSUS, No. 23], it would appear that Memmius had the by-name of "Mordax" (Cic. de Orat. ii. 59. § 240, 66. § 267; Quint. Inst. vi. 3. § 67.)

6. L. MEMMIUS, was an orator of some eminence during the war of Sulla with the Marius party, B. C. 87—81. (Cic. Brut. 36, 70, 89.) From Cicero (pro Sext. Rosc. 32) it would appear that Memmius was a supporter of C. Marius.

7. C. MEMMIUS, brother, probably, of the preceding (Cic. Brut. 36), married a sister of Pompey. He was Pompey's propraetor in Sicily, and his quaestor in Spain, during the Sertian war, B. C. 76, and was slain in battle with Sertorius near Saguntum. (Cic. pro Balb. 2; Plut. Pomp. 11, Sert. 21; Oros. v. 23.)

8. C. MEMMIUS L. F. GEMELLUS, son of No. 6, was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 66, when he opposed the demand of L. Lucullus for a triumph on his return from the Mithridatic war. (Plut. Lucull. 37.) Memmius was a man of profligate character. He wrote indecent poems (Plin. Nat. h. v. 3; Ovid. Trist. ii. 433; Gell. xix. 9), made overtures to Cn. Pompey's wife (Suet. Jul. Gr. 14).

and, when curule ædile, in B. C. 60, seduced the wife of M. Lucullus, whence Cicero, combining this intrigue with Memmius's previous hostility to L. Lucullus, calls him a Paria, who insulted not only Menelaus (M. Lucullus), but Agamemnon also (L. Lucullus). (Cic. ad Att. i. 18. § 3; comp. Val. Max. vi. 1. § 13.) Memmius was prætor in B. C. 58. (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. i. 2, 5, 16.) He belonged at that time to the Senatorian party, since he impeached P. Vatinius, consul in B. C. 47 (Cic. in P. Vat. 14); opposed P. Clodius (id. ad Att. ii. 12); and was vehement in his invectives against Julius Caesar (Suet. Caes. 23, 49, 73; Schol. Bob. in Cic. pro Sest. p. 297, in Cic. Fatinius. p. 317, 323, Orelli); and attempted to bring in a bill to rescind the acts of his consulate. Before, however, Memmius himself competed for the consulship, B. C. 54, he had been reconciled to Caesar, who supported him with all his interest. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 15, 17; Suet. Caes. 73.) But Memmius soon again offended Caesar by revealing a certain coalition with his opponents at the comitia. (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. ii. 15, ad Att. iv. 16, 18.) Memmius was impeached for ambitus, and, receiving no aid from Caesar, withdrew from Rome to Mytilene, where he was living in the year of Cicero's proconsulate. (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. iii. 2, 8, ad Fam. xiii. 19, ad Att. v. 11, vi. 1.) Memmius married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla, whom he divorced after having by her at least one son C. Memmius [No. 9]. (Ascon. in Cic. pro M. Aemil. Scaur. p. 29, Orelli; Cic. pro Sull. 19.) He was eminent both in literature and in eloquence, although in the latter his indolence, his fastidious taste, and exclusive preference of Greek to Roman models rendered him less effective in the forum. (Cic. Brut. 70.) Lucretius dedicated his poem, De Rerum Natura, to this Memmius, and Cicero addressed three letters to him (ad Fam. xiii. 1—3).

9. C. MEMMIUS, son of the preceding by Fausta, daughter of Sulla the dictator, was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 51. He prosecuted A. Gabinus, consul in B. C. 58, for malversation in his province of Syria (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. iii. 1. 5, 15, 2. 1, 3, 2, pro Rubr. Post. 3; Val. Max. viii. 1. § 3), and Domitius Calvinus for ambitus at his consular comitia in B. C. 54 (Cic. ad Quint. Fr. iii. 2. § 3, 3. 2). Memmius addressed the judges in behalf of the defendant at the trial of M. Aemilius Scaurus in the same year (Ascon. in Cic. Scaurian. p. 29, Orelli). Memmius was step-son of T. Annius Milo who married his mother after her divorce by C. Memmius (No. 7). (Ascon. l. c.; Cic. pro Sull. 19.) Memmius was consul suffectus in B. C. 34, when he exhibited games in honour of one of the mythic ancestors of the Julian house, Venus Genetrix. (Dion Cass. xlix. 42.)

10. P. MEMMIUS, was cited a witness for the defendant at the trial of A. Caecina, B. C. 69. (Cic. pro Cæc. 10) [CAECINA, No. 1.]

11. P. MEMMIUS REGULUS, was supplementary consul in A. D. 31 (Fasti; Dion Cass. lvi. 9), and afterwards præfect of Macedonia and Achaia, in which office he received orders from Caligula to remove to Rome the statue of the Pheidian Jupiter from Olympia. (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 1; Pausan. ix. 27; comp. Dion Cass. l. 6.) Memmius was the husband of Lollia Paulina, and was compelled by Caligula to divorce her. (Tac. Ann. xii. 23; Suet. Cal. 25; Dion Cass. lix. 12; Euseb. in

Chron.; comp. Tac. Ann. xii. 1.) Memmius died in A. D. 63. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 47.)

12. C. MEMMIUS REGULUS, son, probably, of the preceding, was consul in A. D. 63. (Fasti; Tac. Ann. xv. 23; Gruter, Inscr. p. 8.)

13. L. MEMMIUS POLLIO, was supplementary consul in B. C. 49. Memmius was a creature of Agrippina, the wife of Claudius, and was employed by her to promote the marriage of her son Nero with the emperor's daughter Octavia. (Tac. Ann. xii. 9.)

14. C. MEMMIUS, C. F., is only known from coins of the republican period, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse bears the head of Ceres, with C. MEMMI, C. F.: the reverse a trophy supported by a captive, with C. MEMMIUS IMPERATOR. This coin is of beautiful workmanship. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF C. MEMMIUS.

MEMNON (Μήνων), a son of Tithonus and Eos, and brother of Emathion. In the Odyssey and Hesiod he is described as the handsome son of Eos, who assisted Priam with his Ethiopians against the Greeks. He slew Antilochus, the son of Nestor, at Troy. (Hes. Theog. 984, &c.; Hom. Od. iv. 188, xi. 522; Apollod. iii. 12. § 4.) Some writers called his mother a Cissian woman (Κισσία), from the Persian province of Cissia. (Strab. p. 728; Herod. v. 49, 52.) As Eos is sometimes identical with Hespera, Memnon's mother is also called Hespera. [Eos.] Homer makes only passing allusions to Memnon, and he is essentially a post-Homeric hero. According to these later traditions, he was a prince of the Ethiopians, and accordingly black (Ov. Amor. i. 8, 4, Epist. ex Pont. iii. 3. 96; Paus. x. 31. § 2); he came to the assistance of his uncle Priam, for Tithonus and Priam were step-brothers, being both sons of Laomedon by different mothers. (Tzets. ad Lyc. 18.) Respecting his expedition to Troy there are different legends. According to some Memnon the Ethiopian first went to Egypt, thence to Susa, and thence to Troy. (Paus. i. 42. § 2.) At Susa, which had been founded by Tithonus, Memnon built the acropolis which was called after him the Memnonium. (Herod. v. 53, vii. 151; Strab. p. 728; Paus. iv. 31. § 5.) According to some Tithonus was the governor of a Persian province, and the favourite of Teutamus; and Memnon obtained the command of a large host of Ethiopians and Susans to succour Priam. (Diod. ii. 22, iv. 75; Paus. x. 31. § 2.) A third tradition states that Tithonus sent his son to Priam, because Priam had made him a present of a golden vine. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 493.) Dictys Cretensis (iv. 4) makes Memnon lead an army of Ethiopians and Indians from the heights of Mount Caucasus to Troy. In the fight against the Greeks he was slain by Achilles. The principal points connected with his exploits at Troy are, his victory over Antilochus, his contest with Achilles, and lastly, his death and the removal of his body by his mother. With regard to the first, we are told that Antilochus, the dearest friend of Achilles after the fall of Patroclus, hastened to the assistance of his father, Nestor, who was hard pressed by Paris. Memnon attacked Antilochus, and slew him. (Pind. Pyth. vi. 80, &c.) According to others, Memnon was fighting with Ajax; and before his Ethiopians could come to his assistance, Achilles came up, and killed Memnon (Dict. Crét. iv. 6); the same accounts represent Antilochus as having been conquered by Hector. (Ov. Heroid. i. 15; Hygin. Fab. 113.) According to the common account, however, Achilles avenged the death of Antilochus upon Memnon, of whose fate Achilles had been informed by his mother, Thetis. While both were fighting Zeus weighed the fate of the two heroes, and the scale containing that of Memnon sank. (Pind. Ol. ii. 148, Nem. iii. 110, vi. 83; Quint. Smyrn. ii. 224, &c.; Philostr. Icon. ii. 7; Plut. De Aud. Poët. 2.) According to Diodorus (ii. 22) Memnon was not killed in an open contest, but fell into an ambush in which the Thesalians lay in wait for him. Eos prayed to Zeus to grant her son immortality, and removed his body from the field of battle. She wept for him every morning; and the dew-drops which appear in the morning are the tears of Eos. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 493; Ov. Met. xiii. 622.)

Philostratus (Her. iii. 4) distinguishes between a Trojan and an Ethiopian Memnon, and believes that the former, who was very young and did not distinguish himself till after the death of Hector, slew Antilochus; and he adds, that Achilles, after having avenged his friend, burnt the armour and head of Memnon on the funeral pile of Antilochus. Some say that the Ethiopian warriors burned the body of Memnon, and carried the ashes to Tithonus (Diod. l. c.); or that those who had gone to Troy under his general, Phalax, received his ashes near Paphos, in Cyprus, and gave them to Memnon's sister, Himera, who was searching after his body, and buried them in Paliochis (an unknown place), whereupon she disappeared. (Dict. Crét. vi. 10.) Tombs of Memnon were shown in several places, as at Ptolemais in Syria, on the Hellespont, on a hill near the mouth of the river Aesepus, near Palton in Syria, in Ethiopia and other places. (Strab. pp. 587, 728.) His armour was said to have been made for him by Hephaestus, at the request of his mother; and his sword was shown in the temple of Asclepius, at Nicomedeia. (Paus. iii. 3. § 6.) His companions, who indulged in excessive wailings at his death, were changed by the gods into birds, called Memnonides, and some of them died of grief. (Serv. ad Aen. i. 755.) According to Ovid (Met. xiii. 576, &c.), Eos implored Zeus to confer an honour on her son, to console her for his loss. He accordingly caused a number of birds, divided into two swarms, to fight in the air over the funeral sacrifice until a portion of them fell down upon the ashes of the hero, and thus formed a funeral sacrifice for him. According to a story current on the Hellespont, the Memnonides every year visited the tomb of Memnon, cleared the ground round about, and moistened it with their wings, which they wetted in the waters of the river Aesepus. (Paus. x. 31. § 2; comp. Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 7.)

At a comparatively late period, when the Greeks became acquainted with Egypt, and the colossal statue in the neighbourhood of Thebes, the stone of which, when reached by the rays of the rising sun, gave forth a sound resembling that of a breaking chord, they looked upon that statue as representing the son of Eos, or confounded it with their own Helios, although they well knew that the Egyptians did not call the statue Memnon, but Amenophis. (Paus. i. 42. § 2; comp. Callistr. Stat. i. 9.) This colossal figure, made of black stone, in a sitting posture, with its feet close together, and the hands leaning on its seat, was broken in the middle, so that the upper part had fallen down; but it was afterwards restored. (Paus. l. c.; Strab. p. 816; Philostr. Her. iii. 4, Icon. i. 7, Vit. Apollon. vi. 4; Lucian, Tox. 27; Tacit. Ann. ii. 61; Juvén. xv. 5.) Several very ingenious conjectures have been propounded respecting the alleged meaning of the so-called statue of Memnon; and some have asserted that it served for astronomical purposes, and others that it had reference to the mystic worship of the sun and light, though there can be little doubt that the statue represented nothing else than the Egyptian king Amenophis. (Creuzer, Symbolik, p. 149, &c.; Jablonski, De Memnone; and the various works on Egyptian antiquities.)

The fight of Memnon with Achilles was often represented by Greek artists, as for example, on the chest of Cypselus (Paus. v. 19. § 1), on the throne of Apollo, at Amyclae (iii. 18. § 7), in a large group at Olympia, the work of Lycius, which had been dedicated there by the inhabitants of Apollonia (v. 22. § 2), in the Lesche at Delphi, by Polygnotus (x. 31. § 2; comp. Millingen, Mosae. Inedit. 1, 4, 5, 40).

MEMNON (Μέμνων), historical. 1. A distinguished Greek, a native of Rhodes. The date of his birth is not accurately known, but Demosthenes (c. Aristocr. p. 672) speaks of him as a young man in a. c. 352. His sister was the wife of Artabazus, satrap of Lower Phrygia, and he joined the latter in his revolt against Darius Ochus. When fortune deserted the insurgents they fled to the court of Philip, Mentor, the brother of Memnon [Μέντωρ], being high in favour with Darius on account of his services in Egypt, interceded on behalf of Artabazus and Memnon, who were pardoned and again received into favour. On the death of Mentor, Memnon, who possessed great military skill and experience, succeeded him in his authority, which extended over all the western coast of Asia Minor (about a. c. 336). When Alexander invaded Asia, Memnon, with the satraps Spithridates and Arsites, collected an army, with which they encamped on the banks of the Granicus. Memnon, thinking their forces insufficient to oppose Alexander, recommended that they should retire and lay waste the country behind them; but his advice was overruled. After the defeat of the Persian troops, Memnon sent his wife and children to Darius as tokens and pledges of his fidelity. As he had hoped, he was invested by the king with the supreme command in the west of Asia. He defended Halicarnassus against Alexander with great skill and bravery, until it was no longer possible to hold out. Having set fire to the place, he and Orontobates made their escape, and crossed over to Coa. Memnon now formed the design of carrying the war into Greece, and attacking Macedonia. Darius had furnished him with large supplies of money. He collected a large force of mercenaries, and a fleet of 300 ships. At the head of this force he attacked and took Chios, and then proceeded to Lesbos. Here he captured several towns without difficulty, but was delayed for a considerable time in the reduction of Mytilene. At this place he was taken ill and died, B. C. 333. His death was an irreparable loss to the Persian cause; for several Greek states, and in particular the Spartans, hearing of his success and intentions, were prepared to join him, had he carried the war into Greece. According to Polyænus (v. 44. § 1) he was some time or other engaged in hostilities with Leucon, king of Bosphorus, who died B. C. 353. (Arrian, i. 12, 20—23, ii. 1; Diod. xvi. 34, 52, xvii. 7, 18, 23, 24, 29, 31; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 284.)

2. Governor of Thrace, who, while Alexander was absent in the East, seized the opportunity afforded by the disaster of Zopyrion, and revolted. The outbreak, however, was speedily suppressed by Antipater, B. C. 330. (Diod. xvii. 62.)

3. One of the demiurgi of the Achæans, at the time of the Roman embassy to the League. (Liv. xxxii. 22.) [C. P. M.]

MEMNON (Μέμνων), a Greek historical writer, a native probably of Heracleia Pontica. He wrote a large work on the history of that city, especially of the tyrants under whose power Heracleia had at various times fallen. Our knowledge of this work is derived from Photius. Of how many books it consisted we do not know. Photius had read from the ninth to the sixteenth inclusive, of which portion he has made a tolerably copious abstract. The first eight books he had not read, and he speaks of other books after the sixteenth. The ninth book begins with an account of the tyrant Clearchus, the disciple of Plato and Isocrates. The last event mentioned in the sixteenth book was the death of Brithagoras, who was sent by the Heracleians as ambassador to J. Caesar, after the latter had obtained the supreme power. From this Vossius supposes that the work was written about the time of Augustus; in the judgment of Orelli, not later than the time of Hadrian or the Antonines. It is, of course, impossible to fix the date with any precision, as we do not know at all down to what time the entire work was carried. The style of Memnon, according to Photius, was clear and simple, and the words well chosen. The Excerpta of Photius, however, contain numerous examples of rare and poetical expressions, as well as a few which indicate the decline of the Greek language. These Excerpta of Photius were first published separately, together with the remains of Ctesias and Agatharchides by H. Stephanus, Paris, 1557. The best edition is that by J. Conr. Orelli, Leipzig, 1816, containing, together with the remains of Memnon, a few fragments of other writers on Heracleia. There is a French translation of Photius's Excerpta in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, vol. xiv. (Phot. Cod. ccxxiv.; Voss. De Hist. Græciæ, ed. Westermann, p. 226; Fabric. Bibl. Græcæ vol. vii. p. 748; Groddeck, Initia Historiæ Græcorum Literariæ, ii. p. 74.) [C. P. M.]

MEMPHIS (Μέμψις). 1. A daughter of Neilus and wife of Epaphus, by whom she became the mother of Libya. The town of Memphis in Egypt was said to have derived its name from her. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4.) Others call her a daughter of the river-god Uchoreus, and add that by Neilus she became the mother of Egyptus. (Diod. i. 51.)

2. One of the daughters of Danaus (Apollod. ii. 1. § 5.) [L. S.]

MEN (Μην), or translated into Latin, Lunus, the god presiding over the months, was a Phrygian divinity. (Strab. xii. pp. 557, 577; Procl. in Plat. Tim. iv. 251; Spartian. Carac. 7.) [L. S.]

MENAECHMUS and SOIDAS (Μέναιχμος καὶ Σοῖδας), were the makers of the gold and ivory statue of the Laphrian Artemis, which Pausanias saw in the temple of that goddess in the citadel of Patrae in Achaia, whither it had been removed from Calydon by Augustus. The goddess was represented in the attitude of the chase. The artists were natives of Naupactus, and were supposed to have lived not much later than Canachus of Sicyon and Callon of Aegina. (Paus. vii. 18. § 6. a. 10, 11.) If so, they must have flourished about B. C. 500. [CALLON, CANACHUS.] Pliny quotes among the authorities for his 33d and 34th books, Menæchmus, a writer on the toreutic art, under which designation the chryselephantine statues were included. (Plin. H. N. Elench. xxxiii. xxxiv.) He also mentions (xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 18) a group by Menæchmus, of a calf pressed down by the knee, and with the neck doubled back (no doubt by some one about to sacrifice it, but this Pliny omits); and he adds that Menæchmus wrote upon his art. He does not expressly say what this art was, but of course we must consider this Menæchmus as the same person whom Pliny quotes as one of the authorities for this book of his work; and then again, since the subject on which he wrote was toreuticæ, it would follow, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that he was the same person as the artist mentioned by Pausanias.

Harduin (Index Auct.) and Thierach (Epochen, p. 202) are therefore almost certainly wrong in identifying Pliny's Menæchmus with the Menæchmus or Manaechmus of Sicyon, who wrote a work περὶ τεχνιτῶν (which means here actors, not artists, as Harduin and the rest evidently thought: see Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græcæ, p. 17), and also a history of Alexander the Great, and a book on Sicyon, and whom Suidas states to have flourished in the time of the successors of Alexander. (Suid. a. v.; Athen. ii. p. 65, a, vi. p. 271 d, xiv. p. 635 b, p. 637 f.; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. ii. 1, ix. 30; Vossius, de Hist. Græcæ, p. 102, ed. Westermann.) [P. S.]

MENALCIDAS (Μενάλκιδας), a Lacedæmonian adventurer, who, in some way not further specified by Polybius, took advantage of the circumstances of Egypt, in its war with Antiochus Epiphanes (B. C. 171—168), to advance his own interests at the Ptolemies' expence. He was thrown into prison by Philometor and Physcon, but was released by them in B. C. 168, at the request of C. Popilius Laenas, the Roman ambassador, who was sent to command Antiochus to withdraw from the country. (Polyb. xxx. 11; comp. Liv. xiv. 12, 13; Just. xxxiv. 2, 3; Val. Max. vi. 4. § 3.) In B. C. 150 we find Menalcidas, as general of the Achæan league, engaging for a bribe of ten talents to induce the Achæans to aid Oropus against Athens. By the promise of half the sum, he won Callicrates to the same cause, and they succeeded in carrying a decree for the succour required. No effectual service, however, was rendered to the Oropians, but Menalcidas still exacted the money he had agreed for, and then evaded the payment of his portion to Callicrates. The latter accordingly retaliated on him with a capital charge of having attempted to prevail on the Romans to sever Sparta from the league; and Menalcidas only escaped the danger through the protection of Diaeus, which he purchased with a bribe of three talents. [CALLICRATES, No. 4.] In B.C. 149 he supported at Rome, against Diaeus, the cause of the Lacedaemonian exiles. [DIANUS.] In B.C. 147, when the war between the Achaeans and Lacedaemonians had been suspended at the command of Caecilius Metellus, he persuaded his countrymen to break the truce, and seized and plundered Iasus, a subject town of the Achaeans on the borders of Laconia. The Lacedaemonians, soon repenting of their rashness, were loud in their outcry against their adviser; and he, driven to despair, put an end to his own life by poison, "having shown himself," says Pausanias, "as leader of the Lacedaemonians at that time, the most unskilful general; as leader of the Achaeans formerly, the most unjust of men." (Polyb. xl. 5; Paus. vii. 11, 12, 13, 16.) [E. E.]

MENALIPPUS (Μενάλιππος, an equivalent form to Μελένιππος), an architect, probably of Athens, who, in conjunction with the Roman architects, C. and M. Stallius, was employed by Ariobarzanes II. (Philopator), king of Cappadocia, to restore the Odeum of Pericles, which had been burnt in the Mithridatic war, in O.L. 173, B.C. 86-5. The exact date of the restoration is unknown; but Ariobarzanes reigned from B.C. 63 to about B.C. 51. (Böckh, Corp. Inscr. vol. i. No. 357; Vitruv. v. 9. 1.) [P. S.]

MENALIPPUS. [MELANIPPUS.]

MENANDER (Μένανδρος), an Athenian officer in the Syracusan expedition, was, together with Euthydemus, associated in the supreme command with Nicias, towards the end of the year B.C. 414. The operations of Menander and his colleague Euthydemus are narrated in the life of the latter. [Vol. II. p. 123, b.] (Thuc. vii. 16, 43, 69; Diod. xiii. 13; Plut. Nicias, c. 20.) It appears to have been this same Menander whom we find serving under Alcibiades in the campaign against Pharnabazus, in the winter of B.C. 409-408 (Xen. Hell. i. 2. § 16), and probably the same who was appointed, with Tydeus and Cephisodotus in B.C. 405, to share the command of the Athenian fleet with the generals who had been previously appointed—Conon, Philocles, and Adeimantus. He was therefore one of the commanders at the disastrous battle of Aegospotami; and he and Tydeus are especially mentioned as rejecting with contempt the advice of Alcibiades before the battle. (Id. ii. 1. §§ 16, 26.)

MENANDER (Μένανδρος). 1. An officer in the service of Alexander, one of those called ἐπαιῖτοι, but who held the command of a body of mercenaries. He was appointed by Alexander, during the settlement of the affairs of Asia made by that monarch when at Tyre (B.C. 331), to the government of Lydia, and appears to have remained at that post till the year 323, when he was commissioned to conduct a reinforcement of troops to Alexander at Babylon, where he arrived just before the king's last illness. (Arrian, Anab. iii. 6. § 12, vii. 23. § 2.) In the division of the provinces, after the death of Alexander, he received his former government of Lydia, of which he hastened to take possession. (Arrian, op. Phot. p. 69, b; Dexippus, ibid. p. 64, a; Justin. xiii. 4; Curt. x. 30. § 2; Diod. xviii. 3, erroneously has Melaeus instead.)

He appears to have early attached himself to the party of Antigonus, to whom he was the first to give information of the ambitious schemes of Perdiccas for marrying Cleopatra. (Arrian, op. Phot. p. 70, b.) In the new distribution of the provinces at Triparadeisus he lost his government of Lydia, which was given to Cleitus (Id. p. 72, a); but this was probably only in order that he might co-operate the more freely with Antigonus, as we find him commanding a part of the army of the latter in the first campaign against Eumenes (B.C. 320). The following year, on learning the escape of Eumenes from Nora, he advanced with an army into Cappadocia to attack him, and compelled him to take refuge in Cilicia. (Plut. Eum. 9; Diod. xviii. 59.) From this time no farther mention of Menander is found in history.

2. An officer appointed by Alexander to command a fortress in Bactria, whom he afterwards put to death for abandoning his post. (Plut. Alex. 57.)

3. A native of Laodiceia, who was a general of cavalry in the service of Mithridates, and figures on several occasions in the wars of that monarch. He was one of those selected to command the army under the king's son, Mithridates, which was opposed to Fimbria, B.C. 85 (Memnon, c. 34); and again in the operations against Lucullus, near Cabeira, he commanded a detachment of the army of Mithridates, which was destined to cut off a convoy of provisions guarded by Sornatias, but was defeated by that general with heavy loss. (Plut. Lucull. 17.) He afterwards fell a prisoner into the hands of Pompey, and was one of the captives who served to adorn his triumph. (App. Mithr. 117.) [E. H. B.]

MENANDER (Μένανδρος), king of Bactria, was, according to Strabo (xi. 11), one of the most powerful of all the Greek rulers of that country, and one of those who made the most extensive conquests in India. Plutarch tells us that his rule was mild and equitable, and that he was so popular with his subjects, that the different cities under his authority, after vying with each other in paying him funeral honours, insisted upon dividing his remains among them. (De Rep. Ger. p. 821.) Both these authors term him king of Bactria; but recent inquirers are of opinion that he did not reign in Bactria Proper, but only in the provinces south of the Paropamisus, or Indian Caucasus. (Lassen, Gesch. d. Bactr. Kön. p. 225, &c.; Wilson's Ariana, p. 282.) According to Strabo (l. c.), he extended his conquests beyond the Hyphasis or Sutlej, and made himself master of the district of Pattalene at the mouths of the Indus. These conquests appear to have been related by Trogus Pompeius in his forty-first book (see Prod. Lib. xli.), but they are omitted by Justin. The author of the Peripplus of the Erythraean sea, commonly ascribed to Arrian, tells us (p. 27, ed. Huds.) that silver coins of Menander and Apollodotus were still in circulation in his day among the merchants of Barygaza (Baroch); and they have been discovered in modern times in considerable numbers in the countries south of the Hindu Koosh, and even as far east as the Juma. (Wilson, p. 281.) The period of his reign is wholly uncertain. [E. H. B.]

MENANDER, A'RRRIUS, a Roman jurist, who lived under Septimius Severus and Antoninus Caracalla, the son of Severus. Caracalla succeeded his father A. n. 211. Menander was a Consiliarius, or a member of the Consilium of Caracalla, as appears from a passage of Ulpian (Dig. 4. tit. 4. s. 11. § 2), coupled with the fact that Ulpian wrote his Libri ad Edictum, which contain the passage just cited, under the reign of Caracalla. Aemilius Macer, who wrote in the time of Alexander Severus, cites Menander. There are six excerpts in the Digest from a work of Menander, entitled "Militaria, or De Re Militari;" and Macer, who wrote on the same subject, also cites Menander as an authority. [G. L.]

MENANDER (Μένανδρος), of ATHENS, the most distinguished poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Diopiteus and Hegesistrate, and flourished in the time of the successors of Alexander. He was born in Ol. 109. 3, or B.C. 342-1, which was also the birth-year of Epicurus; only the birth of Menander was probably in the former half of the year, and therefore in B.C. 342, while that of Epicurus was in the latter half, B.C. 341. (Suid. s. v.; Clinton, F. H. sub ann.) Strabo also (xiv. p. 526) speaks of Menander and Epicurus as συγχρόνοι. His father, Diopiteus, commanded the Athenian forces on the Hellespont in B.C. 342-341, the year of Menander's birth, and was defended by Demosthenes in his oration περὶ τῶν ἐν Χερσωνήσιν. (Anon. de Com. p. xii.) On this fact the grammarians blunder with their usual felicity, not only making Menander a friend of Demosthenes, which as a boy he may have been, but representing him as inducing Demosthenes to defend his father, in A.C. 341, when he himself was just born, and again placing him among the dicasts on the trial of Ctesiphon, in B.C. 330, when he was in his twelfth year. (Meineke, Menand. Reliq. p. xxiv.) Alexis, the comic poet, was the uncle of Menander, on the father's side (Suid. s. v. "Ἀλεξίς"); and we may naturally suppose, with one of the ancient grammarians (Anon. de Com. p. xii.), that the young Menander derived from his uncle his taste for the comic drama, and was instructed by him in its rules of composition. His character must have been greatly influenced and formed by his intimacy with Theophrastus and Epicurus (Alciph. Epist. ii. 4), of whom the former was his teacher (Diog. Laërt. v. 36), and the latter his intimate friend. That his tastes and sympathies were altogether with the philosophy of Epicurus is proved, among numerous other indications, by his epigram on "Epicurus and Themistocles." (Brunck, Anat. vol. i. p. 203, Anth. Pal. vii. 72, vol. i. p. 327, Jacobs.)

Χαίρε, Νεοκλείδα διδυμον γένος, δὺν δ' ἐμὲν ὕμῳ
Πατρίδα δουλοσύνας ῥύσας, δ' ὅ' ἀρρυσύνας.

From Theophrastus, on the other hand, he must have derived much of that skill in the discrimination of character which we so much admire in the Χαρακτήρες of the philosopher, and which formed the great charm of the comedies of Menander. His master's attention to external elegance and comfort he not only imitated, but, as was natural in a man of an elegant person, a joyous spirit, and a serene and easy temper, he carried it to the extreme of luxury and effeminacy. Phaedrus (v. 1. 11, 12) describes him, when paying his court to Demetrius Phalereus, thus:

"Unguento delibutus, vestitu adfluens, Veniebat gressu delicato et languido."

His personal beauty is mentioned by the anonymous writer on comedy (L. c.), though, according to Suidas, his vision was somewhat disturbed, σπαρδὸς τὰς ὀφθαλμοῦς, διδὸς δὲ τὸν νοῦν. He is represented in works of sculpture which still exist, and of one of which Schlegel gives the following description: "In the excellent portrait-statues of two of the most famous comedians, Menander and Posidippus (to be found in the Vatican), the physiognomy of the Greek New Comedy seems to me to be almost visibly and personally expressed. They are seated in arm chairs, clad with extreme simplicity, and with a roll in the hand, with that ease and careless self-possession which always marks the conscious superiority of the master in that maturity of years which befits the calm and impartial observation which comedy requires, but sound and active, and free from all symptoms of decay; we may discern in them that hale and pithy vigour of body which bears witness to an equally vigorous constitution of mind and temper; no lofty enthusiasm, but no folly or extravagance; on the contrary, the earnestness of wisdom dwells in those brows, wrinkled not with care, but with the exercise of thought, while, in the searching eye, and in the mouth, ready for a smile, there is a light irony which cannot be mistaken." (Dramatic Lectures, vii.) The moral character of Menander is defended by Meineke, with tolerable success, against the aspersions of Suidas, Alciphron, and others. (Menand. Reliq. pp. xxviii. xxix.) Thus much is certain, that his comedies contain nothing offensive, at least to the taste of his own and the following ages, none of the purest, it must be admitted, as they were frequently acted at private banquets. (Plut. de Fals. Pud. p. 531, b., Sympos. viii. p. 712, b.; Comp. Arist. et Men. p. 853, b.) Whether their being eagerly read by the youth of both sexes, on account of the love scenes in them, is any confirmation of their innocence, may at least be doubted. (Ovid. Trist. ii. 370.)

Of the actual events of Menander's life we know but little. He enjoyed the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus, whose attention was first drawn to him by admiration of his works. (Phaedrus, L. c.) This intimacy was attended, however, with danger as well as honour, for when Demetrius Phalereus was expelled from Athens by Demetrius Poliorcetes (B.C. 307), Menander became a mark for the sycophants, and would have been put to death but for the intercession of Telephorus, the son-in-law of Demetrius. (Diog. Laërt. v. 80.) The first Greek king of Egypt, Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, was also one of his admirers; and he invited the poet to his court at Alexandria; but Menander seems to have declined the proffered honour. (Plin. H. N. vii. 29. s. 31; Alciph. Epist. ii. 3, 4.) Suidas mentions some letters to Ptolemy as among the works of Menander.

The time of his death is differently stated. The same inscription, which gives the date of his birth, adds that he died at the age of fifty-two years, in the archonship of Philippus, in the 32nd year of Ptolemy Soter. Clinton shows that these statements refer to the year B.C. 292-1 (F. H. vol. ii. p. xv. and sub ann. 342, 291); but, to make up the fifty-two years, we must reckon in both extremes, 342 and 291. The date is confirmed by Eusebius (Chron.); by the anonymous writer on comedy (p. xii.), who adds that Menander died at Athens; by Apollodorus (ap. Aul. Gell. xvii. 4); and by Aulus

Gellius (xvii. 21). Respecting the manner of his death, all that we know is that an old commentator on Ovid applies the line (Ibis, 593)

"Comicus ut medius perit dum nabat in undis"

to Menander, and tells us that he was drowned while swimming in the harbour of Peiræus; and we learn from Alciphron (Epist. ii. 4) that Menander had an estate at Peiræus. He was buried by the road leading out of Peiræus towards Athens. (Paus. i. 2. § 2). There are two epigrams upon him in the Greek Anthology: the one an epitaph by Diodorus (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 188, Anth. Pal. vii. 370, vol. i. p. 413, Jacobs), the other anonymous. (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 268, Anth. Pal. ix. 187, vol. ii. p. 63, Jacobs.)

Notwithstanding Menander's fame as a poet, his public dramatic career, during his lifetime, was not eminently successful; for, though he composed upwards of a hundred comedies, he only gained the prize eight times. (Aul. Gell. xvii. 4; comp. Martial. v. 10.) His preference for elegant exhibitions of character above coarse jesting may have been the reason why he was not so great a favourite with the common people as his principal rival, Philemon, who is said, moreover, to have used unfair means of gaining popularity. (Gell. l. c.)

Menander appears to have borne the popular neglect very lightly, in the consciousness of his superiority; and once, when he happened to meet Philemon, he is said to have asked him, "Pray, Philemon, do not you blush when you gain a victory over me?" (Gell. l. c.; comp. Athen. xiii. p. 594, d.; Alciphron. Epist. ii. 5). The Athenians erected his statue in the theatre, but this was an honour too often conferred upon very indifferent poets to be of much value: indeed, according to Pausanias, he was the only distinguished comic poet of all whose statues had a place there. (Paus. i. 21. § 1; Dion Chrysost. Or. xxxi. p. 628, 13.)

The neglect of Menander's contemporaries has been amply compensated by his posthumous fame. His comedies retained their place on the stage down to the time of Plutarch (Comp. Men. et Arist. p. 854, b.), and the unanimous consent of antiquity placed him at the head of the New Comedy, and on an equality with the great masters of the various kinds of poetry. The grammarian Aristophanes assigned him the second place among all writers, after Homer alone (Brunck, Anal. vol. iii. p. 269). To the same grammarian is ascribed the happy saying, "Ὁ Μένανδρος, καὶ βίε, πόρεος ἀπ' οὐρανὸν πρότερον ἀμυμήσατο" (or, according to Scaliger's correction, πόρεος ἀρεμμήσατο). Among the Romans, besides the fact that their comedy was founded chiefly on the plays of Menander, we have the celebrated phrase of Julius Caesar, who addresses Terence as dimidiatus Menander. (Donat. Vit. Terent. p. 754.) Quintilian's high eulogy of him is well known (x. 1).

The imitations of Menander are at once a proof of his reputation and an aid in appreciating his poetic character. Among the Greeks, Alciphron and Lucian were, in various degrees, indebted to his comedies. (Meineke, p. xxxv.) Among the Romans, his chief imitators were Caecilius, Afranius, and Terentius. How much Caecilius was indebted to him may be conjectured from the titles of his plays, of which there are very few that are not taken from Menander. Respecting Afranius we have the well-known line of Horace (Epist. ii. 1. 57):—

"Dicitur Afrani toga convenisse Menandro."

Plautus was an exception, as we learn from the next line of Horace:—

"Plautus ad exemplar Siculi properare Epichami Dicitur;"

and his extant plays sufficiently show that the ruder energy of the old Doric comedy was far more congenial to him than the polished sententiousness of Menander, whom, therefore, he only followed in a few instances, one of the most striking of which is in the Cistellaria (i. 1. 91; comp. Meineke, Menand. Reliq. p. 208, Frag. Com. Græc. vol. iv. p. 243). With respect to Terence, the oft-repeated statement, that he was simply a translator of Menander, is an injustice to the latter. That Terence was indebted to him for all his ideas and very many of his lines, is true enough; but that from any one play of Terence we can form a fair notion of the corresponding play of Menander, is disproved by the confession of Terence himself (Prolog. in Andr.) that he compressed two of Menander's plays into one; while the coolness with which he defends and even boasts of the exploit, shows how little we can trust him as our guide to the poetical genius of Menander. The one merit of Terence was felicity of expression; he had not the power of invention to fill up the gaps left by the omissions necessary in adapting a Greek play for a Roman audience, and therefore he drew again upon the rich resources of his original. It was this mixing up of different plays that his contemporaries condemned when they said, "Contaminari non decere fabulas," and that Caesar pointed to by the phrase O dimidiatus Menander. In the epigram in which that phrase occurs, Caesar expressly intimates that the spirit of the Greek original had greatly evaporated in Terence:—

"Tu quoque, tu in summis, o dimidiatus Menander, Poneris, et merito, puri sermonis amator. Lenibus atque utinam scriptis adjunctis foret vis; Comica ut aequato virtus polleret honore Cum Græcia, neque in hac despectus parte jaceres. Unum hoc maceror et doleo tibi deesse, Terenti."

The following epigram is worth quoting by the side of Caesar's (Burmans, Anth. Lat. vol. i. p. 140):—

"Tu quoque, qui solus tecto sermone, Terenti, Conversum expressumque Latina voce Menandrum

In medio populi sedatis vocibus effert."

Still, the comedies of Terence are a valuable contribution to our knowledge of Menander, especially considering the scantiness of the extant fragments.

Meineke well remarks that the quality which Caesar missed in Terence was what the Greeks call τὸ παθητικόν, which Menander had with admirable art united with τὸ θητικόν. And thus the poetry of Menander is described as διὰ πολλὸν ἀγομένη παθὼν καὶ θηῶν by Plutarch, in his Comparison of Menander and Aristophanes (p. 853, d.), which is the most valuable of the ancient testimonies concerning our poet. The style of his language is described by an old grammarian as λέγεις λαλῶν καὶ ὑποκρινεῖς, which may be contrasted with another writer's description of the fiction of Philemon, as συνηρημένην καὶ οἷον ἀφαιλισμένην τοῖς συνδράμοις. (Meineke, pp. xxvi, xxxvii.)

To criticise the poetry of Menander is to describe the whole spirit and genius of the New Comedy, of which his plays may be safely taken as the normal representative. This has been done with a most masterly hand by Schlegel, in his seventh lecture, from which the following passage is quoted:—"The New Comedy, in a certain point of view, may indeed be described as the Old Comedy tamed down: but, in speaking of works of genius, tameness does not usually pass for praise. The loss incurred in the interdict laid upon the old, unrestricted freedom of mirth, the newer comedians sought to compensate by throwing in a touch of earnestness borrowed from tragedy, as well in the form of representation, and the connection of the whole, as in the impressions, which they aimed at producing. We have seen how tragic poetry, in its last epoch, lowered its tone from its ideal elevation, and came nearer to common reality, both in the characters and in the tone of the dialogue, but especially as it aimed at conveying useful instruction on the proper conduct of civil and domestic life, in all their several emergencies. This turn towards utility Aristophanes has ironically commended in Euripides. (Ran. 971—991.) Euripides was the forerunner of the New Comedy; the poets of this species admired him especially, and acknowledged him for their master. Nay, so great is this affinity of tone and spirit, between Euripides and the poets of the New Comedy, that apophthegms of Euripides have been ascribed to Menander, and vice versa. On the contrary, we find among the fragments of Menander maxims of consolation, which rise in a striking manner even into the tragic tone." (It may be added, that we have abundant testimony to prove that Menander was a great admirer and imitator of Euripides. An elaborate comparison of the parallel passages is instituted by Meineke in an Epimetrum to his Trag. Com. Græc. vol. iv. p. 705.)

"The New Comedy, therefore, is a mixture of sport and earnest. The poet no longer makes a sport of poetry and the world, he does not resign himself to a mirthful enthusiasm, but he seeks the sportive character in his subject, he depicts in human characters and situations that which gives occasion to mirth; in a word, whatever is pleasant and ridiculous."

Menander is remarkable for the elegance with which he threw into the form of single verses, or short sentences, the maxims of that practical wisdom in the affairs of common life which forms so important a feature of the New Comedy. Various "Anthologies" of such sentences were compiled by the ancient grammarians from Menander's works, of which there is still extant a very interesting specimen, in the collection of several hundred lines (778 in Meineke's edition), under the title of Γνώμαι μονόστιχοι. Respecting the collection entitled Μενάνδρου καὶ Φιλιστίνου σύγκρισις, see PHILISTION.

The number of Menander's comedies is stated at a few more than a hundred; 105, 108, and 109, according to different authorities. (Suid. s. v.; Anon. de Com. p. xii.; Donat. Vit. Ter. p. 753; Aul. Gell. xvii. 4.) We only know with certainty the date of one of the plays, namely, the Ὀργή, which was brought out in B.C. 321, when Menander was only in his twenty-first year. (Clinton, P. H. sub ann.; Meineke, p. xxx.) We have fragments of, or references to, the following plays, amounting in all to nearly ninety titles:—Ἀδελφοί (imitated by Terence, who, however, has mixed up with it the Συναποθήσκοντες of Diphilus), Ἀλκιεύς not Ἀλκι Ἀραρηίδης, Ἀλκιεύς, Ἀναστειμένη ἡ Μεσοστρία, Ἀνδρία (mixed up with the Περνθία in the Andria of Terence), Ἀνδρόγυνος ἡ Κρής, Ἀνεψιόι, Ἀπιστος, Ἀρήφφρος ἡ Ἀλητρίς, Ἀσπίς, Λύδων πενήτων, Ἀφροδίσια, Βαυγία, Γεωργός, Δακτύλιος, Δαρδανός, Δεισιδαίμων, Δημιουργός, Δίδυμοι, Δις ἐξαπατῶν, Δούσκολος, Ἐαυτὸν τιμωρούμενος (copied by Terence), Ἐγχειρίδιον, Ἐμπιτραμένη, Ἐπαγγελλόμενος, Ἐπικληρός, Ἐπιτρέποντες (the plot of which was similar to that of the Hecyra of Terence), Εὐνούχος (imitated by Terence, but with a change in the dramatis personæ), Ἐφέσιος, Ἡρίσχος, Ἡρώς, Θαῖς, Θερταλή, Θεοφρουμένη, Θεασαῖρος (translated into Latin by Lucius Lavinianus), Θρασυλέων, Ἰέρεια, Ἰμβρία, Ἰπποκόμος, Κατηφόρος, Καρίνη, Καρχηδόνιος (from which Plautus probably took his Roenius), Καταφευδόμενος, Κερκυραῖος, Κιθαριστής, Κνιδία, Κόλας (partly followed in the Eumachius of Terence), Κονιαζόμενοι (perhaps better Κωνιαζόμενοι), Κυβερνήται, Λευκαδία, Λοκροί, Μέθη, Μνησφόρητης, Μισογύνης (reckoned by Phrynichus the best of all Menander's comedies, Epil. p. 417), Μισοῦμενος (another of his best plays, Liban. Orat. xxxi. p. 701), Ναύκληρος, Νομοθέτης, Ξενολόγος, Ὀλυνθία, Ὀμοσπείριοι, Ὀργή, Παιδίον, Παλλὰς, Παρακαταθήκη, Περικεραμένη, Περνθία, Πλόκιον, Πρόγραμμα, Πρυγκαλῶν, Πωλούμενοι, Ραπίζομένη, Σαῦλα, Σικυνίως, Στρατιώται, Συναριστώσαι, Συνερώσα, Συνήφθοι, Τίτην, Τροφῶνιος, Τόβρια, Τμῆς, Τποβολιμαῖος ἡ Ἀγρικός, Φάνιος, Φάσμα, Φιλάδελφοι, Χαλκεία, Χαλκίς, Χίρα, Ψευδοπρακλῆς, Ψοφοδής. There are also about 500 fragments which cannot be assigned to their proper places. To these must be added the Γνώμαι μονόστιχοι, some passages of the Γνώμαι (or Σύγκρισις) Μενάνδρου καὶ Φιλιστίνου, and two epigrams, one in the Greek Anthology (quoted above), and one in the Latin version of Ausonius (Epig. 139). Of the letters to Ptolemy, which Suidas mentions, nothing survives, and it may fairly be doubted whether they were not, like the so-called letters of other great men of antiquity, the productions of the later rhetoricians. Suidas ascribes to him some orations, λόγους πλείστους καταλογίζην, a statement of which there is no confirmation; but Quintilian (x. l. § 70) tells us that some ascribed the orations of Charisius to Menander.

Of the ancient commentators on Menander, the earliest was Lynceus of Samos, his contemporary and rival [LYNCEUS]. The next was the grammarian Aristophanes, whose admiration of Menander we have spoken of above, and whose work, entitled παράλληλοι Μενάνδρου τε καὶ δρῶν ἐκλεψεν ἐκλογαί, is mentioned by Eusebius (Præp. Evæng. x. 3), who also mentions a work by a certain Latinus or Cratinus, περὶ τῶν οὐκ ἰδίων Μενάνδρου. Next comes Plutarch's Comparison of Menander and Aristophanes: next Soterides of Epidaurus, who wrote a σύμμημα εἰς Μενάνδρον (Eudoc. p. 387; Suid. vol. iii. p. 356); and lastly Homer, surnamed Sellius, the author of a work entitled περιχωαί τῶν Μενάνδρου δραμάτων. (Suid.

vol. ii. p. 690.) The Menandrian letters of Alciphron also contain some valuable information [ALCIPHROΝ]. They are printed by Meineke in his edition of Menander.

The fragments of Menander were first printed in the collection of Sententiae, chiefly from the New Comedy, by Morellius, Greek and Latin, Paris, 1553, 8vo. (see Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliograph.); next in the similar collection of Hertelius, Greek and Latin, Basel, 1560, 8vo.; next in that of H. Stephanus, Greek and Latin, with the Tractatus of Stephanus, De habendo Delectu Sententiarum quas γνῶμης a Graecis dicuntur, and the Dissertatio de Menandro of Greg. Gyradius, 1569 (this curiously shaped little volume, which is 4½ inches long, by scarcely 2 wide, contains extracts from several poets of the Middle and New Comedy); next, Menandri et Philistionis Sententiae Comparatae, Graeco, cur. Nic. Rigaltii, excud. R. Stephanus, 1613, 8vo.; Menandri et Philistionis CΥΤΚΠΙCIC, c. vera. Lat. et not. Rutgersii et D. Heinssii, 1618, 8vo. (in the Vur. Lect. of Rutgers); Menandri Fragmenta, Graec. et Lat. in H. Grotii Excerpta ex Trag. et Com. Graec. Paris, 1626, 4to.; Menandri Sententiae, in Winterton's Poet. Min. Graeco., Cantab. et Lond. 1653. The first attempt at a complete critical edition was the following:—Menandri et Philemonis Reliquiae, quotquot reperire potuerunt, Graece et Latine, cum notis Hug. Grotii et Joh. Clerici, &c., Amst. 1709, 8vo.: this edition was reprinted in 1732, 1752, 1771, and 1777, but has been very generally condemned. Since the publication of that work there has been no edition of Menander worthy of notice, except that his γνῶμης have had a place in the various collections of the gnomic poets, until the appearance of Meineke's Menandri et Philemonis Reliquiae, Berol. 1823, 8vo.: this admirable edition contains, besides the fragments, dissertations on the lives and writings of the two poets, and Bentley's emendations on the fragments. The fragments are reprinted by Meineke (with the annotations somewhat condensed) in the fourth volume of his Fragmenta Comicorum Graecorum, Berol. 1841, 8vo.; but in the first volume of that work, which contains the Historia Critica Comicorum Graecorum, he passes over the lives of Menander and Philemon, referring the reader to his former work. Meineke's collection has been also reprinted (carefully revised, and with the addition of a Latin version), by Dübner, as an appendix to the Aristophanes of Didot's Bibliotheca Scriptorum Graecorum, Paris, 1840, roy. 8vo. (For the works on Menander, see Hoffmann, Lexicon Bibliograph.: the chief authorities, besides Meineke, are Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 454–469; Bernhardt, Grundriss der Griechischen Litteratur, vol. ii. p. 1014; Müller, Grk. Lit.) [P. S.]

MENANDER, minor literary persons.

1. A rhetorician of Laodicea, on the river Lycus, wrote a commentary on the τέχνη of Hermogenes, and on the πορνογράματα of Miucianus, and other works. (Suid. s. v.)

2. Of Ephesus, an historian, wrote the acts of kings among the Greeks and the barbarians (ῥαὶ ἐπὶ ἐκδοῦν τῶν βασιλέων πρᾶξις παρὰ τοῖς Ἕλλησι καὶ βαρβάροις γενομένης), founded on the native chronicles of the respective countries, as we learn from Josephus, who preserves a considerable fragment of the work respecting Hiram, king of Tyre. (Joseph. c. Apion. i. 18.) He is also quoted by other authors. (Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 467, ed. Westermann.)

Menander of Pergamus, who wrote on Phoenician history, appears to have been the same person, on account of the resemblance of the fragment quoted from him by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 140) to that quoted by Josephus. (Comp. Taitian, adv. Graec. 58.) An historian of the same name, who wrote a work on Cyprus, is quoted in the Etymologicum Magnum, s. v. Σηπρεσία. (Vossius, l. c.)

3. Protector (Προστάτης, i. e. body-guard), the son of Euphrates of Byzantium, was a rhetorician and historical writer under the emperor Maurice, whose reign began in A. D. 581. He has left us an account of his own literary pursuits, in a fragment preserved by Suidas (s. v.). He continued the history of the Eastern Empire from the point where Agathias broke off, namely, the twenty-third year of Justinian, A. D. 558, down nearly to the death of Tiberius II. in A. D. 583. A considerable fragment of this history is preserved in the Elogia of embassies, published by Hoerschel, Aug. Vindob. 1603. Menander is often quoted by Suidas, and is mentioned by Theophylact of Simocatta (Hist. Mauric. i. 3), who continued his history, and by Constantinus Porphyrogenitus (Them. i. 2). According to Niebuhr (Descript. p. 281), he may be trusted as an historian, but his style is a close imitation of Agathias, varied by occasional ridiculous attempts at fine writing. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. pp. 540, 541; Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 329, ed. Westermann.) There is one epigram by him in the Greek Anthology. (Jacobs, vol. xiii. p. 916.)

A few insignificant writers of the same name are mentioned by Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 454) and Meineke (Menand. et Philem. Reliq. pp. xxxvii.—xxxix.) [P. S.]

MENAS (Μηνᾶς). 1. A Lacedaemonian, was one of the commissioners for ratifying the fifty years' truce between Athens and Sparta in A. C. 421, and also the separate treaty of alliance between these states in the same year. (Thuc. v. 19, 24.)

2. A Bithynian, whom Prusias II. (Πρωμαχίδης), sent to Rome in B. C. 149, to join with Nicomedes (son of Prusias) in an application to the senate to remit the remainder of the sum which they had compelled him to engage to pay to Attalus II. of Pergamus in A. C. 154. The counter-representations, however, of Andronicus, the enemy of Attalus, prevailed, and the senate decided against Prusias. In the event of failure, Menas had received a command from Prusias to put Nicomedes to death, in order to make way for his sons by a second wife; but he shrunk from doing so, and entered into a conspiracy with Nicomedes and Andronicus against his master, inducing the 2000 soldiers whom Prusias had sent with him, to transfer their allegiance to Nicomedes. (App. Mithr. 4, 5; comp. Just. xxxiv. 4; Liv. Epist. 50; Polyb. xxxiii. 11, xxxvii. 2; Diod. xxxii. Etym. iv. p. 523.) [E. E.]

MENAS (Μηνᾶς), a freedman of Pompey the Great and of Sextus Pompeius. Appian calls him MENODORUS (Μηνόδορος), a name which he may not improbably have taken on his manumission. (See Dyer in the Classical Museum, vol. 2. p. 218.) In A. C. 40, Sextus Pompeius, being then in alliance with Antony against Octavian, sent out Menas with a large squadron of ships and foot legions, with which he took Sardinia, and gained over two legions that were stationed there. Sardinia was soon after recaptured by Helenus, a favourite freedman of Octavian's; but Menas, in the same year (A.C. 40), was again entrusted by Sextus with a fleet to carry on operations against Octavian and Antony, who had just been reconciled to one another; and in this expedition he ravaged the Etrurian coast, and once more gained possession of Sardinia; but, wishing to secure a refuge in the protection of Octavian should circumstances make it desirable, he sent back to him Helenus and several other prisoners without ransom. In A.C. 39 he tried in vain to dissuade his master from concluding a peace with Octavian and Antony; and, at an entertainment given to them by Sextus on board his ship at Misenum, Menas suggested to him to cut the cables of the vessel, and, running it out to sea, despatch both his rivals. The treacherous proposal, however, was rejected by Pompeius. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 30. 36—38; Appian, B. C. v. 56, 66, 70—73; Plut. Ant. 32; Vell. Pat. ii. 73, 77.) Meanwhile Pompey's suspicions of the fidelity of Menas had been excited by his dismissal of Helenus and his communication with Octavian, and had been further fomented by the representations of certain persons who were envious of his power in Sardinia. He therefore sent for him early in A.C. 38, on pretence of requiring an account of the provisions and money which he had had to administer. But Menas put all the messengers to death, and covenanted with Octavian to surrender to him the island, together with the whole force, military and naval, under his command. Octavian gladly embraced his offer, and not only refused to give him up, according to Dion, on the application of Sextus, but treated him with great distinction, advanced him to the equestrian order, and, investing him with the authority of legate under Calvisius Sabinus, placed him in command of the ships which he had himself brought over. In this capacity he was engaged in the naval campaign towards the end of A.C. 38, which was on the whole disastrous to Octavian, but in which Menas did good service, and, through his skilful seamanship, saved the ships entrusted to him from destruction by a storm which shattered a great portion of the fleet. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 45—48; Appian, B. C. v. 77—90.) Just before the re-commencement of hostilities between Sextus and Octavian, in A.C. 36, Menas again played the deserter, and returned to his old master's service, not only because the last campaign may have given him reason to think that the stronger side, but also because he was indignant at having merely a subordinate command assigned to him. In the operations which ensued, he gained some advantages over the enemies' ships; and having raised an impression that, formidable as an opponent, he might be equally useful as an ally, he again revolted to Octavian, being especially offended at not having been reinstated in his former command by Pompeius, under whose suspicion he felt uneasy. Octavian received him gladly, but continued to regard him with distrust. In A.C. 35 he accompanied his patron on his expedition to the north-eastern coast of the Adriatic, and was slain in the Pannonian campaign at the siege of Siscia. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 54, xlix. 1, 37; Appian, B. C. v. 96, 100, 101.)

vehemently attacked by Horace in his fourth epode was no other than the subject of the present article. This statement has been called in question by many modern commentators; but their arguments, drawn exclusively from internal evidence, are far from satisfactory. The discussion of the point is, in this place, impossible, connected as it is with the vexata questio of the chronology of the poems of Horace. For the literature of the subject, see above, Vol. II. p. 522, and comp. Classical Museum, vol. ii. pp. 207—209, 217—221. [E. E.]

MENDEIS. [SITHON.]

MENDES (Μένδης), an Egyptian divinity, worshipped in the town of Mendes. He is said to have resembled the Arcadian Pan. (Herod. ii. 46; Strab. xvii. pp. 802, 812.) [L. S.]

MENE (Μήνη), a female divinity presiding over the months. (Hom. Hymn. xii. 1; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 533, iv. 55; August. De Civ. Dei. vii. 2.) [L. S.]

MENECLIDAS (Μενεκλίδης), a Theban orator, was one of those who joined Pelopidas in delivering Thebes from Sparta and the oligarchical government in A.C. 379. After this, however, finding himself eclipsed by Pelopidas and Epaminondas, he strove in every way to bring them into discredit with their countrymen, and, in particular, he took part in the prosecution against them for having retained their command beyond the legal time in the campaign of A.C. 369. Being further exasperated by their acquittal, he continued his rancorous attacks on them; and, as he was a powerful speaker, he so far succeeded against Epaminondas as to exclude him from the office of Boeotarch. Against Pelopidas his efforts were of no avail, and he therefore endeavoured, in the true spirit of envy, to throw his merits into the shade, by advancing and exaggerating those of Charon. The latter had been successful in a slight skirmish of cavalry just before the great battle of Leuctra (A.C. 371), and Meneclidas brought forward a decree for commemorating the exploit by a picture, to be dedicated in one of the temples, and inscribed with Charon's name. For this he was impeached by Pelopidas, on the ground that the honour of all victories belonged, not to any individual, but to the state. He was found guilty and fined; and his inability to pay the penalty led him afterwards to enter into revolutionary designs against his country. (Plut. Pelop. 25. See Vol. II. p. 23, a.) [E. E.]

MENECLÉS (Μενεκλῆς). 1. Of Barce in Cyrene, is mentioned by Athenæus (iv. p. 184) simply as an historian, and is perhaps the same as the one whose work in another passage (ix. p. 390) he mentions under the title of συγγραφή. There also existed an historical work on Athens (περὶ Ἀθηνῶν), the authorship of which was doubtful, even in antiquity, some attributing it to Meneclés, and others to Callistratus (Harpocrat. s. v. Κεραμικός, ἐκατόμυροδον; Etym. Magn. s. v. Διολεῖς; Harpocrat., Phot., Suid. s. v. Ἐρμαῖ). But it is scarcely probable that this historian of Athens should be the same as Meneclés of Barce. It is more likely that the Barcean is identical with the author of a work on the history of Libya, who is mentioned in an anonymous treatise, De Mulieribus Bello clavis, § 10, which is printed in the Bibliothek der Alt. Lit. und Kunst, vi. p. 21. It is highly probable that the Meneclés of Barce was also the author of a work from which a fragment concerning Battus of Cyrene, is still extant. (Schol. ad Pind.

Psch. iv. 10; Tzet. ad Lyc. 886; Schol. Hom. Il. v. 640.)

2. Of Alabanda, a celebrated rhetorician, who lived shortly before the time of Cicero. He and his brother Hierocles taught rhetoric at Rhodes, where the orator M. Antonius heard them, about B.C. 94. They both belonged to the Asiatic or florid school of eloquence, which was distinguished more for pomp and elegance of diction, than for precision of thought. But the two brothers enjoyed extraordinary reputation, for Cicero says that they were imitated by all Asia. (Cic. Brut. 95, Orat. 69, de Orat. ii. 23; Strab. xiv. p. 661.) [L.S.]

MENE'CRATES (Μενεκράτης), a freedman of Sextus Pompeius, was sent out by him as commander of a large squadron of ships, in B.C. 38, to act against Calvisius Sabinus (Octavian's admiral) and MENAS, the renegade. The fleets came to an engagement off Cumae, and Menecrates had the advantage over the enemy in manoeuvring; but burning with hatred against Menas, he attacked and grappled with the ship in which he sailed, and though disabled by a severe wound, continued to encourage his men until he saw that the enemy was on the point of capturing his vessel. He then threw himself overboard and perished. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 46; Appian, B. C. v. 81, 82.) [E.E.]

MENE'CRATES (Μενεκράτης). 1. A comic poet, mentioned only by Suidas, who says ᾠδματα αὐτοῦ Μενέκτωρ ἢ Ἐπιμνεύς, where the plural ᾠδματα suggests the alteration of ἦ to καί. Μενέκτωρ is obviously an abbreviation of Μένους Ἐκκωρ, a title which seems to belong to the Middle Comedy. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 469; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 493.)

2. Of Smyrna, the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology (Brunck, Anal. vol. i. p. 476; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. p. 227), is not improbably the same as Menecrates of Ephesus, a poet mentioned by Varro, de Re Rustica, i. 1. (See Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. xiii. pp. 916, 917.) [P.S.]

MENE'CRATES, a sculptor, of whom we only know, what shows him, however, to have been a very eminent artist, that he was the teacher of Apollonius and Tauriscus, the sculptors of the celebrated group of the Farnese Bull. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10.) [P.S.]

MENE'CRATES (Μενεκράτης), a Syracusan physician at the court of Philip, king of Macedon, B.C. 359—336. He seems to have been a successful practitioner, but to have made himself ridiculous by calling himself "Jupiter," and assuming divine honours. (Suid. s. v. Μενεκράτης.) He once wrote a letter to Philip, beginning Μενεκράτης Ζεὺς φιλικῶς χαίρειν, to which the king wrote back an answer in these words, Φίλικτος Μενεκράτης ὕγιαίνειν.* (Athen. vii. p. 289; Aelian. Var. Hist. xii. 51.) He was invited one day by Philip to a magnificent entertainment, where the other guests were sumptuously fed, while he himself had nothing but incense and libations, as not being subject to the human infirmity of hunger. He was at first pleased with his reception, but afterwards, perceiving the joke and finding that no more substantial food was offered him, he left the party in disgust. (Athen. Aelian, l. c.)

2. TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS QUIRINA (Κουίρνατος) MENE'CRATES, a physician mentioned in a Greek inscription (Gruter, Inscript. p. 581. § 9), is no doubt the same person who is frequently quoted by Galen. He lived in the former part of the first century after Christ, and was physician to some of the emperors, probably to Tiberius and Claudius. He enjoyed a great reputation, and composed more than 150 medical works, of which only a few fragments remain. He was the inventor of the well-known plaster called diachylon (i. e. διὰ χυλίου), and his directions for preparing it were put into verse by Damocrates. (Galen. de Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. vii. 9, 10, vol. xiii. pp. 993, &c.) In consequence of his having observed how easily the signs and contractions used in medical formulae were mistaken by careless transcribers, he wrote the quantities, &c. in his prescriptions at full length; but Galen tells us (l. c.) that his carelessness did not much benefit posterity, as his works were afterwards written with the usual contractions. The Menecrates Zeophletensis (or native of Zeophleta?) quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Chron. i. 4, p. 323) may be the same person as the preceding. [W.A.G.]

MENEDAEUS or MENE'DATUS (Μενεδαῖος, Μενέδατος), a Spartan, was one of the three leaders of the Peloponnesian force which was sent to aid the Aetolians in the reduction of Naupactus, in B.C. 426. The place, however, was saved by Demosthenes, with the help of the Acarnanians. In the same year Menedaeus was engaged in the expedition against Amphilocheian Argos; and after the death of his two colleagues, Eurlochus and Macarius, at the battle of Olpae, he concluded with Demosthenes and the Acarnanian generals a secret agreement, by which the Peloponnesians were permitted to withdraw in safety, leaving their allies, the Ambraciots, to their fate. (Thuc. iii. 100—102, 105—111.) [E.E.]

MENEDE'MUS, historical. 1. One of the generals of Alexander the Great, who was sent against Spitamenes, but was surprised and slain, together with 2000 foot-soldiers and 300 horse. (Arrian. iv. 3. § 15; Curt. vii. 7, 9.)

2. A native of Alabanda, the leader of part of the forces of Antiochus in Coele Syria. (Polyb. v. 69, 79, 82.)

3. Chief of that part of Macedonia which bore the name of Libera. He took part with Caesar in the civil war B.C. 48. (Caes. B. C. iii. 34.) He is probably the same with the Menedemus mentioned by Cicero with considerable aversion as a friend of Caesar (Philipp. xiii. 16, ad Att. xv. 2, 4.) [C.P.M.]

MENEDE'MUS (Μενέδημος), historical. 1. A citizen of high rank at Crotona, who was appointed one of the generals to carry on the war against the exiles that had been driven from the city on occasion of the war with Syracuse in B.C. 317. Together with Paron, his colleague in the command, he totally defeated the exiles and their auxiliaries, and put them all to the sword. (Diod. xii. 10.) It appears that he subsequently raised himself to the supreme power in his native city; and in that position entered into friendly relations with Agathocles; notwithstanding which the latter took an opportunity to make himself master of Crotona, by a sudden and treacherous attack. (Id. xxi. Erc. Hoersch p. 490.) This must have been about 295 B. C.

2. A general of the Rhodians, who, during the siege of Rhodes by Demetrius Poliorcetes (B. C. 305—304), intercepted and took many ships that were bringing provisions and supplies to Demetrius, including one containing presents for the king himself from Phila, which were immediately sent to Ptolemy in Egypt. (Diod. xx. 93; Plut. Demetr. 22.)

3. A friend and attendant of Lucullus, who was thought to have saved the life of that general during the war against Mithridates, by refusing to admit a Scythian chief named Olthacus into the tent where Lucullus was sleeping. (Plut. Lucull. 16; Appian. Mithr. 79.) [E. H. B.]

MENEDEMUS (Μενέδημος), literary. 1. A Greek philosopher, a native of Eretria, the son of a man named Cleisthenes, who, though of noble birth, belonging to the family of the Theopropidae, was poor, and worked for a livelihood either as a builder or as a tent-maker, both which trades were learnt and practised by Menedemus. According to Diogenes Laërtius, he seized the opportunity afforded by his being sent on some military service to Megara to hear Plato, and abandoned the army to addict himself to philosophy. But it may be questioned whether he was old enough to have heard Plato before the death of the latter; if the duration of his life as given by Diogenes is accurate, it would have been impossible, for at the time of Plato's death he would have been only about four years old. Ritter considers the account to have arisen from a confusion of names. According to the story in Athenaeus (iv. p. 168), he and his friend Asclepiades got their livelihood as millers, working during the night, that they might have leisure for philosophy in the day. Menedemus and his friend Asclepiades afterwards became disciples of Stilpo at Megara. From Megara they went to Elia, and placed themselves under the instruction of some disciples of Phaedo. On his return to Eretria Menedemus established a school of philosophy, which was called the Eretriac. He did not, however, confine himself to philosophical pursuits, but took an active part in the political affairs of his native city, and came to be the leading man in the state, though at first he had been regarded with contempt and dislike. He went on various embassies to Ptolemaeus (probably Ptolemaeus Ceraunus), to Lysimachus, and to Demetrius, and seems to have done his native city good service by procuring for it a remission of part of the tribute paid to Demetrius, and opposing the machinations of his emissaries. At some period of his life he visited Cyprus, and greatly incensed the tyrant Nicocreon by the freedom of his remarks. The story of his having been in Egypt and having something to do with the making of the Septuagint version, which is found in Aristæas, is no doubt erroneous. He was in high favour with Antigonus Gonatas, and induced the Eretrians to address to him a public congratulation after his victory over the Gauls. This led to his being suspected of the treacherous intention of betraying Eretria into the power of Antigonus. According to one account, these suspicions induced him to quit Eretria secretly and take refuge in the sanctuary of Amphiaræus, at Oropus. But some golden vessels belonging to the temple having been lost while he was there, the Boeotians compelled him to leave it. He then betook himself to the court of Antigonus, where he shortly after died of grief. According to another account, he went from Eretria to Antigonus for the purpose of inducing him to interfere to establish the freedom of his native city; but not succeeding, starved himself to death in the 74th year of his age, probably about the year B. C. 277.

As a teacher, his intercourse with his disciples was marked by the entire absence of all formality and restraint, though he seems to have been noted for the sternness with which he rebuked all kinds of dissoluteness and intemperance; inasmuch, that the fear of incurring his censure seems occasionally to have acted as a salutary check. He lived with his friend Asclepiades, between whom and himself there existed an intimacy which resembled that of Pyllades and Orestes. For the latter part of his life, at any rate, he seems to have lived in considerable affluence. Athenaeus (x. p. 419) and Diogenes Laërtius give a somewhat curious account of the convivial usages established at his entertainments. Menedemus was twice married. He and Asclepiades married daughter and mother. His first wife he divorced when he rose to distinction in the government of Eretria, that he might marry one of rank and wealth, though the management of the household was still left to the former wife, whom Asclepiades married, his first wife being dead. By his wife Oropia, Menedemus had three daughters. He was remarkable in his old age for his bodily strength and vigour. He is reported to have been of a somewhat superstitious turn of mind.

Epicrates, in a passage quoted by Athenaeus (ii. p. 59), classes Menedemus with Plato and Spensippus; but it appears, from Diogenes Laërtius, that his opinion of Plato and Xenocrates was not very high. Of Stilpo he had a great admiration.

Of the philosophy of Menedemus little is known, except that it closely resembled that of the Megarian school. [EUCLEIDES.] Its leading feature was the dogma of the oneness of the Good, which he carefully distinguished from the Useful.

All distinctions between virtues he regarded as merely nominal. The Good and the True he looked upon as identical. In dialectics he rejected all merely negative propositions, maintaining that truth could be predicated only of those which were affirmative, and of these he admitted only such as were identical propositions. He was a keen and vehement disputant, frequently arguing, if we may believe Antigonus Carystius, as quoted by Diogenes, till he was black in the face. In his elocution he was not easy to be understood. He never committed any of his philosophical doctrines to writing. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 125—144; Athen. i. c.; Cic. Academ. ii. 42; Plut. De Adv. et Amici Disc. p. 55, c.; Strab. ix. p. 393, c.; Ritter, Geschichte der Philosophie, book vii. c. 5.)

2. A Cynic philosopher, or rather fanatic, a disciple of Colotes of Lampacæus. He used to go about garbed as an Erinny, proclaiming himself a sort of spy from the infernal regions. (Diog. Laërt. vi. 102.) Suidas (s. v. φαίος) relates the same of Menippus, probably by mistake.

3. If the text of Aulus Gellius be correct (xiii.

5), a distinguished disciple of Aristotle, a native of Rhodes, bore the name Menedemus.

4. An Athenian rhetorician, who came to Rome and taught there in the time of L. Crassus the orator. (Cic. de Orat. i. 19.) [C. P. M.]

MENE LA'US (Μενέλαος, Μενέλαος, or Μενέλας), a son of Atreus, and younger brother of Agamemnon and Anaxibia. He was king of Lacedaemon, and married to the beautiful Helen, by whom he was the father of Hermione and Megapenthes (Hom. Il. vii. 470, x. 37, Od. iv. 11, &c. xi. 469; comp. AGAMEMNON). When his wife Helen had been carried off by Paris, Menelaus and Odysseus set out to Troy to claim her back. Menelaus was hospitably treated by Antenor (Hom. Il. iii. 206), but the journey was of no avail, and the Trojan Antimachus even advised his fellow-citizens to kill Menelaus and Odysseus (xi. 139, &c.). In order, therefore, to avenge the rape of Helen, and to punish the offender, Menelaus and his brother resolved to march against Troy with all the forces that Greece could muster (i. 159, ii. 589, iii. 351, &c.). The two brothers, in their travels through Greece to rouse the chiefs to avenge the insult offered to a Greek prince, also visited Odysseus in Ithaca (Hom. Od. xxiv. 115), along with whom Menelaus is said to have consulted the Delphic oracle about the expedition against Troy; and at Delphi he dedicated the necklace of Helen to Athena Pronoea (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1466). Hereupon Menelaus in sixty ships led the inhabitants of Lacedaemon, Pharis, Sparta, Messe, Bryseiae, Amyclae, Helos, Laas, and Oetylus, against Troy (Il. ii. 581, &c.). In Troas he was under the special protection of Hera and Athena, and one of the most gallant heroes (iv. 8, 129, v. 715), who slew many Trojans, such as Scamandrius (v. 50), Pylaemenus (v. 576), Peisander (xiii. 614, &c.), Dolops (xv. 541), Thoas (xvi. 311), Euphorbus (xvii. 45), and Podes (xvii. 575).

We shall pass over his minor exploits, and mention only his engagement with Paris. When Menelaus saw his chief enemy stepping forth from the Trojan ranks, he rejoiced like a lion at the sight of a stag, and leaped from his chariot to attack him (Il. iii. 27, &c.); but Paris took to flight, until, encouraged by Hector, he challenged Menelaus to decide the contest for the possession of Helen and the treasures by single combat (iii. 97, &c.). Menelaus accepted the challenge, and his spear penetrated the shield of Paris, but did not wound him. Menelaus thereupon drew his sword, which, however, broke on the shield of his opponent. He then seized him by the helmet, and dragged him to the camp of the Achaeans. But Aphrodite loosened the helmet and wrapped her favourite in a cloud, in which he escaped from his enemy (iii. 325, &c., iv. 12, &c.). At the funeral games of Patroclus, Menelaus fought with Antilochus in the chariot race, but voluntarily gave up the second prize, and was satisfied with the third (xxiii. 293, 401, 516—609). Menelaus also was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse (Od. iv. 280; comp. Virg. Aen. ii. 264); and, along with Odysseus, he hastened to the house of Deiphobus, as soon as the town was taken (Od. viii. 518; Virg. Aen. vi. 523). After the destruction of Troy, he advised the assembled Achaeans to return home, which involved him in a dispute with his brother (Od. iii. 141, &c.). He was among the first that sailed away from Troy, accompanied by his wife Helen and Nestor (Od. iii. 276). When near the coast of Attica, his steersman Phrontis died, and Menelaus was detained some time by his burial. When he reached Maleia, Zeus sent a storm, in which part of his ships were thrown on the coast of Crete, and five others and Menelaus himself landed in Egypt (iii. 278; comp. Paus. x. 25. § 2). After this he wandered about for eight years in the eastern parts of the Mediterranean, where he visited Cyprus, Phoenicia, the Ethiopians, the Erembians, and Libya. These Eastern people were not so inhospitable as those in the West who were visited by Odysseus, and on his return home Menelaus brought with him a large number of presents which he had received (Od. iii. 301, 312, iv. 90, 128, 131, 228, 617; comp. Herod. ii. 113, 116). His last stay on his wanderings was in the island of Pharos, near the coast of Egypt, where he remained twenty days (Od. iv. 355), being kept back by the gods. Hunger already began to affect his companions, and his steersman Canobus died (Strab. p. 801). Eidothea, the daughter of Proteus, advised him to seize her father, who would reveal to him the means of returning home. Proteus, when caught, told him that he must first return to Egypt and propitiate the gods with hecatombs. This Menelaus did, and having there erected a monument to his brother, whose death he learned from Proteus, he, next to Odysseus, the last of the heroes, returned home, and arrived at Sparta on the very day on which Orestes was engaged in burying Clytaemnestra and Aegisthus (Od. iv. 365; comp. i. 286, iii. 257, 311). Henceforward he lived with Helen at Sparta in peace, comfort, and wealth, and his palace shone in its splendour like the sun or the moon (iv. 45, 72, 80; comp. Paus. iii. 14. § 6). At the time when Telemachus came to him to inquire after his father, Menelaus was just solemnising the marriage of his daughter Hermione with Neoptolemus, and of his son Megapenthes with a daughter of Alector (iv. 1, &c.). According to the Homeric poems Menelaus was a man of an athletic figure; he spoke little, but what he said was always impressive; he was brave and courageous, but milder than Agamemnon, intelligent and hospitable. According to the prophecy of Proteus, Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium (iv. 561); but according to a later tradition, he and Helen went to the Taurians, where they were sacrificed by Iphigeneia to Artemis (Ptolem. Geogr. 4). Menelaus was worshipped as a hero at Therapne, where also his tomb and that of Helen were shown (Paus. iii. 19. § 9). On the chest of Cypselus he was represented at the moment when, after the taking of Troy, he was on the point of killing Helen. (Paus. v. 18. § 1; comp. Millingen. Inedit. Monum. i. 32). [HELENA.] [L. S.]

MENE LA'US (Μενέλαος), historical, 1. Father of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and grandfather of Philip of Macedon, according to Justin (vii. 4) and Aelian (V. H. xii. 43).<sup>a</sup> But there is much discrepancy on this point: Dexippus (ap. Syncell. p. 263, a) calls the father of Amyntas Arrhidæus; and Diodorus (xv. 60), Tharraleoa. Justin represents him as brother of Alexander the First, king of Macedonia, which is a gross error. (See Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 225.)

2. A son of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, by his wife Gygaia. (Justin. vii. 4.) According to Justin, he was put to death by his step-brother Philip, after the capture of Olynthus, A.C. 347. (Id. viii. 3.)

3. Son of Lagos, and brother of Ptolemy Soter. His name does not occur among the officers or generals of Alexander during the lifetime of that monarch, though it is incidentally mentioned by Phylarchus (op. Athen. xii. p. 539, d.) in terms that would seem to imply that he then already occupied a distinguished position. (See also Aelian, F. H. ix. 3.) The first occasion on which he appears in history is in A.C. 315, when he was appointed by his brother to the chief command of the forces despatched to Cyprus, where they were destined to co-operate with the fleet of Seleucus, and with Nicocreon, king of Salamis. (Diod. xix. 62.) By their combined efforts, they soon reduced all the cities of Cyprus to subjection, with the exception of Citium; and that also, it would appear, must have ultimately submitted. Menelaus now remained in the island, which he governed with almost absolute authority, the petty princes of the several cities being deposed, imprisoned, or assassinated on the slightest symptom of disaffection. He still held the chief command in 306, when Demetrius Poliorcetes arrived in Cyprus with a powerful fleet and army. Unable to contend with this formidable antagonist in the open field, Menelaus drew together all his forces, and shut himself up within the walls of Salamis, which he prepared to defend to the utmost. But having risked an action under the walls of the town, he was defeated with much loss; and Demetrius pressed the siege with his wonted vigour. Menelaus, however, succeeded in burning his battering engines; and by the most strenuous exertions, made good his defence until the arrival of Ptolemy himself, with a powerful fleet, to the relief of the island. In the great sea-fight that ensued, Menelaus sent a squadron of sixty ships to assist Ptolemy; but though these succeeded in forcing their way out of the harbour of Salamis, they came too late to retrieve the fortune of the day; and the total defeat of the Egyptian fleet having extinguished all his hopes of succour, he immediately afterwards surrendered the city of Salamis, with all his forces, both military and naval, into the hands of Demetrius. The conqueror, with characteristic magnanimity, sent him back to Egypt, accompanied by his friends, and carrying with him all his private property. (Diod. xix. 62, 79, xx. 21, 47—53; Plut. Demetr. 15—17; Justin. xv. 2; Paus. i. 6, § 6.) From this time we hear no more of Menelaus. There is a coin, attributed to him, which must have been struck during the period of his occupation of Cyprus. (Borrell, Notice de Quelques Médailles des Rois de Chypre, p. 64.)

4. Onias, son of Simon, who was made high-priest of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes, assumed the name of Menelaus. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 5. § 1.) [E. H. B.]

MENELA'US (Μενέλαος), literary. 1. Of Anaea in Caria, is called by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. 'Avalea) a peripatetic philosopher, and a great historian, but is otherwise unknown.

2. Of Maratho in Phoenicia, a Greek rhetorician, whose assistance C. Sempromius Gracchus was said to have used in composing his speeches. (Cic. Brut. 26.)

3. Of Aegae, an epic poet, who among other works which are not specified, wrote an epic poem, Thebais (Θηβαίς), consisting, according to Suidas, of twelve, and according to Eudocia, of thirteen books. As Longinus mentioned Menelaus with praise, he must have lived before A. D. 273, for in that year Longinus died (Waltz, Rhet. Græc. vi. p. 93; Ruhnken, Dissert. de Viti et Script. Longini, 30, &c. ed. Toupinus). The first five books of this epic are referred to by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Τέμυξ, Τρίμιν, Ἀμφιγύνηα, Λύκαια, Εὐθροίης), but no fragments of any importance have come down to us. [L. S.]

MENELA'US (Μενέλαος), a Greek mathematician, a native of Alexandria, the author of a treatise in three books, on the Sphere, which is comprised in the mathematical collection called μικρὸς ἀστρονόμος, or μικρὸς ἀστρονομικός. Menelaus is mentioned by Pappus, Proclus, and Ptolemaeus, who, in his Magna Synaxis (p. 170), says that he made some astronomical observations at Rome in the first year of the emperor Trajan (A. D. 98). He is probably the same with the Menelaus introduced by Plutarch in his dialogue De Facie in Orbe Lunæ, p. 930. Besides his work on the Sphere, Menelaus wrote a treatise "On the Quantity and Distinction of Mixed Bodies." Both works were translated into Syriac and Arabic. A Latin translation of the treatise on the Sphere was published at Paris in 1644; and it was also published by Marinus Mercennus in his Synopsis Mathematica, Paris, 1644. This edition contained many additions and interpolations. A more correct edition was published at Oxford by Halley, a reprint of which, with a preface by G. Costard, appeared in 1758. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. pp. 16, 23.) [C. P. M.]

MENELA'US, a pupil of Stephanus, was the sculptor of a marble group in the villa Ludovisi at Rome, which bears the inscription ΜΕΝΕΛΑΟΣ ΣΤΕΦΑΝΟΣ ΜΑΘΗΤΗΣ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. The group, which consists of a male and female figure, the size of life, has been differently explained. It used to be taken to refer to the story of Papirius and his mother. (Aul. Gell. i. 23.) Thiersch maintains that it is impossible not to recognise the Roman matron in the female figure, and in both the expression of maternal and filial love; and he supposes that it represents some scene from the family life of the Caesars, probably Octavia and Marcellus, "Tu Marcellus eris, manibus date lilia plena," &c. (Epochen, pp. 295, 296.) Winckelmann at first took it for Phædra and Hippolytus (Geschichte d. Kunst, Vorrede, § 5); but he afterwards explained it as representing the recognition of Orestes by Electra (bk. xi. c. 2, § 29), and this supposition has been generally adopted. Thiersch (l. c.) refers the work to the Augustan age. [Compare STEPHANUS.] [P. S.]

MENEMACHUS (Μενέμαχος), a physician born at one of the cities named Aphrodisias, who belonged to the medical sect of the Methodici, and lived in the second century after Christ. (Galen, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 684, De Meth. Med. i. 7, vol. x. p. 53, 54.) He wrote some works which are not now extant, and is probably the physician quoted by Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 1. p. 75), Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos. iii. 1, vol. xii. p. 625), and Oribasius (Coll. Medic. vii. 21, p. 18, and in Matthæi's collection, Monog. 1808). The Menemachus, however, who is quoted by Celsus (De Medic. vi. 9, p. 129), is not the same person, and must have lived at least a century earlier. [W. A. G.]

MENETIA GENS, was a very ancient and illustrious patrician house at Rome from B. C. 503 to B. C. 376. Its only cognomen is Lanatus. [LANATUS.] Cicero (ad Fam. xiii. 9) mentions a Menenian tribe, and Appian a Menenius who was proscribed by the triumvirs in B. C. 43, and rescued from death by the self-devotion of one of his slaves. (B. C. iv. 44.) [W. B. D.]

MENEPHRON, an Arcadian, who is said to have lived in incestuous intercourse with his mother Bias and his daughter Cyllene. (Ov. Met. vii. 386; Hygin. Fab. 253, who calls him Menophrus.) [L. S.]

MENES (Μένης), a Thracian, from whom the town of Menebria or Mesebria was said to have received its name. (Strab. vii. p. 319.) [L. S.]

MENES (Μήνης). This is the most usual form of the name, which, however, we also find written as Menas, Menis, Meinis, Men, Min, and Mein (Μηνάς, Μήνις, Μείνις, Μήν, Μιν, Μείν). Menes was the first king of Egypt, according to the traditions of the Egyptians themselves. Herodotus records of him that he built Memphis on a piece of ground which he had rescued from the river by turning it from its former course, and erected therein a magnificent temple to Hephaestus (Pthah). (Comp. Diod. i. 50; Wess. ad loc.) Diodorus tells us that he introduced into Egypt the worship of the gods and the practice of sacrifices, as well as a more elegant and luxurious style of living. As the author of this latter innovation, his memory was dishonoured many generations afterwards by king Tnephachthus, the father of Bocchoris; and Plutarch mentions a pillar at Thebes in Egypt, on which was inscribed an imprecation against Menes, as the introducer of luxury. There is a legend also, preserved by Diodorus, which relates (in defiance of chronology, unless Mendes is to be substituted for Menas), that he was saved from drowning in the lake of Moeris by a crocodile, in gratitude for which he established the worship of the animal, and built a city near the lake called the City of Crocodiles, erecting there a pyramid to serve as his own tomb. That he was a conqueror, like other founders of kingdoms, we learn from an extract from Manetho preserved by Eusebius. By Marsham and others he has been identified with the Mizraim of Scripture. According to some accounts he was killed by a hippopotamus. (Herod. ii. 4, 99; Diod. i. 43, 45, 89; Wess. ad loc.; Plut. De Is. et Osir. 3; Perizon. Orig. Aegypt. c. 5; Shuckford's Connection, bk. iv.; Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. ii. pp. 38—45.) [E. E.]

MENES (Μένης), a citizen of Pella, son of Dionysius, was one of the officers of Alexander the Great; and after the battle of Issus (B. C. 333) was admitted by the king into the number of his body-guards, in the room of Balacrus, who was promoted to the satrapy of Cilicia. In B. C. 331, after Alexander had occupied Susa, he sent Menes down to the Mediterranean to take the government of Syria, Phoenicia, and Cilicia, entrusting him at the same time with 3000 talents, a portion of which he was to transmit to Antipater for his war with the Lacedaemonians and the other confederate states of Greece. Apollodorus of Amphipolis was joined with him in this command. (Arr.

MENESAECHMUS (Μενεσάχμους), an Athenian, an inveterate enemy of the orator Lycurgus, by whom he was impeached on a charge of impiety and convicted. When Lycurgus felt his end drawing near, he had himself brought into the council to give an account of his public conduct, and Menesaechmus was the only man who ventured to find fault with it. He continued his hostility to the sons of Lycurgus after their father's death, and so far succeeded in a prosecution against them, that they were delivered into the custody of the Eleven. They were released, however, on the remonstrance of Demosthenes. (Pseudo-Plut. V. X. Orat. Lycurg.; Phot. Bibl. Cod. 268; Suid. s. v. Λυκούργος, προηροσταί; Harpoc. s. v. Ἀρκύριος, Δηλιαστράλ.) [E. E.]

MENESAECHMUS [ΜΝΗΣΑΕΧΜΟΣ]. MENESTHES, an architect, whose pseudo-dipteral temple of Apollo is mentioned by Vitruvius (iii. 2. § 6. ed. Schneid.) [P. S.]

MENESTHEUS (Μενεσθέης), a son of Peisus, an Athenian king, who led the Athenians against Troy, and surpassed all other mortals in arranging the war-steeds and men for battle (Hom. Il. ii. 552, &c., iv. 327; Philostr. Her. ii. 16; Paus. ii. 25. § 6). With the assistance of the Tyndarids, he is said to have driven Theseus from his kingdom, and to have died at Troy (Plut. Thea. 32, 35; Paus. i. 17. § 6). A second personage of this name occurs in Virgil. (Aen. x. 129.) [L. S.]

MENESTHEUS (Μενεσθέης), son of Iphicrates, the famous Athenian general, by the daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace. Hence he said that he owed more to his mother than to his father; for that the latter, as far as in him lay, had made him a Thracian; the former had made him an Athenian. (Nep. Iph. 3; comp. Vol. II. p. 617, a.) He was born probably about B. C. 377 (see Rehdantz, Vit. Iphic. Chabr. Timoth. ii. § 4); and, as he grew up, his great height and size caused him to be thought older than he really was, so that he was called on, while yet a boy, to undertake λευσέμεν, a demand which Iphicrates resisted. (Arist. Rhet. ii. 23. § 17.) He married the daughter of Timotheus; and in B. C. 356 was chosen commander in the Social war, his father and his father-in-law, according to C. Nepos, being appointed to aid him with their counsel and experience. They were all three impeached by their colleague, CHARES, for alleged misconduct and treachery in the campaign; but Iphicrates and Menestheus were acquitted in B. C. 355. (Nep. Tim. 3; Dion Hal. Dem. p. 667; Rehdantz, Vit. Iphic. &c. vi. § 7, vii. §§ 5, 7; comp. Diod. xvi. 21; Wess. ad loc.; Isocr. περὶ ἀντιδ. § 137.) Menestheus was distinguished for his military skill; and we find him again appointed commander of a squadron of 100 galleys, sent out, in B. C. 335, to check the Macedonians, who had intercepted some Athenian ships on their voyage down from the Euxine. We do not know the exact period of his death, but it took place before B. C. 325. (Plut. Phoc. 7; Pseudo-Dem., περὶ τῶν πρὸς Ἀλλεξ. συνθ. p. 217. Epist. iii. p. 1482; Rehdantz, Vit. Iphic. &c. vi. § 8.) [IPHICRATES.] [E. E.]

MENESTHEUS, a sculptor whose name has been preserved by a fragment of a statue, bearing ΜΕΝΕΣΘΕΥΣ ΜΕΝΕΣΘΕΩΣ ΑΦΟΡΑΚΙΟΥ ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. (Gruter, p. 1021, 2.) [P. S.]

MENESTHIUS (Μενέσθιος). 1. A son of Areithous and Philomedusa, of Arne in Boeotia, was slain at Troy by Paris. (Hom. Il. vii. 9, &c., 136, &c.)

2. A son of the river-god Spercheus or of Borus and Polydora, was one of the commanders of the hosts of Achilles. (Hom. Il. xvi. 173, &c.) [L. S.]

MENE/STRATUS (Μενέστρατος), an Athenian, of the demus of Amphitrope, in the tribe Antiochia, who, being in danger from an accusation brought against him by the informer Agoratus, under the tyranny of the Thirty, saved his own life by giving false information against a number of his fellow-citizens. After the restoration of the democracy he was brought to trial for this, and condemned to be beaten to death, — ἀνευνομάσθη. (Lys. c. Agor. pp. 134, 135.) [E. E.]

MENE/STRATUS or MENESTAS (Μενέστρατος, Μενέστας), of Epeirus, was one of the chief instigators of the Aetolians to their war, in conjunction with Antiochus, against Rome, which commenced in B.C. 192. In the following year, when the Aetolians sued for peace, M. Acilius Glabrio, the consul, demanded that Menestratus should be delivered up, but the demand was not complied with. (Polyb. xx. 10, xxii. 14; Liv. xxi. 28, xxxviii. 10.) [E. E.]

MENE/STRATUS (Μενέστρατος), artist. 1. A worthless painter, ridiculed in an epigram by Lucilius, who says that his Phaëdon was only fit for the fire, and his Deucalion for the water. (Brunck, Anal. vol. ii. p. 337. No. 93; Anth. Pal. ii. 213; comp. Martial, v. 53.) Nothing more is known of him, except what the epigram itself shows; namely, that he was a contemporary of Lucilius, and lived, therefore, in the time of Nero.

2. A sculptor, of uncertain time and country, whose Hercules and Hecate were greatly admired. The latter statue stood in the Opisthodomus (post adæm) of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus, and was made, says Pliny, of marble of such brilliancy that it was necessary to warn the beholders to hide their eyes. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 10.) From this passage of Pliny, Silig conjectures that the artist lived about the time of Alexander the Great. Tatian mentions him as the maker of a statue of a poetess named Learchia. (Adv. Graec. 52. p. 113, Worth.) [P. S.]

MENE/XENUS (Μενίξενος), an Athenian, son of Demophon, was a disciple of Socrates, and is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the dialogues Lysis and Meneæmus. [C. P. M.]

MENIDAS (Μενίδας), one of the generals of Alexander the Great, whose name occurs on several occasions. (Arrian, iii. 13. § 4, 26. § 5; Curt. iv. 2, 15, 16, vii. 6, 10.) [C. P. M.]

MENIPPE (Μενίππη). 1. A daughter of Orion and sister of Metioche. After Orion was killed by Artemis, Menippe and Metioche were brought up by their mother, and Athena taught them the art of weaving, and Aphrodite gave them beauty. Once the whole of Aonia was visited by a plague, and the oracle of Apollo Goryniae, when consulted, ordered the inhabitants to propitiate the two Erinyes by the sacrifice of two maidens, who were to offer themselves to death of their own accord. Menippe and Metioche offered themselves; they thrice invoked the infernal gods, and killed themselves with their shuttles. (Pervol. II.

sephone and Hades metamorphosed them into comets. The Aonians erected to them a sanctuary near Orchomeno, where a propitiatory sacrifice was offered to them every year by youths and maidens. The Aetolians called these maidens Coronides. (Ov. Mel. xiii. 685; Anton. Lib. 25; Schol. ad Hom. Il. xviii. 486.)

2. A daughter of Peneius, and wife of Pelasgus, by whom she became the mother of Phrastor (Dionys. I. 28).

3. A daughter of Thamyris, and according to some the mother of Orpheus (Tzet. Chil. i. 12).

4. A daughter of Nereus and Doria. (Hes. Theog. 260.) [L. S.]

MENIPPUS (Μένιππος), a son of Megareus, who was believed to be buried in the prytaneum at Megara. (Pana. i. 43. § 2.) [L. S.]

MENIPPUS (Μένιππος), historical. 1. One of those who, with Philistides, succeeded, against the opposition of Euphræus, and by the aid of Philip of Macedon, in making themselves tyrants of Oreus in Euboea. They were driven out by the Athenians under Phocion, in B.C. 341. (Dem. Phil. iii. p. 126, De Cor. pp. 248, 252, &c.; comp. Aesch. c. Ctes. p. 68; Plut. Demosth. 17; Diod. xvi. 74.) [CALLIAS, Vol. I. p. 568, a; CLAUDIUS TARSCHUS.]

2. An officer of Philip V. of Macedon. In B.C. 208, when Philip was recalled from the war in the South against the Romans and Aetolians by tidings of disturbance and revolt in Macedonia, he left Menippus and Polyphantas in command of 2500 men for the protection of the Achæans. In the following year Menippus was sent by Philip to aid in the defence of Chalcis in Euboea against Attalus I. of Pergamus and the Romans, by whom an unsuccessful attempt was made upon the town. (Liv. xxvii. 32, xxviii. 5, 6; Polyb. x. 42.)

3. One of the envoys of Antiochus the Great to Rome in B.C. 193, on which occasion, however, the negotiation failed in consequence of the demands of the Romans. (Liv. xxxiv. 57—59; App. Syr. 6.) [HÆGESIANAX.] In B.C. 192, Menippus was sent by Antiochus as ambassador to the Aetolians, whom he stimulated to war with Rome by magnifying the power and resources of his master. In the same year Antiochus placed him in command of 3000 men to aid in intercepting all succours sent to Chalcis in Euboea by Eumenes II. of Pergamus and the Achæans, who contrived, however, to throw aid into the town before the passage thither by sea and land had been barred by the Syrian forces. But, after Menippus had occupied the road to Antia, 600 Roman soldiers, also destined for the relief of Chalcis, arrived, and found themselves obliged to turn aside to Delium. Here, in spite of the sanctity of the place, they were suddenly attacked by Menippus, and were all slain except about fifty, whom he captured. (Liv. xxxv. 32, 33, 50, 51; comp. Diod. Exc. de Virt. et Vit. p. 574; App. Syr. 15.) [E. E.]

MENIPPUS (Μένιππος), literary. 1. A comic poet, according to Suidas; but Meineke suspects, on very good grounds, that the name is only a corruption of Hermippus. (Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 494.)

2. A cynic philosopher, and originally a slave, was a native of Gadara in Coele-Syria (Steph. Byz. s. v. Γάδαρα; Strab. xvi. p. 759). Diogenes calls him a Phoenician: Coele-Syria was sometimes reckoned as a part of Phœnicia, sometimes not. He seems to have been a hearer of Diogenes. He amassed great wealth as a usurer (ἡμεροδανειστής), but was cheated out of it all, and committed suicide. Diogenes, who has given us a short life of him, with an epigram of his own upon him (ii. 99—100), informs us that he wrote nothing serious, but that his books were full of jests, like those of his contemporary Meleager; and Strabo and Stephanus call him σπουδῶταλος; that is, he was one of those cynic philosophers who threw all their teaching into a satirical form. In this character he is several times introduced by Lucian, who in one place speaks of him as τῶν παλαιῶν κυνῶν μᾶλα ὑλακτικὸν καὶ κάρχαρον (Bis Accus. 33).

Even in the time of Diogenes, his works were somewhat uncertain; and they are now entirely lost: but we have considerable fragments of Varro's Saturae Menippeae, which were written in imitation of Menippus. (Cic. Acad. i. 2, 8; Gell. ii. 18; Macrob. Sat. i. 11.) The recent edition of the fragments of Varro by Oehler contains a short but excellent dissertation on the date of Menippus, whom he places at B. C. 60.

The works of Menippus were, according to Diogenes (vi. 101), thirteen in number, namely, Nekula, Διαθήκαι, Ἐπιστολαὶ κεκομψευμένα ἀπὸ τοῦ τῶν δαῶν προσώπου, πρὸς τοὺς φυσικοὺς καὶ μαθηματικοὺς καὶ γραμματικοὺς, καὶ γονὰς Ἐπικούρου καὶ τὰς ἑρσησκευμένους ὑπ' αὐτῶν ἐκάδας, and others. (Comp. Menag. Observ. in loc.)

3. Of Stratonicæ, a Carian by birth, was the most accomplished orator of his time in all Asia. (About B. C. 79.) Cicero, who heard him, puts him almost on a level with the Attic orators (Brut. 91; Plut. Cic. 4; Diog. Laërt. vi. 101; Strab. xiv. p. 660).

4. Of Pergamum, a geographer, lived in the time of Augustus, and wrote a Περὶ κλῆους τῆς ἐπὶ τοῖς θαλάττης, of which an abridgement was made by Marcianus, and of which some fragments are preserved. He is also quoted several times by Stephanus Byzantinus. (See Hoffmann, Menippus der Geograph. Leipz. 1841.) [P. S.]

MENIPPUS, artistæ. Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 101) mentions a statuary and two painters of this name. [P. S.]

MENOCHARES (Μηνοχάρης), an officer of Demetrius Soter, king of Syria. In B. C. 161, when Demetrius had escaped from Rome and established himself on the Syrian throne, he sent Menochares to plead his cause with Tiberius Gracchus [No. 6.] and his fellow-commissioners, then in Cappadocia. In the following year, Menochares was sent by Demetrius to Rome, to conciliate the senate by the present of a golden crown and the surrender of Leptines, the assassin of Cn. Octavius, the Roman envoy. (Polyb. xxxi. 4, 6; Diod. xxxi. Exc. Leg. xxv. p. 626.) [LEPTINES, No. 6.] [E. E.]

MENODORUS, freedman of Pompey. [MENAS.]

MENODORUS (Μηνόδορος), a writer on botany and materia medica, quoted by Athenæus (Deipnos. ii. p. 59), who says he was a follower of Erasistratus, and a friend of the physician Hicæsius. He lived, therefore, probably at the end of the first century A. C., and is perhaps the person who is quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, vii. 3, vol. xiii. p. 64). [W. A. G.]

MENODORUS (Μηνόδορος), of Athens, a sculptor, who made for the Thespians a copy of the celebrated statue of Eros by Praxiteles, which originally stood at Thespiae, but was removed to Rome by the emperor Caligula. (Paus. ix. 27 §§ 3, 4, Bekker.) The date of this artist can only be conjectured by supposing that his copy was made about the same time that the original was removed, in order to supply its loss. There is nothing to determine whether or no he was the same person as the statuary mentioned by Pliny, who made athletas et armatos et venatores, sacrificantesque (H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 34). [P. S.]

MENODOTUS (Μηνόδοτος). 1. Of Samos, was the author of at least two works connected with the history of his native island. One bore the title Τῶν κατὰ Σάμον ἐνδεδέσθαι ἀναγραφῶν, and the other Περὶ τῶν κατὰ τὸ ἱερὸν τῆς Σάμου ἑρσι. (Athen. xiv. p. 655, xv. pp. 672, 673.)

2. Of Perinthus, is referred to by Diodorus Siculus (Fragm. lib. xxvi. 3, p. 513) as the author of a work entitled Ἑλληνικὰ πρᾶγματα, in fifteen books, but is otherwise unknown.

3. The author of a work on the Athenian painter Theodorus. (Diog. Laërt. ii. 104.) [L. S.]

MENODOTUS (Μηνόδοτος), a physician of Nicomedia in Bithynia, who was a pupil of Antiochus of Laodiceia, and tutor to Herodotus of Tarsus; he belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, and lived probably about the beginning of the second century after Christ. (Diog. Laërt. ix. § 116; Galen. De Meth. Med. ii. 7, vol. x. p. 142, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683; Sext. Empir. Pyrrhon. Hypotyph. i. § 222, p. 57, ed. Fabric.) He refuted some of the opinions of Asclepiades of Bithynia (Gal. De Nat. Facult. i. 14, vol. ii. p. 52), and was exceedingly severe against the Dogmatici (id. De Subfig. Empir. c. 9, 13, vol. ii. pp. 343, 346, ed. Chart.). He enjoyed a considerable reputation in his day, and is several times quoted and mentioned by Galen. (De Cur. Rat. per Fen. Sect. c. 9, vol. xi. p. 277; Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iii. 62, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 575; Comment. in Hippocr. "De Rat. Vick. in Morb. Acut." iv. 17, vol. xv. p. 766; De Libr. Propr. c. 9, vol. xix. p. 58; De Compos. Medicam. sec. Locos, vi. i. vol. xii. p. 904.) He appears to have written some works which are quoted by Diogenes Laërtius, but are now extant. There is, however, among Galen's writings a short treatise entitled, Γαλῆνους Παραφραστικὸν τοῦ Μηνόδοτου Προπρετικὸς λόγος ἐπὶ τῇ τέχνῃ, Galen's Paraphrastice Menodoti Saeculi ad Artes Oratio. This is supposed to have been written originally by Menodotus, and afterwards revised and polished by Galen; but its history is not quite satisfactorily made out, and its genuineness (as far as Galen is concerned) has been doubted. Its object is sufficiently expressed by the title, and it is composed in a somewhat declamatory style, which has perhaps caused it to be both unduly admired, and unjustly depreciated. On the one hand, Erasmus translated it himself into Latin, and it has been several times published apart from Galen's other works; and on the other, a writer in the Cambridge Museum Orbicum (vol. ii. p. 318) calls it "a very inferior composition, incorrect in language, inelegant in arrangement, and weak in argument." Perhaps the latest edition is that by Abr. Willet, Greek and Latin. Bonn. Lugd. Bat. 1812. [W. A. G.]

MENODOTUS, sculptor. [DIODOTUS, No. 2.]

MENOCEUS (Μηνόκευς). 1. A Thesian grandson of Pentheus, and father of Hipponome, Jocaste or Epicaste, and Creon. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, iii. 5. § 7; Eurip. Phœm. 10, and the schol. on 942.)

2. A grandson of the former, and a son of Creon. (Eurip. Phœm. 788.) In the war of the Seven Argives against Thebes, Teiresias declared that the Thebans should conquer, if Menoeceus would sacrifice himself for his country. Menoeceus accordingly killed himself outside the gates of Thebes (Eurip. Phœm. 913, 980; Apollod. iii. 6. § 7). Pausanias (ix. 25. § 1) relates that Menoeceus killed himself in consequence of an oracle of the Delphian god. His tomb was shown at Thebes near the Neitig gate. (Paus. l. c.; comp. Stat. Theb. x. 755, &c., 790.) [L. S.]

MENOETES. The name of two mythical personages. (Virg. Æn. v. 161, &c.; Ov. Mét. xii. 116.) [L. S.]

MENOETIUS (Mevotius). 1. A son of Iapetus and Clymene or Asia, and a brother of Atlas, Prometheus and Epimetheus, was killed by Zeus with a flash of lightning, in the fight of the Titans, and thrown into Tartarus. (Hes. Theog. 507, &c., 514; Apollod. i. 2. § 3; Schol. ad Æschyl. Prom. 347.)

2. A son of Ceuthonymus, a guard of the oxen of Pluto. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 10; comp. HERACLID.)

3. A son of Actor and Aegina, a step-brother of Aeacus, and husband of Polymele, by whom he became the father of Patroclus. He resided at Opus, and took part in the expedition of the Argonauts (Hom. Il. xi. 785, xvi. 14, xviii. 326). Some accounts call his mother Damocrateia, and a daughter of Aegina; and instead of Polymele they call his wife Sthenele or Periapis (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 107; Strab. p. 425; comp. Val. Flacc. i. 407; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 112). When Patroclus, during a game, had slain the son of Amphidamas, Menoetius fled with him to Peleus in Phthia, and had him educated there (Hom. Il. xi. 770, xxiii. 85, &c.; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. ix. 104). Menoetius was a friend of Heracles. (Diod. iv. 39.) [L. S.]

MENOGENES (Mevoyéns), one of the numerous commentators on Homer, who wrote a work in 23 books on the catalogue of ships in the second book of the Iliad. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 199, ed. Basil.) [L. S.]

MENOGENES, a statuary, who was admired for his quadrigæ. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 30.) [P. S.]

MENON (Ménur). 1. A citizen of Pharsalus in Thessaly, who aided the Athenians at Eion with 12 talents and 200 horsemen, raised by himself from his own penestæ, and was rewarded by them for these services with the freedom of the city. (Dem. c. Arist. pp. 686, 687; Pseudo-Dem. repl. superdices, p. 173; Wolf, Proleg. ad Dem. c. lept. p. 74.) By some this Menon has been identified with the Pharsalian who commanded the troops sent from his native city to the aid of the Athenians in the first year of the Peloponnesian war, B. C. 431; while the above mentioned assistance at Eion is referred by them to the eighth year of the same war, B. C. 424. (Thuc. ii. 22, iv. 102, &c.; Gedik. ad Plat. Men. p. 70.) Perhaps, however, the service may have been rendered at the siege of Eion by Cimon in B. C. 476; and in that case the Menon alluded to by Demosthenes may have been the father of the leader of Thessalian cavalry mentioned by Thucydides in B. C. 431 (Herod. vii. 107; Plut. Cim. 7; Paus. viii. 8; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iii. p. 3.) [BOGAE.]

2. An Athenian, a fellow-workman of PHEDIAS, was suborned to bring against him the accusation by which he was ruined. For this service the faction which had employed Menon obtained for him from the people the privilege of δράκεια. (Plut. Per. 31.)

3. A Thessalian adventurer, was a favourite of Aristippus of Larissa, who placed him in command of the forces, which he had obtained by the help of Cyrus the Younger in order to make head against a party opposed to him. When Cyrus began his expedition, in B. C. 401, Menon was sent by Aristippus to his aid with 1500 men, and joined the prince's army at Colossæ. Cyrus having reached the borders of Cappadocia, employed Menon to escort back into her own country Epyaxa, the wife of Syennesis, the Cilician king. In passing through the defiles on the frontiers Menon lost a number of his men, who, according to one account, were cut off by the Cilicians; and in revenge for this, his troops plundered the city of Tarsus and the royal palace. When the Cyrean army reached the Euphrates, Menon persuaded the soldiers under his command to be the first to cross the river, and thus to ingratiate themselves with the prince. At the battle of Cunaxa he commanded the left wing of the Greeks, and, after the battle, when Clearchus sent to Ariaeus to make an offer of placing him on the Persian throne, he formed one of the mission at his own request, as being connected with Ariaeus by ties of friendship and hospitality. He was again one of the four generals who accompanied Clearchus to his fatal interview with Tissaphernes, and was detained, together with his colleagues. Clearchus, in seeking the interview for the purpose of delivering up on both sides those who had striven to excite their mutual suspicions, had been instigated in a great measure by resentment against Menon, whom he suspected of having calumniated him to Ariaeus and Tissaphernes, with the view of obtaining the entire command of the army for himself. According to the statement which Ariaeus made to the Greeks immediately after the apprehension of the generals, Menon and Proxenus were honourably treated by the Persians, as having revealed the treachery of which he said Clearchus had been guilty; and Ctesias relates, in ignorance certainly of the details and in direct opposition to Xenophon, that Clearchus himself distrusted Tissaphernes, and that the army was induced by the arts of Menon to compel him to agree to the interview. That Menon did really act a treacherous part towards his countrymen is by no means improbable, as well from the circumstances of the case as from his character, even if we make all allowance for some colouring which Xenophon's personal hostility to the man may have thrown into his invective against him. As to his fate, Ctesias merely says that he was not executed with the other generals; but Xenophon tells us that he was put to death by lingering tortures, which lasted for a whole year. If this latter account is the true one, Bishop Thirlwall's hypothesis seems not improbable, viz., that he was given up to the vengeance of Parysatis as a compensation for the rejection of her entreaties on behalf of Clearchus and his colleagues. There can be no doubt of the identity of the subject of the present article with the Menon introduced in the dialogue of Plato, which bears his name. (Xen. Anab. i. 1. § 10, 2. §§ 6, 20—25, 4. §§ 13—17, 5. §§ 11—17, 7. § 1, 8. § 4, ii. 1. § 5, 2. § 1, 5. §§ 28, 31, 38, 6. §§ 21—29; Diod. xiv. 19, 27; Ctes. Pers. ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 132; Plut. Arias. 18; Diog. Laërt. ii. 50; Suid. s. v. Ménor; Athen. xi. pp. 505, a, b, 506, b; Thirlwall's Greece. vol. iv. pp. 324, 325; Gedik. ad Plat. Men. p. 70.)

4. A citizen of Pharsalus in Thessaly, and a man of great influence and reputation, took a prominent part in the Lamian war, and commanded the Thessalian cavalry in the battle with the Macedonians, in which LEONNATUS was slain. Plutarch tells us that his services were highly valued by the confederates, and that he held a place in their estimation second only to Leosthenes. At the battle of Cranon (B.C. 322), he and Antipater, the Athenian, were defeated by Antipater and Craterus, though the Thessalian horse under his command maintained in the action its superiority over that of the enemy; and they felt themselves compelled to open a negotiation with the conquerors, which led to the dissolution of the Greek confederacy. But when Antipater was obliged to cross over to Asia against Perdiccas, the Aetolians renewed the war, and were zealously seconded in Thessaly by Menon, through whose influence it probably was that most of the Thessalian towns were induced to take part in the insurrection. Soon after, however, he was defeated by Polyperchon in a pitched battle, in which he himself was slain, B.C. 321. His daughter Phthia he gave in marriage to Aescides, king of Epeirus, by whom she became the mother of Pyrrhus. (Diod. xviii. 15, 17, 38; Plut. Pyrrh. 1, Phoc. 24, 25; Droysen, Gesch. der Nachf. Alex. pp. 71, 87, 127, 155.)

MENTOPHANTUS (Μενόφαντος), the sculptor of a beautiful statue of Aphrodite, which was found on the Caelian mount at Rome, and afterwards came into the possession of prince Chigi. It was first described by Winckelmann (Geach. d. Kunst. b. v. c. 2. § 3 note), and it is figured in the Museo Capitolino (vol. iv. p. 392), and in Müller's Denkmäler d. alten Kunst (vol. ii. pl. xxv. No. 275). The attitude is nearly the same as that of the Venus de Medici, but the left-hand holds a fold of a piece of drapery, which falls down upon what is apparently a box, on the end of which is the inscription ΑΠΟ ΤΗC ΕΝ ΤΡΩΑΔΙ ΑΦΡΟΔΙΤΗC ΜΗΝΟΦΑΝΤΟC ΕΠΟΙΕΙ. The execution is extremely good, and the eyes, forehead, and hair are particularly admired. We know nothing further of the original statue, from which the copy of Menophantus was made, nor of Menophantus himself. [P.S.]

MENS, i.e. mind, a personification of mind, worshipped by the Romans. She had a sanctuary on the Capitol, which had been built, according to some, about the time of the battle of lake Trasimene, B.C. 217, and according to others a century later. The object of her worship was, that the citizens might always be guided by a right and just spirit. (Ov. Fast. vi. 241; Liv. xxii. 9, 10, xxiii. 31; Cic. De Nat. Deor. ii. 22, De Leg. ii. 11; Plut. De Fort. Rom. 5; August. De Civ. Dei. iv. 21; Lactant. i. 20). A festival in honour of Mens was celebrated on the 8th of June. [L.S.]

only from coins and some inscriptions quoted by Ursinus. The interpretation of the figures on the reverse of these coins, of which a specimen is given below, is very uncertain. It has been conjectured that they have reference to the lex Julia, by which the civitas was given to the allies, and that the latter are symbolically represented stepping into the chariot of the Roman people. This hypothesis is supposed to be favoured by the head on the obverse, which is believed to be that of Libertas, as the pileus is behind it. (Eckhel. vol. v. p. 212.)

COIN OF L. FARSULEIUS MENTOR.

MENTES (Μέντρυς). 1. The leader of the Cicones in the Trojan war, whose appearance Apollo assumed when he went to encourage Hector. (Hom. Il. xvii. 73.)

2. A son of Ancehalus, king of the Taphians north of Ithaca. He was connected by ties of hospitality with the house of Odysseus. When Athena visited Telemachus, she assumed the personal appearance of Mentes. (Hom. Od. i. 105, 181, &c.; Strab. x. p. 456.) [L.S.]

MENTO, C. JULIUS. 1. Was consul in A.C. 431. He was superseded in the command of the Volscian war, which, from dissension with his colleague, he conducted unsuccessfully, by the dictator A. Postumius Tubertus. Mento was left in charge of the city, where he dedicated a temple to Apollo. (Liv. iv. 26, 27, 29.)

2. A rhetorician, cited by Seneca. (Contr. 2, 4, 7, 8, 14, 20, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 32.) [W.B.D.]

MENTOR (Μέντωρ). 1. A son of Eurytheus, fell, like his father and brothers, in a battle against the Heracleids and Athenians. (Diod. iv. 57; Apollod. ii. 8. § 1.)

2. A son of Heracles by Asopia. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

3. A son of Alcimus and a friend of Odysseus, who, on quitting Ithaca, entrusted to him the care of his house. (Hom. Od. ii. 226, &c., xxii. 235.) Athena assumed his appearance when she conducted Telemachus to Pylos. (Od. ii. 269, 402, iii. 13, &c., iv. 654.) On Odysseus's return, Mentor assisted him in the contest with the suitors, and brought about a reconciliation between him and the people (xxii. 206, xxiv. 445, &c.).

4. The father of Imbrius, and son of Imbrus, as Pedaeus, was an ally of the Trojans. (Hom. Il. xiii. 171.) [L.S.]

MENTOR (Μέντωρ), a Greek of Rhodes, the brother of Memnon [ΜΕΜΝΟΝ]. With his brother Memnon he rendered active assistance to Artabazus. When the latter found himself compelled to take refuge at the court of Philip, Mentor entered the service of Nectanabius, king of Egypt. He was appointed to the command of his Greek forces, and afterwards led a force of 4000 Greeks to the assistance of Tennes, king of Sidon, in his revolt against Darius Ochus. Tennes treacherously betrayed the Sidonians [ΤΕΝΝΕΣ], and at his command Mentor, who had been left in charge of the city, directed his troops to open the gates

Dareius. Mentor with his troops was taken into the Persian service. When Dareius Ochus marched upon Egypt, one division of his Greek forces was placed under the command of Mentor and the eunuch Bagoas. When this division came before Babastus, Mentor contrived that a report should reach the garrison, which consisted partly of Greeks, that all who surrendered would be pardoned. The Greek commanders on both sides were eager to be the first to make and to receive the submission; and Mentor contrived that Bagoas in entering the city should be taken prisoner by the Greeks. Having then himself received the surrender of the city, and procured the release of Bagoas, he secured the favour of Dareius and the gratitude of Bagoas, and was rewarded with a satrapy including all the western coast of Asia Minor. His influence with Dareius also enabled him to procure the pardon of his brother Memnon and of Artabazus. While engaged in the government of his satrapy he treacherously secured the person of Hermias, tyrant of Atarneus, the friend of Aristotle [HERMIAS; ARISTOTELIS], and having forged letters in his name, obtained possession of his fortresses. He sent Hermias to Dareius, who put him to death. He died in possession of his satrapy, and was succeeded by his brother Memnon. His wife's name was Barsine. His three daughters fell into the hands of Parthenion at Damascus. One of them was subsequently married to Nearchus (Diod. xvi. 42, &c. 49—52; Arrian, vii. 4. § 9; Curt. iii. 13. § 14.) [C. P. M.]

MENTOR, the most celebrated silver-chaser among the Greeks, must have flourished before B. C. 356, for Pliny states that his choicest works perished in the conflagration of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus (H. N. xxxv. 12. a. 55). Others of them were burnt in the Capitol, and none were extant in Pliny's time (L. c.; comp. vii. 38. a. 39). His works were vases and cups, the latter chiefly of the kind called Thericles (see Ernesti, Clav. Cic., and Orelli, Onom. Tullian. a. v.). The statement of Pliny respecting the utter loss of his works must be understood of the large vases, and not of the smaller cups, many of which existed, and were most highly prized (Cic. Verr. iv. 18; Martial, iii. 41, iv. 39, viii. 50, ix. 59, xiv. 91; Propert. i. 14. 2; Juv. viii. 104). Some of them were, however, certainly spurious. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 11. a. 53.) Lucian (Lixiph. p. 332, ed. Wetstein) uses the phrase μεταπορυσσῆν ποτήρια to describe elaborately-wrought silver cups. [P. S.]

MENYLLUS (Μένυλλος). 1. A Macedonian, who was appointed by Antipater to command the garrison which he established at Munychia after the Lamian war, B. C. 322. He is said by Plutarch to have been a just and good man, and to have sought as far as possible to prevent the garrison from molesting the Athenians. He was on friendly terms with Phocion, upon whom he in vain sought to force valuable presents. On the death of Antipater, B. C. 319, he was replaced by Nicanor. (Diod. xviii. 18; Plut. Phoc. 28—31.)

2. Of Alabanda, was sent ambassador to Rome, B. C. 162, by Ptolemy VI. Philometor, to plead his cause against his younger brother Physcon. The senate, however, espoused the cause of the latter, and the next year Menyllus was sent again to endeavour to excuse Ptolemy for his non-compliance with the orders of the senate. But they refused to listen to him, and ordered the embassy to quit Rome within five days. (Polyb. xxxi. 18, xxxii. 1.) During his stay at Rome on the former occasion, Menyllus took an active part, in conjunction with the historian Polybius, in effecting the escape of Demetrius, the young king of Syria, who was detained at Rome as a hostage. (Id. xxxi. 20—22.) [DEMETRIUS.] [E. H. B.]

MENYTES or INDEX. [HERACLES.]

MEPHITIS, a Roman divinity who had a grove and temple in the Esquilie, on a spot which it was thought fatal to enter. (Plin. H. N. ii. 93. a. 95; Varro, De L. L. v. 49.) Who this Mephitis was is very obscure, though it is probable that she was invoked against the influence of the mephitic exhalations of the earth in the grove of Albunea. She was perhaps one of the Italian sibyls. Servius (ad Aen. vii. 84) mentions that Mephitis as a male divinity was connected with Leucothea in the same manner as Adonis with Aphrodite, and that others identified her with Juno. (Comp. Tac. Ann. iii. 33.) [L. S.]

MERCATOR, ISIDORUS, also called Isidorus Pecosator, a Spanish bishop, about A. D. 830, respecting whom see Fabric. Bib. Graec. vol. x. p. 497, vol. xii. p. 159.

MERCATOR, MA'RIUS, distinguished among ecclesiastical writers as a most zealous antagonist of the Pelagians and the Nestorians, appears to have commenced his literary career during the pontificate of Zosimus, A. D. 218, at Rome, where he drew up a discourse against the opinions of Coelestius, which he transmitted to Africa and received in reply an epistle from St. Augustine, still extant (Ep. xciii. ed. Bened.). Having repaired to Constantinople about ten years afterwards, for the purpose of counteracting the designs of the banished Julianus [JULIANUS ECLANENSIS], he presented his Commonitorium to Theodosius. He then became deeply involved in the controversy regarding the Incarnation, and in this found active occupation for the remainder of his life, which must have extended beyond the middle of the fifth century, since we find mention made in his writings of the Eutychians, whose name does not appear among the catalogue of heretics, until after the council of Chalcedon, held in 451. Mercator seems undoubtedly to have been a layman, but we are absolutely ignorant of every circumstance connected with his origin and personal history. Hence, in the absence of all ascertained facts, an ample field is thrown open for that unprofitable species of labour which seeks to create substance out of shadow; and here the exertions of Garnier and Gabriel Gerberon are especially conspicuous, but it would be a mere waste of time and space to recount their visions.

The works of Mercator refer exclusively to the Pelagian and Nestorian heresies, and consist for the most part, in so far as the latter is concerned, of passages extracted and translated from the chief Greek authorities upon both sides, and arranged in such a manner as to enable the orthodox to comprehend the doctrines advanced by their opponents, and the arguments by which they were confuted.

1. Commonitorium super nomine Coelestii, composed originally in Greek, presented in 429 to the emperor Theodosius, and translated into Latin some years afterwards. The object of this piece was to procure the expulsion of Julianus and Coelestius from Constantinople, by giving a history of the rise and progress of their errors, and by exposing the fatal tendency of their doctrines. We learn from the full title that this end was accomplished, and that the two hierarchs, with their followers, were banished by an imperial edict, and subsequently condemned in the Council of Ephesus (231) by the judgment of 275 bishops.

2. Commonitorium adversus Haeresin Pelagii et Coelestii vel etiam Scripta Juliani, made up of excerpts from the writings of Julianus, with answers (subnotationes) annexed by Mercator. Garnier gives to this production the title Liber Subnotationum ad Pieritium Presbyterum, and considers it as consisting of two parts, the first, or Commonitorium, being a preface or introduction; the second, or Subnotationes ad Verba Juliani, forming the main body of the work.

3. Refutatio Symboli Theodori Mopsuestani, an examination of the false doctrine with regard to the Nature of Christ, contained in a creed attributed to Theodorus of Mopsuestia, the friend and supporter of Julianus. Of the following it will be enough to give the names:—4. Comparatio Dogmatum Pauli Samosateni et Nestorii. 5. Sermones V. Nestorii adversus Dei Genitricem Mariam. 6. Nestorii Epistola ad Cyrillum Alexandrinum. 7. Cyrilli Alexandrini Epistola ad Nestorium. 8. Cyrilli Alexandrini Epistola secunda ad Nestorium. 9. Cyrilli Alexandrini Epistola ad Clericos suos. 10. Excerpta ex Codicibus Nestorii. 11. Nestorii Sermones IV. adversus Haeresim Pelagianam. 12. Nestorii Epistola ad Coelestinum. 13. Nestorii Blasphemiarum Capitula, containing the replies of Nestorius to the letters of Pope Coelestinus and Cyril of Alexandria. 14. Synodus Ephesiana adversus Nestorium, extracts from those proceedings of this council which were most hostile to the views of Nestorius. 15. Cyrilli Alexandrini Apologeticus adversus Orientales. 16. Cyrilli Alexandrini Apologeticus adversus Theodoretum. 17. Fragmenta Theodoretii, Diodori et Ibae. 18. Eutherii Tyranensis Fragmentum. 19. Nestorii Epistola ad Papam Coelestinum. 20. Epistola Synodica Cyrilli ad Nestorium. 21. Cyrilli Scholia de Incarnatione Unigeniti.

Among the lost works of this author we may reckon the Libri contra Pelagianos, of which we hear in the epistle of St. Augustine (xciii.). Dupin hazards a conjecture that the Hypognosticon, commonly attributed to the bishop of Hippo, may be in reality the treatise in question.

It is remarkable that no ancient writer, if we except St. Augustine in the letter named above, takes any notice of Mercator, who remained altogether unknown until the seventeenth century, when Holstein discovered a MS. of his works in the Vatican, and soon after a second was found by Labbe, in the library of the Chapter of Beauvais. Labbe printed the Commonitorium super Nomine Coelestii, in his collection of councils, fol. Paris, 1671, vol. ii. pp. 1512—1517; a selection from the Vatican MS. was published by Gabriel Gerberon, a Benedictine, under the assumed name of Righerius, 12mo. Brux. 1673, and in the same year the first complete edition appeared at Paris in folio, under the editorial inspection of the learned Garnier, the text being formed upon a comparison of the only two existing MSS. The most esteemed edition is that of Baluze, 8vo. Par. 1684, reprinted with additions and corrections, by Galland, in his Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. viii. pp. 615—737, fol. Venet. 1772. A very full account of the labours of Garnier and Baluze will be found in Schönmann, Bibl. Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 16. See also MERCURIUS, a Roman divinity of commerce and gain, probably one of the dei laesii. The character of the god is clear from his name, which is connected with merx and mercari. (Paul. Diac. p. 124, ed. Müller; Schol. ad Pers. Sat. v. 112.) A temple was built to him as early as a. c. 495 (Liv. ii. 21, 27; Ov. Fast. v. 669), near the Circus Maximus (P. Vict. Reg. Urb. xi.); and an altar of the god existed near the Porta Capena, by the side of a well; and in later times a temple seems to have been built on the same spot. (Ov. Fast. v. 673; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. i.) Under the name of the ill-willed (malevolus), he had a statue in what was called the vicus sobrius, or the sober street, in which no shops were allowed to be kept, and milk was offered to him there instead of wine. (Fest. pp. 161, 297, ed. Müller.) This statue had a purse in its hand, to indicate his functions. (Schol. ad Pers. l. c.) His festival was celebrated on the 25th of May, and chiefly by merchants, who also visited the well near the Porta Capena, to which magic powers were ascribed; and with water from that well they used to sprinkle themselves and their merchandise, that they might be purified, and yield a large profit. (Ov. Fast. v. 670, &c.; Fest. p. 148, ed. Müller.)

The Romans of later times identified Mercurius, the patron of merchants and tradespeople, with the Greek Hermes, and transferred all the attributes and myths of the latter to the former (Hor. Carm. i. 10), although the Fætales never recognised the identity; and instead of the caduceus used a sacred branch as the emblem of peace. The resemblance between Mercurius and Hermes is indeed very slight; and their identification is a proof of the thoughtless manner in which the Romans acted in this respect. [Comp. HERMES.] [L. S.]

MERCURIUS MONACHUS (Μετρωμενος Μοναχος), the reputed author of a short treatise (or fragment) on the Pulse, published at Naples, in Greek and Latin, with notes and a long introduction, by Salvator Cyrillus, 8vo. 1812. It does not seem to be derived from Greek sources, and nothing is known respecting the writer. Some suppose him to have been a monk, who lived in the south of Italy, about the tenth century; but Sprengel, in the last edition of his Gesch. der Arzneikunde (ii. p. 560, quoted by Choulant in his Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin) conjectures that he lived in the thirteenth century, and derived his opinions from some one who had travelled in the East,—perhaps Carpinus. Cardinal Mai, however, in the preface to the fourth volume of his collection Classicior. Auctor. e Vatican. Codicib. Editor. (p. xii. &c.) affirms, apparently from actual inspection of some manuscripts containing the work, that it does not belong to Mercurius at all, but to a person called Abitanius. The writer has no means of deciding whether this assertion is correct, but it agrees well enough with the proof arising from internal evidence that the work is derived from Oriental sources, for this Abitanius must be no other than the celebrated Arabic physician Abū 'Alī Ibn Sīnā, commonly called Averroes. [W. A. G.]

MERCURIUS TRISMEGISTUS. [HERMES TRISMEGISTUS.]

MERENDA. was a surname, of rare occurrence in the Antonian and Cornelian gentes at Rome. Merenda signifies the mid-day meal (Fest. v. c. 123, Muell. ed.; Nov. p. 28, 32; comp. Isidor. Orig. xx. 2. § 12), and the word, unchanged in form, is extant in the modern Neapolitan dialect. The Merenda branch of the Gens Antonia was patrician (Dionys. x. 58) [ANTONIA Gens].

1. T. ANTONIUS MERENDA, was decemvir in B. C. 450—49, and was defeated by the Aequians on the Algidus. (Dionys. x. 58, xi. 23, 33; Liv. iii. 35, 38, 41, 42; Fasti.)

2. Q. ANTONIUS T. F. MERENDA, probably a son of the preceding, was tribune of the soldiers, with consular authority, in B. C. 422. (Liv. iv. 42; Fasti.)

3. SERVILIUS CORNELIUS MERENDA, was legatus in B. C. 275, to the consul L. Cornelius Lentulus [LENTULUS, No. 5], and was presented by him, for the capture of a town in Samnium, with a golden chaplet of five pounds' weight. In the following year Merenda was consul, and again commanded in Samnium and Lucania. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 11; Fasti.) [W. B. D.]

MERUUS, M. LAETORIUS. [LAETORIUS, No. 3.]

MERICUS, a leader of Spanish mercenaries in the service of Syracuse at the time when that city was besieged by Marcellus. After the departure of Epicydes, and the massacre of the officers whom he had left in the command, six new praetors were appointed, of whom Mericus was one; but he entered into a correspondence with his countrymen in the Roman service; and being entrusted with the charge of part of the island of Ortygia, took the opportunity to admit a body of Roman troops into that fortress. By this means Marcellus became master of the citadel, which soon led to the capture of the whole city, B. C. 212. Mericus was rewarded for his treachery by appearing in the ovation of the Roman general adorned with a crown of gold, besides the more substantial benefits of the Roman franchise, and an assignment of 500 jugera of land. (Liv. xxv. 30, 31, xvi. 21.) [E. H. B.]

MERIONES (Μηριόνης), a son of Molus (Hom. Il. xiii. 249), conjointly with Idomeneus, led the Cretans in 80 ships against Troy (ii. 651, iv. 254), where he was one of the bravest heroes, and usually acted together with his friend Idomeneus (viii. 264, x. 58, xiii. 275, 304, xv. 302, xvii. 258). He slew Pherclus (v. 59), Hippotion, and Morys (xiv. 514), Adamas (xiii. 567), Harpalion (xiii. 650), Acarnas (xvi. 342), Laogonus (xvi. 603), and wounded Deiphobus (xiii. 528). He also offered to fight with Hector, who afterwards slew his charioteer, Coeranus (vii. 165, xvii. 610). He offered to accompany Diomedes on his exploring expedition into the Trojan camp; but when Diomedes chose Odysseus for his companion, Meriones gave to the latter his bow, quiver, sword, and famous helmet (x. 662, &c.). He and Ajax protected the body of Patroclus (xvii. 669); and at the funeral games of Patroclus he won the fourth prize in the chariot-race, in shooting with the bow the first, and in throwing the javelin the second (xxiii. 351, 528, 614, 860, &c.). Later traditions state that on his way homeward he was thrown on the coast of Sicily, where he was received by the Cretans who had settled there (Diod. iv. 79); whereas, according to others, he returned safely to Crete, and was buried and worshipped as a hero,

ME'RMERUS (Μέρμερος). 1. A son of Pheres, and grandson of Jason and Medeia. He was the father of Iilus and Ephyra, and skilled in the art of preparing poison. (Hom. Od. i. 260; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1416.)

2. A son of Jason and Medeia, is also called Macareus or Mormorus (Hygin. Fab. 239; Tzetz. ad Lyc. 175); he was murdered, together with his brother Pheres, by his mother at Corinth. (Apollod. i. 9. § 28; Hygin. Fab. 25; Diod. iv. 54.) According to others he was stoned to death by the Corinthians (Paus. ii. 3. § 6; Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 10), or he was killed during the chase by a lioness. (Paus. ii. 3. § 7.) A centaur, Mermerus, is mentioned by Ovid. (Met. xii. 305.) [L. S.]

ME'RMNADAE (Μέρμναι), a Lydian family, which, on the murder of Candanes by Gyges, succeeded the Heraclidae on the throne of Lydia, and held it for five generations, during a period of 170 years (about 716—546). The successive sovereigns of this family were Gyges, Ardyas, Sadyattes, Alyattes, Croesus. (See these articles, and comp. DIOCHUS; also Thirlwall's Greece, vol. ii. pp. 157, 158; Clint. F. H. vol. i. sub anno 716, vol. ii. App. xvii.) [E. E.]

MEROBAUDES, FLAVIUS. In the collection of the Christian poets by G. Fabricius, fol. Basel. 1564, we find (p. 765) thirty hexameters, De Christo, said to be the work "Merobaudis Hispanici Scholastici," taken, as we are assured by the editor, from a very ancient MS. This hymn was, at a subsequent period, most erroneously ascribed to Claudian, and in all the later impressions of his poems is placed among the Epigrammata, and numbered xxviii.

About the year 1812 or 1813 the base of a statue was dug up in the Ulpian forum at Rome, bearing a long inscription in honour of Flavius Merobaudes, who is declared to have been equally brave and learned, capable of performing glorious deeds, and of celebrating the achievements of others, well skilled in wielding both the sword and the pen, a gallant and experienced soldier, a bard worthy of the Heliconian wreath. It is then set forth that, as a tribute to his rare qualities, a brazen image had been erected in the Ulpian forum, on the 29th of July, in the 15th consulship of Theodosius, and the 4th of Valentinian (A. D. 435).

Ten years afterwards Niebuhr succeeded in deciphering, upon eight leaves of a palimpsest belonging to the monastery of St. Gall, several Latin verses, which, from the subjects to which some of them referred, must have been composed about the middle of the fifth century. For a considerable time it seemed impossible to determine the author, no name appearing on the parchment; but upon comparing the preface to the principal piece with the inscription just mentioned, some expressions in the former were found to be so completely an echo of the words in the latter, that it became almost certain that Merobaudes must be the person sought, and this conclusion was confirmed by a passage in Sidonius Apollinarius, which contains an allusion to this very statue. (Carm. ix. Ad Felicem, 278—302, comp. the note of Sirmond.) The fragments thus recovered are miserably mutilated. The pages preserved do not follow each other in regular order; the initial or the final words in most of the larger lines have been pared off when the sheets were bound up into a new volume, and in some places the original writing has been completely obliterated. What remains consists of

I. Four Carmina. The first, a fragment comprising 23 lines in elegiac measure, is a description apparently of the Triclinium of Valentinian. The second, a fragment comprising 14 lines in elegiac measure, is a description of a garden probably attached to the Triclinium. The third, a fragment comprising 7 lines in elegiac measure, depicts the beauties of a garden, the property Viri Jul. Fausti. The fourth, a fragment in 46 hendecasyllabics, is a birthday ode in honour of the son of Aëtius Patricius.

II. A fragment, extending to 197 hexameters, of a panegyric on the third consulship of Aëtius Patricius, to which is prefixed an introduction in prose, in a very wretched condition. This Aëtius was consul for the first time A. D. 432, for the second time A. D. 437, for the third time A. D. 446. If we assume that the whole of these five scraps are by the same author, and that he is the Spanish Merobaudes who wrote De Christo, a proposition which, although highly probable, cannot be strictly demonstrated, it follows, as a matter of course, that he must have been a Christian, although unquestionably the terms in which he laments that the morals of the olden time and the ancient religion had passed away together, seem at first sight little favourable to such an idea. On the other hand, the reference to baptism (Carm. i. sub fin.) is such as could scarcely have proceeded from a gentile. Niebuhr conjectures that the Disticha de Miraculis Christi, and the Carmen Paschale, placed side by side with the De Christo, among the epigrams of Claudian (xcv. xcix.), to whom they confessedly do not belong, ought to be assigned to Merobaudes. (The fragments were first published by Niebuhr at Bonn, 8vo. 1823, again in 1824, and will be found, edited by Bekker, in the "Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae," in the same volume with Corippus, 8vo. Bonn, 1836. See Rheinisches Museum, 1843, p. 531. The inscription is in Orelli, No. 1183. With regard to Aëtius, consult Hansen, De Vita Aëtii, 8vo. Dorpat. 1840; see also Nicol. Anton. Bibl. Hispan. Vol. ii. 3.) [W. R.]

MEROPE (Μερόπη). 1. A daughter of Oceanus, and by Clymeneus the mother of Phaëton. (Hygin. Fab. 154.)

2. One of the Heliades or sisters of Phaëton. (Ov. Met. ii. 340, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 154.)

3. A daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, and the wife of Sisyphus of Corinth, by whom she became the mother of Glauca. In the constellation of the Pleiades she is the seventh and the least visible star, because she is ashamed of having had intercourse with a mortal man. (Apollod. i. 9. § 3, iii. 10. § 1; Ov. Fast. iv. 175; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1155; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 138; comp. Hom. Il. vi. 154; Schol. ad Pind. Nov. ii. 16; Sisyphus.)

4. A daughter of Oenopion and Helice in Chios, is also called Haero, Aerope, and Maerope. She was beloved by Orion, who was, in consequence, blinded by her father. (Apollod. i. 4. § 5; Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 34.)

5. The wife of Megareus, by whom she became the mother of Hippomenes. (Hygin. Fab. 185.)

6. A daughter of Cypselus, and wife of Cresphontes, and afterwards of Polyphontes, and mother of Aegyptus. (Apollod. ii. 8. § 5; Pans. iv. 3. § 5, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 184; comp. Asp. PTTA.) [L. S.]

MEROPS (Μέροψ). 1. The father of Eumeia, king of the island of Cos, which he thus called after his daughter, while the inhabitants were called after him, Meropes. His wife, the nymph Eumea, was killed by Artemis, because she had neglected to worship that goddess, and was carried by Persephone to the lower world. Merops, from a desire after his wife, wished to make away with himself, but Hera changed him into an eagle, whom she placed among the stars. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 16; Anton. Lib. 15; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 318; Eurip. Helas. 384.)

2. Also called Maerops, a king of the Ethiopians, by whose wife, Clymene, Helios became the father of Phaëton. (Strab. i. p. 33; Ov. Met. i. 763, Trist. iii. 4. 30; comp. Welcker, Die Aenhyd. Tril. p. 572, &c.)

3. A king of Rhindacus, of Perote, on the Hellespont, is also called Macar, or Macareus. He was a celebrated soothsayer and the father of Cleis, Ariabe, Amphius, and Adrastus. (Hom. Il. ii. 831, xi. 329; Apollon. Rhod. i. 975; Strab. xiii. p. 586; Conon, Narrat. 41; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀπόλλων; Serv. ad Aen. ix. 264; Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.)

4. A Trojan, who was slain by Turnus in his attack on the camp of Aeneas. (Virg. Aen. ix. 702.) [L. S.]

MEROVEUS, a Frankish chieftain, of whom little is known that is authentic, beyond the fact that he was the grandfather of Clovis, the real founder of the Frankish monarchy in Gaul. The chroniclers of the middle ages augmented this little by their fables, and Meroveus figured in the lists of the kings of the Frankish nation, of which he could have been only one among many petty chiefs. This list of French kings included Pharamundus or Pharamond, the reputed founder of the monarchy, and after him, in regular descent and succession, Clodion, Meroveus, Childericus or Childéric, and Chlodoveus or Clovis. Pharamundus is not mentioned by Gregory of Tours, the best, as well as the first in point of time, of the early historians of France. Gregory, however, does mention Clodion, or, as he writes the name, Chlogion, and states that, according to some accounts, he resided in the castle of Disparium, on the border of the Thoringi, the locality of which is much disputed; that he surprised and took Camaracum (Caenbrai) and subdued all the country as far as the Sumina (Somme); he adds, that some affirmed that Meroveus was of the race of this Chlogion. (Greg. Turon. Hist. Francor. ii. 9.) The date of this conquest is not determined. Some place it before A. D. 423, in which year the Clodion who had occupied a part of Gaul was driven out by Aëtius; others make this a second and later invasion, placing it as late as A. D. 445, and consider the acquisition as permanent. That Meroveus succeeded Clodius is probable, but it could scarcely have been in more than a petty chieftainship. Whether he was the son of Clodion or his nephew is very doubtful: the accounts of his descent vary; one of them, which makes him the offspring of Clodion's wife by a monster, is obviously of later date, but may suggest the suspicion that he was illegitimate. The Chronicon of Ado of Vienne ascribes to the Franks under Meroveus the capture of Treves

(Trèves), the burning of Mettis (Mets), and the invasion of the country as far as Aureliani or Aurelia (Orléans); but the silence of Gregory of Tours renders the account very questionable, unless we suppose that Meroveus and the Franks formed part of the army of Attila, who about that time destroyed Metz and penetrated to Orleans: but this is contrary to the opinion of Dubos, and most modern historians, who range Meroveus and his Franks on the side of Aëtius. If we suppose that Meroveus was with Attila, we may perhaps adopt the supposition that he was one of the two Frankish princes, sons of a deceased king, who according to the rhetorician Priscus (apud Excerpta de Legationibus, p. 40, ed. Paris), disputed their father's succession, and claimed the assistance, the one of Attila, the other of Aëtius. This would sufficiently accord with the Chronicon of Prosper Tyro, which places the commencement of Meroveus's reign in A.D. 448, but the authority of this probably interpolated chronicle is not great. Meroveus is said to have reigned ten years. That he was the father of Childeric, and the grandfather of Clovis, appears well established; as well as that the first race of the Frankish kings of Gaul derived from him the title Merovingi or Merovingi, Merovingian; unless we suppose with Siamondi (Hist. des Français, ch. iii.) that this name was derived from an earlier Meroveus, the common ancestor of all the kings of the tribes who formed the Frankish confederacy. (Greg. Turon. l. c.; Fredegarius Scholast. Greg. Turon. Historia Epitomal, c. 9; Priscus, l. c.; Gesta Regum Francorum; Ado Vienn. Chron.; Mezerai, Le P. Daniel, Velly, Histoire de France; Dubos, Hist. Crit. de l'Etablissement de la Monarchie Francoise; Siamondi, Hist. des Français, ch. iv.) [J.C.M.]

MER'ULA, was a surname of the Gens Cornelia at Rome. It signifies an osule or blackbird. (Varr. R. R. iii. 2. §§ 2, 38; Quint. Inst. i. 6. § 38.) The following Cornelii Merulae occur in history:—

1. L. CORNELIUS L. F. MERULA, was consul in B.C. 193. His province was Gallia Cisalpina. Merula closed an active predatory campaign by a total defeat of the Boian Gauls in the neighbourhood of Mutina. But since his victory cost the Romans dear, and the officers of Merula accused him of negligence on his march to Mutina, the senate refused him a triumph on his return to Rome. (Liv. xxxiv. 54, 55, 56, 57, xxxv. 4, 5, 6, 8.)

2. CN. (CORNELIUS?) MERULA, was appointed legatus by the senate in B.C. 162—161, to adjust the disputes between the brothers Ptolemy Philometor and Physcon respecting the sovereignty of Cyprus. Merula accompanied Physcon to Crete and Asia Minor, and, after an ineffectual embassy to the elder brother at Alexandria, he induced the senate, on his return to Rome, to cancel the existing treaty with Philometor. (Polyb. xxxi. 18, 25, 26, 27, xxxii. 1.)

3. L. CORNELIUS MERULA, was flamen dialis, and, on the deposition of L. Cinna in B.C. 87, was elected consul in his place. [CORNELIUS CINNA, No. 2.] On the return of Marius from exile in the same year Merula was summoned to take his trial for illegally exercising the consulship. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 113.) He had already resigned it, but his condemnation was certain. Merula therefore anticipated his sentence by opening his veins in the sanctuary of the Capitoline Jupiter. Before he inflicted his death-wounds he carefully laid aside his official head-dress (apex), and left a record in writing that he had not profaned by death the sacred emblem of his pontificate. His last breath was spent in imprecating curses on his murderers, Cinna and Marius. The priesthood of the flamen dialis was not filled up until 73 years after Merula's death. (Appian, B. C. i. 65, 70, 75; Vell. ii. 20, 22; Flor. iii. 21. § 61; Val. Max. ix. 12. § 8; Dion Cass. liv. 36; Tac. Ann. iii. 58; Plut. Mar. 41, 45; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 40; Diod. ap. Val. Fr.; August. de Civ. Dei, iii. 27; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Flamen.) [W.B.D.]

MERYLLUS (Μέρυλλος), a Greek writer, who wrote a work on Boeotia (Plut. Par. Min. c. 14), and another on Italy (ibid. c. 26). In the latter passage of Plutarch, perhaps Dercylus is the correct reading, as Dercylus was the author of a work on Italy. (Vossius, De Hist. Graec. p. 469. ed. Westermann.) [DERCYLUS.]

MESATEUS (Μεσατέως), a surname of Dionysus, derived from the town of Mesatis, where, according to a tradition at Patrae, he had been educated. (Paus. vii. 18. § 3, 21. § 2.) [L.S.]

MESCI'NIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

MESOMED'ES (Μεσομήδης), a lyric and epigrammatic poet under Hadrian and the Antonines, was a native of Crete, and a freedman of Hadrian, whose favourite Antinous he celebrated in a poem. (Suid. a. v.) A salary, which he had received from Hadrian, was diminished by Antoninus Pius. (Capit. Ant. Pius, 7.) Three poems of his are preserved in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anth. vol. ii. p. 292; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 6, vol. xiii. p. 917; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. pp. 130, 131.) [P.S.]

MESSALLA, a cognomen of the Gens Valeria at Rome, was originally assumed by M. Valerius Maximus [No. 1] after his relief of Messana in Sicily from blockade by the Carthaginians in the second year of the first Punic war, B.C. 263. (Macrob. Sat. i. 6; Sen. Brev. Vit. 13.) For the antiquity of the Messalla branch of the Valerian gens see Tibullus (Carm. i. 28; comp. Dionys. iv. 67; Rutil. Iter. i. 169; Sidon. Apoll. Ep. i. 9). They appear for the first time on the consular Fasti in B.C. 263, and for the last in A.D. 506; and, during this period of nearly eight centuries, they held twenty-two consulships and three censorships. (Sidon. Apoll. Carm. ix. 302; Rutil. l. c.; Symmach. Ep. vii. 90.) The cognomen Messalla, frequently written Messala, appears with the agnomens Barbatu, Niger, Rufus, with the nomens Ennodius, Pacatus, Silius, Thrasia Priscus, Vipstanus, and with the praenomens Potitus and Volesus, and was itself originally, and when combined with Corvinus, an agnomen, as M. Valerius Maximus Corvinus Messalla, i. e. of Messana.

1. M'. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MAXIMUS CORVINUS MESSALLA, son of M. Valerius Maximus Corvinus, was consul in B.C. 263, the second year of the first Punic war. Sicily was assigned to both the consuls for their province. Their campaign was brilliant: more than sixty of the Sicilian towns acknowledged the supremacy of Rome, and the consuls concluded a peace with Hieron, which lasted the remainder of his long life, and proved equally advantageous to both Syracuse and Rome. [HIERON, No. 2.] Messalla's share in this campaign is inseparable from that of M. Otacilius

Crassus [CRASSUS, OTACILIUS, No. 1], his colleague. But that his contemporaries ascribed to Messalla the principal merit of these events appears from his alone triumphing "De Paeneis et Rege Siculorum Hierone" (Fust.), as well as from the cognomen he obtained on relieving Messana from blockade, which, slightly changed in pronunciation (Messana — Messalla), remained in the Valerian family for nearly eight centuries. A house on the Palatine hill was a more tangible recompense of his services (Ascon. in Pisonias. p. 13, Orelli); and his triumph was distinguished by two remarkable monuments of his victory—by a pictorial representation of a battle with the Sicilian and Punic armies, which he placed in the pronaos of the Curia Hostilia (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. § 7; Schol. Bob. in Vatinian. p. 3:8, Orelli; comp. Liv. xli. 28), and which Pliny regards as one of the earliest encouragements to art at Rome—and by a sundial, Horologium, from the booty of Catania, which was set up on a column behind the rostra, in the forum. (Varro, ap. Plin. H. N. vii. 60; Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Horologium.) Messalla was censor in B.C. 252, when he degraded 400 equites to aerarians for neglect of duty in Sicily. (Polyb. i. 16, 17; Diod. Ecl. xxiii. 5; Zonar. viii. 9; Liv. xvi. Epit.; Eutrop. ii. 19; Oros. iv. 7; Sen. Brev. Vit. 13; Macrobi. Sat. i. 6; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 7.)

2. M. VALERIUS M'. F. M. N. MESSALLA, son probably of the preceding, was consul in B.C. 226. His year of office was employed in organising a general levy of the Italian nations against an expected invasion of the Gauls from both sides of the Alps. (Zonar. viii. 19; Oros. iv. 13; Fasti; comp. Polyb. ii. 23.)

3. M. VALERIUS M. F. M'. N. MESSALLA, son of the preceding, was prefect of the fleet in Sicily in B.C. 210, the ninth year of the second Punic war. He was ordered by M. Valerius Laevinus [LAEVINUS, No. 2], the consul of that year, to effect a landing in Africa. Messalla ravaged the neighbourhood of Utica, and returned with his booty and captives to Lilybaeum fourteen days after his departure from Sicily. Laevinus being directed by the senate to nominate a dictator, named his lieutenant Messalla, but both the senate and people cancelled the appointment. (Liv. xxvii. 5.) He is probably the same Messalla who was praetor peregrinus in B.C. 194, and consul in 188. In the latter year the province of Liguria and a consular army were assigned him, but he performed nothing memorable, and gave some offence by returning late in the year to hold the next comitia. In B.C. 174 Messalla was legatus in Macedonia, and in 172 was appointed decemvir sacrorum, in the room of M. Aemilius Papus, deceased. (Liv. xxxiv. 54, 55, xxxviii. 35, 42, xli. 22, xlii. 28.)

4. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MESSALLA, son of the preceding, was consul in B.C. 161. His consulate was remarkable chiefly for a decree of the senate prohibiting the residence of Greek rhetoricians at Rome. (Gell. ii. 24, xv. 11; Suet. Clar. Rhet. i.) The "Phormion" and "Eunuch" of Terence were first acted in this year. (Titul. Phorm. et Eunuch. Terentii.) Messalla, having been once degraded by the censors, became himself censor in B.C. 154. (Val. Max. ii. 9. § 9.)

5. — VALERIUS MESSALLA was a legatus of the consul P. Rutilius Lupus at the breaking out of the Marius or Social War, B.C. 90. (Appian. B. C. i. 40.)

6. M. VALERIUS M. F. M. N. MESSALLA, with the agnomen NIGER, was praetor in the year of Cicero's consulship, B.C. 63, and consul in 61, the year in which Clodius profaned the mysteries of the Bona Dea, and Cn. Pompey triumphed for his several victories over the Cilician pirates, Tigranes and Mithridates. Messalla, as consul, took an active part in the prosecution of Clodius, and tried to elicit from Pompey a public avowal of his opinion and intentions. Cicero's character of Messalla (ad Att. i. 14. § 6) must be regarded as a mere party-sketch, heightened by the feelings and circumstances of the time at which it was drawn. Messalla was censor in B.C. 55, a member of the college of pontifices (pseudo-Cic. Harusp. Resp. 6), and a respectable orator. (Cic. Brut. 70.) In B.C. 80 he was engaged in collecting evidence for the defence in the cause of Sextus Roscius of Ameria (id. pro Sext. Rosc. 51); in 62 he solicited Cicero to undertake the defence of his kinsman, P. Sulla (id. pro Sull. 6); and in 54 he was one of the six orators whom M. Aemilius Scaurus retained on his trial. (Ascon. in Scaurians. p. 20, Orelli.) Messalla married a sister of the orator Q. Hortensius (Cic. ad Fam. viii. 2, 4), by whom he had at least one son, No. 7. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 46; Caes. B. G. i. 2; Plin. H. N. vi. 26, viii. 36, xxxviii. 2; Cic. ad Att. i. 12, 13, 14.)

7. M. VALERIUS MESSALLA, son of the preceding, was a successful candidate for the consulship in B.C. 53; but, owing to the disturbances at Rome, and the repeated appointment of interreges, he could not enter upon its functions until half of his official year had expired. (Dion Cass. xl. 17, 45; Appian. B. C. ii. 19; Plut. Pomp. 54; Ascon. ad Milonian. p. 48, Orelli.) Messalla paid high for his election (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16. § 6); his success was anxiously desired by Cicero, who at that time was in daily dread of Clodius (id. ad Quint. Fratr. iii. 1, 2, 5, 8, 9, 16); but he was secretly opposed by Cn. Pompey, who disliked Messalla, and wanted to be named dictator himself. (Id. ad Att. iv. 9, 15.) Messalla was prosecuted for bribery at the comitia by Q. Pompeius Rufus, a grandson of Sulla's. Cicero admitted Messalla's guilt, but, in common with the bulk of the senatorial party, gave him his political support. (Id. ad Att. iv. 16, ad Quint. Fratr. iii. 2.) He was defended by his uncle, Q. Hortensius (Cic. Brut. 96); acquitted of direct bribery, but found guilty of transgressing the Lex Licinia de Sodalibus, that is, of causing and countenancing assemblies or clubs for controlling the elections. (Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Ambitus; Cic. ad Fam. viii. 2, 4.) Messalla was stoned by the Clodian mob during his consulate. (Schol. Bob. in Or. de aere al. Melon. p. 343, Orelli.) In B.C. 47 Messalla was with Caesar in the East, and was probably the legatus of that name whom in the African war in the following year a mutinous centurion and his company besieged in Messana. (Auct. B. Afr. 28.) After the battle of Thapsus Messalla was sent to Utica. (Id. ib.) Messalla was in high repute for his skill in surgery, on which science he wrote; and scanty fragments from his treatise are preserved by Gellius (N. A. xiii. 14, 15) and Festus (v. "serpula serpens" and "verniera"). Cicero (ad Fam. vi. 18) mentions letters of Messalla written during the and Spanish war, in B. C. 45. He was the purchaser of the domus Autroniana. (Cic. ad Att. i. 15.)

6. M. VALERIUS, M. P. M. N. MESSALLA CORVINUS, son of the preceding, was born, according to Eusebius, in B. C. 59, in the same year with Livy the historian. (Hieron. in Euseb. Chron. Olymp. 180. 2.) Since, however, Messalla had gained some reputation for eloquence before the breaking out of the civil war in B. C. 43, the earlier date assigned by Scaliger (ad loc. Euseb.) for his birth, about B. C. 70, seems preferable. (Ellendt, Proleg. ad Cic. Brut. p. 131, comp. Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 183, B. C. 59.) He was partly educated at Athens (Cic. ad Att. xii. 32), where probably began his intimacy with Horace and L. Bibulus. (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 81—86; Appian, B. C. iv. 38; comp. Plut. Brut. 24.) In the interval between Caesar's death and the formation of the triumvirate, Messalla returned to Italy. (Cic. ad Att. xv. 17.) He attached himself to the senatorial party, and especially to its leader, Cassius, whom, long after, when he had become the friend of Augustus, he was accustomed to call "my general." (Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Dion Cass. xlvii. 24; Plut. Brut. 40; Vell. ii. 71.) Messalla was proscribed; but since his kinsmen proved his absence from Rome at the time of Caesar's assassination, the triumvirs, notwithstanding his wealth and influence (Appian, l. c.; Cic. ad Att. xvi. 16), erased his name from the list, and offered him security for his person and property. Messalla, however, rejected their offers, followed Cassius into Asia, held the third place in the command of the republican army (Vell. Pat. ii. 71), and at Philippi, in the first day's battle, turned Augustus's flank, stormed his camp, and narrowly missed taking him prisoner. (Plut. Brut. 41.) To Messalla, on the night before the battle, Cassius made his protest that, like Cn. Pompey at Pharsalia, he was compelled to set his country's fortune on a single stake. (Id. ib. 40.) After the death of Brutus and Cassius, Messalla, with a numerous body of fugitives, took refuge in the island of Thasos. His followers, though defeated, were not disorganised and offered him the command. But he induced them to accept honourable terms from Antony (Appian, B. C. iv. 38), to whom he attached himself until Cleopatra's influence made his ruin certain and easy to be foreseen. Messalla then, for the third time, changed his party, and served Augustus effectively in Sicily (Appian, B. C. v. 102—103, 110—113) B. C. 36; against the Salassians, a mountain tribe, lying between the Graian and the Pennine Alps, B. C. 34 (Dion Cass. xlix. 38; Appian, Illyr. 17; Strab. iv. p. 189), and at Actium, B. C. 31. A decree of the senate had abrogated Antony's consulship for B. C. 31, and Messalla was appointed to the vacant place. (Dion Cass. l. 10.) At Actium he commanded the centre of the fleet, and so highly distinguished himself, that Augustus remarked, Messalla had now fought as well for him as formerly at Philippi against him. "I have always taken the best and justest side," was Messalla's adroit rejoinder. (Plut. Brut. 53.) At Daphne in Syria, Messalla proved himself an unscrupulous partisan, by dispersing among distant legions and garrisons Antony's gladiators, and finally destroying them, although they had not submitted until life and freedom had been guaranteed them. (Dion Cass. li. 7.) He was proconsul of Aquitaine in

B. C. 28—27, and obtained a triumph for his reduction of that province. (Fasti; Dion Cass. liii. 12; Appian, B. C. iv. 38; Tibull. i. 7, ii. 1. 33, ii. 5. 117, iv. 1, iv. 8. 8.) Shortly before or immediately after his administration of Aquitaine Messalla held a prefecture in Asia Minor. (Tibull. i. 3.) He was deputed by the senate, probably in B. C. 30, to greet Augustus with the title of "Pater Patriæ;" and the opening of his address on that occasion is preserved by Suetonius. (Aug. 58; comp. Flor. iv. 12. § 66; Ovid. Fast. ii. 127, Trist. ii. 39, 181; Dion Cass. lvi. 8, 41.) During the disturbances at the comitia in B. C. 27, Augustus nominated Messalla to the revived office of warden of the city; but he resigned it in a few days, either because he deemed its functions unconstitutional—incivilem potestatem (Euseb. 1991),—or himself unequal to their discharge—quasi necius imperandi (Tac. Ann. vi. 11; comp. Dion Cass. liv. 6). Messalla soon afterwards withdrew from all public employments except his aurgarship, to which Augustus had specially appointed him, although, at the time of his admission, there was no vacancy in the augural college. (Dion Cass. xlix. 16.) About two years before his death, which happened about the middle of Augustus's reign, B. C. 3—A. D. 3 (Dialog. de Orat. 17), Messalla's memory failed him, and he often could not recall his own name. (Hieron. ad Euseb. 2027; Plin. H. N. vii. 24.) A statue erected by Augustus in his own forum to M. Valerius Corvus, consul in B. C. 348, was probably either a tribute to his living or a memorial of his deceased friend Messalla. (Gell. ix. 11; comp. Suet. Aug. 21.) He left at least one son, Aurelius Cotta Messallinus [COTTA, No. 12]; and he had a brother who bore the name of Gellius Poplicola. (Dion Cass. xlvii. 24.) His tomb was of remarkable splendour. (Mart. Ep. viii. 3, x. 2.)

Messalla was as much distinguished in the literary as in the political world of Rome. He was a patron of learning and the arts, and was himself an historian, a poet, a grammarian, and an orator. He wrote a history, or, more properly, commentaries on the civil wars after Caesar's death, from which both Suetonius (Aug. 58, 74) and Plutarch (Brut. 40, 41. 45, 53) derived materials. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34; Tibull. iv. 1. 5.) Towards the close of his life he composed a genealogical work, De Romanis Familiis (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 13, xxxv. 2; Suet. Aug. 74.) The treatise, however, de Progenie Augusti, which sometimes accompanies Eutropius and the minor Roman historians, is the forgery of a much later age. Messalla's poems were probably occasional—verses de société merely—and of a satirical or even licentious character. (Plin. Ep. v. 3.) His writings as a grammarian were numerous and minute, comprising treatises on collocation and lexicography, and on the powers and uses of single letters. The titles of two of these treatises have been preserved, "Liber de S. Litera" (Quinct. Inst. i. 7. § 23, i. 5. § 15, ix. 4. § 38) and "Liber de involute Dictis" (Fest. v. Sanates); and Suetonius (Ill. Gr. 4) cites part of a grammatical work or letter of Messalla's. (Quinct. Inst. i. 5. § 61, 6. § 42, viii. 3. § 24, ix. 4. § 38.) His eloquence reflected the character of his age. It was an era of transition from the decaying forms of an aristocratical republic to the vigorous centralisation of the imperial system of Trajan and the Antonines. The ancient freedom of the forum was extinct; no great public causes survived; the measures of the government and the person of the ruler were hazardous topics, and the orator addressed not a mixed multitude, but a select audience. A scholastic spirit was rapidly encroaching upon the province of eloquence, and preparing the way for the rhetorical fineness of the later Roman schools. Messalla was not chargeable with all the vices of the rhetoricians, but neither had he retained the purity of the preceding age. He was preferred to Cicero, and the preference is a proof of the incompetence of his critics. More smooth and correct than vigorous or original, he persuaded rather than convinced, and conciliated rather than persuaded. His health was feeble, and the proemia of his speeches generally pleaded indisposition and solicited indulgence. (Quint. iv. 1. § 8; Dialog. de Orat. 17, 18, 21.) Of his speeches the following titles have been transmitted: 1. Contra Aufidium (Quint. x. 1. § 22); 2. Pro Liburnia, of which there is a fragment in Festus (s. v. tabem); 3. Pro Pythodoro (Sen. Contr. ii. 12, p. 171, Bipont. ed.); 4. Contra Antonii Literas (Charis. p. 103); and 5. De Antonii Statuis (id. p. 80), both of which were probably delivered in B.C. 32, 31. Messalla mostly took the defendants' side, and was frequently associated in causes with C. Ainius Pollio. (Quint. Inst. x. 1. § 24.) He recommended and practised translation from the Greek orators; and his version of the Phryne of Hyperides was thought to exhibit remarkable skill in either language. (Quint. x. 5. § 2.) Messalla was somewhat of a jurist in his diction, preferring native Latinisms to adoptive Greek words: e. g. funambulus to schoenobates (Schol. Cruqu. ad Hor. Sat. i. 10, 28), and archaisms to novelties in expression and orthography. In the age of Domitian Messalla had become nearly obsolete; beside the gaudy ornaments and measured declamation of the rhetoricians, he appeared tame and insipid. (Sen. Excerpt. Contr. iii. Proem.; Dialog. de Orat. 21; Meyer, Fragm. Or. Rom. p. 208; Schott, de Rhet. ap. Sen. Memor.)

His political eminence, the wealth he inherited or acquired in the civil wars (Casaub. in Pers. Sat. ii. 71), and the favour of Antony and Augustus, rendered Messalla one of the principal persons of his age, and an effective patron of its literature. (Quint. xii. 10. § 11, 11. § 28.) His friendship for Horace (Od. iii. 21, Sat. i. 6. 42, 10. 29, 85, A. P. 371) and his intimacy with Tibullus are well known. In the elegies of the latter poet, indeed, even where he is not (as in elegies i. 7, iv. 1) the immediate subject of the poem, the name of Messalla is continually introduced. The dedication of the "Ciris," a doubtful work, is not sufficient proof of his friendship with Virgil; but the companion of "Plotius and Varius, of Maecenas and Octavius" (Hor. Sat. i. 10. 81), cannot well have been unknown to the author of the Eclogues and Georgics. He directed Ovid's early studies (ex Pont. iv. 16), and Tiberius sought his acquaintance in early manhood, and took him for his model in eloquence. (Suet. Tib. 70.) Some of Messalla's bon mots, which were highly relished by his contemporaries, have been handed down to us. (Sen. Swas. 1, 2, 3.) He was a man well suited to the era in which he lived. He was courtly, cautious, and servicable to the government both abroad and at home; and his early passion for liberty easily subsided into reasonable acquiescence in a government that at least protected life and property. If he merited his own description of Dellius [Dellius], a man who had danced through a revolution (Sen. Swas. 1), he atoned for his compliance by his zeal in behalf of his friends (Plut. Brut. 53), by his encouragement of literary aspirants (Sen. Swas. 6), and by his intimacy with the best and wisest men of his generation.

Messalla's life forms the subject of several monographies, e. g. De Burigny, Mémoires de l'Acad. des Inscriptions. xxxiv. p. 99 ff.; D. G. Moler, Disputat. de M. Val. Corv. Messalla, Altorf 1689, 4to.; L. Wiese, de M. Val. Messall. Corv. Vita et Studii Doctrinae, Berol. 1829, 8vo.; to which add Ellendt, Proleg. ad Cic. Brut. pp. 131-138.

9. POTITI vs VALERIUS MESSALLA, was one of the supplementary consuls in B.C. 29. He was probably father of No. 11.

10. M. VALERIUS M. P. M. N. MESSALLA BARBATUS, with the agnomen APPLANTUS, was consul in B.C. 12, and died in his year of office. He was the father (or grandfather) of the empress Messallina [MESSALLINA, No. 1]; and Suetonius (Claud. 26) calls him cousin of the emperor Claudius I. Strictly speaking, however, he was cousin only by marriage; and there is some difference of opinion as to the name of his wife. Lipsius (ad Tac. Ann. xi. 37) and Perizonius (Ep. ad N. Heins. Collect. Burmann. iv. pp. 301-302) make Messalla to have married Domitia Lepida, daughter of Antonia major, and granddaughter of M. Antony and Octavia. Claudius, son of Antonia minor, was therefore Domitia Lepida's first cousin, but Messalla's cousin only by marriage. The following stemma will show their respective relationship:—

Ryckius (ad loc. Tac.), on the other hand, and Brotier (Tac. Supplem. Stemma. Caca.), make Messallae Barbati, father and son, of whom the elder married Marcella major, daughter of Claudius Marcellus, consul B.C. 50, and Octavia, and the younger Domitia Lepida. (Dion Cass. liv. 24; Tac. Ann. xi. 37.)

11. L. VALERIUS POTITI P. MESSALLA TOLLEUS, son probably of No. 9, was consul in A.D. 5, and afterwards proconsul of Asia, where his cruelties drew on him the anger of Augustus and a condemnatory decree from the senate. According to Seneca, Messalla in one day decapitated 300 persons, and walked among the headless trunks exclaiming "a royal spectacle, and more than royal, for what king ever did the like!" (Tac. Ann. ii. 68; Sen. de Ira, ii. 5; Fasti.)

12. M. VALERIUS M. P. MESSALLA, consul in A.D. 20, moved at the first meeting of the senate under Tiberius, in A.D. 14, that the oath to the emperor (sacramentum) should for the future be repeated annually instead of at intervals of five or ten years (Tac. Ann. i. 8, iii. 2; Fasti.)

13. M. VALERIUS MESSALLA, great-grandson of M. Valerius Messalla Corvinus (No. 8), was Nero's colleague in the consulship A. D. 58. His immediate predecessors had squandered the wealth of his ancestors; and Messalla, who had been content with honourable poverty, received from the treasury an allowance to enable him to meet the expenses of the consulship. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 34; comp. Suet. Ner. 10.)

14. L. VESPASIANUS MESSALLA, was legionary tribune in Vespasian's army, A. D. 70. He rescued the legatus Aponius Saturninus from the fury of the soldiers who suspected him of corresponding with the Vitellian party. Messalla was brother of Aquilius Regulus, the notorious delator in Domitian's reign (Plin. Ep. i. 5). He is one of Tacitus' authorities for the history of the civil wars after Galba's death, and a principal interlocutor in the dialogue De Oratoribus, ascribed to Tacitus. (Tac. Hist. iii. 9, 11, 18, 25, 28, iv. 42, Dialog. de Orat. 15—25.) [W. B. D.]

MESSALLA, SILIUS, was consul suffectus from the 1st of May, A. D. 193, and was the person who formally announced to the senate the deposition of Didius Julianus and the elevation of Septimius Severus. He is apparently the Messalla who stands in the Fasti as consul for A. D. 214, and who subsequently (A. D. 218) fell a sacrifice to the jealous tyranny of Elagabalus. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 17, lxxix. 5.) [W. R.]

MESSALLINA STATILIA, granddaughter of T. Statilius Taurus, coa. A. D. 11, was the third wife of the emperor Nero, who married her in A. D. 66. She had previously espoused Atticus Vestinus, coa. in that year, whom Nero put to death without accusation or trial, merely that he might marry Messallina. After Nero's death Otho, had he been successful against Vitellius, purposed to have married her, and in the letters he sent to his friends before he destroyed himself, were some addressed to Messallina. (Tac. Ann. xv. 68; Suet. Ner. 35, Oth. 10.) There are only Greek coins of this empress. [W. B. D.]

MESSALLINA, VALE'RIA, daughter of M. Valerius Messalla Barbatius and of Domitia Lepida, was the third wife of the emperor Claudius I. She married Claudius, to whom she was previously related, before his accession to the empire. Her character is drawn in the darkest colours by the almost contemporary pencils of Tacitus and the elder Pliny, by the satirist Juvenal, who makes her the exemplar of female profligacy, and by the historian Dion Cassius, who wrote long after any motive remained for exaggerating her crimes. We must accept their evidence; but we may remember that in the reign of Nero even Messallina's vices may have received a deeper tinge from malignity and fear; that it was the interest of Agrippina (AGRI'PPINA, No. 2), her successor in the imperial bed, to blacken her reputation, and that the fears of her confederates may have led them to ascribe their common guilt to their victim alone. That the reign of Claudius owed some of its worst features to the influence of his wives and freedmen is beyond doubt; and it is equally certain that Messallina was faithless as a wife, and implacable where her fears were aroused, or her passions or avarice were to be gratified. The freedmen of Claudius, especially Polybius and Narcissus, were her confe-derates; the emperor was her instrument and her dupe; the most illustrious families of Rome were polluted by her favour, or sacrificed to her cupidity or hate, and the absence of virtue was not concealed by a lingering sense of shame or even by a specious veil of decorum. Among her most eminent victims were the two Julias, one the daughter of Germanicus [JULIA, No. 8], the other the daughter of Drusus, the son of Tiberius [JULIA, No. 9], whom she offered up, the former to her jealousy, the latter to her pride; C. Appius Silanus, who had rejected her advances and spurned her favourite Narcissus; Justus Antonius, whose impeachment of herself she anticipated by accusing him [CATONIUS JUSTUS]; M. Vinicius, who had married a daughter of Germanicus [JULIA, No. 8], and whose illustrious birth and affinity to Claudius awakened her fears; and Valerius Asiaticus, whose mistress Poppaea she envied, and whose estates she coveted. The conspiracy of Annianus Vinicianus and Camillus Scribonianus in A. D. 42, afforded Messallina the means of satiating her thirst for gold, vengeance, and intrigue. Claudius was timid, and timidity made him cruel. Slaves were encouraged to inform against their masters; members of the noblest houses were subjected to the ignominy of torture and a public execution; their heads were exposed in the forum; their bodies were flung down the steps of the Capitol; the prisons were filled with a crowd of both sexes; even strangers were not secure from her suspicions or solicitations; and the only refuge from her love or hate was the surrender of an estate or a province, an office or a purse, to herself or her satellites. The rights of citizenship were sold by Messallina and the freedmen with shameless indifference to any purchaser, and it was currently said that the Roman civitas might be purchased for two cracked drinking cups. Nor was the ambition of Messallina inferior to her other passions. She disposed of legions and provinces without consulting either Claudius or the senate; she corrupted or intimidated the judicial tribunals; her creatures filled the lowest as well as the highest public offices; and their incompetency for the posts they had bought led in A. D. 43 to a scarcity and tumult. The charms, the arts, or the threats of Messallina were so potent with the stupid Claudius that he thought her worthy of the honours which Livia, the wife of Augustus, had enjoyed; he alone was ignorant of her infidelities, and sometimes even the unconscious minister of her pleasures. At his triumph for the campaign in Britain (A. D. 44), Messallina followed his chariot in a carpentum or covered carriage (comp. Dion Cass. lx. 33; Tac. Ann. xii. 42; Suet. Claud. 17)—a privilege requiring a special grant from the senate. The adulteress received the title of Augusta and the right of precedence—ius consecrationis—at all assemblies; her lover, Sabinus, once prefect of Gaul, but for his crimes degraded to a gladiator, was, at her request, reprieved from death in the arena; and the emperor caused a serious riot at Rome by withholding the popular pantomime Mnester from the stage while Messallina detained him in the palace. Messallina was safe so long as the freedmen felt themselves secure; but when her malice or her rashness endangered her accomplices, her doom was inevitable. She had procured the death of Polybius, and Narcissus perceived the frail tenure of his own station and life. The insane folly of Messallina, in A. D. 48, furnished the means of her own destruction. Hitherto she had been content with the usual excesses of a profligate age, with the secrecy of the palace, or the freedom of the brothel. But in A. D. 47 she had conceived a violent passion for a handsome Roman youth, C. Silius. She compelled him to divorce his wife Junia Silana, and in return discarded her favourite Mnestor. In 48, her passion broke through the last restraints of decency and prudence, and, during the absence of Claudius at Ostia, she publicly married Silius with all the rites of a legal connubium. Messallina had wrought upon the fears of Claudius for the destruction of others; those fears were now turned against herself. Narcissus persuaded the feeble emperor that Silius and Messallina would not have dared such an outrage had they not determined also to deprive him of empire and life. Claudius wavered long, and at length Narcissus himself issued Messallina's death-warrant, which he committed to his freedman Euodus, and to a tribune of the guards. Without transcribing Tacitus it is impossible to describe worthily the irresolution of the emperor, the trepidation of the freedmen, the maternal love of Domitia Lepida, and the helpless agony of Messallina. She perished by the tribune's hand in the gardens of Lucullus—a portion of the demesnes of her victim Valerius Asiaticus. Her name, titles, and statues were removed from the palace and the public buildings of Rome by a decree of the senate. She left two children by Claudius, Britannicus and Octavia. There are Greek and colonial but no Latin coins of this empress. The inscription on her coins is VALERIA MESSALINA. VALERIA MESSALINA AUG. (Tac. Ann. xi. 1, 2, 12, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38; Dion Cass. ix. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 27, 28, 29, 31; Juv. Sat. vi. 115—135, x. 333—336, xiv. 331; Suet. Claud. 17, 26, 27, 29, 36, 37, 39, Ner. 6, Vitell. 2; Vict. Caes. iv; Plin. H. N. x. 63; Sen. Mort. Claud.; Joseph. Antiq. x. 8 § 1, Bell. ii. 12 § 8.) [W. B. D.]

MESSALLINUS AURELIUS COTTA. [COTTA, No. 12.]

MESSALLINUS, M. VALERIUS CATUL-LUS, was governor of the Libyan Pentapolis in the reigns of Vespasian and Titus, where he treated the Jewish provincials with extreme cruelty, and by a fictitious plot involved in a charge of perdition the principal Jews residing at Alexandria and Rome, and among them the historian Josephus. Messallinus was recalled from his province, but eluded the punishment due to his crimes, probably through Domitian's interest with his father and brother. Under Domitian Messallinus distinguished himself as a delator. Josephus represents him as dying in extreme torments aggravated by an evil conscience. Messallinus was probably consul in A. D. 73. (Fasti; Joseph. B. J. vii. 11. § 3; Plin. Ep. iv. 22; Juv. Sat. iv. 113—122.) [W. B. D.]

MESSAPEUS (Μεσάπευς), a surname of Zeus, under which he had a sanctuary between Amyclae and mount Taygetus. It was said to have been derived from a priest of the name of Messapeus. (Paus. iii. 20. § 3.) [L. S.]

MESSA'PUS (Μεσσαπός). 1. A Boeotian, from whom Mount Messapion, on the coast of Boeotia, and Messapia (also called Iapygia), in southern Italy, were believed to have derived their names. (Strab. ix. p. 405.)

2. A son of Neptune and king of Etruria, who was invulnerable, and a famous tamer of horses. (Virg. Aen. vii. 691, &c., with the note of Servius.) [L. S.]

MESSE'NE (Μεσσηνή), a daughter of Triopas, and wife of Polycraon, whom she induced to take possession of the country which was called after her, Messenia. She is also said to have introduced there the worship of Zeus and the mysteries of the great goddess of Eleusis. In the town of Messene she was honoured with a temple and heroic worship. (Paus. iv. 1. §§ 2, &c., 3. § 6, 27. § 4, 31. § 9.) [L. S.]

C. MESSIUS, was tribune of the plebs in A. C. 56, when he brought in a bill for Cicero's recall from exile. (Cic. Post. Red. in Sen. 8.) In the same year the Messian law, by the same tribune, assigned extraordinary powers to Cn. Pompey (id. ad Att. iv. 1.) Cicero defended Messius when he was recalled from a legatio, and attacked by the Caesarian party (id. ad Att. iv. 15, viii. 11). Messius afterwards appears as an adherent of Caesar's, whose troops he introduced into Acilia, a town in Africa. (Caes. B. A. 33.) Messius was seditious, but in what year is unknown. [W. B. D.]

MESSIUS MAXIMUS. [MAXIMUS.]

MESSIUS, VECTIUS, a Volscian, who, in B. C. 431, distinguished himself in battle against the Romans. (Liv. iv. 28, 29.) [W. B. D.]

MESTOR (Μήστωρ), the name of four mythical personages, of whom nothing of interest is related. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5, iii. 12. § 5; Hom. Il. xiv. 257.) [L. S.]

MESTRA (Μήστρα), a daughter of Erysichthon, and granddaughter of Triopas (whence she is called Triopeia, Ov. Met. viii. 872). She was sold by her hungry father, that he might obtain the means of satisfying his hunger. In order to escape from slavery, she prayed to Poseidon, who loved her, and conferred on her the power of metamorphosing herself whenever she was sold, and of thus each time returning to her father. (Tzet. ad Lyc. 1393; Ov. Met. viii. 847, &c.; Anton. Lib. i. who calls her Hypermetra.) [L. S.]

META (Μήτρα), a daughter of Hoples, and first wife of Aegeus. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 6.) In other traditions she was called Melite. (Schol. ad Eurip. Med. 668.) [L. S.]

METABUS (Μεταβός), a son of Sisypheus, from whom the town of Metapontum, in Southern Italy, was believed to have derived its name. (Strab. vi. p. 265; Serv. ad Aen. xi. 540; Steph. Byz. s. v. Μεταβόντιος.) [L. S.]

METACLEIDES (Μετακλέης), a peripatetic philosopher, who wrote on Homer, mentioned by Tatianus and Suidas (s. v.). There is some dispute as to whether the name should be Metacleides or Megacleides. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 321, 517.) [C. P. M.]

META'GENES (Μεταγένης), an Athenian comic poet of the Old Comedy, contemporary with Aristophanes, Phrynichus, and Plato. (Schol. in Aristoph. Av. 1297.) Suidas gives the following titles of his plays: — Ἀδραί, Μαυράνθος, Θουπέριον, Φιλοδότης, Ὀμηροί & Ἀσκληπ. some of which appear to be corrupt. (Meineke, Trag. Com. Graec. vol. i. pp. 218—221, vol. ii. pp. 751—760; Bergk, Com. Att. Ant. Reliq. p. 621; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 470.) [P. S.]

META'GENES, artists. 1. The son of Cirsiphron, and one of the architects of the temple of Artemis at Ephesus. [CHERSIPHRO'N.]

2. An Athenian architect in the time of Pericles, was engaged with Corcebus and Ictinus and Xenocles in the erection of the great temple at Eleusis. (Plut. Peric. 13.) [P. S.]

METANEIRA (Μετάνειρα), the wife of Celeus, and mother of Triptolemus, received Demeter on her arrival in Attica. (Hom. Hymn. in Cer. 161; Apollod. i. 5. § 1.) Pausanias (i. 39. § 1) calls her Meganeira. [L. S.]

METAPHRASTES, SY'MEON (Συμεὼν ὁ Μεταφράστης), a celebrated Byzantine writer, lived in the ninth and tenth centuries. He was descended from a noble family of great distinction in Constantinople, and, owing to his birth, his talents, and his great learning, he was raised to the highest dignities in the state; and we find that he successively held the offices of proto-secretarius, logotheta dromi, and perhaps magnus logotheta, and at least that of magister, whose office resembled much that of our president of the privy council. The title of Patricius was likewise conferred upon him. The circumstance of his having held the post of magister caused him to be frequently called Symeon Magister, especially when he is referred to as the author of the Annales quoted below, but his most common appellation is Symeon Metaphrastes, or simply Metaphrastes, a surname which was given to him on account of his having composed a celebrated paraphrase of the lives of the saints. There are many conflicting hypotheses as to the time when he lived, which the reader will find in the sources below. We shall only mention, that it appears from different passages in works of which the authorship of this Symeon (Metaphrastes) is pretty well established, that he lived in the time of the emperor Leo VI. Philosophus; that in 902 he was sent as ambassador to the Arabs in Crete, and in 904 to those Arabs who had conquered Thessalonica, whom he persuaded to desist from their plan of destroying that opulent city; and that he was still alive in the time of the emperor Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus. Michael Psellus wrote an Encomium of Metaphrastes, which is given by Leo Allatius, quoted below. The principal works of Metaphrastes are:—

1. Vitae Sanctorum. Metaphrastes, it is said, undertook this work at the suggestion of the emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus, but this is not very probable, unless the emperor requested him to do so while still a youth. The work, however, is no original composition, but only a paraphrase or metaphrase of the lives of a great number of saints which existed previously in writing; Metaphrastes has the merit of having re-written them in a very elegant style for his time, omitted many things which appeared irrelevant to him, and added others which he thought worth admitting. The biographers of Metaphrastes were in their turn remodelled by later writers, and in many places completely mutilated; but whatever was left untouched is easily to be distinguished from the additions. Fabricius gives a list of 539 lives which are commonly attributed to Metaphrastes: out of these, 122 are decidedly genuine; but, according to Cave, the greater part of the remaining 417, which are extant in MSS. in different libraries, can be traced to Metaphrastes. The principal lives are published, Greek and Latin, in "Bollandii Acta Sanctorum." Agapius, a monk, made an extract of them, which was published under the title

2. Annales, beginning with the emperor Leo Armenus (A. D. 813—820), and finishing with Romanus, the son of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, who reigned from 959—963. It is evident that the Metaphrastes who was ambassador in 902 cannot possibly be the author of a work that treats on matters which took place 60 years afterwards: thence some believe that the latter part of the Annales was written by another Metaphrastes, while Baronius thinks that the author of the whole of that work lived in the 12th century. The Annales were published with a Latin version by Combéfiis in Hist. Byzant. Script. post Theophanem, of which the edition by Immanuel Bekker, Bonn, 1838, 8vo., is a revised reprint. The Annales are a valuable source of Byzantine history.

3. Annales ab Orbe Conditio, said to be extant in MS.

4. Epistolae IX., Greek and Latin, apud Allatium, quoted below.

5. Carmina Pia duo Politica, apud Allatium, and in Poetae Graeci Veteres, ed. Lectius, Geneva, 1614, fol.

6. Sermo in Diem Sabbati Sancti, Latin, in the 3d vol. of Combéfiis, Biblioth. Concionator.

7. Εἰς τὸν δῆμον τῆς ὑπερπύλης Θεοτόκου, &c., In Lamentationem Sanctae Deiparae, &c., Greek and Latin, apud Allatium.

8. Several Hymns or Canones still used in the Greek church.

9. Ἡθικὰ λόγια, Sermones XXIV. de Moribus, extracted from the works of S. Basil, ed. Greek and Latin by Morellus, Paris, 1556, 8vo.; also Latin, by Stanislas Ilovius, in Cypra Basilii Magni; the same separate, Frankfort, 8vo. (when?) (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 683, x. 180, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 492, &c. ed. Geneva; Hankius, Script. Byzant. c. 24; Oudin, Dissertatio de Aetate et Scriptis Simeonis Metaphrastae, in his Commentarii; Baronius, Annales ad ann. 859; Leo Allatius, Diatriba de Simeonibus.) [W. P.]

METELLA. [CAECILIA.]

METELLUS, the name of a noble family of the plebeian Caecilia gens. This family is first mentioned in the course of the first Punic war, when one of its members obtained the consulship; and if we are to believe the satirical verse of Naevius,—Fato Metelli Romae sunt Consules,—it was indebted for its elevation to chance rather than its own merits. It subsequently became one of the most distinguished of the Roman families, and in the latter half of the second century before the Christian era it obtained an extraordinary number of the highest offices of the state. Q. Metellus, who was consul B. C. 143, had four sons, who were raised to the consulship in succession; and his brother L. Metellus, who was consul B. C. 142, had two sons, who were likewise elevated to the same dignity. The Metelli were distinguished as a family for their unwavering support of the party of the optimates. The etymology of the name is quite uncertain. Festus connects it (p. 146, ed. Müller), probably from mere similarity of sound, with mercenarii. It is very difficult to trace the genealogy of this family, and the following table is in many parts conjectural. The history of the Metelli is given at length by Drumann (Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. pp. 17—58.)

STEMMA METELLORUM.

1. L. CAECILIUS L. F. C. N. METELLUS, consul B. C. 251, with C. Furius Pacilus, in the first Carthaginian war, was sent with his colleague into Sicily to oppose Hasdrubal, the Carthaginian general. The Roman soldiers were so greatly alarmed at the elephants in the Carthaginian army, that their generals did not venture to attack the enemy, but lay inactive for a long time. At last, when Furius Pacilus returned to Italy with a part of the forces, Hasdrubal availed himself of the opportunity to attack Panormus, but was entirely defeated by Metellus, who slew a great number of his troops, and captured all his elephants, which he afterwards exhibited in his triumph at Rome. This victory established the Roman supremacy in Sicily, and may be said to have had a decisive influence on the fate of the war. (Polyb. i. 39, 40; Flor. ii. 2. § 27; Eutrop. ii. 24; Oros. iv. 9; Frontin. Strateg. ii. 5. § 4; Cic. de Rep. i. 1; Liv. Epit. 19; Plin. H. N. vii. 43. a. 45; Dionys. ii. 66.)

In B. C. 249, Metellus was magister equitum to the dictator A. Atilius Calatinus, and in B. C. 247 consul a second time with N. Fabius Buteo, but nothing of importance took place during this year. Four years afterwards (B. C. 243) he was elected pontifex maximus, and held this dignity for twenty-two years. He must, therefore, have died shortly before the commencement of the second Punic war, B. C. 221. An act of Metellus during his high-priesthood is recorded by the historians. In B. C. 241 he rescued the Palladium when the temple of Vesta was on fire, but lost his sight in consequence; he was, therefore, rewarded by the people with a statue on the Capitol, and the permission, previously granted to no one, of riding to the senate-house in a carriage. In addition to his other honours he was appointed dictator in B. C. 224, for the purpose of holding the comitia. His merits and distinctions are recorded by Pliny in an extract which he has made from the funeral oration delivered by his son, Q. Metellus. (Plin. Liv. Dionys. ll. cc.; Cic. Cl.

9, pro Scaur. 2; Val. Max. i. 4. § 4; Ov. Fest. vi. 436.)

2. Q. CAECILIUS L. F. L. N. METELLUS, son of the preceding, is enumerated by Cicero in his list of Roman orators (Brut. 14, 19), and his oration at his father's funeral has been spoken of above. (Comp. Plin. H. N. vii. 43. a. 45.) He was elected one of the pontifices in B. C. 216, plebeian aedile in B. C. 209, and curule aedile in B. C. 208 (Liv. xiii. 21, xxvii. 21, 36). In B. C. 207 he served in the army of the consul Claudius Nero, and was one of the legates sent to Rome to convey the joyful news of the defeat and death of Hasdrubal; and it was mainly in consequence of his services in this war that he owed his elevation to the consulship in the following year. On his return to Rome he was appointed magister equitum to M. Livius Salinator, who was nominated dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia, and it was at these comitia (B. C. 206) that he was elected consul with L. Veturius Philo, who had served with him in the campaign against Hasdrubal (Liv. xxvii. 51, xxviii. 9, 10; Cic. Brut. 14). The consuls received Brutus as their province, in order to prosecute the war against Hannibal; but their year of office passed over without anything of importance occurring, and Metellus remained in the same province as proconsul, during the following year. At the end of the year he was recalled to Rome, and nominated dictator for the purpose of holding the comitia (Liv. xxviii. 10, 11, 45, 46, xxix. 10, 11). Q. Metellus had, like his other distinguished contemporaries, taken an active part in the Hannibalian war; but at the conclusion of this war in B. C. 201, he is reported to have said in the senate that he did not look upon its termination as a blessing to Rome, since he feared that the Roman people would now sink back again into its former slumbers, from which it had been roused by the presence of Hannibal. (Val. Max. vii. 2 § 3.)

Metellus survived the war many years, and was employed in several public commissions. In B. C. 201 he was appointed one of the decemviri for dividing the public land in Samnium and Apulia among the Roman soldiers, who had served in Africa against Hannibal (Liv. xxxi. 4). In B. C. 185 he was one of the ambassadors sent to Philip of Macedonia and to the Achæans. (Liv. xxxix. 24, 33; Polyb. xxiii. 6, &c., vel Excerpt. Legat. 40, 41; Paus. vii. 8. § 6, vii. 9. § 1.) The name of Metellus also occurs in the debates in the senate in B. C. 193, and his address to the censors in B. C. 179 is given by Livy. (Liv. xxxv. 8, xl. 46.)

3. L. CAECILIUS METELLUS, brother of No. 2, had, after the battle of Cannas in B. C. 216, formed the project, with other noble youths, of abandoning Italy and trying their fortunes elsewhere; but P. Scipio compelled him and his associates to swear that they would abandon this design. In consequence of his conduct on this occasion the censors removed him from his tribe, and reduced him to the condition of an aerarian two years afterwards (B. C. 214), when he was quaestor. Notwithstanding this degradation he was elected tribune of the plebs for the following year, and immediately he had entered upon his office, he cited the censors before the court of the people, but was prevented by the other tribunes from proceeding in his accusation. (Liv. xxiii. 53, xxiv. 18, 43; Val. Max. ii. 9. § 8, v. 6. § 7.)

4. M. CAECILIUS METELLUS, brother of Nos. 2 and 3, was plebeian ædile in B. C. 208, the same year in which his brother Quintus was curule ædile, and prætor urbanus B. C. 206, during the consulship of Quintus. In the following year he was one of the ambassadors sent to king Attalus, and brought to Rome the sacred stone, which was regarded as the mother of the gods. (Liv. xxvii. 36, xxviii. 10, xxix. 11.)

5. Q. CAECILIUS Q. F. L. N. METELLUS MACEDONICUS, son of No. 2, is first mentioned in B. C. 168, when he was serving in the army of Æmilius Paulus in Macedonia, and was sent to Rome with two others to announce the defeat of Perseus. In B. C. 148 he was prætor, and received Macedonia as his province, where Andronicus, who pretended to be a son of Perseus, and had assumed the name of Philip, had defeated the Roman prætor Juventina. He was, however, defeated and taken prisoner by Metellus. After Metellus had concluded this war he turned his arms against the Achæans, who had insulted an embassy which he had sent to Corinth, and refused to listen to any overtures of peace. At the beginning of B. C. 146 he defeated Crisolanus, the Achæan prætor, near Scarpheia in Locria, and subsequently an Arcadian army near Chæroneia; but he was unable to bring the war to a conclusion before the arrival of the consul L. Mummius, for whom was reserved the glory of subduing Greece. On his return to Rome in B. C. 146, Metellus celebrated a triumph on account of his victory over Andronicus, and received in consequence the surname of Macedonicus.

Notwithstanding the glory which he had acquired in this war, Metellus was twice a candidate for the consulship without success; and he did not obtain this honour till B. C. 143 along with Ap. Claudius Pulcher. The province of Nearer Spain fell to the lot of Metellus, who carried on the war with success during this and the following year against the Celtiberi, and was succeeded by Q. Pompeius in B. C. 141. Many anecdotes are related of his conduct during this campaign; the severity with which he maintained discipline, the humanity which he displayed on one occasion towards the enemy (a rare virtue with Roman generals!), and the prudence and skill with which he prosecuted the war, are particularly celebrated by Valerius Maximus and Frontinus. But he sullied his reputation by the efforts which he used to render his army as inefficient as possible on his departure from the province, in order that his successor, Q. Pompeius, whom he envied and hated, might find it difficult to obscure his glory.

In B. C. 131 Metellus was censor with Q. Pompeius, the first time that both the censors were elected from the plebs. In his censorship Metellus proposed that every Roman should be compelled to marry, for the purpose of increasing the free population of the city: the oration which he delivered on the subject was extant in the time of Augustus, and was read by that emperor in the senate when he brought forward his law de Maritandis Ordinibus. (Suet. Aug. 89.) Some fragments of it are preserved by A. Gellius (i. 6), who, however, attributes it erroneously to Metellus Numidicus. Metellus during his censorship narrowly escaped death at the hands of the tribune C. Atinius Labeo, whom he had expelled from the senate during the first year of his censorship, and who, in the following year, seized him in the forum and commanded him to be thrown down the Tarpeian rock: he was rescued from death by the intervention of another tribune, but Labeo revenged himself by dedicating the property of Metellus to the gods.

It is related of Metellus, that he was a political opponent of Scipio Africanus the younger, but that he conducted his opposition without any bitterness or malice, and was one of the first at his death to recognise and acknowledge his greatness. He united with the aristocracy in opposing the measures of the Gracchi; and the speech which he delivered against Tib. Gracchus is referred to by Cicero, who speaks highly of his eloquence, and alludes to several of his orations. (Cic. de Orat. i. 49, Brut. 21.) Like the other Roman nobles of his time, he either had or pretended to have a love of art. He erected a splendid porticus, and two temples dedicated to Jupiter and Juno, which were the first at Rome built of marble; and in front of them was placed the celebrated group of horsemen who fell at the battle of the Granicus, which Lysippus executed at the command of Alexander the Great, and which Metellus carried to Rome, on the conquest of Andronicus in Macedonia.

Metellus died in B. C. 115, when his son Marcus was consul, full of years and honours. He is frequently quoted by the ancient writers as an extraordinary instance of human felicity. Not only was he distinguished by his noble birth, his military glory, and the high political offices he had held, but his was the rare lot of living to see four sons rise to the highest honours of the state, and of being carried to the funeral pile by these four children. Three of these sons had obtained the consulship in his lifetime, and the fourth was a candidate for the office at the time of his father's death. Metellus also left behind him two married daughters (not three, as some writers state), and numerous grandchildren (Liv. Epit. 49, 50, 52, 53, 59; Vell. Pat. i. 11; Tac. Ann. xii. 62; Flor. ii. 14, 17; Entrop. iv. 13, 16; Aurel. Vic. de Vir

6. L. CAECILIUS Q. F. L. N. METELLUS CALVUS, brother of No. 5, was consul B.C. 142 with Q. Fabius Maximus Servilianus. All that is recorded of this Metellus is that he bore testimony, along with his brother Macedonicus, against Q. Pompeius, the consul of B.C. 141, when he was accused of extortion. (Oros. v. 4; Obsequ. 81; Cic. ad Att. xii. 5. § 3, pro Font. 7; Val. Max. viii. 5. § 1.)

7. Q. CAECILIUS Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS BALEARICUS, eldest son of No. 5, was consul B.C. 123 with T. Quinctius Flamininus, and during this year and the following carried on war against the inhabitants of the Balearic islands, who were accused of piracy. He entirely subdued them, and founded several cities in the islands; and in consequence of his victories he obtained a triumph in B.C. 121, and received the surname of Balearicus. He was censor in B.C. 120 with L. Calpurnius Piso. (Plut. de Fort. Rom. 4; Cic. Brd. 74, pro Dom. 53; Liv. Epit. 60; Eutrop. iv. 21, who erroneously calls him Lucius; Oros. v. 13; Flor. iii. 8; Strab. iii. p. 167.)

8. L. CAECILIUS Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS DIADEMATIS, brother of the preceding and son of No. 5, has been frequently confounded with Metellus Dalmaticus, consul B.C. 119 [No. 13], who was a son of Metellus Calvus [No. 6]. Metellus Diadematius received the latter surname from his wearing for a long time a bandage round his forehead, in consequence of an ulcer. He was consul B.C. 117, with Q. Mucius Scaevola; and Eutropius (iv. 23) erroneously ascribes to him the triumph of Dalmaticus. Clinton (ad ann.) falls into the same mistake. He lived to see the return of his first-cousin Metellus Numidicus from exile, and exerted himself to obtain his recall. (Cic. post Red. in Sen. 15, post Red. ad Quir. 3.)

9. M. CAECILIUS Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS, brother of the two preceding and son of No. 5, was consul B.C. 115, with M. Aemilius Scaurus, the year in which his father died. In B.C. 114 he was sent to Sardinia as proconsul, to suppress an insurrection in the island, which he succeeded in doing, and obtained a triumph in consequence in B.C. 113, on the same day as his brother Caprarius. (Vell. Pat. i. 11, ii. 8; Eutrop. iv. 25.)

The annexed coin which bears the legend M. METELLUS Q. F. was struck by order of the preceding Metellus. The reverse represents the head of an elephant enclosed in Macedonian shields, and the whole surrounded by a laurel crown: the elephant has reference to the victory of his great-grandfather in Sicily over the Carthaginians [No. 1], and the Macedonian shields to the conquest of

Andriacus in Macedonia by his father [No. 5]. (Eckhel. vol. v. p. 151.)

10. C. CAECILIUS Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS CAPRARIUS, younger brother of the three preceding, and son of No. 5. The origin of his surname is quite uncertain. He served under Scipio at the siege of Numantia, B.C. 133, and the abuse which he received from Scipio, according to the tale related by Cicero (de Orat. ii. 66), may have been owing to the enmity between his father [see above, p. 1057, b.] and Scipio, rather than to any demerits of his own. He was consul B.C. 113 with Cn. Papirius Carbo, and went to Macedonia to carry on war with the Thracians, whom he quickly subdued. He obtained a triumph in consequence in the same year and on the same day with his brother Marcus. He was censor in B.C. 102 with Metellus Numidicus; and he exerted himself, along with his brother Lucius, to obtain the recall of Numidicus from banishment in B.C. 99. (Eutrop. iv. 25; Tac. Germ. 37; Obsequ. 98; Vell. Pat. ii. 8; Cic. post Red. in Sen. 15, post Red. ad Quir. 3.) The annexed coin was struck by order of this C. Metellus. The head of the obverse is that of Pallas, and the elephants drawing a triumphal car on the reverse, refer, like the reverse of the preceding coin, to the victory of the ancestor of L. Metellus over the Carthaginians. [No. 1.]

13. L. CAECILIUS L. F. Q. N. METELLUS Dalmaticus, son of No. 6, and frequently confounded, as has been already remarked, with Diadematius [No. 8.] He is spoken of by Cicero as the maternal grandfather of Scaurus, whom Cicero defended, since his daughter Caecilia married the father of Scaurus. Metellus was consul in B.C. 119, with L. Aurelius Cotta, and through desire of a triumph declared war against the Dalmatians, who had been guilty of no offence against Rome. The Dalmatians offered no opposition to him, and after passing the winter quietly in their town of Salona, he returned to Rome and obtained the undeserved honour of a triumph, and the surname Dalmaticus or Delmaticus. With the booty obtained in this war he repaired the temple of Castor and Pollux. In B.C. 115 he was censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and, in conjunction with his colleagues, expelled thirty-two members from the senate, among whom was C. Licinius Geta, who was afterwards censor himself. Metellus was also poetize maximus; and the decision which he came to in the case of the Vestals, who were brought before him for trial in B.C. 114, was generally condemned. [See above, p. 782, a.] He was alive in B.C. 100, when he is mentioned as one of the senators of high rank, who took up arms against Saturninus. (Appian. Illyr. 11; Liv. Epit. 62; Cic. pro Scaur. 2; Plut. Pomp. 2; Cic. Ferr. i. 53, 55, pro Cluent. 42; Ascon. in Cic. Ad. p. 46, ed. Orelli; Cic. pro C. Rabir. 7.)

14. Q. CÆCILIUS L. F. Q. N. METELLUS NUMIDICUS, younger brother of the preceding and son of No. 6, was one of the most distinguished members of his family. The character of Metellus stood very high among his contemporaries; in an age of growing corruption his personal integrity remained unsullied; and he was distinguished for his abilities in war and peace. He was one of the chief leaders of the aristocratical party at Rome, and displayed the usual arrogance and contempt for all those who did not belong to his order, which distinguished the Roman nobles of his time. The year of his prætorship is not stated; but it was probably after his return from his prætorian province that he was accused of extortion, on which occasion it is related that the judges had such confidence in his integrity that they refused to look at his accounts when they were produced in court. Some modern writers, however, suppose that this trial took place after his return from Numidia (Cic. pro Balb. 5, ad Att. 1, 16; Val. Max. ii. 10. § 1). Metellus obtained the consulship in B. C. 109, with M. Junius Silanus, and received Numidia as his province, with the conduct of the war against Jugurtha, who had in the year before inflicted great disgrace upon the Roman arms. Their honour, however, was fully retrieved by Metellus, who gained a great victory over Jugurtha near the river Muthul. It is unnecessary to enter here into the details of the war, as they are given in the life of JUGURTHA. Metellus remained in Numidia during the following year as proconsul, but as he was chiefly occupied in the siege of towns, and was unable to bring the war to a conclusion, his legate C. Marius, whom he had grossly affronted (see above p. 954, a.), industriously circulated reports in the camp and the city that Metellus designedly protracted the war, for the purpose of continuing in the command. These rumours had the desired effect. Marius was raised to the consulship, Numidia was assigned to him as his province, and Metellus saw the honour of finishing the war snatched from his grasp. The blow was all the heavier, since his successor had sprung from the lower classes, and had at the commencement of his political career been assisted by Metellus himself (see p. 952, a.). So bitter were his feelings that he could not brook the sight of Marius, and accordingly left the army in charge of his legate P. Rutilius, who was to hand it over to Marius. On his arrival at Rome, Metellus was, contrary to his expectation, received with the utmost respect and applause. The people probably felt that injustice had been done him: he celebrated a splendid triumph in B. C. 107, received the honorary surname of Numidicus, and retired into private life, full of glory and honour.

In A. C. 102 Metellus was censor with his cousin Metellus Caprarius. He attempted to expel from the senate L. Appuleius Saturninus and Servilius Glaucia, two of the greatest enemies of the aristocracy, but was prevented by the interposition of his colleagues from carrying his design into effect. He refused to allow the name of L. Equitius, who pretended to be a son of Gracchus, to stand upon the list of citizens, notwithstanding the popular tumult which this refusal occasioned. Saturninus and his party resolved in revenge to ruin Metellus, and were supported in their design by Marius, who hated Metellus both on personal and political grounds. By the murder of A. Nonius, who was likewise a candidate for the tribunate, Saturninus obtained this dignity in B. C. 100, the same year in which Glaucia was prætor and Marius consul for the sixth time. Saturninus forthwith proposed an agrarian law, to which he added the clause, that the senate should swear obedience to it within five days after its enactment, and that whosoever should refuse to do so should be expelled from the senate, and pay a fine of twenty talents. In order to entrap his enemy, Marius got up in the senate and asserted that he would never take the oath; and Metellus made the same declaration; but when the senators were summoned to the rostra to comply with the law, Marius was the first to swear obedience, and Metellus was the only one in the senate who refused to do so. He was therefore expelled from the senate; and, not contented with this, the tribune brought forward a bill to punish him with exile. The friends of Metellus were ready to take up arms, if necessary, to resist the law; but Metellus would not avail himself of their assistance, and, in order to avoid a civil commotion, he departed from the city, and retired to Rhodes, where he bore his loss with great calmness, without troubling himself about his return. In the course of the same year, however, the mad schemes of Saturninus occasioned his own ruin and that of his friends; and the popular party received such a severe blow in consequence of their death, that very little opposition was offered to the recall of Metellus, which was proposed in the following year (A. C. 99) by the tribune Q. Calpurnius. The son of Metellus exerted himself so strongly in support of the rogation of Calpurnius, that he obtained from his contemporaries the surname of Pius. According to a tale preserved by Cicero (de Nat. Deor. iii. 33), Q. Varius, who was tribune of the plebs A. C. 91, and a violent enemy of the aristocracy, poisoned a Metellus, and as Cicero mentions him without any surname, he probably means the great Metellus Numidicus. The tale, however, may have been invented by the hatred of party.

The general character of Metellus has been already portrayed. He was certainly one of the best specimens of his class, and probably one of the most virtuous citizens of his time. He was not ignorant of literature and art, and was a generous patron of both. In his youth he had heard Carneades in Rome; he was a friend and patron of the poet Archias; and when he went into exile he took with him the rhetorician L. Aelius Præconinus or Stilo, and occupied his time in reading the works and hearing the lectures of the philosophers. His powers of oratory are spoken of with praise by Cicero, and his orations continued to be read with admiration in the time of Fronto. (Sall. Jug. 43—88; Plut. Marius; Liv. Epit. 65, 69; Vell. Pat. ii. 11; Aurel. Vic. de Vir. III. 62; Flor. iii. 1; Eutrop. iv. 27; Oros. v. 15; Appian, B. C. i. 28, 30—33; Val. 15. CÆCILIA (METELLA), sister of the two preceding, and daughter of No. 6, married Lucullus, the father of the conqueror of Mithridates. [CÆCILIA, No. 3.]

16. Q. CÆCILIUS Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS NEPOS, son of Balearicus [No. 7], and grandson of the celebrated Macedonicus [No. 5], appears to have received the surname of Nepos, because he was the eldest grandson of the latter; for the Metelli were so numerous that it became necessary, for the sake of distinction, that each member of the family should have some personal designation. This surname of Nepos was also borne by one of his children [No. 21]. Metellus Nepos exerted himself in obtaining the recall of his kinsman Metellus Numidicus from banishment in B. C. 99, and was consul the following year, B. C. 98, with T. Didius. In this year the two consuls carried the lex Caecilia Didia. (Cic. post Reii. in Sen. 15, pro Dom. 20, ad Att. ii. 9; Schol. Bob. pro Sext. p. 310, ed. Orelli; Obsequ. 107.)

18. CAECILIA (METELLA), daughter of Dalmaticus [No. 13], married first Scaurus, consul in B. C. 115, and afterwards the dictator Sulla. [CAECILIA, No. 5.]

19. Q. CAECILIUS Q. F. L. N. METELLUS PIUS, son of Numidicus [No. 14], received the surname of Pius on account of the love which he displayed for his father when he besought the people to recall him from banishment, in B. C. 99. He was about twenty years of age when he accompanied his father to Numidia in B. C. 109. He obtained the praetorship in B. C. 89, and was one of the commanders in the Marcic or Social war, which had broken out in the preceding year. He defeated and slew in battle Q. Pompaedius, the leader of the Marsians in B. C. 88. He was still in arms in B. C. 87, prosecuting the war against the Samnites, when Marius landed in Italy and joined the consul Cinna. The senate, in alarm, summoned Metellus to Rome; and, as the soldiers placed more confidence in him than in the consul Octavius, they entreated him to take the supreme command shortly after his arrival in the city. As he refused to comply with their request, numbers deserted to the enemy; and finding it impossible to hold out against Marius and Cinna, he left the city and went to Africa. Here he collected a considerable force and was joined by Crassus, who had also fled thither from Spain, but they quarrelled and separated shortly afterwards. In B. C. 84 Metellus was defeated by C. Fabius, one of the Marian party. He therefore returned to Italy, and remained in Liguria; but hearing of the return of Sulla from Asia in the following year (B. C. 83), he hastened to meet him at Brundisium, and was one of the first of the nobles who joined him. In the war which followed against the Marian party, Metellus was one of the most successful of Sulla's generals. Early in B. C. 82, Metellus gained a victory over Carrinas, near the river Aesis in Umbria, defeated shortly afterwards another division of Carbo's army, and finally gained a decisive victory over Carbo and Norbanus, near Faventia, in Cisalpine Gaul.

In B. C. 80, Metellus was consul with Sulla himself. In this year he rewarded the services of Calpurnius, in obtaining the recall of his father from banishment, by using his influence to obtain for him the praetorship. In the following year (B. C. 79), Metellus went as proconsul into Spain, in order to prosecute the war against Sertorius, who adhered to the Marian party. Here he remained for the next eight years, and found it so difficult to obtain any advantages over Sertorius, that not only was he obliged to call to his aid the armies in Nearer Spain and in Gaul, but the Romans also sent to his assistance Pompey with proconsular power and another army. Sertorius, however, was a match for them both; and when Metellus, after frequent disasters, at length gained a victory over Sertorius, he was so elated with his success, that he allowed himself to be saluted emperor, and celebrated his conquest with the greatest splendour. But Sertorius soon recovered from this defeat, and would probably have continued to defy all the efforts of Metellus and Pompey, if he had not been murdered by Perperna and his friends in B. C. 72. [SERTORIUS.] Metellus returned to Rome in the following year, and triumphed on the 30th of December.

In B. C. 65, Metellus was one of those who supported the accusation against C. Cornelius. He was pontifex maximus, and, as he was succeeded in this dignity by C. Caesar in B. C. 63, he must have died either in this year or at the end of the preceding. Metellus Pius followed closely in the footsteps of his father. Like him, he was a steady and unwavering supporter of the aristocracy; like him, his military abilities were very considerable, but not those of a first-rate general, and he was unable to adapt himself or his troops to the guerrilla warfare which had to be carried on in Spain; like his father, again, his personal character contrasted most favourably with the general dissoluteness of his contemporaries; and lastly, he imitated his father in the patronage which he bestowed upon Archias and other poets. His conduct at the time of his father's banishment, and the gratitude which he showed to Q. Calpurnius, are especially deserving of praise. He adopted the son of Scipio Nasica, who is called in consequence Metellus Pius Scipio [No. 22]. (Sall. Jug. 64; Appian, B. C. i. 33, 53, 68, 80—91, 97, 103, 108—115; Aurel. Vic. de Vir. Ill. 63; Oros. v. 18, 28; Plut. Mor. 12, Crass. 6, Sertor. 12—27; Liv. Epit. 84, 91, 92; Vell. Pat. ii. 15, 28—30; Dion Cass. xxvii. 37; Plut. Caes. 7; Cic. pro Arch. 4, 5, 10, pro Planc. 29, pro Cluent. 8, pro Balb. 2, 22; Ascon. in Cic. Corn. p. 60, ed. Orelli.)

20. Q. CAECILIUS Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS CILVS, consul B. C. 60, was son of Nepos, consul B. C. 96. [No. 16.] The latter was most probably his father, but his descent has given rise to much dispute. Cicero and Asconius both call Metellus Celer the frater of the younger Metellus Nepos [No. 21], and Asconius states that the latter was the son of the elder Nepos [No. 16], the grandson of Balearicus [No. 7], and the great-grandson of Macrodonicus [No. 5]. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 1, 2; Ascon. in Corn. p. 63.) From the way in which Cicero speaks of Nepos, as well as from other circumstances, we are led to conclude that they were brothers and not first-cousins. The only difficulty in this supposition is, that they both bear the praenomen Quintus; but the ingenious hypothesis of Manutius (ad Cic. l. c.) removes this difficulty. He supposes that the elder Nepos [No. 16] may have had two sons, one called Quintus and the other perhaps Lucius: that the latter, the subject of this notice, was adopted by the Q. Metellus Celer, who is mentioned by Cicero as one of the consuls in B. C. 90, and that he received in consequence the praenomen Quintus and the cognomen Celer. Manutius further supposes that after the death of the elder son Quintus, the wife of Nepos bore him a third son, to whom he again gave the names of Quintus and Nepos. This supposition accounts not only for the two brothers bearing the same praenomen, but also for the younger, and not the elder, having the cognomen of his father.

In B. C. 66, Metellus Celer served as legate in the army of Pompey in Asia, and distinguished himself by repulsing an attack which Oroeses, king of the Albanians, made upon his winter-quarters. He returned to Rome before Pompey, and was praetor in B. C. 63, the year in which Cicero was consul. Like the other members of his family he distinguished himself during his year of office by a warm support of the aristocratical party. He prevented the condemnation of C. Rabirius by removing the military flag from the Janiculum, as has been already narrated in the life of Caesar [Vol. I. p. 541]. He co-operated with Cicero in opposing the schemes of Catiline; and, when the latter left the city to make war upon the republic, Metellus had the charge of the Picentine and Senonian districts. By blocking up the passes he prevented Catiline from crossing the Apennines and penetrating into Gaul, and thus compelled him to turn round and face Antonius, who was marching against him from Etruria. In the following year, B. C. 62, Metellus went with the title of proconsul into the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which Cicero had relinquished because he was unwilling to leave the city. Although Metellus and Cicero had been thus closely connected, yet he was exceedingly angry when the orator attacked his brother Nepos, who had given him, however, abundant provocation. [See below, No. 21.] The letter which Celer wrote to Cicero on this occasion is still preserved, and is very characteristic of the haughty aristocratical spirit of the family. Cicero's reply is very clever. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 1, 2.)

In B. C. 61, Metellus was consul elect, and by his personal influence prevented the celebration of the Compitalia, which a tribune of the plebs was preparing to celebrate in opposition to a senatus-consultum. Towards the end of the year he took an active part in conjunction with M. Cato, and others of the aristocracy, in resisting the demands of the publicani, who petitioned the senate to allow them to pay a smaller sum for the farming of the taxes in Asia than they had agreed to give. Their request was accordingly refused, but was subsequently granted, in B. C. 59, by Caesar, who brought forward a bill in the comitia for the purpose. In B. C. 60, Metellus was consul with L. Afranius, who was a creature of Pompey, and had been raised to this dignity by Pompey's influence. Pompey was anxious to obtain the ratification of his acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands for his soldiers; but Afranius was not a man of sufficient ability and energy to be of much service to him, and Metellus thwarted all his plans, since Pompey, and not Caesar, was generally regarded at that time as the most formidable enemy of the aristocracy. It was this opposition which drove Pompey into the arms of Caesar, and thus prepared the downfall of the republic. So resolute was the opposition of Metellus to the agrarian law of the tribune L. Flavius, which he brought forward in order to provide for Pompey's veterans, that the tribune had him dragged to prison; but even this did not frighten Metellus, and the law was in consequence abandoned. He acted with such energy and decision in favour of the aristocracy that Cicero calls him "egregius consul"; and although he did not at first oppose the adoption of Clodius into a plebeian family, apparently not attaching much importance to the matter, yet as soon as he perceived that Clodius was resolved to favour the views of the democratical party, Metellus opposed his plans to the utmost of his power. Clodius was the first-cousin of Metellus, being the son of his father's sister, and likewise the brother of his own wife; but he did not allow this family connection to produce any change in his political conduct. As a war threatened to break out in Gaul, the senate determined that the consuls should draw lots for the provinces of the Gauls; but Metellus did not leave Rome this year, nor apparently the next. In B. C. 59, the year of Caesar's consulship, he took a leading part in the opposition to the agrarian law of Caesar, but in vain. He died in the course of the same year, so unexpectedly, that it was suspected that he had been poisoned by his wife Clodia, with whom he lived on the most unhappy terms, and who was a woman of the utmost profligacy. The character of Metellus has been sufficiently indicated in the preceding sketch of his life: he was one of the great leaders of the aristocracy, but did not possess either sufficient influence or sufficient genius to cope with such men as Caesar and Pompey. His oratory is spoken of favourably by Cicero, and was more adapted to the popular assemblies than to the courts. (Dion Cass. xxxvi. 37, and libb. xxxvii. xxxviii; Sall. Cat. 57; the passages of Cicero in Orelli's Orom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 107.)

21. Q. METELLUS, Q. F. Q. N. METELLUS NEPOS, brother of the preceding, and son of the elder Nepos [No. 16]. In B. C. 67 he served as legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates, and was still with him in Asia in B. C. 64. In B. C. 63 he returned to Rome, in order to become a candidate for the tribunate, that he might thereby favour the views of Pompey. The aristocracy, who now dreaded Pompey more than any one else in the state, were in the utmost consternation. They brought forward M. Cato as a rival candidate and succeeded in carrying his election, but were unable to prevent the election of Metellus likewise. Metellus entered upon his office on the 10th of December, B. C. 63, and commenced his official career by a violent attack upon Cicero, whom he looked upon as the main support of the existing order of things. He openly asserted that he who had condemned Roman citizens without a hearing ought not to be heard himself, and accordingly prevented Cicero from addressing the people on the last day of his consulship, when he had to lay down his office, and only allowed him to take the usual oath, whereupon Cicero swore that he had saved the state. On the 1st of January, B. C. 62, Cicero attacked Metellus with great bitterness in the senate, and two days afterwards Metellus replied to him with equal bitterness, upbraiding him with his low origin, denouncing him as a tyrant for condemning Roman citizens to death unheard, and threatening him with an impeachment. Stung to the quick, Cicero published an oration against him, entitled "Metellina," of the nature of which the second Philippic will probably give us the best idea. Supported by Caesar, who was anxious, above all things, to drive Pompey to an open rupture with the senate, Metellus brought forward a bill to summon Pompey, with his army, to Rome, in order to restore peace and protect the citizens from arbitrary punishment. Parties were in the state of the highest exasperation: on the day on which the bill was to be brought forward, Cato attempted to prevent its being read, but was driven out of the forum by force. He soon, however, returned, supported by a large body of the aristocracy; and this time the victory remained in their hands. Metellus was obliged to take to flight, and repaired to Pompey: the senate proposed to deprive him of his office, and according to some accounts actually did so.

Metellus returned to Rome with Pompey, and was raised to the praetorship in B.C. 60. In this year he brought forward a law for the abolition of the vetigalia in Italy; and the senate, out of hatred to Metellus, attempted to call the law by the name of some other person. In the following year he appears not to have gone to a province, but to have remained in Rome. In B.C. 57 he was consul with P. Cornelius Lentulus Spinther. Cicero, who had been banished in the preceding year, and whose friends were now exerting themselves to obtain his recall, was greatly alarmed at the election of Metellus, since he was one of his bitterest personal enemies. But since Clodius had offended both Pompey and Caesar, and the latter was anxious to mortify and weaken the power of the demagogue, Metellus, out of respect to them, suppressed his feelings towards Cicero, and announced in the senate on the 1st of January, that he should not oppose his recall from exile. Cicero wrote to him to express his gratitude (ad Fam. v. 4), and in subsequent speeches he frequently praises his moderation and magnanimity. At the same time the friends of Cicero at Rome seem to have had some suspicions of Metellus; but he was eventually induced, very much by the influence of his relative, P. Servilius, to give a hearty support to Cicero's friends, and in the month of September the orator was at Rome. But almost immediately afterwards we again find Metellus on the other side, and in the month of November using his efforts to obtain the aedileship for Clodius.

In B.C. 56 Metellus administered the province of Nearer Spain. Either before he left Rome or soon afterwards Metellus had quarrelled with Clodius, and this enmity naturally led to a reconciliation with Cicero, to whom he writes in apparently cordial terms (ad Fam. v. 3). In the month of April he repaired, with many other distinguished Roman nobles, to Caesar's winter-quarters at Luca, doubtless with the view of obtaining the prolongation of his command. On his return to Spain he made a sudden and apparently unjustifiable attack upon the Vaccæi, whom he defeated; but in the following year (B.C. 55) they took the town of Clunia from him, and advanced with such considerable forces that Metellus dared not attack them. Metellus seems to have returned to Rome in the course of this year, and to have died in the same year, as his name does not occur again. In his testament he left Carrinas (probably the consul of B.C. 43) the heir of all his property, passing over all the Metelli and likewise the Claudii, with whom he was so nearly connected (Val. Max. vii. 8. § 3.) Metellus did not adhere strictly to the political principles of his family. He did not support the aristocracy, like his brother; nor, on the other hand, can he be said to have been a leader of the democracy. He was in fact little more than a servant of Pompey, and according to his bidding at one time opposed, and at another supported Cicero. (App. Mithr. 95; Flor. iii. 6; Joseph. Ant. iv. 2. § 3, B. J. i. 6. § 2; Plut. Cat. Min. 20; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 38—61, xxxix. 1—7, 54; Plut. Cæs. 21; the passages of Cicero in Orelli's Onom. Tull. vol. ii. p. 107, &c.)

22. Q. CÆCILIUS, Q. F. METELLUS PIUS SCIPIO, the adopted son of Metellus Pius [No. 19]. He was the son of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, praetor A.C. 94, and Licinia, a daughter of the orator L. Crassus, and was a grandson of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, consul B.C. 111, and Cæcilia, a daughter of Metellus Macedonicus. Through his grandmother he was therefore descended from the family of the Metelli, into which he was subsequently adopted. Before his adoption he bore the names of P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and hence his name is given in various forms. Sometimes he is called P. Scipio Nasica, sometimes Q. Metellus Scipio, and sometimes simply Scipio or Metellus. His full legal name, as it appears in a senatus consultum (Cic. ad Pom. viii. 8), is the one given at the commencement of this notice. Appian erroneously gives him the praenomen Lucius. (B.C. ii. 24.)

Metellus is first mentioned in B.C. 63, when he is said to have come to Cicero by night, along with M. Crassus and Marcellus, bringing with them letters relating to the conspiracy of Catiline. In B.C. 60 he was elected tribune of the plebs, but was accused of bribery by M. Favonius, who had failed in his election, and was defended by Cicero. He was tribune in B.C. 59, and was one of the college of pontiffs before whom Cicero spoke respecting his house in B.C. 57. In the latter year he exhibited gladiatorial games in honour of his deceased father, Metellus Pius. In A.C. 53 Scipio was a candidate for the consulship along with Plautius Hypsaecus and Milo, and was supported by the Clodian mob, since he was opposed to Milo. The candidates had recourse to the most unblushing bribery, and to open violence and force. The most frightful scenes were daily occurring in the streets of Rome; and these disturbances were secretly fomented by Pompey, who was anxious to be named dictator, for the purpose of restoring order to the city, and thereby possessing the power which might enable him to crush Caesar, of whom he had now become jealous. The comitia could not be held for the election of consuls; and when the murder of Clodius at the beginning of the following year, B.C. 52, threw the state almost into anarchy, the senate consented that Pompey should be elected sole consul. This took place at the end of February; and shortly afterwards he married Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, to whom he showed particular favour. Hypsaecus and Scipio were both accused of bribery; but though both were equally guilty, the former only was condemned. On the 1st of August Pompey made Scipio his colleague in the consulship; and Scipio showed his gratitude by using every effort to destroy the power of Caesar and strengthen that of Pompey. He was all the more ready to exert himself in Pompey's favour, since the latter was now obliged to enter into a close connection with the aristocratical party, to which Scipio belonged, for the purpose of crushing his rival. One of the first acts of Metellus after his appointment to the consulship was to bring forward a law restoring to the censors the power of which they had been deprived by Clodius, intending thereby to expel Caesar's friends from the senate; for that he was actuated by no desire to preserve the purity and morality of the body, the scandalous tale related by Valerius Maximus (ix. l. § 8) is a sufficient proof. In the following year (a. c. 51) Scipio proposed in the senate on the 1st of September that the senate should take into consideration the Gallic provinces on the 1st of March in the following year; but as this proposition was considered rather too open a declaration of hostility against Caesar, it was decreed that the consular provinces in general should be brought before the senate on that day. When stronger measures were resolved upon by the aristocracy, Scipio again appeared foremost in urging their adoption. He warmly seconded the consul Lentulus when he proposed in the senate at the beginning of January, a. c. 49, that Caesar should dismiss his army by a certain day, or else be regarded as an enemy of the state; and when the tribunes, M. Antonius and Q. Cassius, placed their veto upon the decree, Scipio urged on matters to an open rupture, and refused to listen to any overtures of peace. The consequence was that the two tribunes fled from the city, and Caesar took up arms against the senate. In the division of the provinces, which was made a few days afterwards, Syria fell to the lot of Scipio, who hastened thither without delay. His conduct in the province is drawn by Caesar in the blackest colours (B. C. iii. 31, 32). Although he suffered some loss in an engagement with the inhabitants of Mount Amanus, he assumed the title of imperator, and had it struck upon his coins. His exactions and extortions were almost unparalleled; new taxes of all kinds were imposed upon the inhabitants; Roman officers were sent into every part of the province to collect them; and there was scarcely a village which escaped their marauding visits: they plundered on their own account as well as on account of their general; and they had the fullest licence given them for every kind of oppression. After collecting large sums of money and a considerable body of troops, he took up his winter-quarters at Pergamum, leaving his province quite unprotected and exposed to a fresh attack of the Parthians. At the beginning of the following year, a. c. 48, he was preparing to plunder the temple of Diana in Ephesus, when he received a summons from Pompey to join him with his troops, as Caesar had already crossed over to Greece. Caesar sent Domitius Calvinus into Macedonia, and L. Cassius Longinus into Thessaly to oppose Scipio, but no battle took place between them, according to the statement of Caesar (B. C. iii. 36—38), although a different account is given by other writers. (Dion Cass. xli. 51; Appian, B. C. ii. 60.) At all events Scipio was unable to join Pompey till Caesar's repulse at Dyrrhachium obliged Calvinus to unite his forces with those of Caesar. Scipio thereupon took possession of Larissa, and shortly after joined Pompey, who divided the command of the army with him. Confident of success, the nobles in Pompey's camp began to quarrel with one another respecting the division of the spoil; and Scipio had a violent altercation, which descended to personal abuse, with Domitius Ahenobarbus and Lentulus Spinther, respecting the office of pontifex maximus, which Caesar then held. The battle of Pharsalia annihilated these prospects. In this battle Scipio commanded the centre of the Pompeian troops, and was opposed by his old adversary, Domitius Calvinus.

After the loss of the battle of Pharsalia, Metellus fled, first to Coryra and then to Africa, where it was hoped that the army of Attius Varus and the assistance of Juba, king of Numidia, might restore the fallen fortunes of the Pompeian party. Through the influence of Cato, Scipio obtained the supreme command, as being of consular rank, much to the chagrin of Varus, who laid claim to it. As soon as Scipio had received the command, he attempted to destroy the important town of Utica, in order to gratify Juba, and it was with difficulty that Cato prevented him from doing it. His conduct in Africa seems to have been as oppressive as it had been in Syria; in every direction he plundered the inhabitants and laid waste the country. At length Caesar, landed in Africa, at the end of December, a. c. 47, and in the month of April in the following year, a. c. 46, he defeated Scipio and Juba at the decisive battle of Thapsus. Scipio immediately fled to the sea, and with a small squadron of ships steered first for Utica; but, learning from Cato that there would be no security for him there, he put out to sea, intending to sail over to Spain. Contrary winds, however, obliged him to put back to Hippo Regius, where he fell in with the fleet of P. Sittius, who fought on Caesar's side. His small squadron was overpowered; and, as he saw that escape was impossible, he stabbed himself and leaped into the sea.

Scipio never exhibited any proofs of striking abilities either in war or in peace; and the prominent part which he played in these stormy times was chiefly owing to his high connections, being a Scipio by birth, a Metellus by adoption, and, by the marriage of his daughter, the father-in-law of Pompey. The love of country and the freedom of the republic (the watchwords with which he fought against Caesar) were a mere sham; he was only anxious to obtain for himself and his party the exclusive possession of the offices of the state and of the provinces, that they might realise fortune to gratify their love of luxury and pomp. In public, Scipio showed himself cruel, vindictive, and oppressive; in private, he was mean, avaricious, and licentious, even beyond most of his contemporaries. A striking instance of his profligacy is given in the tale related by Valerius Maximus, which has already been referred to. (Plut. Cic. 15; Dion Cass. xl. 51, xliii. 9; Appian, B. C. ii. 24, 25, 60, 76, 87, 95—100; Caes. B. C. i. 1—4, iii. 31—33, 36, 57, 82, 83, B. Afric. passim; Plut. Pomp. 55, Caes. 30, Cat. Min. 60; Liv. Epit. 113, 114; *Val. The two coins annexed were struck by Metellus Scipio. On the obverse of the former is the legend Q. METEL. PIVS, but the head is uncertain; on the reverse is SCIPIO IMP., with an elephant, which refers evidently to his command in Africa. The head on the obverse of the latter is also uncertain; beneath it is an eagle's head, and the legend is METEL. PIVS SCIP. IMP.: the reverse represents a pair of scales hanging from a cornucopia, with a sella curulis beneath, on one side of which is an ear of corn, and on the other side a hand grasping something. The legend CRASS. IVN. LEG. PRO(PR). refers to Crassus Junianus, one of Scipio's legates, who served with the title legatus propraetore. [CRASSUS, No. 29, p. 882, a.]

COINS OF METELLUS SCIPIO.

23. Q. CAECILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS. His descent and that of his two brothers is quite uncertain; for he evidently could not have been the son of Metellus Macedonicus, as Florus (iii. 8. § 1) states. (Drumann, vol. ii. p. 50.) Metellus was consul B. C. 69 with Q. Hortensius, and obtained the conduct of the war against Crete, which Hortensius had declined, when the lot had given this province to him. Metellus left Italy in B. C. 68 with three legions. He was engaged two whole years in the subjugation of the island, and did not return to Rome till the third. The difficulty of the conquest was much increased by the unwarrantable interference of Pompey; for after Cydonia, Cnossus, and many other towns had fallen into the hands of Metellus, and the war seemed almost at an end, the Cretans sent to offer their submission to Pompey, from whom they hoped to obtain more favourable terms than from Metellus. By the Gabinian law, passed in B. C. 67, which gave to Pompey the conduct of the war against the pirates, the supreme command in the whole of the Mediterranean was also assigned to him; he therefore had a pretext for interfering in the affairs of Crete, but it was clearly never intended that he should supersede Metellus. His emissaries had probably persuaded the Cretans to make this offer; but however this may be, he immediately complied with their request, and sent his legate L. Octavius to receive the surrender of their towns, and shortly afterwards another of his legates, Cornelius Siseuna, came to the island from Greece with the command of some troops. Metellus, however, refused to take any notice of their claims, and continued to attack and subdue the towns, although the inhabitants were encouraged in their resistance to him by the legates of Pompey. Eleuthera and Lappa fell into his hands; and in the capture of the latter town Octavius was made prisoner, but dismissed by Metellus with contempt. Cornelius Siseuna had meantime died, and hitherto Octavius had not ventured to use force against Metellus, but now he employed the troops of Siseuna to fight on the side of the Cretans. But as these troops shortly afterwards withdrew from the island, for some reason unknown to us, Octavius took refuge with Ariation in Hierapytna, from which, however, he fled at the approach of Metellus, leaving the Cretans to their fate. Thereupon Lasthenes and Panareus, the chief leaders of the Cretans, made their submission to him, and the war was brought to a close.

In B. C. 66 Metellus returned to Rome, but he was prevented from obtaining a triumph by the partisans of Pompey. Metellus, however, could not relinquish his claim to a triumph, and accordingly resolved to wait in the neighbourhood of the city till more favourable circumstances. His patience was as great as his desire for the honour; for he was still waiting before the city in B. C. 63, when the conspiracy of Catiline broke out. He was sent into Apulia to prevent an apprehended rising of the slaves; and in the following year, B. C. 62, after the death of Catiline, he was at length permitted to make his triumphal entrance into Rome, and received the surname of Creticus. He was robbed, however, of the chief ornaments of his triumph, Lasthenes and Panareus, whom a tribune of the plebs compelled him to surrender to Pompey.

Metellus, as was naturally to be expected, joined Lucullus and the other leaders of the aristocracy in their opposition to Pompey, and succeeded in preventing the latter from obtaining the ratification of his acts in Asia. In B. C. 60 Metellus was sent by the senate with two others to investigate the state of Gaul, where a rising of the people was apprehended. He is mentioned by Cicero, in A. C. 57, as one of the pontiffs before whom he spoke respecting his house, and he probably died soon afterwards. (Liv. Epit. 98—100; Flor. iii. 7, iv. 2; Entrop. vi. 11; Oros. vi. 4; Vell. Pat. ii. 34, 35; Justin. xxxix. 5; Appian, Sic. 6; Dion Cass. Frug. 178, xxxvi. 1, 2; Plut. Pomp. 29; Sall. Cat. 30; Cic. Verr. i. 9, pro Flacc. 3, 13, 40, in Pison. 24, ad Att. i. 19, de Har. Resp. 6.)

24. L. CAECILIUS METELLUS, brother of the preceding [No. 23], was praetor B. C. 71, and as proprætor succeeded Verres in the government of Sicily in B. C. 70. He defeated the pirates, who had conquered the Roman fleet and taken possession of the harbour of Syracuse, and compelled them to leave the island. His administration is praised by Cicero for restoring peace and security to the inhabitants, after the frightful scenes which had been enacted there by Verres; but he nevertheless attempted, in conjunction with his brother, to shield Verres from injustice, and tried to prevent the Sicilians from bringing forward their testimony and complaints against him. He was consul B. C. 68 with Q. Marcius Rex, but died at the beginning of his year. (Liv. Epit. 98; Oros. vi. 3; Cic. Verr. Act. i. 9, Accus. ii. 4, iii. 16, ii. 28, 56, 67, iii. 53, in Pis. 4; Dion Cass. xxxv. 4.)

25. M. CAECILIUS METELLUS, brother of the two preceding [Nos. 23, 24], was praetor B. C. 69, in the same year that his eldest brother was consul. The lot gave him the presidency in the court de pecuniis repetundis, and Verres was very anxious that his trial should come on before Metellus. (Cic. Verr. Act. i. 8, 9, 10.) Since he did not obtain the consulship, Drumann conjectures (vol. ii. p. 57) that the gladiators of M. Metellus, whom Cicero mentions in B. C. 60 (ad Att. ii. l. § 11) may have belonged to the son of the praetor, and were exhibited by him in honour of his father, who would therefore have died about this time.

26. Q. CAECILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS, is conjectured by Drumann (vol. ii. p. 57) to have been the son of No. 23, and to have been the quaestor with C. Trebonius, who supported the adoption of Clodius into a plebeian family, when Trebonius opposed it. (Cic. ad Fam. xv. 21. § 2.) This is, however, mere conjecture, for the name of the colleague of Trebonius is not even mentioned in the passage of Cicero referred to above. Cicero speaks (ad Att. iv. 7. § 2), in B. C. 56, soon after his return from exile, of a Metellus who had lately died, and who had always acted badly towards him. As this Metellus cannot be any of the celebrated persons of that name, Drumann supposes him to have been the colleague of Trebonius.

27. L. CAECILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS, a son probably of No. 24 (comp. Cic. Verr. iii. 68), was tribune of the plebs, B. C. 49, and, true to the hereditary principles of his family, distinguished himself by his warm support of the aristocracy. He did not fly from Rome on the approach of Caesar with Pompey and the rest of his party, but remained behind in the city. He also showed his courage in attempting to prevent Caesar from taking possession of the sacred treasury, and only gave way upon being threatened with death. (Plat. Caes. 35, Pomp. 62; Dion. Cass. xli. 17; Appian, B. C. ii. 41; Caes. B. C. i. 33; Lucan, iii. 114, &c.; Cic. ad Att. x. 4, 8.) He soon afterwards left Rome, and was at Capua at the beginning of March, when Pompey was on the point of leaving Italy. Cicero mentions Clodia as his mother-in-law, who may perhaps have been the wife of Metellus, consul B. C. 60. [No. 20.] (Cic. ad Att. ix. 6. § 3.)

There was a Metellus who fought on the side of Antony in the last civil war, was taken prisoner at the battle of Actium, and whose life was spared by Octavian at the intercession of his son, who had fought on the side of the latter. (Appian, B. C. iv. 42.) The elder of these Metelli may have been the tribune of B. C. 49; but this is only conjecture.

28. M. CAECILIUS METELLUS, son probably of No. 25, is mentioned by Cicero in B. C. 60 (ad Att. ii. 1. § 1). See No. 25.

29. Q. CAECILIUS METELLUS CRETICUS, consul B. C. 7 with A. Licinius Nerva, was probably ransom of No. 23, and son of No. 26, if the latter ever existed. (Dion. Cass. iv. 30; Fasti.)

30. L. (CAECILIUS) METELLUS, a triumvir of the mint, whose name is only known from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse has the head of Apollo, with (L.) METEL. A. ALE. S. P. F. on the reverse, a man sitting on shields, whom victory is crowning from behind, with C. MAL. and underneath, ROMA. It thus appears that the colleagues of this Metellus were A. Albinus and C. Albiolus. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 279.)

COIN OF L. METELLUS.

METHAPUS (Μέθαρως), an Athenian who is said to have introduced at Thebes the worship of a Cabeiri. He was much skilled in all kinds of mysteries and orgies, and made several alterations in the mysteries at Andania. (Paus. iv. 1. § 5; elcker, Die Archyl. Tril. p. 270.) [L. S.]

METHARME (Μεθάρμης), a daughter of king Pygmalion, and wife of Cinyras. (Apollod. iii. 14. § 3; comp. CINYRAS.) [L. S.]

METHODIUS (Μεθόδιος). 1. Surnamed the APOSTLE of Bohemia, enjoys a great reputation in the history of the church as well as of the fine arts. He lived in the ninth century of our era, was a native of Thessalonica, and went to Constantinople, where he entered a convent of the order of St. Basilianus Cyrillus. For some time he lived in Rome, and devoted himself to painting, in which he rose to such celebrity that, after his return to Constantinople, he received an invitation from Bogoria, king of Bulgaria, to repair to his court at Nicopolis. The king being fond of pictures representing battles and the like bloody subjects, requested him to execute something more terrible for him than he had ever seen before; and upon this suggestion, Methodius painted the Last Judgment with such effect, that Bogoria, whose mind had already a turn for the Christian religion, entreated the skilful monk to baptize him forthwith, and thus enable him to find pardon with God on the day of the last judgment. This was exactly what Methodius had in view when he chose that subject. The conversion of the king was followed by that of the army; and in a short time the whole nation adopted the Christian religion. At that period Christianity was daily losing ground in Asia, where the influence of Mohammedanism became overwhelming; but the losses in the South were more than balanced by the victories of the Cross in the North, obtained through the noble zeal of the Greek clergy, among whom our Methodius and (his brother?) Cyrillus, were then the most luminous stars. Shortly after the conversion of the Bulgarians, which took place in 853 and the following years (perhaps only in 861), Methodius was sent into the countries north of the Danube, where he displayed the greatest activity among the Slavonian population of Pannonia and the adjacent countries: he resided there in the quality of archbishop of Pannonia, and he repaired thither as early as 859, or at least not later than 863. He is said to have assisted Cyrillus in inventing the Slavonian alphabet, which is the parent of the present Russian and Servian alphabets; and he was active in translating the whole of the Bible and several liturgical books into the Slavonian languages. In 878 he was summoned by pope John VIII. to come to Rome, and to show cause why he should not be punished for having translated the mass into Slavonian, and introduced it in that form into the churches of his diocese; but it appears he did not obey the summons. About 890 Methodius converted duke Borziwoi of Bohemia, who soon afterwards became king of Magna Moravia, to the Christian religion; and now all the Bohemians and Moravians, many millions in number, submitted likewise to the rite of baptism. There are, however, doubts as to the conversion of Bohemia by Methodius, respecting which the reader will find more information in the sources quoted below. The time of the death of Methodius is not exactly known, but thus much is certain, that he died after 893, and perhaps in the beginning of the tenth century, at a very advanced age. In later years he was canonised. The Greeks and Slavonians celebrate him on the 11th of May; but in the Martyrologium the day is the 9th of March. As to his proficiency in painting, Le Beau (Hist. du Bas Empire, vol. xiv. p. 362) calls him the most eminent painter of his time. It is, however, well known that his contemporaries, Modalluph in France, Tutilo in Germany, and Lazarus in Constantinople, enjoyed also a first-rate reputation as painters. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 272; Cedren. p. 489, &c.; Simeon Metaphr. Annal. p. 412, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 135, &c., in the Paris edition; Bolland, Vitæ Cyrilli et Methodii; J. G. 2. CONFESSOR, patriarch of Constantinople, was called Ὁμολογῆτα, or Confessor, on account of his firm adherence to the worship of images. He was a native of Syracuse, where he was born towards the close of the eighth century of our era, but went to Constantinople and took holy orders, after giving his property to the church and the poor. For some time he lived in a convent in the island of Chios. The severe measures of the emperor Leo Armenus induced him to take refuge among the orthodox in Rome, but he returned to Greece after the death of Leo, in 820. Shortly afterwards he was sent by Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople, as ambassador to pope Pashalis, who entrusted him with a letter to Michael, in order to persuade the emperor to behave less harshly against the orthodox. For this service poor Methodius paid very dearly. Michael, offended by the pope's letter, ordered seven hundred lashes to be inflicted upon the back of Methodius, who, half dead, was thrown into an awful dungeon in one of the islands of the Propontis, where he would have perished from want of food had not a poor fisherman accidentally discovered him, and kept him alive by occasional supplies of bread and fish. He remained there several years; but being a man of great talents and acknowledged skill in administrative affairs, he was recalled by Theophilus, son and successor of Michael, who gave him suitable apartments in his own palace. In a short time Methodius obtained great influence at the court; but his orthodox principle caused him a second flogging and a second imprisonment in his former dungeon. Again released, he returned to Constantinople and was compelled to accompany Theophilus in his campaigns against the Arabs, the emperor being in want of his talents, although he did not trust him sufficiently to leave him in the capital. His life, however, was far from being agreeable, several plots having been made to ruin him: among other charges brought forth against him was that of having committed fornication with a reputed courtesan, who declared she was pregnant by the pious bishop; but Methodius cleared himself of this imputed misdemeanour. Theophilus died in 842. He was succeeded by his widow, Theodora, who reigned for her infant son, Michael III., and being a professed friend of images, she bestowed her powerful protection upon Methodius, and caused him to be chosen patriarch of Constantinople in the very year of his accession (842). This high office Methodius held till his death, on the 14th of June, 846, displaying constantly the greatest activity in suppressing the iconoclasts, and restoring the worship of images. Methodius was a very learned man, and wrote a considerable number of works on divinity, of which several have come down to us, and have been found well worthy of publication. The most important are:—1. Encomium S. Dionysii Areopagitæ. Editions: the Greek text, Florence, 1516, 8vo.; Paris, 1562, 8vo.; Græce et Latine, in the second volume of "Opera S. Dionysii Areop." Antwerp, 1634, fol. The question whether, in composing this work, Methodius was guilty of plagiarism by stealing from the monk Hilddunius, who wrote on the same subject, caused a literary feud, which is largely discussed in Fabricius, to whom we refer the reader. 2. Oratio in eos qui dicunt: Quid profuit Filius Dei Crucifigi? Græce et Latine, by Gretærus, in the second volume of his work, De Cruce. 3. De Occursu Simeonis et Annæ in Templo, et de Desipara; and 4. In Ramos Palmarum, two orations, Græce et Latine, in Combéfis's edition of the works of Methodius Patarsensis, Paris, 1644, fol. 5. Encomium S. Agathæ Virginis et Martyris, a Latin version in Combéfis's Bibl. Patr.; the text, incomplete, with a Latin version, in Leo Allatius, Diatriba de Methodio. 6. Cusones Poenitentiales, &c., published with a Latin version by Gentianus Herterus. 7. Constitutio de iis qui diverso Modo, &c., ad fidem Christianam revertantur, Græce et Latine, with notes, by Jac. Goar in Ecceholog. Græcor. 8. Tres versus Iambici ad Theodorum et Theophrastum gratias, tribus illis quos ad ipsum miserunt Responsorii, in Lambecii Commentarii; also ad Calcem Const. Manassæ in the Paris edition. (Leo Allatius, Diatriba de Methodio; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 273; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 451, &c., ed. Geneva; Baronius, Annal. ad annum 842; Theophan. Contin. ii. 8, iii. 24, iv. 3, 6, 10; Simeon Metaphrasta, Theophil. c. 23, Michael et Theodora, c. 5; Georg. Munach. Michael et Theodora, c. 1.)

3. Patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE in 1210, is probably the author of De Revolutionibus, which some attribute to Methodius Patarsensis. [See No. 6.] The Greek text, with a Latin version, is contained in the first volume of the Græcica Orthodoxa, as well as in some of the Biblioth. Patr. He also wrote Aenigmata, in iambic tristickons, extant in MS. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 275; Cave, p. 662, ed. Geneva.)

4. EUBULUS or EUBULUS. [No. 6.]

5. MONACHUS, lived in Constantinople during the middle and latter part of the thirteenth century. About this time the Byzantine capital was much disturbed by the coincident election of Josephus and Arsenius to the patriarchal see of Constantinople, each of them being proclaimed by his partisans as the sole legitimate patriarch. On this occasion Methodius wrote a valuable treatise, entitled Συλλογὴ συνοδικῆ, Sylloga Synodica, showing that orthodox people sought not to secede from their spiritual leaders even in case their predecessor had been illegally deposed. It was published by Leo Allatius in his Diatriba de Methodio, with a Latin translation. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 275; Cave, Hist. Lit. p. 612, ed. Geneva.)

6. Surnamed PATARENSIS, and sometimes, EUBULUS or EUBULUS, lived in the third, and died in the beginning of the fourth century of our era. He held successively the sees of Olympos and Patara in Lycia (whence Patarsensis) and Tyros in Phœnicia. He was a Christian; and Suidas says that he died the death of a martyr, at Chalcis Ἀνατολῆς (one of the two Chalcs in Syria), during the reign of Decius (A. D. 249—251) and Valerianus. The addition of the latter name seems to be spurious, since Valerian did not reign with, but after Decius. However the original text of Suidas may be, he was wrong with regard to the time assigned by him to the death of Methodius; for there seems to be no doubt that this divine was a contemporary of Porphyry, and perhaps outlived him; and if he therefore died during one of the later persecutions of the Christians, as is asserted, it might have been in 303, as Cave thinks, or in 311, according to Fabricius. Methodius was a man of great learning and exemplary piety, who enjoyed the general esteem of his contemporaries. He wrote several works, the principal of which are: 1. Περὶ Ἀναστάσεως, De Resurrectione, against Origen, which was divided into two or perhaps three parts. Fragments of it are given by Epiphanius in his Parasurium; in Photius, Bibliotheca; a few are contained in the works of Damascenus; 2. Περὶ τῶν γενεῶν, De Creatis, in Photius; 3. Περὶ Ἀδελφότητος καὶ πόλεως τῆς κατὰ, De Libro Arbitrio. Leo Allatius had the complete text with a Latin version, but the work, as contained in the edition of Methodius by Combéfis, is not quite complete. 4. Περὶ τῆς ἀγγελικῆς καὶ ἀνθρώπου καὶ ἀγγέλων, De Angelica Virginitate et Castitate, written in the form of a dialogue. Leo Allatius published this work, Gr. et Lat., in his Diatriba de Methodio, at Rome, 1656, 8vo. and dedicated it to Pope Alexander VII. At the same time Petrus Possinus obtained the Greek text of this work from Lucas Holsten, at Rome; and having prepared a copy for the press, sent it, together with a Latin version, to Paris, where it was published in the following year, 1657, fol. Possinus, strangely enough, dedicated his edition to the same pope, not knowing that Leo Allatius was doing, or had just done, the same thing; nor was Allatius at all aware of Possinus being engaged in the same work at the same time as he was. It is also contained in Combéfis, Auctuar. Biblioth. Patr. Paris, 1672. Photius, quoted below, says that the work had been adulterated, and contained especially several passages tending to Arianism, of which no trace is to be found in the later editions, so that his MS. was decidedly different from those perused by Allatius and Possinus. 5. Oratio de Simeone et Anna, seu In Festum Occursus et Purificationis B. Mariæ, ed. Petrus Plantinus, Antwerp, 1598. This work is said to be the production of a later Methodius, but Allatius vindicates the authorship of Methodius Patrensis. 6. Λόγος περὶ Μαρτυρίας, Sermo de Martyriis. 7. Εἰς τὴν Βαθλὴν, In Ramos Palmarum, an oration, of which Photius has extracts. The authorship of Methodius is doubtful. 8. Libri adversus Porphyrium, of which there are fragments in Damascenus. 9. De Pythionissa contra Origeneum, lost. 10. Commentarii in Cantica Cantico-rum, fragments. 11. Ἐπιστολὴ, lost, &c. This Methodius is said to have written a work, De Revelatione, which, however, is more justly attributed to a later Methodius. [No. 3.] The principal works of Methodius, viz., De Libro Arbitrio, De Resurrectione, De Angelica Virginitate et Castitate, two homilies, and the extracts given by Photius were published by Combéfis, Græco et Latine, cum notis, Paris, 1644, fol., together with the works of Amphilocheus and Andreas Cretensis. Phot. Cod. 234, 235, 236, 237; Cave. Hist. Lit.

p. 96, ac. ed. Geneva; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 260, &c. This Methodius stands in the index to Fabricius as Methodius Patrensis, which is correct; but the passage where the reader finds more information on him (vol. vii. p. 260, &c.) is omitted. (Hankius, Script. Byzant.) [W. P.]

METHON (Μέθων), a kinsman of Orpheus, from whom the Thracian town of Methone was believed to have derived its name. (Plut. Quæst. Græc. 11.) [L. S.]

METHYMNA (Μέθυμνα), a daughter of Macar and wife of Leobus, from whom the town of Methymna, in Lesbos, derived its name. (Diod. v. 81; Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

METHYMNAEUS (Μέθυμναίος), a surname of Dionysus, derived, according to some, from Methymna, rich in vines. (Heesych. s. v.; Virg. Georg. ii. 20.) Others derived it from μέθυ (sweet or wine), as Plutarch (Sympos. iii. 2) and Athenæus (viii. p. 363). [L. S.]

METIADUSA (Μητιάδουσα), a daughter of Eupalamus, and wife of king Cecrops, by whom she became the mother of Pandion. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 5; Paus. i. 5. § 3.) [L. S.]

METILIA GENS, an Alban house, which, on the destruction of Alba Longa, migrated to Rome. (Dionys. iii. 29.) Since the Metilii were immediately admitted into the Roman senate, they must at the time of their migration have been of patrician rank. In history, however, they occur only as plebeians. Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 17) mentions a lex Metilia de Falloniis in B. C. 220. [W. B. D.]

METILIUS. 1. SP. METILIUS, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 416. He brought forward a rogation for fresh assignments of the public land to the commons, but was foiled in his attempt by his colleagues in the tribunate. (Liv. iv. 48.)

2. M. METILIUS, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 401, when he impeached two of the consular tribunes of the preceding year, and resisted the levying of the war-tax (tributum) because the patricians usurped the rents of the demesne-land. (Liv. v. 11, 12.)

3. M. METILIUS, tribune of the plebs in B. C. 217, brought forward a rogation to deprive Q. Fabius Maximus, then dictator, of the sole control of the legions, and to admit the master of the horse, Q. Minucius Thermus, to an equal share of the command. Metilius was legatus, in B. C. 212, from the senate to the consuls, after some reverses, in the seventh year of the second Punic war. (Liv. xxii. 25, xxv. 22.)

4. T. METILIUS CROTO, legatus, in B. C. 215, from the prætor Appius Claudius Pulcher to the legions in Sicily. (Liv. xxiii. 31.) [W. B. D.]

METIOCHE. [METOPPE.] A second person of the name was a Trojan woman, who was painted by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. x. 26. § 1.) [L. S.]

METIOCHUS (Μητιόχος), an Athenian orator, a contemporary and friend of Pericles, for whom he often spoke in the assembly at Athens. (Plut. Præcept. Pol. 15; Bekker, Anecd. p. 309; Schömann, De Sortit. Jud. p. 40, &c.) [L. S.]

METION (Μητιών), a son of Erechtheus and Praxithen, and husband of Alcippe. His sons, the Metionidae, expelled their cousin Pandion from his kingdom of Athens, but were themselves afterwards expelled by the sons of Pandion (Apollod. iii. 15. §§ 1, 5, 6, 8; Paus. i. 5. § 3). Diodorus (iv. 76) calls Daedalus one of the sons of Metion, and Metion himself a son of Eupalamus and grandson of Erechtheus (comp. Plat. Ion, p. 533, a.; Paus. vii. 4. § 5). Apollodorus (iii. 15. § 8) on the other hand, calls Eupalamus a son of Metion and father of Daedalus. According to a Sicynonian legend, Sicyon also was a son of Metion and a grandson of Erechtheus. (Paus. ii. 6. § 3; comp. Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 468, who calls the wife of Metion Iphinoë.) [L. S.]

METIS (Μῆτις). 1. The personification of prudence, is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Thetys. At the instigation of Zeus, she gave to Cronos a vomitive, whereupon he brought back his children whom he had devoured (Apollod. i. 2. § 1, &c.; Hes. Theog. 471). She was the first love and wife of Zeus, from whom she had at first endeavoured to withdraw by metamorphosing herself in various ways. She prophesied to him that she would give birth first to a girl and afterwards to a boy, to whom the rule of the world was destined by fate. For this reason Zeus devoured her, when she was pregnant with Athena, and afterwards he himself gave birth to a daughter, who issued from his head (Apollod. i. 3. § 6; Hes. Theog. 886). Plato (Sympos. p. 203, b.) speaks of Poros as a son of Metis, and according to Hesiod, Zeus devoured Metis on the advice of Uranus and Ge, who also revealed to him the destiny of his son. (Comp. Welcker, Die Aeschyl. Tril. p. 278.)

2. A male being, a mystic personification of the power of generation among the so-called Orphics, similar to Phanes and Ericapæus. (Orph. Fragm. vi. 19, viii. 2.) [L. S.]

METIUS. [METTIUS.]

METOCHITA, GEORGIUS (Γεώργιος ὁ Μετοχίτης), magnus diaconus in Constantinople, lived in the thirteenth century. He was an intimate friend and staunch adherent of the emperor Andronicus the Elder, and one of those few Greek divines who advocated the re-union of the Greek and Latin churches. For both these reasons he was deposed and exiled, about 1263, by the emperor Andronicus the Younger. He died in exile, but the year of his death is not known. Some say that he was the father of the following Theodore Metochita, with whom several modern writers have confounded him. He wrote different works of no small importance for the history of the time: his style is abominable, but full of expressive strength and barbarous vigour. 1. Ἀντίρρησις, &c., or Refutatio trium Capitulum Maximi Planulii; 2. Ἀντίρρησις, &c., or, Responsio ad ea quae Manuel Nepos Cretensis publicavit, both published together, Greek and Latin, by Leo Allatius, in the second volume of Græcia Orthodoxa. 3. Fragmentum ex Oratione de Unione Ecclesiarum, published by the same in his diatribe Contra Hottinger; 4. Fragm. ex Oratione de Dissidio Ecclesiarum, ibid.; 5. Tractatus de Processione Spiritus Sancti Patrumque hæc in re Sententiæ, divided into five parts or books; a fragment of the fourth was published by Combès in the second volume of Nova Biblioth. Patr. and a fragment of the fifth by Leo Allatius in De Purgatorio and Contra Hottinger, who gives some information on the whole work in his De Consensu utriusque Ecclesie, p. 771; 6. Oratio Antirrheticus contra Georgium Cyprium Patriarcham. 7. Oratio de Sacris Mysteriis; 8. Explicatio Regularum S. Nicephori, &c., and other minor productions, most of which were known to Leo Allatius. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 412, not; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 1276, p. 645, ed. Geneva.) [W. P.]

METOCHITA, THEODORUS (Θεόδωρος ὁ Μετοχίτης), the intimate friend and adherent of the unfortunate emperor Andronicus the Elder (A. D. 1262—1328), was a man of extraordinary learning and great literary activity, although much of his time was taken up by the duties he had to discharge as Magnus Logotheta Ecclesiæ Constant., and the various commissions with which he was entrusted by his imperial friend. No sooner had Andronicus the Younger usurped the throne, in 1328, than he deposed Metochita and sent him into exile. The learned priest, however, was soon recalled, but, disgusted with the world, he retired into a convent in Constantinople, where he died in 1332. It is said that he was the son of the preceding Georgius Metochita, with whom he has often been confounded. Nicephorus Gregoras, the writer, delivered the funeral oration at the interment of Th. Metochita, and wrote an epitaph which is given in Fabricius. Many details referring to the life of this distinguished divine are contained in the works of Nicephorus Gregoras and John Cantacuzenus. Metochita wrote a great number of works on various subjects; the principal are:—1. Παράφρασις, being commentaries on various works of Aristotle's, especially Physica, De Animæ, De Cælo, De Ortis et Interitu, De Memoræ et Reminiscentiæ, De Somno et Vigiliis, and others. The Greek text has never been published. A Latin version by Gentianus Hervetus appeared at Basel, 1559, 4to; reprinted, Ravenna, 1614, 4to; 2. Χρονικόν, a Roman history from Julius Cæsar to Constantine the Great; the Greek text, with a Latin version, by John Meursius, Leyden, 1618, 4to. Regarding the doubts on Metochita's authorship of this work, compare Fabricius; 3. Ἱστορικὰ καὶ Ἰζητητικὰ ὑπομνήματα, various commentaries, essays, sentences, &c., published under the title Specimina Operum Theod. Metochitæ, by Janus Bloch, Copenhagen, 1790, 8vo. The following are still unpublished:—4. Περὶ Νεωτέρων κακομελειῶν, De multis recentiorum Constantinensium, treats on the corruption of the church, especially of the anti-Christian changes introduced into the rites. Arcadius made a Latin version of this work, which, however, seems not to have been published. 5. Ἀδύοι, eight books on ecclesiastical history, two of which are extant in MS. 6. Capita Philocephæ et Historiciæ Miscellanea CXX., of which Fabricius gives the titles. Their great variety allows us to infer the extensive learning and the speculative genius of Metochita. 7. Michaelis Palæologus et Irene Augustas Epitaphium. 8. Astronomica. Metochita was one of the best astronomers of his time. 9. Commentarii in Ptolemæi Megasphætaris, said to be extant in MS. in Spain. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 412, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad ann. 1276, and Wharton, in Append. to Cave, ad ann. 1301; Thomas Magister, Προσφωρισμὸς (ad Metochitam) and Επιστολὰ (to the same), ed. Græc. et Lat., together with other letters of the same Thomas, Laurentius Normann, Upsalæ, 1693, 4to.) [W. P.]

METON (Μέτων), a citizen of Tarentum, who, when the decree was proposed for calling in the assistance of Pyrrhus, came into the assembly of the people, in the garb of a reveller, and accompanied by a flute-player, as if just come from a banquet. When the people laughed at him and called out to him to sing them a song, he answered, "You are right to encourage men to sing and make merry now while they can, for when Pyrrhus is arrived we shall have to lead a very different sort of life." By this artifice he produced a great effect upon the assembly; but the decree was nevertheless carried. (Plut. Pyrrh. 13; Dion Cass. Fr. Vol. 45, p. 169, ed. Mai; Dionys. xvii. 13, 14.) [E. H. B.]

METON (Μέτων). With the name of Meton we join those of PHAEINUS (Φαεινός) and EUCTEMON (Ευκτῆμων), all of Athens, contemporaries, and, as to the little which is known of them, inseparable.

As to Phaeinus, he appears nowhere except in a passage of Theophrastus, who says (de Signis Temp. et. scil.) that he observed the solar tropics at Athens on Lycabettus; from which Meton learnt the mode of constructing the cycle of nineteen years. Salmasius has a conjecture which we only mention here because it suggested a reverse conjecture. There is in Aratus the following line (at the beginning of the Diosemeia):—

Ἐννεακαίδεκα κύκλα φαεινοῦ ἡελίοιο.

This, says Salmasius, should be Φαεινῶ ἡελίοιο, or the shining sun here mentioned is Phaeinus of Elea. The conjecture has been rejected with scorn by Petavius, Weidler, &c. May we not go further, and ask whether it ought not to be the other way? Did any Phaeinus give information upon tropics to Meton (a known observer of them) other than Φαεινός Ἠέλιος, Apollo himself? It is worth noting that Phaeinus is a strange adjective, and a strange form of it, for a proper name; and that a slight mistake of Theophrastus (no astronomer, as far as is known), or of some one whom he copied, might easily have converted the old epithet of the Sun into an astronomer. And there is another astronomer, Philip, contemporary with Meton, to whom (with Euctemon) Geminus attributes the cycle of nineteen years, to the exclusion of Meton. Here is one confusion in which Philip bears a part, and there might easily have been another.

Much emendation has often been found necessary when an ancient writer enumerates those who have written on subjects which he had not studied himself: witness the passage in Vitruvius (ix. 7), in which the older texts and versions join Hipparchus and Aratus with Eudæmon, Callistus, and Mela, for which we must read Euctemon, Callippus, and Meton.

As to Meton, the son of Pausanias, and (on either supposition) the follower of Phaeinus, Suidas calls him Λυκονίδης (some read Λευκονίδης). Ptolemy (de Apparent.) says he observed at Athens, in the Cyclades, in Macedonia, and in Thrace; unless indeed he meant one or two of these places to be stated of Euctemon. A verse of Phrynichus (preserved by Suidas) describes him as κρήνας ὄγων, whence his skill in hydraulics has been inferred. The discovery of the cycle of nineteen years (CALLIPPUS, and Dict. of Antiq. s. v. "Calendar, Greek") is referred to by Aelian (Var. Hist. x. 7), Censorinus (c. 18), Diodorus (xii. 36), Ptolemy (Synt. iii. 2), all of whom note or refer to a column or table erected by Meton at Athens, setting forth this cycle and the observations of the solstices which were made shortly before the epoch of commencement of the cycle.

From Ptolemy's words it appears that the date of these observations of the solstices made by Meton and Euctemon is thus to be determined (Halma, i. 163):—"It is said that this observation was made at Athens when Appendæ was archon, on the 21st of the month Phamenoth, in the morning. Now, from this solstice to that which was observed by Aristarchus in the fiftieth year of the first period of Callippus, there have elapsed, as Hipparchus says, 152 years. And since this fiftieth year, which was the forty-fourth after the death of Alexander, to the four hundred and sixty-third, which is that of my observation, there have elapsed 419 years." Such are the data from which, and from the presumed meaning of a passage in Diodorus, Meton's solstice, the acknowledged epoch of commencement of the period, has been placed B. C. 432. But we are far from seeing how it has been made out. Delambre gives no opinion, but quotes Cassini's, which he would not have done on any point in which care or research could have given him one of his own. But though the particular date of this epoch is not fixed to a year or two, the general era of Meton is well fixed, as well by the data above mentioned as by Aelian (Var. Hist. xiii. 12), who states that he feigned insanity to avoid sailing for Sicily in the ill-fated expedition of which he is stated to have had an evil presentiment.

The length of the year, according to Meton, is stated by Ptolemy as  $365\frac{1}{4}$  days and  $\frac{1}{8}$  of a day. This is more than half an hour too long. But then it should be remembered that this length of the year is that deduced from assuming that Meton held his own period to be exact. Now it by no means follows that in stating the cycle he meant to assert that it was mathematically true. Whether he was himself the inventor of this remarkable period, or whether he found it elsewhere, cannot now be known.

The number of different persons to whom this astronomical period has been attributed (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 9), may furnish some presumption that Meton only brought forward and made popular a piece of knowledge which he and others had derived from an oriental source: a thing by no means unlikely in itself.

Of Euctemon, independently of his astronomical partnership with Meton, nothing is known. Geminus and Ptolemy both frequently refer to him on the rising and setting of stars, on which is to be inferred he had left some work. (Ptolemy, Geminus, Weidler, Hist. Astron.; Delambre, Astron. Anc.; Petavius, Uranolog. &c.) [A. De M.]

METOP'PE (Μετώπη). 1. A daughter of the Arcadian river-god Ladon, was married to Asopus, and the mother of Thebe. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 6; Pind. Ol. vi. 144, with the Schol.)

2. A daughter of the river-god Asopus. (Schol. ad Pind. Isthm. viii. 37.)

3. The wife of the river-god Sangarius and mother of Hecabe, the wife of Priam. (Apollod. iii. 12. § 5.) [L. S.]

METOP'PUS (Μετώπος), a Pythagorean, a native of Metapontum. A fragment of a work of his on virtue is still extant. (Stob. Serm. i. p. 7; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 852.) [C. P. M.]

METROBIUS (Μητρόβιος). 1. One of the numerous Greek writers on the art of cookery, quoted by Athenæus, was the author of a work entitled Πλακωντοποικόν σύγγραμμα. (Athen. xiv. p. 643, e. f.)

2. An actor, who played women's parts (Λυσί-86s), was a great favourite of the dictator Sulla. (Plut. Sull. 2, 36.)

METROCLEES (Μητροκλής), of Maroneia, a brother of Hipparchia, was at first a disciple of Theophrastus, but afterwards he entered the school of Crates, and became a cynic. He seems to have been a man of great ability, and having reached an advanced age, he drowned himself. He wrote several works, all of which he is said to have burnt; one of them bore the title of Χρηλα, of which a line is preserved in Diogenes Laërtius (vi. 6; comp. vi. 33, ii. 102; Stob. Serm. tit. 116. 48). [L. S.]

METRODORUS (Μητρόδωρος), an officer of Philip V. of Macedon, with whom, in B. C. 202, the Thasians capitulated on condition that they should not be required to receive a garrison, nor to pay tribute, that they should have no soldiers billeted on them, and should retain their own laws. Philip, however, broke this agreement and reduced them to slavery. (Polyb. xv. 24.) We learn from a fragment of Polybius that Metrodorus greatly excited Philip's displeasure, but by what conduct, or on what occasion, does not appear. (Polyb. Fragm. Hist. xxxii.; Suid. s. v. 'Ανατάσις.) It was perhaps the same Metrodorus who is mentioned by Polybius as an ambassador from Perseus to the Rhodians, in B. C. 168. (Polyb. xxix. 3, 5.) [E. E.]

METRODORUS (Μητρόδωρος), literary. 1. Of Cos, the son of Epicharmus, and grandson of Thyrsus. Like several of that family he addicted himself partly to the study of the Pythagorean philosophy, partly to the science of medicine. He wrote a treatise upon the works of Epicharmus, in which, on the authority of Epicharmus and Pythagoras himself, he maintained that the Doric was the proper dialect of the Orphic hymns. Metrodorus flourished about B. C. 460. (Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. c. 34, p. 467, ed. Kiessling; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 852; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. i. p. 190.)

2. Of LAMPISACUS, a contemporary and friend of Anaxagoras. He wrote on Homer, the leading feature of his system of interpretation being that the deities and stories in Homer were to be understood as allegorical modes of representing physical powers and phenomena. He died B. C. 464. (Plat. Ion, c. 2, p. 530, c; Diog. Laërt. ii. 11; Tatian. Assyr. in orat. Πρὸς Ἕλληνας, p. 160, b; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 517; Voss. de Hist. Graecia, p. 180, ed. West.)

3. Of CHIOS, a disciple of Democritus, or, according to other accounts, of Nessus of Chios. He flourished about B. C. 330. He was a philosopher of considerable reputation, and professed the doctrine of the sceptics in their fullest sense. Cicero (Acad. ii. 23, § 73) gives us a translation of the first sentence of his work Περὶ φύσεως: "Nescire nos sciamusne aliquid an nihil sciamus: ne id ipsum quidem nescire aut scire; nec omnino sitne aliquid, an nihil sit." The commencement of the same work is quoted in Eusebius (Præp. Evang. xiv. p. 765). Athenæus (iv. p. 184, a) quotes from a work by Metrodorus, entitled Τρωικά. A work, Περὶ ἱστορίας, is cited by the scholiast on Apollonius (iv. 834) as the production of a man named Metrodorus; but we have no means of determining which of the name is referred to. Metrodorus did not confine himself to philosophy, but studied, at least, if he did not practise, medicine, on which he wrote a good deal. It is probably he who is quoted more than once by Pliny. He was the instructor of Hippocrates and Anaxarchus. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 58; Suidas, s. re. Ἀναρχος; Πόρρω; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 660; Voss. de Hist. Graecia, pp. 54, 470, ed. West.)

4. A distinguished Greek philosopher, a native, according to some accounts (Strab. xiii. p. 589; Cic. Tusc. Disp. v. 37. § 109), of Lampacus; according to others (Diog. Laërt. x. 22, though the text in that passage seems to be corrupt), of Athens. This is to some extent confirmed by the fact that his brother, Timocrates, was an Athenian citizen of the deme Potamus, in the tribe Leontis [TIMOCRATES]; but the former account seems to be supported by the best authority. Metrodorus was the most distinguished of the disciples of Epicurus, with whom he lived on terms of the closest friendship, never having left him since he became acquainted with him, except for six months on one occasion, when he paid a visit to his home. He died in B. C. 277, in the 53d year of his age, seven years before Epicurus, who would have appointed him his successor had he survived him. He left behind him a son named Epicurus, and a daughter, whom Epicurus, in his will, entrusted to the guardianship of Amynomachus and Timocrates, to be brought up under the joint care of themselves and Hermachus, and provided for out of the property which he left behind him. In a letter also which he wrote upon his death-bed, Epicurus commended the children to the care of Idomeneus, who had married Batia, the sister of Metrodorus. The 20th of each month was kept by the disciples of Epicurus as a festive day in honour of their master and Metrodorus. Leontium is spoken of as the wife or mistress of Metrodorus.

The philosophy of Metrodorus appears to have been of a more grossly sensual kind than that of Epicurus. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 40, Tusc. Disp. v. 9, de Fin. ii. 28. § 92, 30. § 99, 31. § 101.) Perfect happiness, according to Cicero's account, he made to consist in having a well-constituted body, and knowing that it would always remain so. He found fault with his brother for not admitting that the belly was the test and measure of every thing that pertained to a happy life. Of the writings of Metrodorus Diogenes Laërtius mentions the following: 1. Πρὸς τοὺς λατρεῖς, in three books; 2. Περὶ αἰσθήσεων, addressed to Timocrates (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 40); 3. Περὶ μεγαλοψυχίας; 4. Περὶ τῆς Ἐπικούρου ἀφροσύνης; 5. Πρὸς τοὺς διαλεκτικούς; 6. Πρὸς τοὺς σοφιστάς, in nine books; 7. Περὶ τῆς ἐπὶ σοφίαν πορείας; 8. Περὶ τῆς μεταβολῆς; 9. Περὶ πλοῦτος; 10. Περὶ Δημοκρίτου; 11. Περὶ εὐγενείας. But besides these, Metrodorus wrote: 12. Περὶ Ποιητῶν, in which he attacked Homer. (Plut. Moral. p. 1687, a. 1094, d.) 13. Πρὸς Τίμαρχον (Plut. adv. Colot. p. 1117, b); and 14. Περὶ συνουσίας (Athen. ix. p. 391, d.) Athenæus (xii. p. 546, f.) also mentions his letters, and quotes a passage from one addressed to Timocrates. These letters may possibly consist of or include some of the treatises above enumerated. The passage which Athenæus quotes is similar in import to what Cicero refers to (de Nat. Deor. i. 40). The treatise Περὶ φιλοσοφίας, mentioned by Plutarch (adv. Colot. extz.), is perhaps the same as the seventh in the preceding list. (Diog. Laërt. x. 22, &c., with the notes of Menagius; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 606; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. i. p. 11.)

5. Surnamed  $\delta$  Σεισηματικός, a disciple first of Theophrastus, afterwards of Stilpo, is mentioned only by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 113).

6. Of Σεισπεία, a contemporary and friend of Demetrius of Scepsis, to whom he was indebted for his advancement, when he abandoned philosophy, and betook himself to politics. He was originally poor, but gained distinction by his writings, the style of which was peculiar and new, and married a wealthy Carthaginian lady. He attached himself to Mithridates Eupator, accompanied him into Pontus, and was raised to a position of great influence and trust, being appointed supreme judge, without appeal even to the king. Subsequently, however, he was led to desert his allegiance, when sent by Mithridates on an embassy to Tigranes, king of Armenia. Tigranes sent him back to Mithridates, but he died on the road. According to some accounts he was despatched by order of the king; according to others he died of disease (Strab. xiii. pp. 609, 610). Methodorus is frequently mentioned by Cicero; he seems to have been particularly celebrated for his powers of memory (Cic. de Orat. ii. 88. § 360). This is also mentioned by Pliny (H. N. vii. 24). In consequence of his hostility to the Romans he was surnamed the Roman-hater (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 7 or 16). He was a contemporary of L. Crassus, the orator, who heard him when in Asia (Cic. de Orat. iii. 20. § 75). Athenæus (xii. p. 552, c.) quotes a work by this Metrodorus, Περὶ ἀλεγειότητος. We also find mention of a Metrodorus as the author of a Περὶ ἡρώων (Placidus Lutatius on Statius, iii. 478). Notices which might very well have been derived from a work of that kind, are given by Pliny (H. N. v. 31. a. 38, viii. 14), on the authority of a Metrodorus; and as similar notices (H. N. iii. 16. a. 20, xviii. 7. a. 23, xxxvii. 4. a. 15) are taken by him from Metrodorus of Scepsis, the latter was very probably the author of the Περὶ ἡρώων in question. Strabo also (xi. p. 504) quotes from Metrodorus of Scepsis a geographical notice respecting the Amazons. (Voss. de Hist. Græciæ, p. 180, ed. West.)

7. Of STRATONICE in Caria. He was at first a disciple of the school of Epicurus, but afterwards attached himself to Carneades. Cicero speaks of him as an orator of great fire and volubility (de Orat. i. 11. § 45). He flourished about a. c. 110. (Diog. Laërt. x. 9; Cic. Acad. ii. 6. § 16, 24. § 78; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 607.)

8. A distinguished grammarian, the brother of Anthemus of Tralles [ANTHEMIUS], mentioned by Agathias, v. 6. (Voss. de Hist. Græciæ, p. 470.)

9. A native apparently of Alexandria or Egypt, mentioned by Photius (Cod. 115, 116) as the author of a cycle for the calculation of the time of Easter. He lived after the time of Diocletian, but nothing more exact is known respecting him. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 712; Noris. Dissert. de Cyclo Pasche. Ravenn. c. 3, p. 183.) [C. P. M.]

METRODORUS (Μητροδόρος), the author of two epigrams in the Greek Anthology. (Brunck, Anth. vol. ii. p. 476; Jacoba, Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 180.) His age is very uncertain, and it is even doubtful whether both the epigrams ought to be ascribed to the same poet. (Jacoba, Anth. Græc. vol. xiii. pp. 917, 918; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 482.) [P. S.]

METRODORUS, of Athens, a painter and philosopher, of such distinction, that when Aemilius Paullus, after his victory over Perseus (B. c. 168), requested the Athenians to send him their most approved philosopher, to educate his children, and their best painter, to represent his triumph, they selected Metrodorus as the most competent man for both offices; and Paullus concurred in their opinion. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. a. 40. § 30.) [P. S.]

METRODORUS (Μητροδόρος), the name of several physicians.

1. A pupil of Chrysippus of Cnidos, and tutor to Erasistratus, who lived in the fourth and third centuries B. C. He was the third husband of Pythias, the daughter of Aristotle, by whom he had a son named after her celebrated father. (Sext. Empir. Cont. Mathem. i. 12, p. 271. ed. Fabric.)

2. A pupil of Sabinus, in the first and second centuries after Christ, is mentioned by Galen as one of those who had commented on part of the Hippocratic Collection (Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. III." i. 4, "Epid. VI." i. 29, vol. xvii. pt. i. pp. 508, 877), and is probably the physician who was one of the followers of Asclepiades. (Galen, De Simplic. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. i. 29, 35, vol. xi. pp. 432, 442.)

3. The author of the work quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 81), and entitled Ἐντροπὴ τῶν Πίσιτο-μυμένων, appears to have been a different person (though sometimes reckoned as the same), and may be supposed to have been a contemporary of Cratevas in the first century B. C. (Plin. H. N. xxv. 4.)

4. The physician mentioned by Cicero (Ep. ad Famil. xvi. 20) as attending on his freedman Tiro, B. C. 46.

One of the above (perhaps the third) is quoted by Marbodius (De Gemmis), and called by him "maximus auctor." (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 337, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

METROPHANES (Μητροφάνης), a general of Mithridates the Great, who sent him with an army into Greece, to support Archelaus, B. C. 87. He reduced Euboea, as well as Demetrias and Magnesia in Thessaly, but was defeated by the Roman general Brutius Sura. (Appian, Mithr. 29.) He is again mentioned in B. C. 73, as commanding, together with the Roman exile L. Fannius, a detachment of the army of Mithridates, which was defeated by Mamercus during the siege of Cyzicus. (Oros. vi. 2; comp. Sall. Hist. lib. iii. p. 217, ed. Gerlach. min.) [E. H. B.]

METROPHANES (Μητροφάνης), the name of three later Greek writers, mentioned by Suidas (s. v.).

1. Of Eucarpia, in Phrygia (comp. Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἐυκαρπία), wrote a work on Phrygia, and also the following treatises on rhetoric:—Περὶ ὁρίων λόγου, Περὶ σπάρσεων, and commentaries on Hermodorus and Aristides, in consequence of which he is regarded by some as the author of the Scholia on Aristides. (Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 104, n. 15.)

2. Of Lebadeia, in Boeotia, the son of the rhetorician Cornelianus, was the author of the following works:—Περὶ τῶν χαρακτήρων of Plato, Xenophon, Nicostratus, and Philostratus, Μελέται, and Δόγαι παρηγορητικαί.

3. A descendant of the sophist Lachares, against whom the sophist Saperianus wrote a book. This Metrophanes is mentioned by Damascius in his life of Isidorus (ap. Phot. cod. p. 342 a. b. ed. Bekker).

METROPHANES (Μητροφάνης), bishop of Smyrna, is renowned in ecclesiastical history for his obstinate opposition to the famous patriarch Photius. He was the son of the woman who was inveigled to entice Methodius, patriarch of Constantinople, but he was not the son of Methodius. The patriarch Ignatius having been deposed by the emperor Michael III., in 858, and Photius chosen in his stead, Metrophanes, who was then bishop of Smyrna, recognised Photius, although he was a friend of Ignatius. But he soon altered his opinion, declared publicly for the deposed patriarch, and so violently attacked Photius, that he was deprived of his see and thrown into a prison. When Photius was deposed in his turn, and Ignatius re-established in the patriarchate by the emperor Basil I., Metrophanes recovered his see of Smyrna, and, in the council held in Constantinople in 869, showed himself one of the most zealous opponents of Photius. But in 879 Photius became once more patriarch on the death of Ignatius, and now Metrophanes was again deposed. He nevertheless continued to speak and to write against Photius, so that in 880 the patriarch and the emperor contrived his excommunication. Metrophanes died in an obscure retirement, but the year of his death is not known. He wrote besides other works:—1. Epistola ad Manuelem Patricium de Rebus in Causa Photii ab anno 858 ad 870 gestis, one of the most valuable documents bearing on the history of that turbulent patriarch. A Latin version by Melius, in Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 870, Greek and Latin, in the 8th vol. of Labbe, Concilia, and in Acta Concilii CP. quarti, by M. Raderus, Ingolstadt, 1604, 4to. 2. Ἐπιστολὴ Μητροφάνους Μητροπολίτου πρὸς Μανουὴλ Πατρίκιον καὶ Λογοθέτην τοῦ δρόμου, divided into four parts, a very remarkable and important document. The three first parts treat on Manichaeism, and the fourth on the Mystery of the Holy Ghost: it is very doubtful whether Metrophanes is the author of this work, which is now generally attributed to Photius. 3. De Spiritu Sancto, of which a fragment is extant in a Vienna codex. 4. Expositio Fidei, in a Paris codex. 5. Liber Canonum Triadicoorum, in a Venetian codex, according to Leo Allatius. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 700; Baronius, Annal. ad ann. 870, &c.; Hankius, Script. Byzant. xvii. 1, &c., xviii. 66.) [W. P.]

METTIUS or ME'TIUS, an old Italian name, in use both among the Sabines and Latins. It is doubtful whether Mettius or Metius is the better orthography, as we sometimes find one and sometimes the other in the best MSS. For the sake of uniformity, however, we have adopted the form Mettius in all the following names, though some of them occur with only one t.

METTIUS. 1. P. METTIUS, a partisan of Saturninus and Glaucia in a. c. 100, assassinated C. Memmius, one of the consular candidates in that year. (Oros. v. 17.)

2. M. METTIUS, was sent by Caesar at the opening of the Gallic war, in a. c. 58, as legatus to Ariovistus, king of the German league, and was detained prisoner by him, but subsequently rescued by Caesar. (Caes. B. G. i. 47, 53.) The annexed coin, which bears the legend M. Mettius, and has on the obverse the head of Caesar, probably refers to this Mettius. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF M. METTIUS.

METTIUS CURTIUS. [CURTIVS METTIUS, No. 1.]

METTIUS CARUS. [CARUS.]

METTIUS FUFFETIUS, was praetor or dictator of Alba in the reign of Tullus Hostilius, third king of Rome. After the combat between the Horatii and Curiatii had determined the supremacy of the Romans, Mettius was summoned to aid them in a war with Fidenae and the Veientes. On the field of battle, from cowardice or treachery, Mettius drew off his Albans to the hills, and awaited the issue of the battle. The Etruscans, mistaking his movement for a design upon their flank, took to flight, and Mettius fell upon them in their disorder, intending probably to regain the confidence of his Roman allies. But on the following day the Albans were all deprived of their arms, and Mettius himself, as the punishment of his treachery, was torn asunder by chariots driven in opposite directions. (Dionys. iii. 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30; Liv. i. 23, 26, 27, 28; Varr. Fr. p. 240, Bip. ed.; Flor. i. 3. § 8; Val. Max. vii. 4. § 1; Frontin. Strat. ii. 7. § 1; Polyaen. Strat. viii. 5.) [W. B. D.]

METTIUS GEMINIUS, or GEMINUS, was commander of the cavalry of Tusculum in the last war between Rome and the Latin league, b. c. 340. He challenged T. Manlius, son of the consul T. Manlius Torquatus, and was slain by him in the combat. (Liv. viii. 7; Val. Max. ii. 7. § 6.) [W. B. D.]

METTIUS POMPOSIA'NUS, a senator in Vespasian's reign, whom the emperor raised to the consulate, although Mettius was reported to have a royal nativity. Domitian afterwards banished and put him to death. (Suet. Vesp. 14, Dom. 10, 20; Dion Cass. lxxvii. 12; Victor, Ep. 9.) [W. B. D.]

MEZENTIUS (Μεζέντιος), a mythical king of the Tyrrhenians or Etruscans, at Caere or Argilla, and father of Lausus. When he was expelled by his subjects on account of his cruelty he took refuge with Turnus, king of the Rutulians, and assisted him in his war against Aeneas and the Trojans. Aeneas wounded him, but Mezentius escaped under the protection of his son. When, however, Lausus had fallen, Mezentius returned to the battle on horseback, and was slain by Aeneas (Virg. Aen. viii. 480, &c., x. 689, &c., 785, 606, &c.). The story about the alliance between Mezentius and the Rutulians is also mentioned by Livy and Dionysius, but they say nothing about his expulsion from Caere or Argilla. According to them Aeneas disappeared during the battle against the Rutulians and Etruscans at Lanuvium, and Ascanius was besieged by Messenius and Lausus. In a sally at night the besieged defeated the enemy, slew Lausus, and then concluded a peace with Mezentius, who henceforth remained their ally. (Liv. i. 2, 3; Dionys. i. 64, &c.) According to Servius (ad Aen. iv. 620, vi. 768, ix. 745) Mezentius was slain by Ascanius. Duces

the siege of Ascanius, Mesentius, when he was asked to conclude a peace, demanded among other things, that the Latins should give up to him every year the whole produce of their vintage; and in commemoration of this, it was said, the Romans in later times celebrated the festival of the Vinalia, on the twenty-third of April, when the new wine was tasted, and a libation made in front of the temple of Venus, and a sacrifice offered to Jupiter. (Plin. Quest. Rom. 45; Ov. Fast. iv. 881, &c.; Macrob. Sat. iii. 5; comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Vinalia.) [L. S.]

MEZETULUS, a Numidian, who, after the death of Oesalces, king of the Massylians, revolted against Capusa, the eldest son of the late king, who had succeeded him on the throne; and defeated him in a great battle, in which Capusa himself was killed. Mezetulus, however, did not assume the sovereignty himself, but placed on the throne Lacumaces, the youngest son of Oesalus, a mere child, in whose name he designed to govern the kingdom. But the return of Masinissa from Spain disconcerted his plans: he quickly raised a large army, with which he opposed this new adversary in the field, but was defeated, and compelled to seek refuge in the dominions of Syphax. From thence, however, he was induced to return, and take up his residence at the court of Masinissa, from whom he received a free pardon and the restitution of all his property. (Liv. xxix. 29, 30.) It is probably the same person who is called by Appian Mesotulus (Μεστούλος), and is mentioned as joining Hannibal with a force of 1000 horsemen shortly before the battle of Zama. (Appian, Pun. 33.) [E. H. B.]

MICCIADES, a sculptor of Chioa, was the son of Malas, the father of Anthernus (or Archennus), and the grandfather of Bupalus and Athenia. He must have flourished about Ol. 42 or 45. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4. § 2.) [P. S.]

MICCION (Μικκίων), a painter mentioned by Lucian as a disciple of Zeuxia. (Luc. Zeux. 7. vol. i. p. 845, Wetst.) [P. S.]

MICHAEL I. RHANGABE, or RHAGABE (Μιχαήλ ὁ Ῥαγδάβη, or Ῥαγαβή), emperor of Constantinople from A. D. 811 to 813, was the son of Theophylactus, one of the high functionaries who, together with Stauracius, conspired against the emperor Constantine VI., and the grandson of one Rhangabe, from whom he derived his surname. Michael was at once honest, handsome, and gifted with many talents, but he was of a weak character, and his amiability could not always efface the unfavourable impression which his want of energy made upon persons of stouter hearts than his. He stood in great favour with the emperor Nicephorus I. (802—811), who, by creating him master of the palace, raised him to the highest rank in the empire after the emperor and his family, and finally gave him his daughter Procopia in marriage. Stauracius, however, the son and successor of Nicephorus, was far from sharing the sentiments of his father towards the master of the palace, and feeling himself dying from the effects of a wound, received some months previously on the battle-field where his father was slain by the Bulgarians, he gave orders to blind Michael, in order that his wife Theophano, to whom he intended to bequeath the throne, might find no obstacles at her succession. One Stephanus was charged with executing the emperor's order. He wisely refrained from doing so, and informed Michael of it. They immediately assembled the chief officers of the state, and being all willing to support Michael, they proclaimed him emperor while Stauracius was still alive (2nd of October, 811). The dying emperor implored and obtained mercy from his brother-in-law, and went to expire in a convent. The accession of Michael caused great joy among the people, though little in the army: the soldiers, however, were soon satisfied by the liberal use which the new emperor made of the rich treasures hoarded up by the late Nicephorus. Michael, a peaceful man, began his reign by restoring peace to the disturbed church, and recalling from exile Leo Armenus, a celebrated general, who now enjoyed the emperor's full confidence, for which he afterwards rewarded him by hurling his benefactor from his throne. In the spring of 812, Crum, the king of the Bulgarians, again invaded the territories of the empire. Michael set out at the head of his army to meet him, but committed the imprudence of allowing the empress Procopia to accompany him. A general discontent and symptoms of sedition among the troops were the consequences of his thoughtlessness; a woman with more than seeming authority in the camp being then an unheard of thing. Distrusting the army, the emperor hastened back to the capital, followed by a host of reckless barbarians who laid the country waste with fire and sword. At their approach, multitudes of people, mostly iconoclasts, fled before them; and a sedition in consequence broke out among the numerous iconoclasts in Constantinople, which was quelled, not without difficulty, by Leo Armenus: their leader Nicolaus was confined in a convent; and they were finally all driven out of the city and dispersed in the provinces, by order of the emperor. About the same time great numbers of Christians of all sects took refuge within the empire, flying from the dominions of the khalifs, which were then filled with commotion and civil wars. Crum, meanwhile, pursued his victorious course, and laid siege to Mesembria, whereupon he made offers of peace, which, on account of their moderation, the emperor was inclined to accept, but his councillors were for further resistance. Mesembria was now taken by assault, and the danger from the Bulgarians grew daily more alarming. In February 813, Michael once more set out to meet them, again accompanied by his wife Procopia. Her presence in the camp had the same consequences as before. Leo Armenus secretly fomented the discontent of the troops, and carried on those intrigues which led to the loss of the battle of Adrianople (22d of June, 813), the flight of Michael to Constantinople, and his deposition by the successful rebel, as is related in the life of LEO V. The deposed Michael retired into a convent, where he led an obscure, but quiet and happy life, during more than thirty years. Leo succeeded him on the throne. (Cedren. p. 48, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 125, &c.; Const. Manass. p. 94; Theoph. Contin. p. 8; Author. incert. post Theoph. p. 428, &c.; Glycas, p. 286; Joel, p. 178; Genesius, p. 2, &c.; Leo Gram. p. 445, &c.; Symeon Metaphrastes, p. 402.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL II. BALBUS (Μιχαήλ ὁ Βαλβός), or the "STAMMERER," emperor of Constantinople, A. D. 820—829. This prince was of low origin; he was born at Amorium, and spent his earlier youth as a groom, in different stables of his native town. He afterwards entered the army, and although he was ignorant and illiterate, he met with success in his new profession, owing to his bold character and uncommon impudence. One of his superior officers esteemed him so much that he gave him his daughter Thecla in marriage. Having made the acquaintance of the celebrated Bardanes, he found numerous opportunities of distinguishing himself under the eyes of that eminent general, who accordingly promoted him, and in spite of a defect of his speech, whence his surname of Ῥαυλός, he became conspicuous as one of the best Greek generals. The emperor Leo V. owed the fortunate issue of his conspiracy against Michael I. in a great measure to the assistance of Michael the Stammerer, and accordingly raised the latter to the highest dignities in the empire. But Michael wanted prudence, and having often severely censured the conduct of Leo, incurred the displeasure of his master. In order to get rid of him, Leo sent him into Asia as dux Orientis, but soon recalled him for fear he should kindle a rebellion. Nothing the wiser for so many apparent proofs of Leo's displeasure, Michael continued to abuse both the emperor and the empress. Vexed at being perpetually thwarted, censured, and libelled by this troublesome officer, Leo once more ordered him to proceed to Asia and inspect the troops. This time Michael refused to comply with the order, and openly joined a number of disaffected persons, who made secret preparations for depriving Leo of his crown. The plot was discovered through the zealous honesty of Hexabulus, and Michael was arraigned of high treason. Sentenced to be burnt alive in a furnace, Michael escaped death, and was raised to the throne in an almost miraculous way, as is related in the life of Leo V. (Christmas, 820). Immediately after the assassination of Leo, Michael was released from his prison, and such was the haste of his friends to proclaim him emperor and show him to the public, that they did not even wait until his fetters were taken off, but hurried him, loaded with iron, to the hippodrome, where a trembling crowd saluted him with shouts of satisfaction.

The first act of the new emperor was to castrate the four sons of Leo, but no sooner was this infamous crime committed, than the perpetrator had to defend himself against a formidable avenger of the death of Leo and the disgrace of his sons. This was Thomas, commander-in-chief of the troops in Asia, whose revolt was one of the most dangerous that ever threatened the rulers of Constantinople. A few months after raising the standard of rebellion, Thomas was master of the whole of the Byzantine possessions in Asia. He concluded an alliance with the Arabs, and was then proclaimed emperor at Antioch (821). He pretended to be the emperor Constantine VI., who was said to have survived his excruciation, and he styled himself so, though he was not blind; but he was originally a run-away slave who had risen to eminence in the army. Having no children, he adopted an unknown youth, who was created Augustus, and then marched at the head of an army of 80,000 men, against Constantinople. His adopted son was slain in the neighbourhood of the Hellespont, and Thomas adopted another, a former monk, to whom he gave the name of Anastasius. Upon this Thomas crossed the Hellespont, and laid siege to Constantinople. Michael awaited the danger with undaunted courage. Unable to take the field against superior forces, he adopted measures to render the capital impregnable, and a bloody defeat, which Thomas suffered in 822 while leading his men to a general assault, proved that Michael had not lost all chances of success. Thomas retired into Thrace, but renewed the siege in 823, by sea and land. His fleet obtained a victory over the imperial navy. Gregorius Pterotes, an old friend of Leo V., and a general of great experience and influence, whom Michael had banished to Samos, now left his exile, and joined the rebel; but the emperor having meanwhile obtained several advantages, and the motley army of Thomas, which was composed of specimens of all the different nations of Hither Asia, betraying symptoms of disaffection Pterotes resolved to desert to the emperor. Afraid to appear there alone, he seduced many of the rebels to join him, and with them secretly left the camp of Thomas. But Thomas had watched him, and the two-fold traitor was stopped on his flight, defeated, and put to death. Proud of his success, Thomas endeavoured to force the Golden Horn with a fleet of 350 vessels, but Michael fell upon him with such vigour as not only to repel him, but to destroy the greater portion of his fleet. Thomas was no more successful in his assaults by land, the capital being gallantly defended by Michael, his son Theophilus, Olbionus, Catagylus, and other generals of renown; yet in spite of their valour, they could not dislodge Thomas from his lines around Constantinople, and there was just fear lest hunger should achieve what the sword was unable to accomplish. In this extremity Michael received an offer from Mortagon, king of the Bulgarians, to join him against the rebel. Michael declined the proposition, and this act shows that he was no ordinary man: he would rather stand his own chance than make common cause with an ally who would have turned against him in case of defeat, and asked for an exorbitant reward in case of success. Mortagon, however, came on his own account, and fell upon the besieging army, not so much because he wanted to help Michael as because he was desirous of plundering some one. Being defeated by the Bulgarians, Thomas raised the siege and retreated into Thrace. Michael now sallied forth, followed his enemy closely, and at last brought him to a stand. Thomas was entirely defeated; one-half of the army went over to the victor's side; and he shut himself up in Adrianople. Michael soon followed him thither, and made preparations for forcing the city to surrender through famine, which so frightened the inhabitants that they seized the rebel and dragged him to the emperor. Thomas had his hands and feet cut off, and in this state was put on an ass and paraded through the streets. Michael joined the procession, according to the barbarous custom of the time. "If you are really emperor," cried the fainting man, "have mercy on a wretch, and take my life at once!" Michael urged him to confess whether he had any accomplices at the court, and to name them. Had Thomas done so, many as innocent man might have suffered death together with as many guilty, but John Hexabulus, whose name was always prominent among the straightforward and the honest, stopped the emperor, crying out, "Will you give credit to an enemy against your own friends?" Michael felt the reproach, and desisted from further inquiries of Thomas, who was subsequently thrown on a dunghill, where he expired several days after (October, 823). The chief partisans of Thomas met with severe punishment. Thus ended a revolt, during which Michael proved he was worthy of his throne.

In 824 Michael renewed the friendly intercourse which had subsisted between his predecessors and the Western or Frankish emperors: he sent an embassy to Louis the Pious, and also wrote a letter to him, which his ambassadors presented to Louis at Roen. It is known that the Byzantine emperors would never recognise the imperial title of the Frankish kings, and afterwards those of Germany. In the above-mentioned letter Michael consequently called Louis only "Ludovicus qui vocatus est Francorum et Longobardorum Imperator," and this the Byzantine historians consider as a great condescension. The letter is contained in Thegan's Vie de Louis le Débonnaire, and in the works of other historians. In the same year, 824, a band of Spanish Arabs, commanded by one Abuhafis, made a descent upon Crete and conquered the island, which was henceforth called Candia, from Candax, its new capital, which was founded by the Arabs: Michael was unable to dislodge them, and the island was lost for ever. A colony of Arabs, the descendants of the followers of Abuhafis, still inhabit a portion of Candia. Michael lost likewise the province of Dalmatia, which was taken from him by the Servians, but the greatest loss he had to suffer was that of Sicily. Euphemius governed the island for the emperor, and having met with some disappointment at the court, invited Ziadet-Allah, the third khalif of the Aglabites in Africa, to take possession of the country. Ziadet-Allah accordingly went to Sicily in 827, with a powerful fleet, and the island soon became a prey to the Arabs, and remained in their possession for upwards of two hundred years. Michael died a natural death on the first of October, 829, and was succeeded by his son Theophilus. MICHAEL III. (Μιχαήλ), emperor of Constantinople from A. D. 842 to 867, was the son and successor of the emperor Theophilus, and the grandson of Michael II. the Stammerer. He ascended the throne at the age of three, and reigned under the guardianship of his talented mother Theodora. This active princess began by re-establishing the worship of images, an undertaking in which she had to encounter intrigues of a most dangerous nature [PHOTIUS]. Her armies were less successful; they were beaten in the Caucasus and in Asia Minor, and an expedition fitted out for the recovery of Crete from the Arabs was totally discomfited. She despatched a fleet of 300 ships with a view of conquering Egypt, but the capture and temporary possession of Damietta was the only result of it. On the other hand, she continued to be fortunate in her exertions for the orthodox church and the Christian religion in general: the Khazars were converted in 847, and a few years afterwards the Bulgarians, those hereditary enemies of Byzantium, adopted likewise the religion of Christ [METROPHANES]. But her zeal for images caused a most dangerous revolt of the Paulicians (848), who entered into an alliance with the Arabs, and baffled the efforts of the imperial armies to reduce them to obedience. Meanwhile, Michael grew up and gave proof of his wicked propensities.

At the boyish age of fifteen he already led an immoral life with Eudoxia, a noble young lady, the daughter of one Ingerius, who belonged to the great family of the Martinacii; and his mother preferring under these circumstances to give him a lawful wife, he accepted with the greatest indifference Eudoxia, the daughter of Decapolia, continuing all the while his licentious intercourse with the other Eudoxia, his mistress. The principal person at the court was Theoctistus, a celebrated, though not always successful general, who incurred the jealousy of Bardas, the brother of the empress, and the displeasure of the young emperor. Michael and Bardas consequently formed a plot to make away with Theoctistus, and carried their design into effect, Michael being the first to raise his hand against his unfortunate minister. Bardas was appointed Magnus Logotheta in his stead, and he soon seized the uncontrolled direction of public affairs. The murder of Theoctistus so afflicted Theodora that she laid down her functions as regent and retired into private life (854). Michael now abandoned himself to a life of almost unparalleled profligacy, for a description of which we must refer to the graphic pen of Gibbon (vol. ix. p. 45, &c. ed. 1815).

In 856 Bardas was made Caesar; and his power being now unlimited, he caused the empress Theodora, with her daughter, to be confined in a convent. On the whole, however, Bardas was no despicable man, though his ambition was boundless. Full of talents, learning, and an enthusiastic love of the fine arts, he was zealous in promoting the arts, science and literature, which had been greatly neglected during the reign of the father and grandfather of Michael. The philosopher Leo was his principal assistant in attaining these laudable objects. Owing to the irresistible influence of Bardas, the patriarch Ignatius was deposed in 857, and the famous Photius succeeded him. In 858 the empire was involved in a great war with the Arabs. Leo commanded against them, and obtained more glory than the unworthy emperor deserved. He defeated the Arabs in several pitched battles, drove them beyond the Euphrates, crossed that river, and made several successful incursions on the eastern side of the Tigris, penetrating to the neighbourhood of Baghdad. During this time, however, the Arab general, 'Omar, laid Pontus waste. Thinking success on the battle-field an easy thing, Michael resolved to put himself at the head of his army, and marched against 'Omar; but the Arabs had been reinforced by a strong body of incensed Paulicians, and under the walls of Samosata the emperor received a severe lesson for his folly. Upwards of 6000 Greeks were taken prisoners, and among them the gallant Leo, whom the Arabs would never restore to liberty in spite of the brilliant ransom offered them. In 860 Michael paid as dearly for a second lesson in Cappadocia; and 'Omar now carried destruction over Cappadocia, Pontus, and Cilicia, whence he carried 70,000 prisoners into perpetual captivity. (862.) Either good sense or the want of his accustomed revels in the capital, or the advice of Bardas, induced Michael to put his younger brother, Petronas, then governor of Lydia and Ionia, at the head of the army; and Petronas chose for his lieutenant Nazar, governor of Galatia, whose maxim was, that a small, but good army, was better than a large, but bad one. Near Anasias they fell in with the main army of the Arabs, commanded by 'Omar. The Greeks obtained a splendid victory; 'Omar was slain; and his head was carried to Constantinople by Petronas, to whom his brother allowed the honour of a triumphal entrance. In order to commemorate the glory of his armies, and with a view of handing his name down to posterity, Michael ordered a hippodrome to be built, which surpassed everything of the kind in magnificence. Jealous of Petronas, the emperor set out in 864 for the purpose of taking the command. He had scarcely arrived in Asia when he was recalled, because a Russian fleet of 200 large barges had suddenly made its appearance in the Bosphorus, and was attacking the Golden Horn. Michael hardly escaped being taken prisoner whilst crossing the Hellespont, but he was soon released from his fear, in consequence of the Russian fleet being destroyed by storm. This was the first blockade of Constantinople by the Russians, or, more correctly speaking, by the Norman nobles, who had just made themselves masters of Western Russia. By this time Michael had grown tired of the ascendancy of Bardas, and felt deeply offended at being exhorted by him to lead a better life. Whether Bardas meant this in reality or not is a matter of doubt, for he certainly wished to establish his own elevation on the ruin of Michael. Bardas was thus gradually superseded in the favour of his master by Basil the Macedonian, afterwards emperor, who married Michael's mistress, Eudoxia, in exchange for whom he surrendered his sister, Thekla, who became the emperor's mistress. Michael formed a plot with Basil to assassinate Bardas; and soon afterwards the Caesar was treacherously killed by Michael, Basil, and a band of assassins hired for the purpose (866). Thereupon Basil rose to eminence, and was proclaimed Caesar. In the same year (866) the patriarch Photius proclaimed the deposition of pope Nicholas I. The conduct of Michael continued to be so disgusting, that Basil, in his turn, remonstrated with him, and soon incurred the hatred of his master, who began to look out for some daring men who would help him in despatching the Macedonian. Of this Basil became informed, and very naturally resolved to anticipate the emperor's designs. He persuaded him to accept a supper in the house of his mother, Theodora, who, utterly unacquainted with the intention of Basil, had consented to invite her son, as a means of restoring a good understanding between the rulers. As the supper degenerated into an orgy, Theodora and her daughter retired, leaving her son alone with Basil and a few more guests, who soon made the emperor so drunk, that he was obliged to lie down on a bed. In this helpless state he was murdered by a band of assassins who had been secretly introduced into Theodora's dwelling. (24th of September, 867.) Basil followed him on the throne. The reign of Michael III., however disgusting the part which he played, is one of the most interesting in Byzantine history: it is rich in events worthy of the attention of the scholar, the philosopher, the historian, the soldier, and the divine; and whoever feels more than superficial sympathy for the fate of the later Greeks will be amply rewarded by turning from this imperfect sketch to the sources from which it is taken. MICHAEL IV. PA'PHLAGO (Μιχαὴλ ὁ Παφλαγῶν), emperor of Constantinople from A.D. 1034 to 1041, was one of the younger brothers of John the Eunuch, first minister under Romanus III. and his predecessor, Constantine IX. Among the four brothers of John, who had once been a monk, Michael and Nicetas were originally money-changers, Constantine and George eunuchs and mountebanks by profession; Stephanus, their brother-in-law, whose name will appear hereafter, was a ship's calker. When John rose to eminence he promoted Michael to the office of chamberlain to Romanus III., a post for which he was well fit, for he was stupid and handsome. Having further the advantage of being young, he pleased the empress Zoe so much, that she admitted him to her bed. The fact was reported to Romanus, who would not believe it, because he knew that Michael was subject to epileptic fits; but Zoe and her lover were afraid that he would believe it one day or other, and consequently contrived the assassination of Romanus. The day after his murder Zoe announced to the senate that she had chosen Michael for her husband, and wished him to be acknowledged as emperor. John the Eunuch being the secret promoter of these transactions, the wishes of the empress were complied with, and Michael and Zoe were proclaimed on the 11th of April, 1034. No sooner was this done than John removed Zoe from the administration of the state, by keeping her a prisoner in her palace; and as Michael was unfit to reign, he seized the supreme power without aspiring to the name. The beginning of Michael's reign was signalled by a general famine and a terrible earthquake at Jerusalem, which lasted forty days with scarcely any interruption. Upon this the barbarians invaded the territory of the empire on all sides, while the fleets of the Arabs in Sicily and Africa covered the Archipelago, and plundered the islands. John, however, succeeded in making peace with them on tolerable conditions. He also brought the Serbians to submission, made peace with the Arabs in Egypt, and had the satisfaction of seeing the Arabs of Baghdad defeated under the walls of Edessa, which they had invaded in 1037. About this time a civil war among the Arabs in Sicily afforded a good opportunity of bringing back that island to the imperial sway; and Leon Opus, the governor of the Greek dominions in Southern Italy, was consequently sent over into Sicily. He defeated the Arabs several times, and returned with many captives, besides 15,000 Christian prisoners of war, which he had taken from the Mohammedans. In 1039 John equipped a powerful fleet and an appropriate army, the fleet being commanded by Stephanus, the brother-in-law of John and the emperor; and the whole expedition by Maniakes, who was the best general in the Greek army. The Greeks were joined by a small, but gallant body of Norman auxiliaries, commanded by three sons of the chivalrous Tancred. Messina and Syracuse were taken by the Greeks, and the Arabs sustained such losses that their brethren in Africa were in great alarm. They consequently came to their relief with 50,000 men; but few of these ever returned to their native country, and thirteen towns and cities surrendered to the victorious Greeks. In 1040 a fresh army arrived from Africa, which was still more numerous than the preceding ; but in a pitched battle with the Greeks and Normans, they were utterly defeated, leaving 50,000 either dead on the field, or prisoners in the hands of the victor. Sicily once more obeyed the Greek sceptre, when a base intrigue caused the loss of what had been so fairly won. Owing to the negligence of Stephanus, the Arab commander-in-chief found means to escape, with a few followers, to Africa ; and Maniaces was so vexed at his flight, that in reproaching Stephanus for it, he probably forgot the degree of deference which he owed to the brother-in-law of the powerful eunuch. In order to avenge himself for the insult, Stephanus calumniated his chief at the court, and caused a warrant to be sent to Sicily for his arrest. After Maniaces had left the island, the negligence of his successors in the command, Stephanus, Docenanus, and Basilus Peditas, caused one loss after another ; and in dividing the booty of their former victories with the Normans, they behaved so unfairly, that their gallant allies not only withdrew, but attacked the Greek dominions on the continent of Italy. The Arabs suffered one more defeat at Messina ; but after that met with continual success, and before the end of 1040 Sicily had again ceased to be a Byzantine province, and in Italy the Greek power was expiring under the sword of the Normans. About the same time the Bulgarians endeavoured to throw off the Greek yoke, and overran Thrace and Macedonia. Michael, forced to fly suddenly from Thessalonica, where he then held his court, left his treasury under the care of one Ibazas, a Bulgarian in the Greek service, who availed himself of the opportunity, and with his trust joined his countrymen.

Constantinople was in the greatest danger of falling into the hands of the barbarians, when, to the surprise and wonder of the whole empire, the apathetic emperor, who was besides suffering from an incurable dropsy, declared his intention of putting himself at the head of his army. In vain his friends and the empress endeavoured to persuade him to abandon his purpose : " If I have made no conquests," said he, " I will at least do my utmost to prevent losses." He was so weak that he was obliged to be raised on his horse, and every morning the troops expected that he would not see the evening ; but he held bravely out, and the moral effect of his appearance upon his soldiers as well as his enemies was so great, that the former fought with the utmost bravery, while the Bulgarians were confounded before they had been defeated. After driving out the barbarians from Thrace and Macedonia, Michael penetrated into Bulgaria ; and in the course of one campaign brought back that extensive country to its allegiance to the Greek emperors. The war being thus finished with glory, Michael celebrated a triumphal entry into Constantinople, and soon afterwards died, on the 10th of December, 1011. This enterprise does great credit to Michael, whose conduct gives proof of a great moral truth, that there is no man so bad but there is still something good left in him, which, under proper circumstances, will shine forth, and cause the man to do actions which, though they cannot obliterate his former conduct, will yet entitle him to our forbearance and compassion. Shortly before his end Michael chose his nephew, Michael, his future successor, who consequently succeeded him on the throne. (Cedren.

p. 734, &c. ; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 235, &c. ; Manass. p. 124 ; Joel. p. 183 ; Glyc. p. 314, &c.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL V. CALAPHATES (Μιχαήλ ὁ Καλαφάτης), or the "CALKER," emperor of Constantinople from December, A. D. 1041, to April, 1042, was the son of Stephanus, the brother-in-law of Michael IV., who had once followed the trade of a ship's calker, whence the surname of his son. He was adopted by Michael IV. and the empress Zoe ; but as he was a profligate fellow, the emperor would soon have excluded him from the throne had death left him time. The people detested Michael V., and persuaded Zoe to reign in his stead ; but a few days were sufficient to make Zoe repent her ambition, and she quietly resigned in favour of her adopted son. Michael began by banishing Zoe and the eunuch John, his uncle, and committed several other imprudent acts, the consequence of which was, that the people of Constantinople rose in rebellion. A fierce battle was fought between them and the adherents of Michael, which ended in the storm of the imperial palace, and in the flight of the young emperor and his brother Constantine to the convent of Studa, where they both took the monastic habit, and continued to live many years in a quiet obscurity. Zoe and her sister Theodora were proclaimed co-empresses by the people, 21st of April, 1042. (Cedren. p. 749 ; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 242 ; Manass. p. 125 ; Glyc. p. 316 ; Joel. p. 183.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL VI. STRATIOTICUS (Μιχαήλ ὁ Στρατιωτικός), emperor of Constantinople from A. D. 1056 to 1057, was chosen by the empress Theodora for her successor shortly before she died ; and he succeeded accordingly on the 22d of August, 1056. His surname, "the warrior," indicates his military merits ; but at the time of his elevation he was broken down by age, and his character had lost all its former energy. Theodora, a woman, had a manly spirit, but Michael the warlike had the spirit of a woman. Michael was scarcely seated on the throne when Theodosius, a cousin of the late emperor Constantine X. Monomachus, rose in revolt ; but after a fierce struggle, which filled the streets of Constantinople with blood, the rebel was compelled to lay down his arms, and was fortunate to escape with mere banishment. The famous general, Catacalon, was recalled from his post as governor of Antioch, and Michael, a cousin of the emperor, was placed in his stead. Catacalon returned to the capital with disaffection in his heart, and there met a great number of his colleagues, whom the emperor had rewarded with fine speeches instead of giving more solid proofs of his gratitude for their former achievements, and all of whom shared the disaffection of Catacalon. A military conspiracy was the consequence, and a deputation was sent by the malcontents to Isaac Comnenus, who resided at Castamone, in Asia Minor, requesting him to accept the crown, which he did, after some hesitation. Michael tried to check the progress of his rival at once by intrigues and weapons, but his duplicity availed him nothing, and his arms were defeated in the battle of Hades by Isaac and Catacalon, whereupon he resigned (31st of August), and retired into a convent. (Cedren. p. 792, &c. ; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 262, &c. ; Manass. p. 128, 129 ; Glyc. p. 132.) [W. P.]

son of the emperor Constantine XI., Duca, who died in 1059, shortly after appointing his three sons, Michael, Andronica, and Constantine, to succeed him in joint possession of the crown. On account of their tender age, their mother, Eudoxia, reigned for them; and having married Romanus Diogenes, this distinguished general enjoyed the imperial title and power till he was made a prisoner by Alp Arslan, the sultan of the Seljuks, in August, 1071. When his captivity became known at Constantinople, Joannes Caesar caused his nephew, Michael, to be proclaimed emperor, with a view of reigning under his name. Soon afterwards Romanus returned from his captivity, but he came too late to retrieve his fate: he was seized and blinded, and died from the operation in October, 1071. Eudoxia was confined in a prison; and these atrocities were committed without Michael taking the least step to prevent them.

John, archbishop of Sida, in Pamphylia, John the Caesar, Nicephorus, and other ministers, now governed the empire for Michael. Enraged that the ransom for which he had restored the late Romanus to liberty was not paid by Michael, sultan Alp Arslan invaded the empire in 1072. Isaac and Alexis Comnenus commanded the Greek army against him. Owing to the want of discipline of his troops, Isaac lost a battle and his liberty, but was soon ransomed by Alexis. The two brothers prepared for taking revenge, when affairs received a different turn, through the daring ambition of one Ursel, a kinsman of the kings of Scotland, and the commander of a body of European auxiliaries in the Greek service. Having made himself master of most of the strongholds and mountain passes in the anti-Taurus and portions of Armenia and Lazica, he ceased at once to fight against the Turks and to help the Greeks, intending to make himself independent in those parts. For this purpose he intrigued with John the Caesar, who joined him, and was proclaimed emperor of the Greeks by the Frankish auxiliaries. Both the Greeks and Turks looked at these proceedings with wonder, when the latter, impatient to come to blows, fell upon John and Ursel, defeated them, and made them both prisoners. Ursel soon redeemed himself, and retired into Pontus, whither he was followed by Nicephorus Palaeologus, who gained a decisive battle over him. On his flight, Ursel was again taken by the Turks. Alexis Comnenus, wishing to obtain possession of this dangerous adventurer, offered a large bribe to the Turks for his person; and having attained his ends, sent him to Constantinople (1073), where he was kept in prison.

In 1074 the Bulgarians, exasperated by the insatiable avarice of the minister Nicephorus, attempted to throw off the Greek yoke, and offered the crown to Bodinus, the grandson of Michael, king of Servia, who accepted it, and came to their assistance with a body of his countrymen. Bulgaria was then governed by Nicephorus Carentenus, a very competent man, who had taken proper measures for quelling the revolt, when he was prevented from carrying them out by the arrival of Damianus Dalassenus, who was sent to supersede him as governor. Dalassenus owed his promotion to some court intrigue, and six weeks after his appointment had the satisfaction of seeing himself a prisoner of the Bulgarians, and his army flying through the country. Bryennius, who had been created Caesar after the captivity of John, retrieved the fortune of the Greeks. Bodinus lost several battles, and fell into the hands of Bryennius, who, on the order of Michael, sent him as a state prisoner to some fortress in Syria, whence, however, the young prince escaped and returned to Servia, over which he became king after the death of his father. Bryennius likewise compelled the Servians to sue for peace; purged the Adriatic and the Ionian sea of the Norman pirates; and quelled a dangerous mutiny of some of his barbarian auxiliaries, who were headed by Nestor, the commander-in-chief of the army of observation on the Danube. His success deserved reward, but earning disgrace instead, he listened to the persuasive wishes of his numerous friends, raised the standard of rebellion, and was proclaimed emperor under the walls of Adrianople. He despatched his brother John to lay siege to Constantinople, while he continued to consolidate his authority in Thrace and Macedonia. The capital was gallantly defended by Constantine Duca, Alexis Comnenus, and Ursel, who was restored to liberty on condition of employing his great military talents for the defence of the emperor. Meanwhile, another rebellion broke out in the East. Only ten days after Bryennius had assumed the imperial title his example was followed by Nicephorus Botaniates in Asia Minor, who advanced with an army mostly composed of Turks, and soon penetrated as far as Nicaea. At that time Constantinople had ceased to be besieged by John Bryennius, whose men were too licentious to hold out long against well-disciplined troops, commanded by the best generals of Greece, and he consequently withdrew to the head-quarters of his brother. The conduct of the emperor during this crisis was so contemptible that the approach of Botaniates created joy among the people, and caused great satisfaction to a crowd of disaffected generals and ambitious priests: they sent a deputation to him, inviting him formally to occupy the imperial throne; and he of course complied with their wishes. Michael, forsaken by all his adherents except Alexis and Isaac Comnenus, who stood with him to the last moment, abandoned all hopes of resisting so formidable an enemy, and without regret resigned the crown to Botaniates, on the 25th of March, 1078. The ensuing struggle between Botaniates and Bryennius belongs to the history of the former. Michael was allowed to retire into a convent, and Botaniates had so little fear of his harmless character that he made him Archbishop of Ephesus, a post for which the ex-emperor was decidedly more fit than for the throne of Constantinople. As weak-minded as his father, Michael had the misfortune to be put under the tutelage of the well-known Michael Psellus, a learned pedant, who, instead of making the young prince fit to rule over men, by teaching him law and history, and enlarging his mind, which was already narrow enough, instructed him chiefly in grammar and rhetoric, thus creating in the young man an artificial taste for such studies, which never left him in after life, and made his mind quite unfit for the severe business of government and legislation. While Michael was a boy Psellus was proud of him, because his pupil was more learned than other boys of his age, but when he became a man and a king, Psellus felt ashamed of him and himself, and to this feeling we must needs ascribe the circumstance that he did not extend his "history" to the reign

MICHAEL VIII. PALAEOLOGUS (Μιχαὴλ δὲ Παλαιολόγος), emperor of Nicea, and afterwards of Constantinople, from A. D. 1260 to 1282, the restorer of the Greek empire, was the son of Andronicus Palaeologus and Irene Angela, the granddaughter of the emperor Alexis Angelus. He was born in 1234. At an early age he rose to eminence, which he owed to his uncommon talents as much as to his illustrious birth, and to the same causes he was indebted for many a dangerous persecution. Without dwelling upon his earlier life, we need only mention that he was once obliged to take refuge at the court of the sultan of Iconium, and having subsequently been appointed governor of the distant town of Durazzo, the slander of his secret enemy followed him thither, and he was carried in chains to Nicea. He justified himself, however, and the emperor Theodore II. Lascaris held him in higher esteem than he had ever done before. This emperor died in August 1259, leaving a son, John III., who was only nine years old, and over whom he had placed the patriarch Arsenius and the magnus domesticus Muzalon, as guardians. Neither of them enjoyed popularity, being both known for their friendship for the Latins. Nine days after the death of Theodore, while his obsequies were solemnising in the cathedral of Magnesia, the imperial guard suddenly broke into the church, and Muzalon, his brothers, and many of his principal adherents fell victims to the military wrath. Michael Palaeologus, whom Theodore had lately appointed magnus dux, was chosen as guardian instead of Muzalon, and soon afterwards he received or gave himself the title and power of despot. Thence there was only a step to the throne, which Michael also took. He made himself master of the imperial treasury, bribed or gained the Varangian guard and the clergy, and was proclaimed emperor at Magnesia. Michael and the boy John were crowned together at Nicea, on the 1st of January, 1260. His succession filled the Nicean empire with joy and satisfaction. It was not so in Constantinople. Although Baldwin II. enjoyed little more than the name of an emperor and the shadow of an empire, the substance whereof was in the hands of the princes of Nicea, Epeirus, and Achaia, he assumed a haughty tone towards Michael, and demanded the cession of those parts of Thrace and Macedonia which belonged to Nicea, as a condition of acknowledging him as emperor. At first Michael treated the Latin ambassadors with ridicule, till they declared they would be satisfied with Thessalonica or even Seres. "Not a village!" replied Michael sternly, dismissing them with contempt; and he was right in doing so, for he had already taken proper measures for driving the Latins out of Constantinople. The ambition of Michael, the despot of Epeirus, checked him for a while in his lofty career. Seeing a child on the throne of Nicea, and a lofty but forsaken foreigner, destitute of power, on that of Constantinople, Michael of Epeirus conceived the same plan as Michael Palaeologus, and the success of the latter at first did not at all discourage him. Things growing serious, the new emperor of Nicea made him honourable offers in order to maintain peace between them. But the despot of Epeirus reckoned upon his alliance with Manfred, the Norman king of Sicily, and William de Villehardouin, the French prince of Achaia and the Morea, and rushed boldly into the field. At Achrida he suffered a severe defeat; Villehardouin was taken prisoner and brought to Constantinople. The Greeks in their turn were totally beaten at Tricorypha. Little moved by the disadvantageous turn of his affairs in the West, Michael Palaeologus hastened his expedition against Constantinople, and before the end of the year 1260 Baldwin II. was shut up within his capital. Michael, however, was not strong enough to reduce the city, and returned to Nicea. Upon this he made an alliance with the Genoese, and in 1261 sent a new army beyond the Bosphorus, the progress of which he watched from his favourite residence of Nymphaeum near Smyrna. Strategopulus Caesar commanded the Greek army round Constantinople, the natural strength of which offered again such obstacles to the besiegers, that the Caesar converted the siege into a blockade, informing the emperor of the bad chances he had of speedy success. While matters stood thus, one Cutrizacus, the commander of a body of voluntary auxiliaries, was informed of the existence of a subterranean passage leading from a place outside the walls into the cellar of a house within them, and which seemed to be known only to the owner of the house. Cutrizacus immediately formed a plan for surprising the garrison by means of the passage, and after concerting measures with the commander-in-chief, ventured with 50 men through the passage into the city. His plan succeeded completely. No sooner was he within than he took possession of the nearest gate, disarmed the post, opened it, and the main body of the Greeks rushed in. The stratagem was executed in the dead of night. The inhabitants, roused from their slumber, soon learned the cause of the noise, and kept quiet within their houses, or joined their daring countrymen. The Latins dispersed in various quarters were seized with a panic, and fled in all directions, while the emperor Baldwin had scarcely time to leave his palace and escape on board of a Venetian galley, which carried him immediately to Italy. On the morning of the 25th of July, 1261, Constantinople was in the undisputed possession of the Greeks, after it had borne the yoke of the Latins during 57 years 3 months and 13 days.

A private messenger brought the news of this strange revolution to Nymphaeum, and Michael at first refused to believe it till the arrival of some officers of the Caesar dispersed all doubt: as a further token of the veracity of their account, they produced the sword, the sceptre, the red bonnet, and other articles belonging to Baldwin, who had not found time to carry them with him. Michael lost no time in repairing to Constantinople, and on the 14th of August held his triumphal entrance, saluted by the people with demonstrations of the sincerest joy. Constantinople, however, was no more what it had been. During the reign of the Latins plunder, rapine, and devastation had spoiled it of its former splendour; trade had deserted its harbour; and thousands of opulent families had abandoned the palaces or mansions of their forefathers, in order to avoid contact with the hated foreigners. To restore, re-people, and re-adorn Constantinople was now the principal task of Michael; and, in order to accomplish his purpose the better, he confirmed the extensive privileges which the Venetian, the Genoese, and the Pisan merchants had received from the Latin emperor. Although the Nicæan emperors considered themselves the legitimate successors of Constantine the Great, the possession of Constantinople was an event of such magnitude as to suggest to Michael the idea of a new coronation, which was accordingly solemnized in the cathedral of St. Sophia. But Michael was crowned alone, without John, an evil omen for the friends of the young emperor, whose fears were but too soon realised, for on Christmas day of the same year 1261, Michael ordered his colleague to be blinded, whereupon he was sent into exile to a distant fortress. This hateful crime caused a general indignation among the people, and might have proved the ruin of Michael had he been a man of a less energetic turn of mind. The patriarch Arsenius, co-guardian to John, was irreconcilable; he fearlessly pronounced excommunication upon the imperial criminal; and years of trouble and commotion elapsed before Michael was re-admitted into the communion of the faithful, by the second successor of Arsenius, the patriarch Joseph.

But to return to the war with the despot of Epeirus. A short time after the conquest of Constantinople the despot Michael defeated Strategopulus, and made him a prisoner. The Greeks had scarcely rallied, when a new enemy rose against them. This was Villehardouin, who had been released from his captivity on condition of ceding some of his territories, and of remaining quiet for the future. But the loss of Constantinople was such a blight to the hopes of pope Urban IV. of effecting a complete union between the Latin and the Greek churches, that he urged the European princes to undertake a crusade against the Greek schismatics, and commanded Villehardouin to commence hostilities forthwith, relieving him from the oath he had sworn, to keep peace with Michael. Villehardouin was successful by sea and land, but Michael avoided further danger by promising the pope to do his utmost in order to effect the intended union. Urban was now the first to offer himself as mediator between the belligerents, and as both parties were tired of bloodshed, peace was soon restored (1263). In the following year the war between the emperor and Michael of Epeirus was likewise brought to an end by an honourable peace, and shortly afterwards the despot died. To Nicephorus, the eldest of his legitimate sons, who had just married Eulogia, the sister of the emperor, he left Epeirus; but the better and larger half of his kingdom, viz. Thessaly, became the share of his favourite natural son John, a warlike man, who was well fit to defend his inheritance. In 1265 Arsenius was deposed because he would not revoke the excommunication of the emperor: his adherents, the Arsenites, caused a schism which lasted till 1312. [ARSENIVS.]

In 1269 Michael was involved in a dangerous war with Charles, king of Sicily, who took up arms on pretence of restoring the fugitive Baldwin to the throne, and who was joined by John of Thessaly, the above-mentioned son of the despot Michael of Epeirus. The despot John, the emperor's brother, took the field against his namesake, but, owing to circumstances which it was not in his power to remove, that gallant commander of the Greeks suffered a terrible defeat (1271), and the prince of Thessaly, forthwith marching upon Constantinople, placed the capital in jeopardy.

But the loss of Negropont and the destruction of his fleet by the Greeks compelled him to fall back. Justly afraid that the hostilities of the king of Sicily and the despot of Thessaly were only the forerunners of a general crusade of all the Latin princes against him, Michael tried to avoid the storm by at last making earnest proposals towards effecting the union of the Greek church with that of Rome. To that effect the learned Veccus, accompanied by several of the most distinguished among the Greek clergy, was sent to the council assembled at Lyon in 1274, and there the union was effected by the Greeks giving way in the much-disputed doctrine of the procession of the Holy Ghost, and submitting to the supremacy of the pope. The union, however, was desired only by a minority of the Greeks, and the orthodox majority accordingly did their utmost to prevent the measure from being carried out. Michael in his turn supported his policy with force. The patriarch Joseph was deposed, and Veccus appointed in his stead; cruel punishment was inflicted upon all those who opposed the union; and Greece was shaken by a religious commotion which forms a remarkable event in the ecclesiastical history of the East. As space forbids us to dwell longer upon these important transactions, we can only remark that the union was never effectually carried out, and fell entirely to the ground upon the death of Michael. The manifest duplicity and the cruelty with which the emperor behaved in this affair made him odious to his own subjects and contemptible to his new Latin friends, and the latter part of his reign was an uninterrupted series of domestic troubles and foreign wars. His dearly-bought friendship with the Latin, and especially the Italian powers, was brought to a very speedy end.

The emperor Baldwin having died, his son Philip assumed the imperial title, and succeeded in forming an alliance between pope Martin IV., Charles of Anjou, king of Sicily, and the Venetians, with a view of reconquering Constantinople and dividing the Greek empire. Soliman Rossi, a French knight, commanded the allied forces, and, invading the empire from the north, met at Belgrade the Greek forces commanded by the magnus domesticus Tarcaniotes. A pitched battle ensued, in which the invaders were totally routed: the magnus domesticus made a triumphant entry into Constantinople, and all danger of a second invasion was removed. Not satisfied with the glory of his arms and the material benefit he derived from his victory, Michael resolved to take terrible revenge: he paid 20,000 ounces of gold towards equipping a Catalan fleet with which king Peter of Arragon was to attack Sicily, and the "Sicilian Vespers," in which 8,000 Frenchmen were massacred, and in consequence of which Sicily was wrested from Charles of Anjou and united with Arragon, were in some degree the work of Michael's fury.

In the autumn of the same year (1282) Michael marched against John, the unruly prince of Thessaly, but, before any thing serious had been done, he fell ill, and died on the 11th of December, 1282, at the age of 58, leaving the renown of a successful but treacherous tyrant. His son Andronicus II. succeeded him. (Pachymer. lib. i.—vi.; Niceph. Gregor. lib. iv.—v.; Acropol. c. 76. &c.; Phrans. lib. i.) [W. P.]

MICHAEL IX. PALAEOLOGUS, the son of Andronicus II., was associated with his father in the throne of Constantinople, but died in the lifetime of his father. An account of him is given under ANDRONICUS II. [W. P.]

MICHAEL (Μιχαήλ), Byzantine writers.

1. ALEXANDRINUS, patriarch of Alexandria in the middle of the ninth century, wrote in A. D. 869 or 870 De Unitate Ecclesiae, a letter addressed to the emperor Basil I., printed Graeco et Latine in the 8th vol. of Labbe's Concil. and in the 5th vol. of Hardouin's Concil. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 869; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 189.)

2. ANCHIALUS [ANCHIALUS.]

3. APOSTOLIUS, was one of those Greeks who contributed to the revival of learning in Italy, where he settled about 1440. He was an intimate friend of Gemistus Pletho, and an adherent of the Platonic philosophy, two circumstances which, together with his own merits, caused him to be well received by Cardinal Bessarion in Italy. The friendship, however, did not last long, and poor Michael retired to Candia, where he got a livelihood by teaching children and copying MSS. There he died, some time after 1457, for in that year he wrote a panegyric on the emperor Frederic III. His principal works are: 1. A defence of Plato against Theodore Gaza, extant in MS. in the Vienna library. 2. Menezenus, a dialogue on the Holy Trinity, investigating whether the Mohammedans and Jews are right, in believing a Mono-Deus; or the Christians, in believing a Deus Trin-uns: extant in MS., ibid. 3. Oratio consularia ad Socerum sibi irascendum cum ad secundas transiret nuptias, extant in the Bodleian.

4. Appellatio ad Constantinum Palaeologum ultimum Imperatorem. 5. Oratio ad Ioannem Argypulam. 6. Epistolae XLV.: these letters are extremely important for the history of the writer's times, as Lambecius asserts, who perused all or most of them, and it is to be regretted that none of them are printed. The first is addressed to Gemistus, the others to Manuel Chrysolaras, Chalcocondylas, Argypoulus, Bessarion, and other celebrated men of the time. They are extant in MS. in the Bodleian; some of them are also to be found in the Vatican and at Munich. 7. Oratio Panegyrica ad Fredericum III., written about or perhaps in 1457; it was published Graeco et Latine by Freherus in the second vol. of his Rerum German. Script.

8. Oratio Funebris in Laudem Bessarionis, does credit to the heart of Michael, for it seems that the cardinal had not behaved very generously towards the poor scholar. Still it is very questionable whether our Michael is the author of it: Bessarion died in 1472; and as Michael, previously to leaving Constantinople, in or before 1440, had enjoyed, during many years, the friendship of Gemistus, whose name became conspicuous in the very beginning of the 15th century, and who was a very old man in 1441, he must have attained a very great age if he survived Bessarion. 9. Disceptatio aduersus eos qui Occidentales Orientalibus superiores esse contendebant, extant in MS. in the Bodleian. 10. De Figuris Grammaticis, which Leo Allatius esteemed so highly that he intended to publish it, but was unfortunately prevented. 11. An Etymological Dictionary; doubtful whether still extant; a work of great importance. 12. Ἱερία, Violets, a pleasing title given to a collection of sentences of celebrated persons. Arsenius of Malvasia made an extract of it, Ἀποσφύματα, Rome, 8vo, which he dedicated to pope Leo X., who reigned from 1513 to 1522. 13. Συναγωγή Παροιμιῶν, containing 2027 Greek proverbs, a very remarkable little work which soon attracted the notice of the lovers of Greek literature: it was dedicated by the author to Casparus Uxama, or Osmi, a Spanish prelate, with whom Michael met at Rome. Editions: the Greek text by Hervagius, Basel, 1558, 8vo.; the text, with a Latin version and valuable notes, by P. Pantinus and A. Scholl, Leyden, 1619, 4to.; also cum Clavi Homericis, by George Perkins. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1440; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 189.)

4. ATTALIATA. [ATTALIATA.]

5. BALSAMON, Magnae Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae Magni Chartophylax et Archidiaconus, was probably a native of Constantinople. He was one of the Greek deputies sent in 1438 to the council of Florence, discovered the secret intrigues of the Latins, and prognosticated the ultimate fate of the union of the two churches to which he subscribed reluctantly. He wrote and addressed to the emperor Ioannes Palaeologus Anaphora Cleri Constantinopolitani, of which Leo Allatius gives a few fragments in his work De Consensu utriusque Ecclesiae. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1440; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 373, note.)

6. CERULARIUS, was chosen patriarch of Constantinople in 1043, and made himself notorious in ecclesiastical history by his violent attacks upon the Latin church. He caused so much scandal that pope Leo IX. sent Cardinals Humbert and Frederic with Peter, archbishop of Amalfi, to Constantinople in order to persuade Cerularius to a more moderate conduct. Their efforts were not only unsuccessful, but they were treated with such abuse that Humbert excommunicated the virulent patriarch. Cerularius in his turn excommunicated the three legates, and he caused the name of Pope Leo IX. to be erased from the diptycha. In 1057 he prevailed upon the emperor Michael Stratoticus to yield to his successful rival, Isaac Comnenus, whose interest he took care of for some time. Differences, however, soon broke out between them; and when he was once quarrelling with Isaac about the respective authority of the church and the state, he impudently cried out, "I have given you the crown, and I know how to take it from you again." Banishment was his due reward, and Isaac was about to remove him from his see when death removed him from the earth (1058). Cerularius wrote: 1. Decisio Synodica de Nuptiis in Septimo Gradu. 2. De Matrimonio prohibito: the former printed Greek and Latin in the third book, and fragments of the latter in the fourth book of Leunclavius, Jus Graeco-Roman. 3. Epistolae II. ad Petrum Antiochenum, Greek and Latin, in the second vol. of Cotelierus, Eccles. Graec. Monument. 4. De Sacerdotis Uxoris Adulterio polluta, in Cotelierus, Patres Apostol. 5. Ἐπιστολὰς α. Edictum Synodale aduersus Latinos de Pittacia seu De Excommunicatione a Latinis Legatis in ipsum ab ipso in Legatos vibrata, anno 1054, die septimo Junii factum, Graeco et Latine in Leo Allatius, De Libr. Eccles. Graecis. 6. Homilia, ed. Graeco et Latine by Montfaucon, under the title Epistola Synodi Nicaeanae ad Sanctam Alerandriae Ecclesiam, Paris, 1716, fol. There are, farther, extant in MS. fragments of several letters, as Contra Rebelles Abbates, Contra Armenios, De Homicidio facto in Ecclesia, De

Episcoporum Judicii, &c. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1043; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. pp. 195, 196.)

7. EPHESIUS, archbishop of Ephesus, the author of valuable scholia to Aristotle, especially the Metaphysica, was, according to some, no other than the emperor Michael Ducas Parapinaces, who was appointed to the see of Ephesus after his forced abdication in 1078. Others pretend that the scholia ought to be ascribed to Michael Psellus. [PSELLUS.] (Leo Allatius, De Psellis, p. 40.)

8. GRAMMATICUS, perhaps the same as Michael Psellus, wrote Epigramma in Agathium, printed in the third vol. of Brunck's Analecta Vet. Poet. Graec., in the third vol. of Jacobs' Anthologia Graeca, and in some other collections. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 482. vol. xi. p. 204.)

9. MONACHUS, ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae presbyter and Ignatii patriarchae synellus, wrote, 1. Encomium Ignatii Patriarchae (who died in 877), edited Greek and Latin, in a very mutilated form, by Raderus in his Acta Concilii, Ingolstadt, 1604, 4to., also in the eighth vol. of the Concilia. 2. Encomium in Angelicorum Ordinum Ductores, Michaellem et Gabrielem. 3. Encomium in gloriosum Christi Apodolum Philippum. 4. Perhaps Vita et Miracula Sti Nicolai. 5. Vita Theodori Studitae, of which Baronius gives some fragments in his Annales ad an. 795 and 826. The complete text with a Latin translation was published by Jacobus de la Baune in the fifth vol. of Opera Sirmoudi, Paris, 1696, fol. The life of Theodore Studita, as well as one or two of the other productions, were perhaps written by another Michael Monachus, a contemporary and survivor of Studita who died as early as 826. The author of this life was a very incompetent writer. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 878; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 205.)

10. PHILE. [PHILE.]

11. PROCHIRUS, of uncertain age, the author of Dramation, Musarum et Fortunae Querimonium continens, et alia, ed. Graec. et Lat. F. Morellus, Paris, 1593, 1598, 8vo.; also in Maittaire's Miscellanea Graecor. aliquot Scriptores Carmina, London, 1722, 4to. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 206.)

12. PRESBYTER, lived in the 9th century, wrote De Constructione Partium Orationis a. Methodus de Orationis Constructione, extant in MS. in Milan, and in the Escorial libraries, which is probably the same as Περί συντάξεως τῶν ᾠκνῶν, ascribed to Georgius Lecapenus, under whose name it was published, together with Theodorus Gaza, at Florence, 1515, 1520, 8vo.; with others, ibid. 1526, 8vo.; and in Grammatici Graeci, Venice, 1525, 8vo. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 133.)

13. PSELLUS. [PSELLUS.]

14. SBIUS. [SBIUS.]

15. SOPHIANUS. [SOPHIANUS.]

16. SYNCELLUS. [SYNCELLUS.]

17. SYNODENSIS, or more correctly SYNNA-DENSIS, bishop of Synnada or Synna, in Phrygia, of uncertain age, wrote Expositio Maximorum Miraculorum SS. Archangelorum. (Leo Allatius, De Symeonibus, p. 107.)

18. THESSALONICENSIS, magister rhetorum and magnae ecclesiae protecdicus, lived about 1160, and embraced the wide-spread Bogomilian heresy, for which he suffered severe persecutions till he returned to the orthodox church. He wrote Con- fessio Brevis, extant in Leo Allatius's De Consuetudine utriusque Ecclesiae, lib. ii. c. 12. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xi. p. 702.) [W. P.]

MI'CI'ON (Μικίων). 1. A Macedonian officer, who made a descent upon the coast of Attica during the Lamian war (a. c. 323), but was defeated by Phocion, and fell in the action. (Pist. Phoc. 25.)

2. An Athenian orator and demagogue, who, together with Euryclides, possessed the chief direction of affairs in his native city about a. c. 216. They were guilty of the most abject flattery towards the surrounding monarchs, but especially towards Ptolemy Philopator; and it was probably their partiality towards the latter that led Philip V., king of Macedonia, to procure their removal by poison. (Polyb. v. 106; Paus. ii. 9. § 6.) Pansanias writes the name Micon, but the authority of Polybius in favour of the form Micion is confirmed by the evidence of coins, on which the two names of Micion and Euryclides are found associated together. [E. H. B.]

MICIPSA (Μικίπας), king of Numidia, was the eldest of the sons of Masinissa who survived their father. He is first mentioned in a. c. 150, as being sent by Masinissa, together with his brother Gulussa, ambassador to Carthage, to demand the restoration of the partisans of Masinissa who had been driven into exile: but the Carthaginians shut the gates of the city against them, and refused to listen to their proposals. (Appian, Pun. 70.) After the death of Masinissa (a. c. 148), the sovereign power was divided by Scipio between Micipes and his two brothers, Gulussa and Mastanabal, in such a manner that the possession of Cirta, the capital of Numidia, and the treasures accumulated there, together with the financial administration of the kingdom, fell to the share of Micipes. (Id. ibid. 106; Liv. Epist. l.; Zonar. ix. 27.) It was not long, however, before the death of both his brothers left him in possession of the undivided sovereignty of Numidia, which he held from that time without interruption till his death. But few events of his long reign have been transmitted to us. He appears indeed to have been of a peaceful disposition; and after the fall of Carthage, he had no neighbours who could excite his jealousy.

With the Romans he took care to cultivate a good understanding; and we find him sending as auxiliary force to assist them in Spain against Viriathus (b. c. 142); and again in the more arduous war against Numantia. (Appian, Hisp. 67; Sall. Jug. 7.) On the latter occasion his auxiliaries were commanded by his nephew, Jugurtha, whom he had brought up with his own sons, and whom he was even induced to adopt; but the intrigues and ambition of the young man threw a cloud over the declining years of Micipes, and filled him with apprehensions for the future. Jugurtha, however, was prudent enough to repress his ambitious projects during the lifetime of Micipes: and the latter died at an advanced age in a. c. 118, having, on his death-bed, urged on his two sons, Adherbal and Hiempsal, and their adopted brother, the necessity of that harmony and concord which he but too well foresaw there was little chance of their preserving. (Sall. Jug. 5-11; Liv. Epist. lxii.; Orac. v. 15; Florus, iii. 2.)

broke out in B.C. 125, and is said to have carried off not less than 800,000 persons. (Oros. v. 11.) But notwithstanding this great calamity, that kingdom appears to have risen to a very flourishing condition under the mild and equitable rule of Micipsa. Diodorus calls him the most virtuous of all the kings of Africa, and tells us that he sought to attract Greek men of letters and philosophers to his court, and spent the latter part of his life chiefly in the study of philosophy. (Diod. xxxv. Exc. Vales. p. 607.) We learn also that he bestowed especial care upon the improvement of his capital city of Cirta, which rose to a high pitch of power and prosperity. He not only adorned it with many public edifices, but established there a number of Greek colonists. (Strab. xvii. p. 832.)

According to Diodorus (l. c.), Micipsa left a son of his own name, but he is not mentioned by any other author. [E. H. B.]

MICON (Μίκων), artists. 1. Of Athens, the son of Phanocheus, was a very distinguished painter and statuary, contemporary with Polygnotus, about B.C. 460. He is mentioned, with Polygnotus, as the first who used for a colour the light Attic ochre (σίλ), and the black made from burnt vine twigs. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 13. s. 56, xxxv. 6. s. 25.) Varro mentions him as one of those ancient painters, by departing from whose conventional forms, the later artists, such as Apelles and Protogenes, attained to their great excellence. (L. L. viii. 12, ed. Müller.) The following pictures by him are mentioned:—(1.) In the Pocile, at Athens, where, Pliny informs us (xxxv. 9. s. 35), Polygnotus painted gratuitously, but Micon for pay,—he painted the battle of Theseus and the Athenians with the Amazons. (Schol. ad Aristoph. Lysist. 679; Paus. i. 15. § 2.) (2.) According to some writers, Micon had a hand in the great picture of the battle of Marathon, in the Pocile [comp. PANÆNUS and POLYGNOTUS], and was fined thirty minæ for having made the barbarians larger than the Greeks. (Sopater, in Ald. Rhet. Græc. p. 340; Harpocr. s. v.) The celebrated figure, in that picture, of a dog which had followed its master to the battle, was attributed by some to Micon, by others to Polygnotus. (Aelian, N. A. vii. 38.) (3.) He painted three of the walls of the temple of Theseus. On the one wall was the battle of the Athenians and the Amazons; on another the fight between the Centaurs and the Lapithæ, where Theseus had already killed a centaur (no doubt in the centre of the composition), while between the other combatants the conflict was still equal: the story represented on the third side, Pausanias was unable to make out. (Paus. i. 17. § 2.) Micon seems to have been assisted by Polygnotus in these works. (See Siebelis, ad loc.) (4.) The temple of the Diocuri was adorned with paintings by Polygnotus and Micon: the former painted the rape of the daughters of Leucippus; the latter, the departure (or, as Böttiger supposes, the return) of Jason and the Argonauts. (Paus. i. 18. § 1.)

Micon was particularly skilful in painting horses (Aelian, N. A. iv. 50); for instance, in his picture of the Argonauts, the part on which he bestowed the greatest care was Acastus and his horses. (Paus. l. c.) The accurate knowledge, however, of Simon, who was both an artist and a writer on horsemanship, detected an error in Micon's horses; he had painted lashes on the lower eye-lids (Pollux, ii.

71): another version of the story attributes the error to Apelles. (Aelian, l. c.)

There is a tale that in one of his pictures Micon painted a certain Buteas crushed beneath a rock, so that only his head was visible, and hence arose the proverb, applied to things quickly accomplished, Βούτην Μίκων ὑπάραθεν, or Θάρον ἢ Βούτην. (Zenob. Proverb. i. 11, p. 87, Append. e Vutic. i. 12, p. 260.)

He was a statuary as well as a painter, and he made the statue of the Olympic victor Callias, who conquered in the pancratium in the 77th Olympiad. (Paus. vi. 6. § 1; comp. v. 9. § 3.) The date exactly agrees with the time of Micon; and Pausanias expressly says, Μίκων ἐποίησεν δὲ Σαρπηδόρα. Böttiger, in the course of a valuable section on Micon, ascribes this statue to Micon of Syracuse (No. 3), to whom consequently he assigns the wrong date. (Böttiger, Arch. d. Malerei, vol. i. pp. 254—260.)

2. Pliny distinguishes, by the epithet of minor, a second painter of this name, the father of Timarete. (H. N. xxxv. 9. s. 35.)

3. A statuary of Syracuse, the son of Niceratus, made two statues of Hiero II. at Olympia, one on horseback, the other on foot. They were made after the death of Hiero, by command of his sons. (Paus. vi. 12. § 4.) The artist must therefore have flourished after B.C. 215. He may safely be assumed to be the same as the statuary of whom Pliny says, Micon athletic spectatur. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 30.) [P. S.]

MICTIO, was a leading man at Chalcis, in Euboea, attached to the Roman, and opposed to the Aetolian party in that island during the war between Antiochus the Great and Rome, B.C. 192. He defended Chalcis by means of a league between the Chalcidians, Eretrians, and Carystians, and rejected the proposals of the Aetolians to remain neutral between Antiochus and the Romans. In B.C. 170 Mictio appeared before the senate at Rome as the chief of a deputation sent from Chalcis to complain of the cruelty and extortions of two successive praetors in Greece, C. Lucretius and L. Hortensius. Mictio, who was lame, was allowed to plead from a litter—a privilege till then unheard of—and, on his return, was conveyed to Brundisium in a carriage at the public cost. (Liv. xxxv. 38, 46, xliii. 7, 8.) [W. R. D.]

MICYTHUS (Μίκυθος). 1. Son of Choerua, was at first a slave in the service of Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, but gradually rose to so high a place in the confidence of his master, that Anaxilas at his death (B.C. 476) left him guardian of his infant sons, with charge to hold the sovereign power in trust for them until they should attain to manhood. The administration of Micythus appears to have been both wise and vigorous, so that he conciliated the affections of his subjects, and held the government both of Rhegium and Messana, undisturbed by any popular commotions. One of the principal events of his reign was the assistance furnished by him to the Tarentines in their war against the Iapygians (B.C. 473), which was terminated by a disastrous defeat, in which 3000 of the Rhegians perished, and the fugitives were pursued by the barbarians up to the very gates of the city. But notwithstanding this blow, we find him shortly after (B.C. 471) powerful enough to found a new colony, the city of Pyxus, or Buxentum, as it was afterwards called. It was doubtless from jealousy of Micythus that Hieron, tyrant of Syracuse, who had been on friendly terms with Anaxilas, was induced to invite the sons of that monarch, who were now grown up to manhood, to his court, and there urged them to require of their guardian the surrender of the sovereign power, and an account of his administration. But on the return of the young princes (B. C. 467), Micrythus immediately complied with their request; and after rendering an exact account of the period of his rule, resigned the supreme power, and departed with all his private wealth to the Peloponnese, where he settled at Tegea, and resided there the rest of his life in honour and tranquillity. He is also mentioned by Pausanias (who calls him Smicythus) as having distinguished himself by the number of statues and other offerings that he dedicated at Olympia. (Herod. vii. 170; Diod. xi. 48, 52, 59, 66; Paus. v. 26. §§ 4, 5; Strab. vi. p. 253; Macrobi. Sat. i. 11. p. 259, ed. Zeun.)

2. An officer under Lyciscus, the general of Cassander, who was killed in battle against Alexander, the son of Alcetas, king of Epeirus, B. C. 312. (Diod. xix. 88.) [E. H. B.]

MIDAS (Μίδας), a son of Gordius, according to some by Cybele (Hygin. Fab. 274), a wealthy but effeminate king of Phrygia, a pupil of Orpheus, and a promoter of the worship of Dionysus (Herod. i. 14; Paus. i. 4. § 5; Aelian, V. H. iv. 17; Strab. vii. p. 304). His wealth is alluded to in a story connected with his childhood, for it is said that while yet a child, ants carried grains of wheat into his mouth to indicate that one day he should be the richest of all mortals (Cic. De Div. i. 36; Val. Max. i. 6. § 3; Aelian, V. H. xii. 45). His effeminate is described by Philostratus (Icon. i. 22; comp. Athen. xii. p. 516). It seems probable that in this character he was introduced into the Satyric drama of the Greeks, and was represented with the ears of a satyr, which were afterwards lengthened into the ears of an ass. He is said to have built the town of Ancyra (Strab. xiii. pp. 568, 571; Paus. i. 4. § 5), and as king of Phrygia he is called Berecynthius heros (Ov. Met. xi. 106). In reference to his later life we have several legends, the first of which relates his reception of Seilenus. During the expedition of Dionysus from Thrace to Phrygia, Seilenus in a state of intoxication had gone astray, and was caught by country people in the rose gardens of Midas. He was bound in wreaths of flowers and led before the king. These gardens were in Macedonia, near Mount Bermion or Bromion, where Midas was king of the Briges, with whom he afterwards emigrated to Asia, where their name was changed into Phryges (Herod. vii. 83, viii. 138; Conon, Narrat. 1). Midas received Seilenus kindly, conversed with him (comp. Plut. Consol. ad Apoll.; Aelian, V. H. iii. 18), and after having treated him hospitably for ten days, he led him back to his divine pupil, Dionysus, who in his gratitude requested Midas to ask a favour. Midas in his folly desired that all things which he touched should be changed into gold (comp. Plut. Parall. Min. 5). The request was granted, but as even the food which he touched was changed into gold, he implored the god to take his favour back. Dionysus accordingly ordered him to bathe in the source of Pactolus near Mount Tmolus. This bath saved Midas, but the river from that time had an abundance of gold in its sand (Ov. Met. xi. 90, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 191; Virg. Eclog. vi. 13). A second story relates his capture of Satyrus. Midas, who was himself related to the race of Satyr, once had a visit from a Satyr, who indulged in all kinds of jokes, and ridiculed the king for his Satyr's ears. Midas, who had learnt from his mother how Satyr might be caught and brought to reason, mixed wine in a well, and when the Satyr had drunk of it, he fell asleep and was caught (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. vi. 27). This well of Midas was at different times assigned to different localities. Xenophon (Anab. i. 2. § 13) places it in the neighbourhood of Thymbrium and Tyraeum, and Pausanias (i. 4. § 5) at Ancyra (comp. Athen. ii. 45; Plut. De Fluv. 10). Once when Pan and Apollo were engaged in a musical contest on the flute and lyre, Tmolus, or according to others (Hygin. Fab. 191, who speaks of the contest between Apollo and Marsyas), Midas, was chosen to decide between them. Tmolus decided in favour of Apollo, and all agreed in it except Midas. To punish him for this, Apollo changed his ears into those of an ass. Midas contrived to conceal them under his Phrygian cap, but the servant who used to cut his hair discovered them. The secret so much harassed this man, that as he could not betray it to a human being, he dug a hole in the earth, and whispered into it, "King Midas has ass's ears." He then filled the hole up again, and his heart was released. But on the same spot a reed grew up, which in its whispers betrayed the secret to the world (Ov. Met. xi. 146, &c.; Pers. Sat. i. 121; Aristoph. Plat. 287). Midas is said to have killed himself by drinking the blood of an ox. (Strab. i. p. 61; Plut. De Superst. 7.) [L. S.]

MIDEATIS (Μιδεατίς), a surname of Alcmena, derived from the town of Mides in Argolis, where her father Electryon ruled as king. (Paus. ii. 25. § 8; Theocrit. xiii. 20, xiv. 1.) [L. S.]

MIDEIA, or MI'DEA (Μιδεα, or Μιδεα). 1. A Phrygian woman, the mother of Licymnius and Electryon. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5; Pind. Ol. vii. 29; comp. Licymnius.)

2. A daughter of Phylas, and by Heracles the mother of Antiochus. (Paus. i. 5. § 2, x. 10. § 1.)

3. A nymph, who became the mother of Asclepius by Poseidon. (Paus. ix. 38. § 6.) [L. S.]

MI'DIAS or MEI'DIAS (Μεδίας). 1. An Athenian, of no very reputable character, to whom we find the nickname of "quail" applied in Aristophanes (Av. 1297), because, — so says the poet, — "he is like a quail with its head broken." No doubt there is also an allusion here, as we learn from the scholiast on the passage, to his propensity for the game of quail-striking (ἀστρονέμετος) and the gambling which accompanied it. We hear that he was satirized, too, by other comic poets (Phrynichus, Plato, and Metagenes) as a very great knave, beggarly at once and arrogant (κόβηλος καὶ πτωχάλας). By Plato, the philosopher (if indeed the dialogue in question be his), he is mentioned as a man who, though utterly uneducated both in mind and in character, presumed to take a part in public affairs, and made his way by dint of impudence and flattery of the people. In the Nixai of Plato, the comic poet, peculation of the public money was charged against him along with his other tricks of knavery. (Plat. Alc. Prim. p. 120; Schol. ad loc.; Athen. xi. p. 506, d.; Dalechamp, ad loc.; Suid. s. v. ἀστρονέμετος; Meineke, Fragm. Com. Graec. vol. ii. p. 182, 644, 755; Dindorf and Brunck, ad Arist. L. c.)

2. An Athenian, of considerable wealth and influence, was a violent and bitter enemy of Demosthenes, the orator. His hostility he first displayed when he broke violently into the house of Demosthenes, with his brother Thrasylochus, to take possession of it,—Thrasylochus having offered, in the case of a trierarchy, to make an exchange of property with Demosthenes (δωρίβορις; see Dict. of Ant. a. v.), under a private understanding with the guardians of the latter that, if the exchange were effected, the suit then pending against them should be dropped. (Dem. a. Meid. p. 540, c. Aphob. p. 841; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, bk. iv. ch. 16.) The opposition offered by Demosthenes, though to no purpose, to the proposal for sending aid against Callias and Taurosthenes of Chalcis to Plutarchus, the tyrant of Eretria, and the friend of Meidias, no doubt further exasperated the hatred of the latter, and he not only assailed Demosthenes with a charge of neglect of military duty (λεηροτάλου ὄντι), but endeavoured also, with the grossest malice, to implicate him in the accusation of murdering one Nicodemus. (Aesch. c. Ctes. pp. 65, 66; Dem. De Pac. p. 58, c. Meid. pp. 547—554.) For the remainder of the transactions between Demosthenes and Meidias, see above, Vol. I. pp. 982, 983, and comp. Clint. F. H. vol. ii. sub annis 350, 348, App. ch. 20.

3. The son-in-law of Mania. [MIDIAS.] [E. E.] MIDIAS, the engraver of a gem in the Royal Library at Paris. (Clarac, Descr. des Antiques du Musée Royal, p. 420; Raoul-Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 45.) [P. S.]

MIGONITIS (Μιγωνίτις), a surname of Aphrodite, derived from a place, Migonium, in or near the island of Cranne in Laconia, where the goddess had a temple. (Paus. iii. 2 § 1.) [L. S.]

MILANION. [ΜΕΙΛΑΝΙΟΝ.]

MILETUS (Μίλητος), a son of Apollo and Areia of Crete. Being beloved by Minos and Sarpedon, he attached himself to the latter, and fled from Minos to Caria, where he built a town, which he called after his own name (Apollod. iii. 1 § 2; Pana. vii. 2 § 3; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 186). Ovid (Met. ix. 442) calls him a son of Apollo and Deione, and hence Deionidea. A different genealogy and story about him is preserved in Antonius Liberalis (30). [L. S.]

MILICHUS, a freedman of Flavius Scaevinus, gave Nero the first information of Piso's conspiracy in A. D. 66. Milichus was liberally rewarded by the emperor, and assumed the surname of Soter, or the Preserver. (Tac. Ann. xv. 54, 55, 71.) [W. B. D.]

MILO, T. ANNIUS PAPIA'NUS, was the son of C. Papius Celsus and Annia [ANNIA, No. 2]. He was born at Lanuvium, of which place he was in A. C. 53, chief magistrate—dictator. Milo derived the name of Annianus from his adoption by his maternal grandfather T. Annianus Luscus. But the appellation by which he is best known, was an Italian-Greek name, common in the South of Italy, the fruitful nursery of Gladiators. Since his ancestors, neither in the Papian nor Annian families, bore this name, and Milo was notorious as a leader of mercenary swordsmen, and for his lawless and ferocious life, a by-name has probably superseded his birth-name. The year of his quaestorship is unknown. He was tribune of the plebs in A. C. 57, when his memorable and fatal contest with P. Clodius began. The history of his tribunate and of the succeeding events until the murder of Clodius in A. C. 52, is inseparable from that of his rival, and has already been related [P. CLODIUS PULCHER, No. 40]. We shall, therefore, merely recapitulate the principal features of their quarrel. Milo was deeply in debt, and a wealthy province alone could extricate him. But without eloquence or political talents, the member of a comparatively obscure family could not hope to attain the consulate, unless he identified his own interest with that of some one or other of the great leaders of the commonwealth. Milo, therefore, attached himself to Cn. Pompey, and Cicero's recall from exile was the immediate pretext of their alliance. In procuring Cicero's restoration, Milo, from his daring and unscrupulous character, was by far the most efficient of the tribunes. He combated Clodius with his own weapons. He purchased, after a faint and fruitless trial of constitutional means, a band of gladiators, and the streets of Rome were the scene of almost daily and always deadly conflict between the two leaders of these paid assassins. Cicero's return did not, however, tranquillise the city. Clodius renewed his attacks on the person and property of the great orator, and Milo twice rescued him from the hands of the Clodian mob. Pompey also had become an object of Clodius' hate, and Milo and his gladiators, who served without being expressly employed by him, were a valuable guard to one who prized the concealment of his sentiments little less than the safety of his person. The success of the combatants was nearly equal. Milo's houses in Rome, the Anniana on the Capitoline and another on the hill Germalus, were assailed by the Clodians, but Clodius was twice driven from the forum, and the last time narrowly escaped with life. Nor did the rivals restrict their warfare to the swords of their adherents. With equal justice and consistency they accused each other of a breach of the Lex Plotia de Vi, and with equal violence both eluded the results of prosecution. Clodius, however, notwithstanding Milo's repeated disruption of the comitia, succeeded in carrying his election for the curule-aedileship in A. C. 56, and was thus during his year of office exempt from impeachment. Milo, whose tribunate expired in December A. C. 57, was on the other hand open to legal proceedings, and Cicero from dread of Crassus, who favoured Clodius, refused to undertake his defence. It was, therefore, necessary for his safety that he should again hold an office of the state. But his bankrupt condition did not allow him to risk the expenses of the curule-aedileship, and there is no authentic record of his praetorship. In those convulsory years of Rome it is indeed likely that the sequence of magistracies was not very strictly observed. Milo, however, although never aedile, exhibited aedilician games of unusual and, according to Cicero, of insane magnificence. He was enabled to give them by the bequest of a deceased curule-aedile, whose name is lost, and he exhibited them in the year previous to his canvass for the consulship. In A. C. 53 Milo was candidate for the consulship, and Clodius for the praetorship of the ensuing year. The gladiatorial combats were revived, and Clodius upbraided Milo in the senate with his insolvency. Cicero, to whom Milo's election was of vital importance, defended him in the speech de Aere alieno Milonis, of which a few fragments are still extant. The contest, however, between the rival ruffians was brought to an end by the murder of Clodius at Bovillae on the Appian-road, January 20th, B.C. 52. The details of the meeting, the quarrel, and its catastrophe, are related in the account of Clodius [No. 40].

The immediate effect of the death of Clodius was to depress the Milonian, and to re-animate the Clodian faction. Milo at first meditated voluntary exile. But the excesses of his opponents made his presence once more possible at Rome. The tribune of the plebs, M. Caelius, attended him to the forum, and Milo addressed the assembly in the white robe of a candidate, and proceeded with his consular canvass. But a more powerful, though secret opponent had meanwhile risen up against Milo. His competitors in the comitia were P. Plautius Hypsæus [HYPSÆUS, No. 5] and Q. Metellus Scipio. Cn. Pompey had married a daughter of Scipio, and from Hypsæus he expected aid in gratifying the prime object of his ambition—the dictatorship. A bill for his appointment was not indeed promulgated. But the senate nominated him sole consul. Pompey immediately brought forward three laws, which, from their immediate reference to the circumstances of the times, were in fact privilegia. In the first he specially noticed the murder at Bovillae, the conflagration of the curia hostilia and the Porcian Basilica, and the attack upon the house of M. Lepidus the interrex. In the second he introduced more stringent penalties for ambitus, and in the third he increased the severity of the existing laws against sodalitia, or illegal interference with the freedom of the comitia. The time allowed for trials de Vi, Ambitu, Sodalitiis, was also much shortened, only three days being assigned to the accusation, the defence, and the examination of witnesses. M. Caelius opposed these laws on the ground that they were privilegia and retrospective. But Pompey stifled all opposition by surrounding his house and gardens with soldiers, and withdrawing himself from the senate and the forum, on pretence of dreading Milo's violence. A variety of charges and recriminations was brought forward by either faction. The slaves of Milo and Clodius were respectively required to be given up to torture, and perjury and intimidation, the forms of law, and the abuse of justice, were put in active requisition. Milo, however, was not without hope, since the higher aristocracy, from jealousy of Pompey, supported him, and Cicero undertook his defence. His trial opened on the 4th of April, B.C. 52. He was impeached by the two Clodii, nephews of the deceased, de Vi, by Q. Petulcius and L. Cornificius, de Ambitu, and by P. Fulvius Neratus, de Sodalitiis. L. Donitius Ahenobarbus, a consular, was appointed quaesitor or instigator by a special law of Pompey's, and all Rome and thousands of spectators from Italy thronged the forum and its avenues from dawn to sunset during these memorable proceedings. But Milo's chances of acquittal, faint even had justice been decorously administered, were wholly marred by the virulence of his adversaries, who insulted and obstructed the witnesses, the process, and the conductors of the defence. Cn. Pompey availed himself of these disorders to line the forum and its encompassing hills with soldiers. Cicero was intimidated and Milo was condemned. Had he even been acquitted on the first count de Vi, the two other charges of bribery and conspiracy awaited him. He therefore went into exile. Cicero, who could not deliver, re wrote and expanded the defence of Milo—the extant oration—and sent it to him at Massilia. Milo remarked, "I am glad this was not spoken, since I must have been acquitted, and then had never known the delicate flavour of these Mareillemullets." M. Brutus also some time afterwards composed as a rhetorical exercise a defence of Milo. He took a different and an easier view of the cause than Cicero. The murder of Clodius, according to Brutus, was a benefit to the commonwealth; according to Cicero, it was a necessary act of self-defence. Both pleas are singularly weak. However useful and merited the death of Clodius might be to the state, inflicted by a private hand it was a pernicious precedent; and although the meeting at Bovillae may have been accidental, the necessity for self-defence ceased with the flight of Clodius, and the pretence wholly fails when it is remembered that Milo's escort was much the more numerous and the better-armed.

Milo's exile was a heavy blow to his numerous creditors. His houses at Rome, his numerous villas, and his bands of fighting men were put up to auction, and Cicero did not escape suspicion of having purchased through an agent, Philotimus, some of the Annian property below its real worth. Cicero, on his return from Cilicia in B.C. 51, showed that he felt the imputation by offering to cancel the purchase or to increase the price. He however, owed no gratitude to Milo, who had espoused his cause because it suited his own interest, and his undertaking the defence of so notorious a criminal with extreme risk to himself amply discharged his real or supposed obligations. The close of Milo's life was as inglorious as his political career had been violent and disgraceful. Milo expected a recall from Caesar, when, in B.C. 49, the dictator permitted many of the exiles to return. But better times were come, and Rome neither needed nor wished for the presence of a bankrupt agitator. Milo's former friend the ex-tribune M. Caelius, praetor in B.C. 48, promulgated a bill for the adjustment of debts—a revolutionary measure for which the senate, where the Caesarian party had then a majority, expelled him from his office. Caelius, himself a man of broken fortunes, required desperate allies, and he accordingly invited Milo to Italy, as the fittest tool for his purposes. At the head of the survivors of his gladiatorial bands, reinforced by Samnite and Brutian herdsmen, by criminals and run-away slaves, Milo appeared in Campania, and proclaimed himself a legatus of Cn. and Sextus Pompey. He found, however, no adherents, and retreated into Lucania, where he was met by the praetor Q. Pedius, and slain under the walls of an obscure fort in the district of Thurii.

Milo, in B.C. 57, married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla. She proved a faithless wife, and Sallust the historian was soundly scourged by Milo for an intrigue with her. (The authorities for Milo's life are Cicero's well-known oration and the passages in Orelli's Onom. Tull.; Plutarch's lives of Pompey, Cicero, and Caesar; Dion Cass. xxxix. 6—8, 18—21, xli. 48—55; Appian, B.C. ii. 16, 20—24, 48; Caes. B.C. iii. 21—23; see Dromann, *Geogr. MILON (MILON) of Crotona, son of Diocimus, an athlete, famous for his extraordinary bodily strength. He was six times victor in wrestling at the Olympic games, and as often at the Pythian; but having entered the lists at Olympia a seventh time, he was worsted by the superior agility of his admirary. By these successes he obtained great distinction among his countrymen, so that he was even appointed to command the army, with which they took the field against the Sybarites under Telys, and bore an important part in the great battle at the Crathis, B.C. 511. Diodorus even goes so far as to attribute the memorable victory of the Crotonians on that occasion almost wholly to the personal strength and prowess of Milon, who is said to have taken the field accoutred like Hercules, and wearing the chaplet of his Olympic victory. (Diod. xii. 9.) This is the only instance in which he appears in any public capacity; but we learn from Herodotus that, so great was the reputation he enjoyed, that when the physician Democedes took refuge at Crotona, he hastened to obtain a daughter of Milon in marriage, trusting to the effect that his name would produce even upon the Persian king. (Herod. iii. 137.) Many stories are related by ancient writers of his extraordinary feats of strength, which are for the most part well known; such as his carrying a heifer of four years old on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia, and afterwards eating the whole of it in a single day. Some of the modes by which he displayed his gigantic powers before the assembled multitude appear to have been commemorated by the attitude of his statue at Olympia, at least if we may trust the account of it given by Philostratus; but Pausanias, while he relates the same anecdotes, does not give us to understand that the statue itself was so represented. (Paus. vi. 14. §§ 6, 7; Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iv. 28.)

The mode of his death is thus related: as he was passing through a forest when enfeebled by age, he saw the trunk of a tree which had been partially split open by woodcutters, and attempted to rend it further, but the wood closed upon his hands, and thus held him fast, in which state he was attacked and devoured by wolves. (Diod. xii. 9; Paus. vi. 14. § 5—8; Athen. x. p. 412; Aelian, V. H. ii. 24; Gell. xv. 16; Val. Max. ix. 12, ext. 9; Suid. s. v. Μίλων; Schol. ad Theocr. iv. 6; Schol. ad Aristoph. Ran. 55; Tzet. Chil. ii. 460; Cic. de Sen. 10.)

The age of Milon is clearly fixed by the passages above cited from Diodorus and Herodotus: Aulus Gellius, who states that he was victor in the 50th Olympiad, is certainly in error.

2. A general in the service of Pyrrhus king of Epeirus, who sent him forward with a body of troops to garrison the citadel of Tarentum, previous to his own arrival in Italy. (Zonar. viii. 2.) He appears to have accompanied Pyrrhus throughout his campaigns in that country, and is mentioned as urging the king to continue the war after the battle of Heracleia in opposition to the pacific counsels of Cineas. When Pyrrhus went into Sicily, B.C. 278, he left Milon to hold the command in Italy during his absence; and when he finally quitted that country and withdrew into Epeirus, he still left him in charge of the citadel of Tarentum, together with his son Helenus. According to Justin, they were both recalled by Pyrrhus himself soon afterwards; but Zonaras states that he was hard pressed by the Tarentines themselves, assisted by a Carthaginian fleet, and was in consequence induced to surrender the citadel to the Romans, on condition of being allowed to withdraw his garrison in safety. (Zonar. viii. 4, 5, 6; Justin. xxv. 3.)

3. An Epeirot, who assassinated Deidameia, the daughter of Pyrrhus II., at the altar of Diana, to which she had fled for refuge [DEIDAMEIA]. For this sacrilege he was punished by a fit of frenzy, and put an end to his own life in a miserable manner. (Justin. xxviii. 3.)

4. Of Beroea, an officer in the army of Perseus, with which he opposed the Roman consul P. Licinius Crassus B.C. 171. (Liv. xlii. 58.) He is again mentioned as holding an important command under Perseus just before the battle of Pydna, B.C. 166. After that action he fled, with his two colleagues, Hippias and Pantauchus, to Beroea, where they were the first to set the example of defection, by surrendering that fortress into the hands of Aemilius Paullus. (Liv. xlv. 32, 45; Plut. Aemil. 16.) [E. H. B.]

MILONIA CAESONIA. [CAESONIA.]

MILTAS (Μίλας), a Thessalian soothsayer, who accompanied Dion on his expedition against Dionysius. He was also attached to the Platonic philosophy. (Plut. Dion. p. 967, c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 179.) [C. P. M.]

MILTIADES (Μιλτιάδης), a name borne by at least three of the family of the Cimonidae. [See the stemma in the article CIMON.] The family sprang from Aegina, and traced their descent to Aeacus. In the genealogy of the family given in the life of Thucydides which bears the name of Marcellinus, mention is made of a Miltiades, son of Tisander; but it is very questionable whether even the text is correct. The two following are celebrated:—1. The son of Cypselus, who was a man of considerable distinction in Athens in the time of Peisistratus. The Dolonciæ, a Thracian tribe dwelling in the Chersonesus, being hard pressed in war by the Absinthians, applied to the Delphic oracle for advice, and were directed to admit a colony led by the man who should be the first to entertain them after they left the temple. This was Miltiades, who, eager to escape from the rule of Peisistratus, gladly took the lead of a colony under the sanction of the oracle, and became tyrant of the Chersonese, which he fortified by a wall built across its isthmus. In a war with the people of Lampsacus he was taken prisoner, but was set at liberty on the demand of Croesus. He died without leaving any children, and his sovereignty passed into the hands of Stesagoras, the son of his half-brother Cimon. Sacrifices and games were instituted in his honour, in which no Lampsaene was suffered to take part. (Herod. vi. 34, 38, 103, 36—38.) Both Cornelius Nepos (Milt. i. 1) and Pausanias (vi. 19. § 6) confound this Miltiades with the following.

2. The son of Cimon and brother of Stesagoras, became tyrant of the Chersonesus on the death of the latter, being sent out by Peisistratus from Athens to take possession of the vacant inheritance. By a stratagem he got the chief men of the Chersonesus into his power and threw them into prison, and took a force of mercenaries into his pay. In order probably to strengthen his position still more he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of a Thracian prince named Olorus. (Herod. vi. 39.) He joined Dareius Hystaspis on his expedition against the Scythians, and was left with the other Greeks in charge of the bridge over the Danube. (Herod. iv. 137.) That when the appointed time had expired and Dareius had not returned, Miltiades recommended the Greeks to destroy the bridge and leave Darius to his fate, is the account repeated by every writer since Herodotus; but doubts have been raised respecting its truth which it is not easy to set aside. If true it could not have remained unknown to Darius, and yet Miltiades was left in quiet possession of his principality for several years, though during that period a Persian force was engaged in military operations in his neighbourhood. Bishop Thirlwall (History of Greece, vol. ii. Appendix 2) is inclined to look upon the story as a fabrication which was invented and spread after Miltiades came to Athens for the purpose of counteracting the odium with which he was at first regarded as a tyrant. Some time after the expedition of Darius an invader of the Scythians drove Miltiades from his possessions; but after the enemy had retired the Dolonians brought him back. (Herod. vi. 40.) It appears to have been between this period and his withdrawal to Athens that Miltiades conquered and expelled the Pelasgians inhabitants of Lemnos and Imbros and subjected the islands to the dominion of Attica. (Herod. vi. 137, 140.) The story of the origin of the enmity between the Athenians and these Pelasgians, of the promise made by the offenders in accordance with the direction of the oracle to surrender their islands to the Athenians, and the mode in which they attempted to elude it by offering to surrender them when a fleet should sail to them from Attica in one day with a north wind, and of the way in which Miltiades, setting out from the Chersonesus, which was in some sort Attic ground, fulfilled the seemingly impossible condition, and demanded the surrender which he had the power to enforce from those who resisted, will be found in Herodotus. Lemnos and Imbros belonged to the Persian dominions (Herod. v. 26), and Thirlwall has suggested that this encroachment on the Persian possessions was probably the cause which drew upon Miltiades the hostility of Darius, and led him to fly from the Chersonesus when the Phœnician fleet approached, after the subjugation of Ionia. Miltiades reached Athens in safety, but his eldest son Metiochus fell into the hands of the Persians. (Herodot. vi. 41.) At Athens Miltiades was arraigned, as being amenable to the penalties enacted against tyranny, but was acquitted. When Attica was threatened with invasion by the Persians under Datis and Artaphernes, Miltiades was chosen one of the ten generals. According to Pausanias (iii. 12. § 7), it was by his advice that the Persian heralds who had come to demand earth and water were put to death. When the Athenians advanced against the Persians, Miltiades by his arguments induced the polemarch Callimachus to give the casting vote in favour of risking a battle with the enemy, the opinions of the ten generals being equally divided. Miltiades waited till his turn came, and then drew his army up in battle array on the ever memorable field of Marathon. For an account of the battle and of the tactics by which the victory was secured the reader is again referred to Herodotus (vi. 104, 109, &c.). After the defeat of the Persians Miltiades endeavoured to urge the Athenians to measures of retaliation, and induced them to entrust to him an armament of seventy ships, without knowing the purpose for which they were designed. He proceeded to attack the island of Paros, for the purpose of gratifying a private enmity. His attacks, however, were unsuccessful; and after receiving a dangerous hurt in the leg while penetrating into a sacred enclosure on some superstitious errand, he was compelled to raise the siege and return to Athens, where he was impeached by Xanthippus for having deceived the people. His wound had turned into a gangrene, and being unable to plead his cause in person he was brought into court on a couch, his brother Tisagoras conducting his defence for him. He was condemned, but on the ground of his services to the state the penalty was commuted to a fine of fifty talents, the cost of the equipment of the armament. Being unable to pay this he was thrown into prison, where he not long after died of his wound. The fine was afterwards paid by his son Cimon. (Herod. vi. 132—136; Plut. Cimon, p. 480, d.) After his death a separate monument was erected to his memory on the field of Marathon. (Paus. i. 15. § 3.)

3. A grandson of the preceding, the son of Cimon, of the name of Miltiades, is mentioned in the scholia on Aristides (iii. p. 515, Dindorf), and by Aeschines (de Falsa Leg. p. 301, ed. Steph.), who speaks of him as having gone as herald to the Lacedæmonians before the conclusion of the fifty years' truce. [C. P. M.]

MILTIADES, joint commander of the Peloponnesian fleet with Lysander and Philochares at the close of the Peloponnesian war. (Lys. adv. Erasth. p. 430, ed. Reiske.) [C. P. M.]

MIMALON (Μιμάλων, or Μιμαλίων), the Macedonian name of the Bacchantes, or, according to others, of Bacchic Amazons (Strab. x. p. 468; Plut. Alex. 2; Lycoph. 1464). The name is commonly connected with the verb μιμῆσθαι, to imitate, because on one occasion, it is said, the Macedonians while at war with the Illyrian king Calander, added the Bacchantes to their army, in order to make it appear more numerous (Schol. ad Pers. Sat. i. 99); but the etymology is uncertain. Ovid (Art. Am. i. 541) uses the form Mimallonides for Mimalones. [L. S.]

MIMAS (Μίμας). 1. A Centaur. (Hes. Sat. Hera. 186.)

2. A giant who is said to have been killed by Area, or by Zeus with a flash of lightning (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1227; Eurip. Ios, 215). The island of Prochyte, near Sicily, was believed to rest upon his body. (Sil. Ital. xii. 147.)

3. A son of Aeolus, king of Aeolia, and father of Hippotea. (Diod. iv. 67.)

4. A son of Amycus and Theano, was born in the same night as Paris. He was a companion of Aeneas, and slain by Mezentius. (Virg. Aen. x. 702, &c.)

5. A Bebrzyx, who was slain by Castor during the expedition of the Argonauts. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 105.) [L. S.]

MIMNERMUS (Μίμνερμος), a celebrated elegiac poet. There were various accounts as to his birthplace. Some authorities spoke of Colophon, others of Smyrna, others of Astypalaea (it is not specified which of the places of that name) as his native city. (Suidas, s. v. Μίμνερμος.) He was generally called a Colophonian (Strab. xiv. p. 643); but from a fragment of his poem entitled Nessus it appears that he was descended from those Colophonians who reconquered Smyrna from the Aeolians (Strab. xiv. p. 634), and that, strictly speaking, Smyrna was his birthplace. Mimnermos flourished from about a. c. 634 to the age of the seven sages (about B.C. 600). He was a contemporary of Solon, who, in an extant fragment of one of his poems, addresses him as still living (Diog. Laërt. i. 60; Bergk, Poelae Lyrici Graeci, p. 331). No other biographical particulars respecting him have come down to us, except what is mentioned in a fragment of Hermesianax (Athen. xiii. p. 597) of his love for a flute-player named Nanno, who does not seem to have returned his affection.

The numerous compositions of Mimnermus (Suidas, who calls him Μίμνερμος, says ἔγραψε βιβλία πολλά) were preserved for several centuries, comprised in two books, until they were burnt, together with most of the other monuments of the erotic poetry of the Greeks, by the Byzantine monks. A few fragments only have come down to us; sufficient, however, when compared with the notices contained in ancient writers, to enable us to form a tolerably accurate judgment of the nature of his poetry. These fragments belong chiefly to a poem entitled Nanno, and addressed to the flute-player of that name. The compositions of Mimnermus form an epoch in the history of elegiac poetry. Before his time the elegy had been devoted chiefly either to warlike and national, or to convivial and joyous subjects. Archilochus had, indeed, occasionally employed the elegy for strains of lamentation, but Mimnermus was the first who systematically made it the vehicle for plaintive, mournful, and erotic strains. The threnetic origin of the elegy, the national temperament and social condition of the Asiatic Ionians, and the melancholy feelings with which they must have regarded their subjection to the Lydians, rendered this change easy and natural; and the elegiac poems of Mimnermus may be looked upon as a correct exponent of the general tone of feeling which marked his age and people. Though warlike themes were not altogether unnoticed by him (the war between Gyges and the Smyrnaeans was one topic of this kind which he dwelt upon), he seems to have spoken of valorous deeds more in a tone of regret, as things that had been, than with any view of rousing his countrymen to emulate them. The instability of human happiness, the helplessness of man, the cares and miseries to which life is exposed, the brief season that man has to enjoy himself in, the wretchedness of old age, are plaintively dwelt upon by him, while love is held up as the only consolation that men possess, life not being worth having when it can no longer be enjoyed. The latter topic was most frequently dwelt upon, and as an erotic poet he was held in high estimation in antiquity. (Hor. Epist. ii. 2. 100; Propert. i. 9. 11.) From the general character of his poetry he received the name Λυγροτάτης or Λυγροτάτης. He was a flute-player as well as a poet (Strab. iv. p. 643; Hermesianax, op. Athen. l. c.), and, in setting his poems to music, made use of the plaintive melody called the Nomos Kradias. Since the character which Mimnermus gave to elegiac poetry remained ever after its predominant characteristic, he is sometimes erroneously spoken of as the inventor of the elegy. The passage of Hermesianax, where he says of Mimnermus, ὅς εἶπετο πολλὰν ἀνὰ λῆδ' ἦχον καὶ μαλακοῦ πνεύμ' ἀπὸ πεντάμετρον, which has frequently been understood as conveying the same assertion, has been more correctly interpreted, by throwing greater stress on the word μαλακοῦ, as referring to the change which Mimnermus made in the character of elegiac poetry. (Comp. Propert. i. 9. 11.) Mimnermus is the oldest poet who mentioned an eclipse of the sun, and spoke of it as a threatening and mournful sign. (Plut. De Facie in Orbe Lunae, p. 931, c.) He is also the earliest authority that we have for the mythus that the sun, after setting in the west, is carried round the earth in a golden bowl, the work of Hephaestus, by the river Oceanus back again to the east. (Athen. xi. p. 470, a.) In his account of the voyage of Jason, also, he removed the dwelling of Aëtes to the shores of Oceanus.

The fragments of Mimnermus have been several times published, in the collections of Stephens, Brunck, Gaisford, Boissonade, and Bergk. There is a separate edition by Bach, Lips. 1826. They have been translated by Stollberg, Herder, Seckendorf, A. W. v. Schlegel, and others. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 733; K. O. Müller, History of the Literature of Ancient Greece, p. 115, &c.; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pp. 173, 175, 247, &c.) [C. P. M.]

MINATIA GENS, plebeian, and of very little note. On coins we find mention of an M. Minatius Sabinus, who was a legate under Cn. Pompey, the younger, in Spain (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 253), and one of the ancestors of Velleius Paterculus was called Minatius Magius. [MAGIUS, No. 3.]

MINDARUS (Μινδαρος), a Lacedaemonian, was sent out in B.C. 411, to succeed Astyochus in the office of Admiral. In the same year, having reason to believe that the Phoenician ships, promised by Tissaphernes, would never be forthcoming, he listened to the invitation of Pharnabazus, and sailed from Miletus to the territory of the latter satrap on the Hellespont, having managed to escape the notice of the Athenian fleet, which was aware of his intention and had removed from Samos to Lesbos with the view of preventing its execution. At Sestos he surprised the Athenian squadron there, which escaped with difficulty and with the loss of four ships. The Athenians, however, under Thrasylus and Thrasylbulus followed him to the north from Lesbos, and defeated him in the Hellespont, off Cynossema. After the battle, Mindarus sent to Euboea to Hegesandridas for reinforcements, and in the meantime we find him furnishing aid to the Aeolians of Antandrus in their insurrection against the garrison of Tissaphernes in their town. Soon after we hear of him offering sacrifices to Athena, at Ilium, whence he hastened to the aid of Demetrius, who had been engaged with a superior number of Athenian ships. A battle ensued and continued doubtful, till the arrival of reinforcements under Alcibiades gave the victory to the Athenians. But the latter, having despatched a large portion of their fleet to different quarters to collect money, were left in the Hellespont with a force of no more than forty ships, and Mindarus, whose squadron now amounted to sixty, prepared to attack them; but they moved away by night from Sestos to Cardia, where they were joined by Alcibiades with five galleys, and soon after by Thrasylbulus and Theramenes, each with twenty. With this force they sailed to Cysicus (whither the Peloponnesians had removed from Abydos), and there surprised them. The latter, however, having drawn up their ships close together near the shore, made a vigorous resistance: but Alcibiades sailed round with twenty triremes to a different part of the coast, and attacked them from the land in the rear. Mindarus hereupon disembarked to meet him, but was slain in the battle, and the Athenians gained a complete victory, B.C. 410. (Thuc. viii. 85, 99—105, 107, 108; Xen. Hell. i. 1. § 3, 1, 3—5, 8—18; Plut. Alc. 27, 28; Diod. xiii. 39, 45, 49—51.) [HIPPOCRATES, No. 6.] [E.E.]

MINIDIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.]

MINERVA, one of the great Roman divinities, whose name seems to be of the same root as mens, whence moneres and promonere (Fest. p. 205, ed. Müller). She is accordingly the thinking, calculating, and inventive power personified. Varro (ap. Aug. de Civ. Dei. vii. 28) therefore considered her as the impersonation of all ideas, or as the plan of the universe, while Jupiter, according to him, is the creator, and Juno the representative of matter. Minerva was the third in the number of the Capitoline divinities, and sometimes is said to have wielded the thunderbolts of Jupiter, her father. Tarquin, the son of Demaratus, was believed to have united the three divinities in one common temple, and hence, when repasts were prepared for the gods, these three always went together (August. de Civ. Dei. iv. 10; Val. Max. ii. 1. § 2). As Minerva was a virgin divinity, and her father the supreme god, the Romans easily identified her with the Greek Athena, and accordingly all the attributes of Athena were gradually transferred to the Roman Minerva. But we shall here confine ourselves to those which were peculiar to the Roman goddess, as far as they can be ascertained.

As she was a maiden goddess her sacrifices consisted of calves which had not borne the yoke or felt the sting (Fulgentius, p. 561, ed. Merc.; Arnob. iv. 16, vii. 22). She is said to have invented numbers, and it is added that the law respecting the driving in of the annual nail was for this reason attached to the temple of Minerva (Liv. vii. 3); but it is generally well attested that she was worshipped as the patroness of all the arts and trades, for at her festival she was particularly invoked by all those who desired to distinguish themselves in any art or craft, such as painting, poetry, the art of teaching, medicine, dyeing, spinning, weaving, and the like. (Ov. Fast. iii. 809, &c.; August. I. c. vii. 16.)

This character of the goddess may be perceived also from the proverb “to do a thing pingui Minerva,” i. e. to do a thing in an awkward or clumsy manner; and sus Minervam, of a stupid person who presumed to set right an intelligent one. Minerva, however, was the patroness, not only of females, on whom she conferred skill in sewing, spinning, weaving, &c., but she also guided men in the dangers of war, where victory is gained by cunning, prudence, courage, and perseverance. Hence she was represented with a helmet, shield, and a coat of mail; and the booty made in war was frequently dedicated to her. (Liv. xlv. 33; Virg. Aen. ii. 615.) Minerva was further believed to be the inventor of musical instruments, especially wind instruments, the use of which was very important in religious worship, and which were accordingly subjected to a sort of purification every year on the last day of the festival of Minerva. This festival lasted five days, from the 19th to the 23d of March, and was called Quinquatrus, because it began on the fifth day after the ides of the month. (Fest. pp. 149, 257, ed. Müller; Varro, De L. L. vi. 14; Ov. Fast. iii. 849.) This number of days does not seem to have been accidental, for Servius (ad Virg. Georg. i. 277) informs us that the number 5 was sacred to Minerva. (See Dict. of Ant. s. v. Quinquatrus.) The most ancient temple of Minerva at Rome was probably that on the Capitol; another existed on the Aventine (P. Vict. Reg. Urb. viii.; Ov. Fast. vi. 728); and she had a chapel at the foot of the Caelian hill, where she bore the surname of Capta. (Ov. Fast. iii. 337.) She also had the surname of Nautia, which was believed to have originated in the following manner. Diomedes had carried the Palladium from Troy; and as he found that it availed him nothing in his misfortunes, and as the oracle commanded him to restore it to the Trojans, he wanted to deliver it up to Aeneas on his wanderings through Calabria. When he came to the Trojans, he found Aeneas engaged in offering up a sacrifice, and Nates received the Palladium instead of Aeneas. The goddess (Minerva) bestowed many favours upon him, instructed him in various arts, and chose him for her servant. The family of the Nauti afterwards retained the exclusive knowledge of the manner in which Minerva Nautia was to be worshipped. Her mysterious image was preserved in the most secret part of the temple of Vesta, and regarded as one of the safeguards of the state. (Dionys. i. 69; Virg. Aen. v. 704; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 166, iii. 407; Lucan. i. 598; comp. Hartung, Die Relig. der Römer, vol. ii. p. 78, &c.) [L. 8.]

MINERVINA, the mother of CAESAR CAESAR, is usually termed by historians the first wife of Constantine the Great. However, Victor (Epist. 41) and Zosimus (ii. 20), both of whom mention her name, state expressly that she was his concubine, and their account is confirmed by Zonaras (xiii. 2). To this direct testimony we can oppose nothing, except the improbability that Constantine should have marked out an illegitimate son as his successor. (Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. iv. art. iv. p. 84, and Notes sur Constantin, note v.) [W. R.]

MINICIA GENS, came originally from Brixia (Brescia), in Cisalpine Gaul. Brixia was a Roman colony, but in what year it became one is unknown. (Plin. H. N. iii. 19.) The Minicii occur only under the empire. There was a C. Minicius Fundanus, one of the consules suffecti in A. D. 51; and another C. Minicius, also one of the consules suffecti in A. D. 103. For this gens see Labrus, Epigrapha novamente usita dalle escavazioni Bresciane, Milan, 1830. [W. B. D.]

MINIDIUS, L., was a Roman merchant or banker, established at Elis in B. C. 46, with whose heirs Cicero had some pecuniary transactions. He was brother of L. Maccinius Rufus, quaestor in Achaia [RUFUS], and married an Oppia. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 26, 28.) [W. B. D.]

MINIDIUS or MINDIUS, M., brother and heir of L. Minidius, and also a Roman merchant. Cicero was engaged in a law-suit with him. (Cic. ad Fam. v. 20, xiii. 26.) [W. B. D.]

MINIO. 1. Was the confidential friend and counsellor of Antiochus the Great, and his representative at the conference with the Roman envoys at Ephesus in B. C. 193. Minio commanded a portion of Antiochus' centre at the battle of Magnesia in B. C. 190. (Liv. xxxv. 15, 16, xxxvii. 48, 42.)

2. Q. MYNNIO (Mynnios), was a native of Smyrna, who, conspiring against Mithridates VI.

king of Pontus, in A. C. 86, was betrayed by one of his confederates, and put to death. (Appian, Narr. 46.) [W. B. D.]

MINIUS CERRINIUS, a Campanian, the son of Minia Paculla, was appointed by her one of the two hierophants of the Bacchanalia at Rome in B. C. 186. On the discovery of these orgies [HIPALA FREGENIA, HERENNIIUS CERRINIUS], Minius was arrested; and, having confessed before the senate the impure and atrocious character of the rites over which he presided, was placed in close custody at Ardea. His final sentence is unknown. (Liv. xxxix. 13, 17, 19.) [W. B. D.]

MINOS (Μίνως). 1. The son of Zeus and Europa, brother of Rhadamanthus, and king of Crete, where he is said to have given many and useful laws. After his death he became one of the judges of the shades in Hades. (Hom. Il. xiii. 450, xiv. 322, Od. xi. 321, 567, xvii. 523, xix. 178; comp. MILETUS.) He was the father of Deucalion and Ariadne; and, according to Apollodorus (iii. 1. § 1, &c.), Sarpedon also was a brother of his. Diodorus (iv. 60; comp. Strab. x. p. 476, &c.) relates the following story about him. Tectamus, a son of Dorus, and a great-grandson of Deucalion, came to Crete with an Aeolian and Pelasgian colony; and as king of the island, he became the father of Asterius, by a daughter of Cretheus. In the reign of Asterius, Zeus came to Crete with Europa, and became by her the father of Minos, Sarpedon and Rhadamanthus. Asterius afterwards married Europa; and having no issue by her, he adopted her three sons. Thus Minos succeeded Asterius, and married Itona, daughter of Lyctius, by whom he had a son, Lycastus. The latter became, by Ida, the daughter of Corybas, the father of another Minos, whom, however, some also called a son of Zeus. It should be observed, that Homer and Hesiod know only of one Minos, the ruler of Cnossus, and the son and friend of Zeus; and of this one they on the whole relate the same things, which later traditions assign to a second Minos, the grandson of the former; for here, as in many other mythical traditions of Greece and other countries, a rationalistic criticism attempted to solve contradictions and difficulties in the stories about a person, by the assumption that the contradictory accounts must refer to two different personages.

2. A grandson of No. 1, and a son of Lycastus and Ida, was likewise a king and law-giver of Crete. He is described as possessed of a powerful navy, as the husband of Pasiphaë, a daughter of Helios, and as the father of Catereus, Deucalion, Olauca, Androgeus, Acala, Xenodice, Arindne, and Phaedra. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 3.) He is said to have been killed in Sicily by king Cocalus, when he had gone thither in pursuit of Daedalus. (Herod. vii. 170; Strab. vi. pp. 273, 279; Paus. vii. 4. § 5.) But the scholiast on Callimachus (Hymn. in Jov. 8) speaks of his tomb in Crete. The detail of his history is related as follows. After the death of Asterius, Minos aimed at the supremacy of Crete, and declared that it was destined to him by the gods; in proof of it, he said that any thing he prayed for was done. Accordingly, as he was offering up a sacrifice to Poseidon, he prayed that a bull might come forth from the sea, and promised to sacrifice the animal. The bull appeared, and Minos became king of Crete. Others say that Minos disputed the government with his brother,

Sarpedon, and conquered. (Herod. . 173.) But Minos, who admired the beauty of the bull, did not sacrifice him, and substituted another in his place. Poseidon therefore rendered the bull furious, and made Pasiphaë conceive a love for the animal. Pasiphaë concealed herself in an artificial cow made by Daedalus, and thus she became by the bull the mother of the Minotaurus, a monster which had the body of a man, but the head of a bull. Minos shut the monster up in the labyrinth. (Apollod. iii. 1. § 3, &c.; comp. DARDALUS.) Minos is further said to have divided Crete into three parts, each of which contained a capital, and to have ruled nine years. (Hom. Od. xix. 178; Strab. x. pp. 476, 479.) The Cretans traced their legal and political institutions to Minos, and he is said to have been instructed in the art of law-giving by Zeus himself; and the Spartan, Lycurgus, was believed to have taken the legislation of Minos as his model. (Paus. iii. 4. § 2; comp. Plat. Min. p. 319, b; Plut. De ser. Num. Vind. 4; Val. Max. i. 2. § 1; Athen. xiii. p. 601.) In his time Crete was a powerful maritime state; and Minos not only checked the piratical pursuits of his contemporaries, but made himself master of the Greek islands of the Aegean. (Thuc. i. 4; Strab. i. p. 48; Diod. l. c.) The most ancient legends describe Minos as a just and wise law-giver, whereas the later accounts represent him as an unjust and cruel tyrant. (Philostr. Vit. Apoll. iii. 25; Catull. Epithal. Pri. 75; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1699.) In order to avenge the wrong done to his son Androgeus [ANDROGEUS] at Athens, he made war against the Athenians and Megarians. He subdued Megara, and compelled the Athenians, either every year or every nine years, to send him as a tribute seven youths and seven maidens, who were devoured in the labyrinth by the Minotaurus. (Apollod. iii. 15. § 8; Paus. i. 27. § 9, 44. § 6; Plut. Thea. 15; Diod. iv. 61; Ov. Met. vii. 456, &c.; comp. ANDROGEUS, THESEUS.) [L. S.]

MINOTAURUS (Μινώταυρος), a monster with a human body and a bull's head, or, according to others, with the body of an ox and a human head; is said to have been the offspring of the intercourse of Pasiphaë with the bull sent from the sea to Minos, who shut him up in the Cnossian labyrinth, and fed him with the bodies of the youths and maidens whom the Athenians at fixed times were obliged to send to Minos as tribute. The monster was slain by Theseus. It was often represented by ancient artists either alone in the labyrinth, or engaged in the struggle with Theseus. (Paus. i. 24. § 2, 27, in fin. iii. 18. § 7; Apollod. iii. 1. § 4, 15. § 8.) [L. S.]

MINTANOR, the author of a lost treatise on music. (Fulgent. Mythol. i. 1; Schol. ad Stat. Theb. iii. 661.) [C. P. M.]

MINTHA or MENTHA (Μίνθη), a Corythian nymph, and beloved by Hades, was metamorphosed by Demeter or Persephone into a plant called after her μίνθη, or mint, or, according to others, she was changed into dust, from which Hades caused the mint plant to grow forth. In the neighbourhood of Pylos there was a hill called after her, and at its foot there was a temple of Pluto, and a grove of Demeter. (Strab. viii. p. 344; Ov. Met. x. 729; Oppian, Hal. iii. 486; Schol. ad Nicom. Alex. 374.) [L. S.]

MINUCIA, one of the Vestal priestesses in A. C. 337. Her passion for gay attire made her conduct suspected. On inquiry, suspicion was justified, and Minucia was buried alive. (Liv. viii. 15.) [W. B. D.]

MINUCIA GENS was originally, in some of its branches at least, patrician [AUGURINUS]; but more frequently occurs in history as a plebeian house. Its principal cognomens were AUGURINUS, BASILIUS, RUFUS, and THERMUS. Minicius and Municius are frequently confounded with Minucius. The following coin of the Minucia gens bears on the obverse the head of Pallas, and on the reverse Jupiter in a chariot hurling a thunder-bolt, with the legend L. MINUCIUS. Who this L. Minucius was is unknown. [W. B. D.]

COIN OF MINUCIA GENS.

MINUCIANUS (Μινουκίανος). 1. A Greek rhetorician, was a contemporary of the celebrated rhetorician Hermogenes of Tarsus (fl. A. D. 170), with whom he was at variance. This we learn from the Scholiast on Hermogenes, and thus the difficulty which Fabricius experienced (Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 107), is removed, as it is evident that this Minucianus was a different person from the one following. (Schol. ad Hermog. pp. 26, 48, 49, 71, 77, 99, 177, 179, 180, 181, 200, 287; comp. Schol. ad Aphth. p. 226, Spengel; Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 95, n. 10.)

2. An Athenian, the son of Nicagoras, was also a Greek rhetorician, and lived in the reign of Gallienus (A. D. 260–268). Suidas (s. v.) tells us that Minucianus was the author of Τέχνη ῥητορικῆ, Περὶ ὑπομνήματα, and Λογοὶ διδασκαλίας. The Τέχνη was commented on by the sophist Pancratius (Suidas, s. v. Πανκράτης; Eudoc. p. 301), and is also referred to by Tzetzes (Chil. iv. 693, vi. 739, xii. 570), but, as Westermann suggests, it may have been written by the elder Minucianus [No. 1]. A portion of this work, entitled Περὶ ἐκτελεσμάτων, is extant, and bears the title Μινουκίανου ἢ Νικαγόρου. It was published along with Alexander Numenius and Phoebeammon, accompanied with a Latin version, by L. Normann, Upsal. 1690, 8vo., and is also printed in the Aldine collection of Greek rhetoricians, pp. 731–734, and in the ninth volume of Wals's Rhetores Graeci. The work of Minucianus, entitled Περὶ ὑπομνήματα, was commented on by Menander of Laodicea (Suidas, s. v. Μενανδρῆς). The eloquence of Minucianus is praised by Himerius. (Ed. vii. p. 166, Or. xxiii. p. 802, ed. Wernsdorf; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. pp. 107, 108; Westermann, Ibid. § 98, n. 15.)

MINUCIANUS, CORNELIUS, a friend and neighbour of the younger Pliny, who calls him "ornamentum regionis meae, seu dignitate, seu moribus," and speaks of him in other very laudatory terms in a letter addressed to Falco, in which he requests the latter to confer the rank of military tribune upon Minucianus (Ep. vii. 22). Three of Pliny's letters (iii. 9, iv. 11, viii. 12) are addressed to this Minucianus.

MINUCIUS. 1. M. MINUCIUS, tribune of the plebs in A. C. 401, when he impeached two of the consular tribunes of the preceding year for misconduct in the war with Veii. (Liv. v. 11, 12.)

2. M. MINUCIUS FASSUA, one of the first augurs elected from the plebs after the extension of the law of Sacerdotii in A. C. 300, by the tribunes Q. and Cn. Ogulnius. (Liv. x. 9.)

3. Q. MINUCIUS, was legatus to the consul, M. Claudius Marcellus, during the siege of Capua, B. C. 210. (Liv. xxvi. 38.)

4. P. and Q. MINUCII, legionary tribunes in the war of Rome with the Boian Gauls in A. C. 193. (Liv. xxxv. 5.)

5. L. MINUCIUS, legatus of the praetor Q. Fulvius Flaccus in the nearer Spain, A. C. 180. His evidence as to the state of the province when examined by the senate differed from the account given by the praetor. (Liv. xl. 35, 36.)

6. TIB. MINUCIUS, praetor peregrinus in A. C. 180, died early in his official year. (Liv. xl. 35, 37.)

7. — MINUCIUS, died intestate before the city-praetorship of C. Verres, in A. C. 75–74. His property therefore belonged to his gens; but Verres issued a special edict regarding it, which Cicero held up to ridicule (i. Ver. i. 45, § 115).

8. CN. MINUCIUS, a person about whose political opinions Cicero wrote to Cornificus in A. C. 43 (ad Fam. xii. 25). [W. B. D.]

MINUCIUS FELIX. [FELIX.]

MINUCIUS NATALIS. [NATALIS.]

MINUCIUS PACATUS. [IRENABOR, No. 3.]

MINYAE (Μινυαί), an ancient race of heroes at Orchomenos, Iolcos, and other places. Their ancestral hero, Minyas, is said to have migrated from Thessaly into the northern parts of Boeotia, and there to have established the powerful race of the Minyans, with the capital of Orchomenos. As the greater part of the Argonauts were descended from the Minyans, they are themselves called Minyae; and the descendants of the Argonauts founded a colony in Lemnos, which was called Minyae. Thence they proceeded to Elis Triphylia, and to the island of Thera. (Herod. i. 146, iv. 145; Pind. Ol. xiv. 4, Pyth. iv. 69; Apollon. Rhod. i. 229; Strab. ix. pp. 404, 414, viii. pp. 337, 347; Paus. vii. 2. § 2, ix. 36; comp. Müller, Orchomen. a. d. Minyer.) [L. S.]

MINYAS (Μινύας), a son of Chryseas, and the ancestral hero of the race of the Minyans; but the accounts of his genealogy vary very much in the different traditions, for some call him a son of Orchomenos or Etocles, others of Poseidon, Alecta, Ares, Sisypheus, or Halmaus. He is further called the husband of Tritogeneia, Clytomena, or Pheneas. Orchomenus, Prebon, Athamas, Dioclethas, Etoclymene, Periclymene, Leucippe, Armines, and Alcithoe, are mentioned as his children. (Paus. ix. 36. § 3, &c., 38. § 2; Schol. ad Apollon Rhod. i. 230, ad Pind. Ol. xiv. 5, Pyth. iv. 126; Tzet. ad Lyc. 875.) He is said to have built the first treasury, of which ruins are said to be still extant. (Paus. ix. 38. § 2.) His tomb was shown at Orchomenos in Boeotia (ix. 38. § 3). [L. S.]

MISA (Μίσα), a mystic being in the Orphic mysteries, perhaps the same as Cybele, or an attribute of her. (Orph. Hymn. 41; Hesych. s. v. Μισαρίς.) [L. S.]

MISAGENES, a Numidian, son of Masinissa, was appointed by his father to command the fleet which he sent to the assistance of the Romans in the war against Perseus, A. C. 171. He appears to have continued in this position throughout the four years of the war, and to have rendered important services to his allies. After the close of the war (B.C. 168) he was sent back by Aemilius Paullus to Africa; but the ships in which his troops were embarked were dispersed by a storm, many of them wrecked, and he himself compelled to take refuge at Brundisium. Here he was received with the utmost distinction, the quaestor, L. Stertinus, being immediately despatched by the senate to bear him magnificent presents, and to provide both him and his troops with all that they required. (Liv. xiii. 29, 35, xiv. 14; Val. Max. v. 1. § 1, who writes the name Musicanæa.) He probably died before his father, as we hear nothing of him after the death of Masinissa. [E. H. B.]

MISENUS (Μισνός). 1. A companion of Odysseus. (Strab. i. p. 26, v. p. 245.)

2. A steerman of Aeneas (Vict. De Orig. Gent. Rom. 9), and, according to Virgil, at first a companion of Hector, and afterwards trumpeter of Aeneas; he died at Cumæ, where Cape Misenum derived its name from him. (Virg. Aen. vi. 162, &c. 235.) His being called Ascleides arose from the legendary connection between the Aæolian and Campanian Cumæ. [L. S.]

MISITHEUS, called TIMESICLES (Τιμοσικλης) by Zosimus (i. 16, 17), apparently a Greek, by extraction at least, was distinguished for learning, eloquence, and virtue, and his daughter Sabinia Tranquillina became the wife of the third Gordian. That amiable prince appointed his father-in-law præfect of the prætorians, and acting in obedience to his wise counsels, effected many important reforms in the royal household, more especially by discarding the eunuchs, who, since the days of Elagabalus, had exercised most foul and corrupt influence in the palace, being notoriously in the habit of disposing of all the highest appointments, both civil and military, to the best bidder. The admirable arrangements for the support of the imperial troops on the exposed frontiers, the judicious regulations introduced with regard to various details in the service, and the success which attended the operations in the East against Sapor, until Misitheus was cut off by disease, or by the treachery of his successor Philippus, seem to indicate that he must have been trained as a soldier and accustomed to important commands, but we know nothing positively of his early history. Even his name, as it stands repeatedly in Capitolinus, is a matter of doubt, for scholars have, not without reason, hesitated to believe that such an ill-omened appellation (God-hater) could ever have been borne by any individual of eminence, in an age when superstition upon such points was so strong. The inscription (Gruter, cccxxxix. 4) quoted to uphold the text of the Augustan historian, but which seems in reality to have been copied from his pages, is open to strong suspicion, in addition to which Zosimus, as we have marked above, twice terms this personage Τιμοσικλης. Among various conjectures, the substitution of Timasitheus, a name found both in Herodotus and Xenophon, and, under its Doric form, Timasitheus, in Livy and Valerius Maximus, seems to be the most probable. (Capitolin. Gordian. Tres, 23, &c.; GORDIANUS III.; PHILIPPUS I.) [W. R.]

and Ὀφθαλμὸς Τρελίας. The latter is also referred to by Plato (Gorg. p. 518, b.). [C. P. M.]

MITHRAS (Μίθρας), the god of the sun among the Persians. (Xenoph. Cyrop. vii. 5. § 55; Strab. xv. p. 732.) About the time of the Roman emperors his worship was introduced at Rome, and thence spread over all parts of the empire. The god is commonly represented as a handsome youth, wearing the Phrygian cap and attire, and kneeling on a bull which is thrown on the ground, and whose throat he is cutting. The bull is at the same time attacked by a dog, a serpent, and a scorpion. This group appears frequently among ancient works of art, and a fine specimen is preserved in the British Museum. [L. S.]

MITHRE'NES (Μιθρήνης) or MITHRI'NES (Μιθρίνης), commander of the Persian force which garrisoned the citadel of Sardes. After the battle of the Granicus (B.C. 334) Mithrines surrendered voluntarily to Alexander, and was treated by him with great distinction. After the battle of Gaugamela (B.C. 331) Alexander appointed him satrap of Armenia. (Arrian, i. 17, iii. 16.) [C. P. M.]

MITHRIDATES or MITHRADATES (Μιθρίδατης or Μιθραδάτης), a common name among the Medes and Persians, appears to have been derived from Mitra or Mithra, the Persian name for the sun, and the root da, signifying "to give," which occurs in most of the Indo-Germanic languages. It therefore signifies "given by the sun," and corresponds to a large class of names in different languages of the Indo-Germanic family. Thus in Sanskrit we find the names, Devadatta, Haradatta, Indradatta, Somadatta, &c. (i. e. given by the gods, by Hara or Siva, by Indra, by Soma or the moon, &c.); in Greek, the names Theodotus, Diodotus, Zenodotus, Herodotus, &c.; and in Persian, the names, Hormisdades, "given by Ormuzd," Pherendates, "given by Behram," &c.

The name of Mithridates is written in several ways. Mithridates is the form usually found in the Greek historians; but on coins, and sometimes in writers, we find Mithradates, which is probably the more correct form. We also meet with Mitradates (Μιτράδατης, Herod. i. 110), and in Tacitus (Ann. xii. 10) a corrupted form Meherdates. (Pott, Etymologische Forschungen, vol. i. p. xlvii. &c.; Rosen, in Journal of Education, vol. ix. pp. 334, 335.)

MITHRIDATES (Μιθρίδατης). 1. An eunuch who was one of the personal attendants of Xerxes, and enjoyed a high place in the favour of that monarch, but joined with Artabanus in the conspiracy to assassinate him (B.C. 465), and enabled the latter to effect his purpose by giving him admission into the king's bedroom. (Diod. xi. 69.)

2. A Persian of high rank, who accompanied the younger Cyrus on his expedition against Artaxerxes. He is termed by Xenophon one of the most attached friends of that prince; but after the death of Cyrus he went over together with Ariæus, to the Persian king. He was one of those who presented themselves to the Greeks after the arrest and death of their generals, and endeavoured to prevail on them to surrender their arms. He again made his appearance just as they were preparing to set out on their march, and held a private conference with their leaders, but failed in the attempt to induce them to abandon their project. The next day he consequently attacked them on their march and caused them some loss; but was repulsed in a subsequent attack, and from this time suffered them to proceed unmolested. (Xen. Anab. ii. 5. § 35, iii. 3. §§ 1—10, 4. §§ 1—5.)

3. Satrap of Lycania and Cappadocia at the time of the expedition of the younger Cyrus (Xen. Anab. vii. 8. § 25). This may perhaps be the same person with the preceding, whom Eckhel also conceives to be the same as is commonly termed Mithridates I., king of Pontus.

4. A son of Antiochus the Great, who is mentioned by Livy as one of the commanders of his father's land forces during the war with Ptolemy, B. C. 197. (Livy xxxiii. 19.)

5. A Persian of high rank, and son-in-law of Darius Codomannus, who was slain by Alexander with his own hand, at the battle of the Granicus, B. C. 334. (Arrian, Anab. i. 15. § 10, 16. § 5.)

6. A nephew of Antiochus the Great, being a son of one of his sisters. (Polyb. viii. 25.)

7. A son of Ariarathes IV., king of Cappadocia, who succeeded his father on the throne, and assumed the name of Ariarathes V. [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDATES, king of ARMENIA. [ARSACIDÆ, Vol. I. p. 362, b.]

COIN OF MITHRIDATES, KING OF ARMENIA

MITHRIDATES, king of the Bosphorus, which sovereignty he obtained by the favour of the emperor Claudius, who appointed him to replace Polemon II., A. D. 41. (Dion Cass. lx. 8.) He was a descendant of the great Mithridates, but we have no account of his more immediate parentage. Nor do we know any thing of the circumstances which led to his subsequent expulsion by the Romans, who placed his younger brother Cotys on the throne in his stead; for these events were related by Tacitus in one of the books of the Annals now lost. But Mithridates, though a fugitive from his kingdom, did not abandon all hope: he collected a body of irregular troops, with which he expelled the king of the Dandarians; and, as soon as the main body of the Roman troops were withdrawn from the Bosphorus, he prepared to invade that kingdom. He was however defeated by the Roman lieutenant Julius Aquila, supported by Eunones, king of the Scythian tribe of the Adorsi, and ultimately compelled to surrender to Eunones, by whom he was given up to the Romans, but with a promise that his life should be spared. (Tac. Ann. xii. 15—21; Plin. vi. 5.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDATES, kings of COMMAGENE. There were two kings of Commagene of this name, of whom very little is known. The first (Mithridates I.) must have succeeded Antiochus I. on the throne of that petty kingdom at some time previous to B. C. 31, as he is mentioned by Plutarch in that year among the allies of Antony. (Plut. Ant. 61.)

Mithridates II. was made king of Commagene by Augustus, B. C. 20, when a mere boy. Dion Cassius tells us that his father had been put to death by the previous king: hence it seems probable that he was a son of the preceding. (Dion Cass.

liv. 9. See, however, Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 343, not h, who has brought together the few facts that are known concerning these kings of Commagene.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDATES, king of MEDIA (by which we are probably to understand Media Atropatene), was the son-in-law of Tigranes I., king of Armenia, whom he supported in his war against the Romans. His name indeed is only once mentioned in the last campaign against Lucullus, B. C. 67 (Dion Cass. xxxv. 14), but there can be little doubt that he is the third monarch alluded to by Plutarch, as present together with Mithridates the Great and Tigranes, when they were defeated by Lucullus at the river Arsanias in the preceding year. (Plut. Lucull. 31.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDATES I. II. III., kings of Parthia. [ARSACIDÆ VI. IX. XIII. Vol. I. pp. 354—356.]

MITHRIDATES (Μιθριδάτης) of PARSAGART was the son of Menodotus, a citizen of that place, by a daughter of Adobogion, a descendant of the tetrarchs of Galatia, but his mother having had an amour with Mithridates the Great, he was generally looked upon as in reality the son of that monarch. To this supposition the king himself lent some countenance by the care he bestowed on his education, having taken him into his own court and camp, where the young man was trained in all kinds of military exercises and studies. (Strab. xiii. p. 625; Hirt. de B. Alex. 78.) His natural abilities, united to his illustrious birth, raised him to a high place in the estimation of his countrymen, and he appears as early as B. C. 64 to have exercised the chief control over the affairs of his native city. (Cic. pro Flacc. 7; Schol. Rob. ad loc.) At a subsequent period he was fortunate enough to obtain the favour and even personal friendship of Caesar, who, at the commencement of the Alexandrian war (B. C. 48), sent him into Syria and Cilicia to raise auxiliary forces. This service he performed with zeal and alacrity, and having assembled a large body of troops advanced by land upon Egypt, and by a sudden attack made himself master of Pelusium, though that important fortress had been strongly garrisoned by Achillas. But he was opposed at the passage of the Nile by the Egyptian army commanded by Ptolemy in person, and compelled to apply to Caesar for assistance. The dictator hastened to his support by sea, and, landing at the mouth of the Nile, united his forces with those of Mithridates, and immediately afterwards totally defeated the Egyptian king in a decisive action which put an end to the war. (Hirt. de B. Alex. 26—32; Dion Cass. xlii. 41—43; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 8. § 1—3, B. J. i. 9. § 3—5.) It is probable that he afterwards accompanied Caesar on his campaign against Pharnaces, as immediately after the defeat of that monarch, Caesar bestowed his kingdom of the Bosphorus upon Mithridates, on whom he conferred at the same time the tetrarchy of the Galatians that had been previously held by Deiotarus, to which he had so hereditary claim. (Hirt. de B. Alex. 78; Strab. xiii. p. 625; Dion Cass. xlii. 48; Appian, Mithr. 121; Cic. Phil. ii. 37, de Divin. ii. 37.) But the kingdom of the Bosphorus still remained to be won, the title being all that it was really in the power of Caesar to bestow, for Asander, who had revolted against Pharnaces and put him to death on his return to his own dominions, was in fact master of the whole country, and Mithridates having soon after attempted to establish himself in his new sovereignty and expel Asander, was defeated and slain. (Strab. l. c.; Dion Cass. xlii. 48, xlvii. 26.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDATES, kings of PONTUS. The first of these, however, was not really an independent monarch, but merely a satrap under the Persian king; and it would be more correct to omit him in the enumeration, and reckon the one who comes next in order as Mithridates I.; but the ordinary practice has been here followed for convenience. The kings of Pontus claimed to be lineally descended from one of the seven Persians who had conspired against the Magi, and who was subsequently established by Darius Hystaspes in the government of the countries bordering on the Euxine Sea. (Polyb. v. 43; Diod. xix. 40; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Illust. 76.) They also asserted their descent from the royal house of the Achæmenides, to which the kings of Persia belonged, but we know not how they made out this part of their pedigree. Very little is known of their history until after the fall of the Persian empire.

MITHRIDATES I., son of Ariobarzanes (probably of the first prince of that name), is mentioned by Xenophon (Cyr. viii. 8. § 4) as having betrayed his father, and the same circumstance is alluded to by Aristotle (Pol. v. 10). Eckhel supposes him to be the same with the Mithridates who accompanied the younger Cyrus, but there is certainly no proof of this. He may, however, be the same with the Mithridates mentioned by Xenophon (Anab. vii. 8. § 25) as satrap of Cappadocia and Lyconia. It appears that he was dead before B. C. 363, when Ariobarzanes II. made himself master of the countries which had been subject to his rule. (Diod. xv. 90.)

MITHRIDATES II., son of Ariobarzanes II., whom he succeeded on the throne in B. C. 337. (Diod. xvi. 90.) He is frequently called ὁ κτιστής, as having been the founder of the independent kingdom of Pontus, and ought certainly to be distinguished as Mithridates I. According to Appian (Mithr. 112) he was eighth in descent from the first satrap of Pontus under Darius Hystaspes, and sixth in ascending order from Mithridates the Great. (Ibid. 9; see Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 423.) Diodorus assigns him a reign of thirty-five years, but it appears certain that he did not hold uninterrupted possession of the sovereignty during that period. What circumstances led to his expulsion or subjection we know not; indeed we meet with no farther notice of him from the date of his accession already mentioned until some time after the death of Alexander, when we find him attending, apparently in a private, or at least subordinate, capacity, upon the court and camp of Antigonus. Probably he had been compelled to submit to the Macedonian yoke at the time that Cappadocia was conquered by Perdicaæ, B. C. 322. He seems to have enjoyed a high place in the favour and confidence of Antigonus, until that potentate, alarmed at a dream he had had, foretelling the future greatness of Mithridates, was induced to form the project of putting him to death. Mithridates, however, received from Demetrius timely notice of his father's intentions, and fled with a few followers to Paphlagonia, where he occupied a strong fortress, called Ciminda, and being joined by numerous bodies of troops from different quarters, gradually extended his dominion over the neighbouring countries, and thus became the founder of the kingdom of Pontus. (Appian, Mithr. 9; Strab. xii. p. 562; Plut. Demetr. 4.) The period of the flight of Mithridates is uncertain, but it must have taken place as early as 318, as we find him at the close of 317 supporting Eumenes in the war against Antigonus. (Diod. xix. 40.) From this time we hear no more of him till his death in B. C. 302, but it appears that he had submitted again to at least a nominal subjection to Antigonus, who now procured his assassination, to prevent him from joining the league of Cassander and his confederates. He seems, however, to have before this established himself firmly in his kingdom, in which he was succeeded without opposition by his son Mithridates. (Diod. xx. 111; Appian, Mithr. 9.) According to Lucian (Macrob. 13), he was not less than eighty-four years of age at the time of his death, which renders it not improbable, as suggested by Clinton (F. H. iii. p. 422), that he is the same as the Mithridates, son of Ariobarzanes, who in his youth circumvented and put to death Datames. [DATAMES.] Plutarch is clearly in error when he calls him a young man at the time of his flight, and a contemporary of Demetrius. (See Clinton, l. c., and Droysen, Hellenism. tom. i. p. 44, 298.)

MITHRIDATES III., son of the preceding, whom he succeeded on the throne in B. C. 302. He is said to have added largely to the dominions inherited from his father, by the acquisition of great part of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia, but whether by conquest or by the cessation of the Macedonian rulers of Asia does not appear. (Diod. xx. 111.) In B. C. 281 we find him concluding an alliance with the Heracleans, to protect them against Seileucus (Memnon, c. 11, ed. Orell.); and at a subsequent period, availing himself of the services of the Gauls, then lately settled in Asia, to overthrow a force sent against him by Ptolemy, king of Egypt. (Steph. Byz. c. Ἀντιόχεια.) These are the only events recorded of his reign, which lasted thirty-six years. He was succeeded by his son Ariobarzanes III.

MITHRIDATES IV., grandson of the preceding, was the son and successor of Ariobarzanes III. He was a minor at the death of his father, but the period of his accession cannot be determined. Clinton places it as low as 242 or 240 B. C., while Droysen (Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 355) carries it back nearly to 258. It seems probable that it must be placed considerably before 240, as Memnon tells us that he was a child at his father's death, and he had a daughter of marriageable age in 222. Shortly after his accession his kingdom was invaded by the Gauls, who were, however, repulsed. (Memnon, c. 24, ed. Orell.) After he had attained to manhood he married a sister of Seleucus Callinicus, with whom he is said to have received the province of Phrygia as a dowry. (Euseb. Arm. p. 164; Justin. xxxviii. 5.) But notwithstanding this alliance, we find him, during the war between Seleucus and Antiochus Hierax, taking part against the former, whom he defeated in a great battle, in which Seleucus lost 20,000 of his troops, and narrowly escaped with his own life. (Euseb. Arm. p. 165.) In B. C. 222, Mithridates gave his daughter Laodice in marriage to Antiochus III.: another of his daughters, also named Laodice, was married about the same time to Achæus, the cousin of Antiochus. (Polyb. v. 43, 74, viii. 22.) In B. C. 220 Mithridates made war upon the wealthy and powerful city of Sinope, but it appears that he was unable to reduce it, and it did not fall into the power of the kings of Pontus until long afterwards. (Id. iv. 56.) At an earlier period we find him vying with the other monarchs of Asia in sending magnificent presents to the Rhodians, after the subversion of their city by an earthquake. (Id. v. 90.) The date of his death is unknown, but Clinton assigns it conjecturally to about B. C. 190. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces. [PHARNACES I.]

MITHRIDATES V., surnamed EUERGETES, was the son of Pharnaces I. and grandson of the preceding. (Justin. xxxviii. 5; Clinton. F. H. vol. iii. p. 426.) The period of his accession is wholly uncertain; we only know that he was on the throne in B. C. 154, when he is mentioned as sending an auxiliary force to the assistance of Attalus II. against Prusias, king of Bithynia. (Polyb. xxxiii. 10.) But as much as twenty-five years before (B. C. 179), his name is associated with that of his father in the treaty concluded by Pharnaces with Eumenes, in a manner that would lead one to suppose he was already admitted to some share in the sovereign power. (Polyb. xxvi. 6.) He was the first of the kings of Pontus who entered into a regular alliance with the Romans, whom he supported with some ships and a small auxiliary force during the third Punic war. (Appian, Mithr. 10.) At a subsequent period he rendered them more efficient assistance in the war against Aristonicus (B. C. 131—129), and for his services on this occasion was rewarded by the consul M. Aquilius with the province of Phrygia. The acts of Aquilius were rescinded by the senate on the ground of bribery, but it appears that Mithridates continued in possession of Phrygia till his death. (Justin. xxvii. 1, xxxviii. 5; Appian, Mithr. 12, 56, 57; Oros. v. 10; Eutrop. iv. 20, who, however, confounds him with his son.) The close of his reign can only be determined approximately, from the statements concerning the accession of his son, which assign it to the year 120. He was assassinated at Sinope by a conspiracy among his own immediate attendants. (Strab. x. p. 477.)

MITHRIDATES VI., surnamed EUPATOR, and also DIONYSUS, but more commonly known by the name of THE GREAT (a title which is not, however, bestowed on him by any ancient historian), was the son and successor of the preceding. We have no precise statement of the year of his birth, and great discrepancies occur in those concerning his age and the duration of his reign. Strabo, who was likely to be well informed in regard to the history of his native country, affirms that he was eleven years old at the period of his accession (x. p. 477), and this statement agrees with the account of Appian, that he was sixty-eight or sixty-nine years old at the time of his death, of which he had reigned fifty-seven. Memnon, on the other hand (c. 30, ed. Orrell), makes him thirteen at the time when he ascended the throne, and Dion Cassius (xxv. 9) calls him above seventy years old in B. C. 68, which would make him at least seventy-five at his death, but this last account is certainly erroneous. If Appian's statement concerning the length of his reign be correct, we may place his accession in B. C. 120.

We have very imperfect information concerning the earlier years of his reign, as indeed during the whole period which preceded his wars with the Romans; and much of what has been transmitted to us wears a very suspicious, if not fabulous, aspect. According to Justin, unfortunately our chief authority for the events of this period, both the year of his birth and that of his accession were marked by the appearance of comets of portentous magnitude. The same author tells us that immediately on ascending the throne he found himself assailed by the designs of his guardians (perhaps some of those who had conspired against his father's life), but that he succeeded in eluding all their machinations, partly by displaying a courage and address in warlike exercises beyond his years, partly by the use of antidotes against poison, to which he began thus early to accustom himself. In order to evade the designs formed against his life, he also devoted much of his time to hunting, and took refuge in the remotest and most unfrequented regions, under pretence of pursuing the pleasures of the chase. (Justin. xxxvii. 2.) Whatever truth there may be in these accounts, it is certain that when he attained to manhood, and assumed in person the administration of his kingdom, he was not only endowed with consummate skill in all martial exercises, and possessed of a bodily frame insured to all hardships, as well as a spirit to brave every danger, but his naturally vigorous intellect had been improved by careful culture. As a boy he had been brought up at Sinope, where he had probably received the elements of a Greek education; and so powerful was his memory, that he is said to have learnt not less than twenty-five languages, and to have been able in the days of his greatest power to transact business with the deputies of every tribe subject to his rule in their own peculiar dialect. (Justin. l. c.; Plin. H. N. xxv. 2; A. Gell. xvii. 17; Val. Max. viii. 7, ext. 16; Strab. xii. p. 545.)

The first steps of his career, like those of most Eastern despots, were marked by blood. He is said to have established himself in the possession of the sovereign power by the death of his mother, to whom a share in the royal authority had been left by Mithridates Euergetes; and this was followed by the assassination of his brother. (Memnon, c. 30; Appian, Mithr. 112.) As soon as he had by these means established himself firmly on the throne of Pontus (under which name was comprised also a part of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia), he began to turn his arms against the neighbouring nations. On the West, however, his progress was hemmed in by the power of Rome, and the minor sovereigns of Bithynia and Cappadocia enjoyed the all-powerful protection of that republic. But on the East his ambition found free scope. He subdued the barbarian tribes in the interior, between the Euxine and the confines of Armenia, including the whole of Colchis and the province called Lesser Armenia (which was ceded to him by its ruler Antipater), and even extended his conquests beyond the Caucasus, where he reduced to subjection some of the wild Scythian tribes that bordered on the Tanais. The fame of his arms and the great extension of his power led Parades, king of the Bosphorus, as well as the Greek cities of Chersonesus and Olbia, to place themselves under his protection, in order to obtain his assistance against the barbarians of the North—the Sarmatians and Roxolani. Mithridates entrusted the conduct of this war to his generals Diophantus and Neoptolemus, whose efforts were crowned with complete success: they carried their victorious arms from the Tanais to the Tyras, totally defeated the Roxolani, and rendered the whole of the Tauric Chersonese tributary to the kingdom of Pontus. A fortress called the tower of Neoptolemus, at the mouth of the river Tyras (Dniester), probably marks the extreme limit of his conquests in that direction; but he is said to have entered into friendly relations with and possessed much influence over the Getae and other wild tribes, as far as the borders of Thrace and Macedonia. After the death of Pariasades, the kingdom of Bosphorus itself was incorporated with his dominions. (Strab. vii. p. 306, 307, 309—312, xi. p. 499, xii. p. 540, 541, 555; Appian, Mithr. 15; Memnon, c. 30; Justin. xxxvii. 3; Niebuhr, KL Schrift. p. 388—390.)

While he was thus extending his own sovereignty, he did not neglect to strengthen himself by forming alliances with his more powerful neighbours, especially with Tigranes, king of Armenia, to whom he gave his daughter Cleopatra in marriage, as well as with the warlike nations of the Parthians and Iberians. He thus found himself in possession of such great power and extensive resources, that he began to deem himself equal to a contest with Rome itself. Many causes of dissension had already arisen between them, and the Romans had given abundant proofs of the jealousy with which they regarded the rising greatness of Mithridates, but that monarch had hitherto avoided an open rupture with the republic. Shortly after his accession they had taken advantage of his minority to wrest from him the province of Phrygia, which had been bestowed by Aquilius upon his father. (Justin. xxxviii. 5; Appian, Mithr. ii. 57.) At a subsequent period also they had interposed to prevent him from making himself master of Paphlagonia, to which kingdom he claimed to be entitled by the will of the last monarch. (Justin. xxxvii. 4.) On both these occasions Mithridates submitted to the imperious mandates of Rome; but he was far from disposed to acquiesce permanently in the arrangements thus forced upon him for a time; and it can hardly be doubted that he was already aiming at the conquest of the neighbouring states which enjoyed the protection of the Roman republic, with a view to make himself master of the whole of Asia. Cappadocia above all appears to have been the constant object of his ambition, as it had indeed been that of the kings of Pontus from a very early period. Ariarathes VI., king of that country, had married Laodice, the sister of Mithridates, notwithstanding which, the latter procured his assassination, through the agency of one Gordius. His design was probably to remove his infant nephews also, and unite Cappadocia to his own dominions; but Laodice having thrown herself upon the protection of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, he turned his arms against that monarch, whom he expelled from Cappadocia, and set up Ariarathes, one of the sons of Laodice, and his own nephew, as king of the country. But it was not long before he found a cause of quarrel with the young man whom he had thus established, in consequence of which he invaded his dominions with a large army, and having invited him to a conference, assassinated him with his own hand. He now placed an infant son of his own, on whom he had bestowed the name of Ariarathes, upon the throne of Cappadocia, but the people rose in rebellion, and set up the second son of Ariarathes VI.

as their sovereign. Mithridates hereupon invaded Cappadocia again, and drove out this new competitor, who died shortly after. But the Roman senate now interfered, and appointed a Cappadocian named Ariobarzanes to be king of that country (B. C. 93). Mithridates did not venture openly to oppose this nomination, but he secretly instigated Tigranes, king of Armenia, to invade Cappadocia, and expel Ariobarzanes. The latter, being wholly unable to cope with the power of Tigranes, immediately fled to Rome; and Sulla, who was at the time praetor in Cilicia, was appointed to reinstate him, B. C. 92. Mithridates took no part in preventing this; and clearly as all things were in fact tending to a rupture between him and Rome, he still continued nominally to enjoy the friendship and alliance of the Roman people which had been bestowed by treaty upon his father. (Justin. xxxviii. 1—3; Appian, Mithr. 10, 12, 14; Memnon, c. 30; Plut. Sull. 5.) But this state of things did not last long; and the death of Nicomedes II., king of Bithynia, by opening a new field to the ambition of Mithridates, at length brought matters to a crisis. That monarch was succeeded by his eldest son Nicomedes III., but Mithridates took the opportunity, on what pretext we know not, to set up a rival claimant in the person of Socrates, a younger brother of Nicomedes, whose pretensions he supported with an army, and quickly drove Nicomedes out of Bithynia, B. C. 90. It appears to have been about the same time that he openly invaded Cappadocia, and for the second time expelled Ariobarzanes from his kingdom, establishing his own son Ariarathes in his place. Both the fugitive princes had recourse to Rome, where they found ready support: a decree was passed that Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes should be restored to their respective kingdoms, and the execution of it was confided to two consular legates, the chief of whom was M. Aquilius, while L. Cassius, who commanded in the Roman province of Asia, was ordered to support them with what forces he had at his disposal. (Appian, Mithr. 10, 11, 13; Justin. xxxviii. 3, 5; Memnon, c. 30; Liv. Epit. lxxiv.)

It is not very easy to understand or account for the conduct of Mithridates at this period, as related to us in the very imperfect accounts which we possess. It seems probable that he was emboldened to make these direct attacks upon the allies of Rome by the knowledge that the arms of the republic were sufficiently occupied at home by the Social War, which was now devastating Italy. But, although that war did in fact prevent the Romans from rendering any efficient support to the monarchs whose cause they had espoused, Mithridates offered no opposition to their proceedings, but yielded once more, as it would seem, to the very name of Rome, and allowed the consular legates and L. Cassius, at the head of a few cohorts only, to reinstate both Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes. He even went so far as to put to death Socrates, whom he had himself incited to lay claim to the throne of Bithynia, and who now, when expelled by the Romans, naturally sought refuge at his court. (Appian, Mithr. 11; Justin. xxxviii. 5.) Yet about this time we are told, that ambassadors having been sent to him by the Italian allies that were in arms against Rome to court his alliance, he promised to co-operate with them, when he had first expelled the Romans from Asia. (Diod.

xxxvii. Esc. Phot. p. 540.) It is difficult to judge whether he was really meditating a war with Rome, but did not yet consider his preparations sufficiently advanced to commence the contest, or was desirous by a show of moderation to throw upon the Romans the odium of forcing on the war. If the latter were his object, his measures were certainly not ill chosen; for it is clear even from the accounts transmitted to us, that whatever may have been the secret designs of Mithridates, the immediate occasion of the war arose from acts of aggression and injustice on the part of the Romans and their allies.

No sooner was Nicomedes replaced on the throne of Bithynia than he was urged by the Roman legates to invade the territories of Mithridates, into which he made a predatory incursion as far as Amastris. Mithridates offered no resistance, but sent Pelopidas to the Romans to demand satisfaction, and it was not until his ambassador was sent away with an evasive answer that he prepared for immediate hostilities, B. C. 88. (Appian, Mithr. 11—15.) His first step was to invade Cappadocia, from which he easily expelled Ariobarzanes for the third time. Shortly afterwards his two generals, Neoptolemus and Archelaus, advanced against Bithynia with an army of 250,000 foot and 40,000 horse. They were met by Nicomedes, supported by the presence of the Roman legate Aquilius and Mancinus, with such forces as they had been able to raise in Asia, but with very few Roman troops, on the banks of the river Amneius in Paphlagonia, when a great battle ensued, which terminated in the complete victory of the generals of Mithridates. Nicomedes fled from the field, and, abandoning Bithynia without another blow, took refuge at Pergamus. Aquilius was closely pursued by Neoptolemus, compelled to fight at disadvantage, and again defeated; and Mithridates, following up his advantage, not only made himself master of Phrygia and Galatia, but invaded the Roman province of Asia. Here the universal discontent of the inhabitants, caused by the oppression of the Roman governors, enabled him to overrun the whole province almost without opposition: the Roman officers, who had imprudently brought this danger upon themselves, were unable to collect any forces to oppose the progress of Mithridates, and two of them, Q. Oppius and Aquilius himself, the chief author of the war, fell into the hands of the king of Pontus. (Appian, Mithr. 15—21; Memnon, 31; Justin. xxxviii. 3; Liv. Epit. lxxvi. lxxvii. lxxviii.; Oros. vi. 2; Eutrop. v. 5; Flor. iii. 6; Strab. xii. p. 562.)

These events took place in the summer and autumn of B. C. 88; before the close of that year they were known at Rome, and Sulla was appointed to take the command in the war which was now inevitable. Meanwhile, Mithridates continued his military operations in Asia, with a view to make himself master of the whole of that country before the Romans were prepared to attack him. All the cities of the main land except Magnesia and some of those of Lycia had opened their gates to him; but the important islands of Cos and Rhodes still held out; and against them Mithridates now directed his arms. Cos was quickly subdued; but the Rhodians were well prepared for defence, and possessed a powerful fleet; so that Mithridates, though he commanded his fleet and army in person, and exerted the most strenuous efforts, was ultimately compelled to abandon the siege. After this he made a fruitless attempt upon the city of Patara in Lycia; and then resigning the command of the war in that quarter to his general, Pelopidas, took up his winter-quarters at Pergamus, where he gave himself up to luxury and enjoyment, especially to the society of his newly-married wife Monima, a Greek of Stratoniceia. (Appian, Mithr. 21, 23—27.) It was in the midst of these revelries that he issued the sanguinary order to all the cities of Asia to put to death on the same day all the Roman and Italian citizens who were to be found within their walls. So hateful had the Romans rendered themselves during the short period of their dominion, that these commands were obeyed with alacrity by almost all the cities of Asia, who found the opportunity of gratifying their own vengeance at the same time that they earned the favour of Mithridates, by carrying into effect the royal mandate with the most unsparring cruelty. The number of those who perished in this fearful massacre is stated by Memnon and Valerius Maximus at eighty thousand persons, while Plutarch increases the amount to a hundred and fifty thousand. (Appian, Mithr. 22, 23; Memnon, 31, Plut. Sull. 24; Liv. Epit. lxxviii.; Dion Cass. Fr. 116; Eutrop. v. 5; Oros. vi. 2; Flor. iii. 5; Cic. p. Leg. Manil. 3, pro Flacc. 24, 25; Tac. Ann. iv. 14; Val. Max. ix. 2. ext. 3.)

But while he thus created an apparently insuperable barrier to all hopes of reconciliation with Rome, Mithridates did not neglect to prepare for the approaching contest; and though he remained inactive himself at Pergamus, he was busily employed in raising troops and collecting ships, so that in the spring of B. C. 87 he was able to send Archelaus to Greece with a powerful fleet and army. During the subsequent operations of that general [ARCHELAUS], Mithridates was continually sending fresh reinforcements both by land and sea to his support; besides which he entrusted the command of a second army to his son Arcathias, with orders to advance through Thrace and Macedonia, to co-operate in the war against Sulla. The intended diversion was prevented by the death of Arcathias; but the following year (B. C. 86) Tullius followed the same route with an army of 110,000 men; and succeeded in uniting his forces with those of Archelaus. Their combined armies were totally defeated by Sulla at Chaeronea; but Mithridates, on receiving the news of this great disaster, immediately set about raising fresh levies, and was soon able to send another army of 60,000 men, under Dorylaeus to Euboea. Meanwhile, his severities in Asia, coupled with the disasters of his arms in Greece, seem to have produced a general spirit of disaffection; the cities of Chios, Ephesus, and Tralles, besides others of less note, drove out his governors and openly revolted: and the assassination of the tetrarchs of Galatia, whom he put to death from suspicions of their fidelity, led to the loss of that important province. (Appian, Mithr. 27, 29, 35, 41—49; Plut. Sull. 11, 15, 20; Memnon, 32, 33.) He now also found himself threatened with danger from a new and unexpected quarter. While Sulla was still occupied in Greece, the party of Marius at Rome had sent a fresh army to Asia under L. Flaccus, to carry on the war at once against their foreign and domestic enemies; and Fimbria, who had obtained the command of this force by the assassination of Flaccus [Fimbria], now advanced through Bithynia to assail Mithridates, B. C. 85. The king opposed to him a powerful army, under the command of his son, Mithridates, seconded by three of his generals; but this was totally defeated by Fimbria, who quickly followed up his advantage, and laid siege to Pergamus itself: from hence, however, Mithridates fled to Pitane, where he was closely blockaded by Fimbria; and had Lucullus, the quaestor of Sulla, who commanded the Roman fleet in the Aegean, been willing to co-operate with the Marian general, it would have been impossible for the king to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies. But the dissensions of the Romans proved the means of safety to Mithridates, who made his escape by sea to Mitylene. (Appian, Mithr. 51, 52; Plut. Lucull. 3; Memnon, 34; Oros. vi. 2; Liv. Epit. lxxxii. lxxxiii.) It was not long afterwards that he received the tidings of the complete destruction of his armies in Greece, near Orchomenus; and the news of this disaster, coupled with the progress of Fimbria in Asia, now made Mithridates desirous to treat for peace, which he justly hoped to obtain on more favourable terms than he could otherwise have expected, in consequence of the divided state of his enemies. He accordingly commissioned Archelaus, who was still in Euboea, to open negotiations with Sulla, which led to the conclusion of a preliminary treaty: but on the conditions of this being reported to the king, he positively refused to consent to the surrender of his fleet. Sulla hereupon prepared to renew hostilities, and in the spring of the following year (B. C. 84) crossed the Hellespont; but Archelaus succeeded in bringing about an interview between the Roman general and Mithridates at Dardanus, in the Troad, at which the terms of peace were definitively settled. Mithridates consented to abandon all his conquests in Asia, and restrict himself to the dominions which he held before the commencement of the war; besides which he was to pay a sum of 2000 talents for the expenses of the war, and surrender to the Romans a fleet of 70 ships fully equipped. Thus terminated the first Mithridatic war. The king withdrew to Pontus, while Sulla turned his arms against Fimbria, whom he quickly defeated; and then proceeded to settle the affairs of Asia, and re-establish Nicomedes and Ariobarzanes in their respective kingdoms: after which he returned to Rome, leaving L. Murena, with two legions, to hold the command in Asia. (Appian, Mithr. 54—63; Plut. Sull. 22—25, Lucull. 4; Memnon, 35; Dion Cass. Frag. 174—176; Liv. Epit. lxxxiii.; Oros. vi. 2.)

The attention of Mithridates was now attracted towards his own more remote provinces of Colchis and the Bosphorus, where symptoms of disaffection had begun to manifest themselves: the Colchians, however, submitted immediately on the king appointing his son Mithridates to be their governor, with the title of king, and even received their new ruler with such demonstrations of favour as to excite the jealousy of Mithridates, who, in consequence, recalled his son, and placed him in confinement. He now assembled a large force both military and naval, for the reduction of the revolted provinces; and so great were his preparations for this purpose, that they aroused the suspicions of the Romans, who pretended that they must be in fact designed against them. Murena, who had been left in command by Sulla, was eager for some opportunity of earning the honour of a triumph, and he now (B. C. 83), under the flimsy pretext that Mithridates had not yet evacuated the whole of Cappadocia, marched into that country, and not only made himself master of the wealthy city of Comana, but even crossed the Halys, and laid waste the plains of Pontus itself. To this flagrant breach of the treaty so lately concluded, the Roman general was in great measure instigated by Archelaus, who, finding himself regarded with suspicion by Mithridates, had consulted his safety by flight, and was received with the utmost honours by the Romans. Mithridates, who had evidently been wholly unprepared to renew the contest with Rome, offered no opposition to the progress of Murena; but finding that general disregard his remonstrances, he sent to Rome to complain of his aggression. But when in the following spring (B. C. 82) he found Murena preparing to renew his hostile incursions, notwithstanding the arrival of a Roman legate, who nominally commanded him to desist, he at once determined to oppose him by force, and assembled a large army, with which he met the Roman general on the banks of the Halys. The action that ensued terminated in the complete victory of the king; and Murena, with difficulty, effected his retreat into Phrygia, leaving Cappadocia at the mercy of Mithridates, who quickly overran the whole province. But shortly afterwards A. Gabinius arrived in Asia, bringing peremptory orders from Sulla to Murena to desist from hostilities; whereupon Mithridates once more consented to evacuate Cappadocia. (Appian, Mithr. 64—66, 67; Memnon, 36.)

He was now at leisure to complete the reduction of the Bosphorus, which he successfully accomplished, and established Machares, one of his sons, as king of that country. But he suffered heavy losses in an expedition which he subsequently undertook against the Achaeans, a warlike tribe who dwelt at the foot of Mount Caucasus. (Appian, ib. 67.) Meanwhile, he could not for a moment doubt that, notwithstanding the interposition of Sulla, the peace between him and Rome was in fact a mere suspension of hostilities; and that that haughty republic would never suffer the massacre of her citizens in Asia to remain ultimately unpunished. (See Cic. pro L. Manil. 3.) Hence all his efforts were directed towards the formation of an army capable of contending not only in numbers, but in discipline, with those of Rome; and with this view he armed his barbarian troops after the Roman fashion, and endeavoured to train them up in that discipline of which he had so strongly felt the effect in the preceding contest. (Plut. Lucull. 7.) In these attempts he was doubtless assisted by the refugees of the Marian party, L. Magius and L. Fannius, who had accompanied Fimbria into Asia; and on the defeat of that general by Sulla, had taken refuge with the king of Pontus. At their instigation also Mithridates sent an embassy to Sertorius, who was still maintaining his ground in Spain, and concluded an alliance with him against their common enemies. (Appian, Mithr. 68; Oros. vi. 2; Pseud. Ascon. ad Cic. Verr. i. 34, p. 183, ed. Orell.) It is remarkable that no formal treaty seems ever to have been concluded between Mithridates and the Roman senate; and the king had in vain endeavoured to obtain the ratification of the terms agreed on between him and Sulla. (Appian, ib. 67.) Hence, on the death of the latter, a. c. 78, Mithridates abandoned all thoughts of peace; and while he concluded the alliance with Sertorius on the one hand, he instigated Tigranes on the other to invade Cappadocia, and sweep away the inhabitants of that country, to people his newly-founded city of Tigranocerta. But it was the death of Nicomedes III., king of Bithynia, at the beginning of the year a. c. 74, that brought matters to a crisis, and became the immediate occasion of the war which both parties had long felt to be inevitable. That monarch left his dominions by will to the Roman people; and Bithynia was accordingly declared a Roman province: but Mithridates asserted that the late king had left a legitimate son by his wife Nysa, whose pretensions he immediately prepared to support by his arms. (Eutrop. vi. 6; Liv. Epit. xciii.; Appian, Mithr. 71; Epist. Mithrid. ap. Sallust. Hist. iv. p. 239, ed. Gerlach; Vell. Pat. ii. 4, 39.)

It was evident that the contest in which both parties were now about to engage would be a struggle for life or death, which could be terminated only by the complete overthrow of Mithridates, or by his establishment as undisputed monarch of Asia. The forces with which he was now prepared to take the field were such as might inspire him with no unreasonable confidence of victory. He had assembled an army of 120,000 foot soldiers, armed and disciplined in the Roman manner, and sixteen thousand horse, besides an hundred scythed chariots: but, in addition to this regular army, he was supported by a vast number of auxiliaries from the barbarian tribes of the Chalybes, Achæans, Armenians, and even the Scythians and Sarmatians. His fleet also was so far superior to any that the Romans could oppose to him, as to give him the almost undisputed command of the sea. These preparations, however, appear to have delayed him so long that the season was far advanced before he was able to take the field, and both the Roman consuls, Lucullus and Cotta, had arrived in Asia. Neither of them, however, was able to oppose his first irruption; he traversed almost the whole of Bithynia without encountering any resistance; and when at length Cotta ventured to give him battle under the walls of Chalcedon, he was totally defeated both by sea and land, and compelled to take refuge within the city. Here Mithridates at first prepared to besiege him, but soon changed his intention, and moved with his whole army to Cyzicus, to which important city he proceeded to lay siege, both by sea and land. His military engines and works were managed by a Greek named Niconides, who displayed the utmost skill and science in this department; while the attacks of the besieging forces were unremitting. But the Roman general Lucullus, who had advanced from Phrygia to the relief of Cotta, and followed Mithridates to Cyzicus, had been allowed, by the negligence of the king, or the treachery, as it was said, of the Roman L. Magius, who enjoyed a high place in his confidence, to occupy an advantageous position near the camp of Mithridates, where he almost entirely cut him off from receiving supplies by land, while the storms of the winter prevented him from depending on those by sea. Hence it was not long before famine began to make itself felt in the camp of Mithridates, and all his assaults upon the city having been foiled by the courage and resolution of the besieged, he was at length compelled (early in the year 73) to abandon the enterprise and raise the siege. But a large detachment of his army, which he at first sent off into Bithynia, was intercepted and cut to pieces by Lucullus; and when at length he broke up his camp, his main body, as it moved along the coast towards the westward, was repeatedly attacked by the Roman general, and suffered very heavy loss at the passage of the Aesepus and Granicus. The king himself proceeded by sea to Parium, where he collected the shattered remnants of his forces, and leaving a part of his fleet under Varius to maintain possession of the Hellespont and the Aegæan, withdrew himself with the rest, after a fruitless attempt upon Perinthus, to Nicomedia. Here he was soon threatened by the advance of three Roman armies under Cotta and the two lieutenants of Lucullus, Triarius and Voconius Barba. These generals had made themselves masters in succession of Prusias and Nicæa, and were preparing to besiege Mithridates himself at Nicomedia, when the king received intelligence of the defeat of his fleet under Varius at Tenedos, and becoming in consequence apprehensive for the safety of his communications by sea, hastened to set sail for Pontus. On his voyage he encountered a violent storm, by which he lost many of his ships, and was himself compelled to make his escape in the light galley of a pirate captain. He obtained, however, an important advantage by the surprise of the free city of Heracleia, which had hitherto remained neutral, but was now compelled to receive a Pontic garrison. After this he returned to Sinope. (Appian, Mithr. 69—78; Plut. Lucull. 7—13; Memnon, 37—42; Liv. Epit. xciii. xcv.; Eutrop. vi. 6.)

The great army with which Mithridates had commenced the war was now annihilated; and he was not only compelled to retire into his own dominions, but was without the means of opposing the advance of Lucullus into the heart of Pontus itself. But he now again set to work with indefatigable activity to raise a fresh army; and while he left the whole of the sea-coast of Pontus open to the invaders, he established himself in the interior at Cabeira, where he soon gathered a numerous force around his standard, while he sent to his son Machares and his son-in-law Tigranes, to request succours and auxiliaries. Lucullus, having in vain tried to allure him to the relief of Amisus, the siege of which he continued throughout the winter, on the approach of spring (a. c. 72) advanced into the interior, and took up a position opposite to him at Cabeira. Mithridates was superior in cavalry, on which account the Roman general avoided an action in the plains, and the campaign was chiefly occupied with mutual attempts to cut off each other's convoys of provisions, which led to repeated partial engagements, with various vicissitudes of fortune. At length a large detachment of the king's army was entirely cut off, and Mithridates hereupon determined to remove his camp: but the orders to this effect by some mismanagement gave rise to a panic in the undisciplined multitudes which composed his army; great confusion arose, and Lucullus having sent his cavalry to take advantage of this, a general rout was the consequence. Mithridates himself with difficulty made his way through the tumult, and must have fallen into the hands of the Romans, had not the capidity of some of his pursuers, who stopped to plunder a mule laden with gold, given him time to effect his escape. He fled to Comana, where he was again able to assemble a body of 2000 horse, but he despaired of opposing the farther progress of Lucullus, and accordingly sent his faithful eunuch Bechides to put to death his wives and sisters whom he had left at Pharnacia, while he himself took refuge in the dominions of his son-in-law Tigranes. It appears that these events took place before the close of the year a. c. 72. (Plut. Lucull. 14—18; Appian, Mithr. 78—82; Memnon, 43, 44; concerning the chronology see LUCULLUS, Vol. II. p. 834, note.)

Tigranes was at this moment the most powerful monarch of Asia [TIGRANES]; but though he had previously promised assistance to Mithridates, he appears to have been unwilling to engage openly in war with Rome; and on this account, while he received the fugitive monarch in a friendly manner, and assigned him all that was requisite for maintaining his royal dignity, he refused to admit him to his presence, and showed no disposition to attempt his restoration. But the arrogance of the Romans brought about a change in his policy; and Tigranes, offended at the haughty conduct of Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had sent to demand the surrender of Mithridates, not only refused this request, but determined at once to prepare for war with the Romans. Community of interests now led to a complete reconciliation between the two monarchs; and Mithridates, who had spent a year and eight months in the dominions of his son-in-law without being admitted to a personal interview, was now made to participate in all the councils of Tigranes, and appointed to levy an army to unite in the war. But it was in vain that in the ensuing campaign (a. c. 69) he urged upon his son-in-law the lessons of his own experience, and advised him to shun a regular action with Lucullus: Tigranes, confident in the multitude of his forces, gave battle at Tigranocerta and was defeated, before Mithridates had been able to join him. But this disaster, so precisely in accordance with the warnings of Mithridates, served to raise the latter so high in the estimation of Tigranes, that from this time forward the whole conduct of the war was entrusted to the direction of the king of Pontus.

During the ensuing winter both monarchs were busily engaged in raising a fresh army, into which Mithridates endeavoured to introduce some discipline, as well as to arm a large body of them after the Roman fashion. They at the same time endeavoured to procure the important assistance of the Parthian king, to whom Mithridates addressed a letter, urging him to consult his true interest by espousing their cause before it was too late, and not to wait until the Romans attacked him in his turn. Whether the epistle to this effect preserved among the fragments of Sallust really bears any resemblance to that composed by the king of Pontus we have unfortunately no means of determining. (Plut. Lucull. 19, 21—23, 25—30; Appian, Mithr. 84—87; Memnon, 46, 55—58; Dion Cass. Fr. 178, xxxv. 1—3; Liv. Epit. xxviii.; Oros. vi. 3; Eutrop. vi. 8, 9; Epist. Mithr. ad Arsacem, op. Sall. Hist. iv. p. 238, ed. Gerlach.)

But the Parthian king still wavered, and in the following summer (a. c. 68), Lucullus crossed the Taurus, penetrated into the heart of Armenia, and again defeated the allied monarchs near the city of Artaxata. But the early severity of the season, and the discontent of his own troops, checked the farther advance of the Roman general, who turned aside into Mesopotamia. Here Mithridates left him to lay siege to the fortress of Nisibis, which was supposed impregnable, while he himself took advantage of his absence to invade Pontus, at the head of a large army, and endeavour to regain possession of his former dominions. The defence of Pontus was confided to Fabius, one of the lieutenants of Lucullus; but the oppressions of the Romans had excited a general spirit of disaffection, and the people crowded around the standard of Mithridates. Even the Thracian mercenaries in the army of Fabius turned against their general, who was totally defeated by Mithridates, and compelled to shut himself up in the fortress of Cabeira. Triarius, another of the Roman generals, now advanced to his support with a fresh army, and the king retreated before this new adversary, and withdrew to Comana, where he took up his winter-quarters. But the following spring (a. c. 67) hostilities were resumed on both sides; and Triarius, who was anxious to engage Mithridates before Lucullus himself should arrive, allowed himself to be attacked at disadvantage, and was totally defeated. The destruction of the Roman army would have been complete had not the king himself been wounded in the pursuit, which was in consequence checked for a time; but even thus the blow was one of the severest which the Roman arms had sustained for a long period: 7000 of their troops fell, among which was an unprecedented number of officers; and their camp itself was taken. (Dion Cass. xxxv. 4—6, 8—13; Appian, Mithr. 87—89; Plut. Lucull. 31, 32, 35; Cic. pro Leg. Manil. 9.)

The advance of Lucullus himself from Mesopotamia prevented Mithridates from following up his advantage, and he withdrew into Lesser Armenia, where he took up a strong position near Talaurea, to await the approach of Tigranes. He doubtless expected that the Roman general would quickly resume the offensive; but the farther proceedings of Lucullus were paralysed by the mutinous and disaffected spirit of his own soldiers; and on the arrival of Tigranes the two monarchs found themselves able to overrun almost the whole of Pontus and Cappadocia without opposition. Before the close of the year 67 Mithridates saw himself once more in possession of the greater part of his hereditary dominions. (Plut. Lucull. 35; Appian, Mithr. 90; Dion Cass. xxxv. 14, 17; Cic. pro Leg. Manil. 3.)

But early in the following year (66) the conduct of the war was entrusted by the Romans to the general whose fame was at this moment eclipsing all others—the illustrious Pompey, and one of the first measures of the new commander was to secure the friendship and alliance of the Parthian king Phraates III., a step by which he not only deprived Mithridates of all hopes of the co-operation of that monarch, but precluded him from the support of Tigranes also, by compelling the Armenian king to look to the defence of his own dominions against the Parthian. Thus thrown back upon his own resources, Mithridates made overtures for peace; but Pompey would listen to no terms except those of unqualified submission and the surrender of all Roman deserters, and these conditions the king of Pontus rejected with scorn. He still found himself at the head of an army of 30,000 foot and 2000 horse, with which, however, he did not venture to meet the enemy in the field, and avoided an action with Pompey, while he protracted the campaign, and gradually withdrew towards the frontiers of Armenia. But he was no match for the generalship of his adversary, who attacked him during a night march through a narrow pass which had been previously occupied by the Roman troops: the greater part of the army of Mithridates was cut to pieces, and the king himself escaped with only a few horsemen and his concubine Hypsícraates, the faithful companion of all his fortunes, to the frontier fortress of Synoria. Here he once more assembled a considerable force, with which he prepared to withdraw into Armenia; but Tigranes, who suspected him of fomenting the intrigues of his son against him, now refused to admit him into his dominions, and no choice remained for Mithridates but to plunge with his small army into the heart of Colchis, and thence make his way to the Palus Maeotis and the Cimmerian Bosphorus. Arduous as this enterprise appeared it was successfully accomplished. After crossing the Phasis he deemed himself secure from the pursuit of Pompey, and took up his quarters for the winter at Dioscurias (the extreme eastern limit of the Greek settlements in this part of the Euxine), where he levied additional troops and also assembled a small fleet. With these combined forces he resumed his progress in the following year (65), and succeeded in effecting his passage, partly by force, partly by persuasion, through all the various barbarian tribes that occupied the country between the Caucasus and the Euxine, and reached in safety the city of Phanagoria on the Bosphorus. His son Machares, to whom he had confided the government of these regions, but who had long before made his submission to Lucullus, fled on learning his approach, and soon after put an end to his own life. Mithridates, in consequence, established himself without opposition at Panticapæum, the capital of the kingdom of Bosphorus. (Appian, Mithr. 97—102, 107; Dion Cass. xxxvi. 28—33; Plut. Pomp. 32, 34, 35; Liv. Epit. ci.; Oros. vi. 4; Strab. xi. pp. 496, 497, xii. p. 555.)

He had now nothing to fear from the pursuit of Pompey, who appears to have at once abandoned all thoughts of following the fugitive monarch into the wild and inaccessible regions beyond the Phasis, and turned his arms first against Tigranes, and afterwards against Syria. It was probably this sense of security that emboldened him in the year 64 to send ambassadors to Pompey to sue for peace, offering to submit on terms similar to those which had been lately granted to Tigranes, namely, that he should be allowed to retain possession of his hereditary dominions, as a tributary to Rome. Pompey, however, insisted that the king should come in person to make his submission, and this Mithridates resolutely refused. The negotiations were in consequence broken off; and while Pompey regulated the affairs of Pontus, which he reduced to the condition of a Roman province, Mithridates on his part commenced the most extensive preparations for a renewal of the contest. Far from contenting himself with the possession of the remote province of the Bosphorus, in which, from its inaccessible position, he might defy the arms of Rome, he now conceived the daring project of marching round the north and west coasts of the Euxine, through the wild tribes of the Sarmatians and Getae, which had been in part already visited by his generals Neoptolemus and Diophantus, and having gathered around his standard all these barbarian nations, of whose hostility towards Rome there could be no question, to throw himself with these accumulated masses upon the frontiers of the Roman state, and perhaps penetrate even into Italy itself. With these views, he was busily engaged in assembling such a fleet and army as would be sufficient for an enterprise of this magnitude. But his proceedings were much delayed at first by a violent earthquake, which overthrew whole towns and villages, and subsequently by a long and painful illness, which incapacitated him for any personal exertion. At length, however, his preparations were completed, and he found himself at the head of an army of 36,000 men and a considerable fleet. But during his illness, while he lived in complete seclusion, visible to none but a few chosen eunuchs, disaffection had made rapid progress among his followers. The full extent of his schemes was probably communicated to few; but enough had transpired to alarm the multitude, and neither the soldiers nor their leaders were disposed to follow their aged monarch on an enterprise which they might well regard as little less than desperate. In this state of things an act of private revenge led to the revolt of the important town of Phanagoria, where the sons of Mithridates, who held the citadel, were compelled to surrender to the insurgents, and the flame of insurrection quickly spread to several other cities of the Tauric Chersonese. Still the spirit of the old king was unbroken: he endeavoured to renew his alliances with the neighbouring Seythian chieftains, and sent some of his daughters to them as brides, under the escort of some confidential eunuchs, who, however, followed the general example, and betrayed their charge into the hands of the Romans. A more formidable conspiracy was now organized by Pharnaces, the favourite son of Mithridates, and whom he had declared heir to his crown. The designs of the young man were discovered, and his accomplices put to death, but Mithridates was persuaded to spare his son's life, and Pharnaces immediately availed himself of his impunity to break out into open insurrection. He was quickly joined both by the whole army and the citizens of Panticapæum, who unanimously proclaimed him king; and Mithridates, who had taken refuge in a strong tower, after many fruitless messages and embassies to his son, saw that no choice remained to him but death or captivity. Hereupon he took poison, which he constantly carried with him; but his constitution had been so long injured to antidotes, that it did not produce the desired effect, and he was compelled to call in the assistance of one of his Gaulish mercenaries to despatch him with his sword. (Appian, Mithr. 107—111; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 3, 11—13; Plut. Pomp. 41; Oros. vi. 3; Eutrop. vi. 12; Liv. Epit. cii.; Flor. iii. 6; Joseph. Ant. xiv. 3. § 4; Val. Max. ix. 2. ext. 3; Gell. xvii. 16; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Illust. 76, 77; Vell. Pat. ii. 40.)

The death of Mithridates took place in the year 63 B.C. (Dion Cass. xxxvii. 10.) The dread that his name still inspired at Rome is strongly displayed in a passage of Cicero's speech on the Agrarian laws, delivered early in that very year (De Leg. Agrar. ii. 19), and we may thus readily credit the statement of Plutarch, that his death was regarded by the army as equal to a great victory.

His body was sent by Pharnaces to Pompey at Amisæ, as a token of his submission; but the conqueror caused it to be interred with regal honours in the sepulchre of his forefathers at Sinope. (Plut. Pomp. 42; App. Mithr. 113; Dion Cass. xxxvii. 14.) According to the statement of Appian already cited, he was sixty-eight or sixty-nine years old at the time of his death, and had reigned fifty-seven years, of which twenty-five had been occupied, with only a few brief intervals, in one continued struggle against the Roman power. The estimation in which he was held by his adversaries is the strongest testimony to his great abilities: Cicero calls him the greatest of all kings after Alexander (Acad. pr. ii. 1), and in another passage says that he was a more formidable opponent than any other monarch whom the Roman arms had yet encountered (pro Muren. 15; see also Vell. Pat. ii. 18). Nor can we doubt the truth of these eulogiums, when we contemplate the circumstances in which he was placed, and the instruments with which he had to work. The numerous defeats of Mithridates are a proof not so much of his own deficiency as a general, as of the inferiority of his troops to those which were opposed to him. This was the radical defect, which he was unable to cure. After the unsuccessful issue of his war with Sulla, all his efforts were directed, as we have already seen, to the training up a disciplined army, capable of contending with the Roman legions; and even after the failure of this first experiment he still seems to have formed armies, comparatively small in numbers, but well organised, instead of the unwieldy and undisciplined multitudes of Tigranes. But he latterly became convinced of the impossibility of coping with the Romans in the field, and on all occasions sought to avoid a pitched battle, and draw his enemies into positions where he might cut them off from their supplies, or take advantage of the rugged and difficult nature of the country in which he had involved them. If he was frequently foiled in these projects, we must remember that he was opposed to generals such as Lucullus and Pompey. But whatever opinion may be entertained of the skill and ability of Mithridates as a general in conducting his campaigns, there can be no question as to the undaunted spirit and energy with which he rose superior to all his defeats, and was ever ready to recommence the unequal contest.

What little we know of his character in other respects is far from favourable; and notwithstanding his Greek education and habits, presents all the characteristics of a genuine Eastern despot. His unreasonable suspicions of those around him, which lost him the province of Galatia and the services of Archelaus; the reliance placed on eunuchs for all confidential purposes; the barbarous execution of several of his numerous sons for various and often trivial causes; and the truly Oriental jealousy which led him to order the death of his wives and sisters, when he found himself compelled to fly from his kingdom—not to speak of the severe punishment inflicted on the people of Chios for a trifling and apparently involuntary offence (App. Mithr. 47); and the general massacre of the Roman citizens throughout Asia—are sufficient evidence that neither his great abilities nor his superior education had produced in him any tendency to real enlightenment or humanity. Yet he was not without a love of the fine arts; and among the vast treasures accumulated in his treasuries at Cabeira and elsewhere were many valuable pictures and statues, and a splendid collection of engraved gems or precious stones. (Strab. xii. p. 536; P. lin. xxxiii. 12. § 54, xxxvii. 2. § 5; Manil. Astron. v. 510.)

Of his numerous wives or concubines, the names of a few only have been preserved to us: among the most conspicuous of which are: Laodice, put to death early in his reign; Berenice and Monima, both of whom were put to death at Pharnacia [MONIMA], STRATONICE and Hysicratea, the last of whom is said to have accompanied him on all his campaigns, and shared with him every danger and privation. (Plut. Pomp. 32; Val. Max. iv. 6. ext. § 2.) By these various wives he was the father of a numerous progeny, many of whom, however, perished before him. Of his sons, Archathias died in Greece, Mithridates and Xipharex were put to death by his orders, and Machares only escaped the same fate by a voluntary death; five others, named Artaphernes, Cyrus, Darius, Xerxes, and Oxathres, had fallen into the hands of Pompey, and served to adorn his triumph (App. Mithr. 117); while Pharnaces succeeded to the throne of the Bosphorus. Of his daughters the following are mentioned in history: 1. Cleopatra, married to Tigranes, king of Armenia; 2. Drypetine, put to death by the eunuch Menophilus; 3. Another Cleopatra, present with her father at the Bosphorus (App. Mithr. 108); 4. Mithridatis; and 5. Nyssa, who poisoned themselves at the same time with their father (ib. iii.); and 6 and 7. Orsabaris and Eupatra, who were taken prisoners by Pompey (ib. 117).

The portrait of Mithridates which appears on his coins is remarkable for the fire and energy of his countenance, which accords well with all we know of his character; while the beautiful execution of the coins themselves, both in gold and silver, bears testimony to his patronage of the arts. They usually bear a date, which refers to an era commencing with the year a. c. 297, and which continued to be used by the kings of Bosphorus long afterwards, though its origin is unknown.

COIN OF MITHRIDATES VI. KING OF PONTUS.

MITHRIDATES, a son of the preceding, who was appointed by his father to take the command of the army which he opposed to the Roman general, Fimbria, in a. c. 85. Though supported by Taxiles, Diophantus, and Menander, three of the ablest generals of Mithridates, he was totally defeated by Fimbria, who surprised his camp, and cut to pieces the greater part of his forces; he himself made his escape to Pergamus, where he joined his father. (Memnon, 34; Appian, Mithr. 52.) After the termination of the war with Sulla, he was appointed by his father to the government of Colchis, with the title of king. The Colchians, who were previously in a state of revolt, immediately submitted to the young prince, and received him with such demonstrations of favour as excited the jealousy of the elder Mithridates, who, in consequence, recalled him; and after keeping him some time in captivity, ultimately put him to death. (App. Mithr. 64.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRIDATIS (Μιθριδάτις), a daughter of Mithridates the Great, who had been at one time betrothed to Ptolemy, king of Egypt; but the marriage never took place, and she shared the fortunes of her father to the last. She and her sister Nyssa were present with Mithridates just before his death, and voluntarily took poison, that they might share his fate. (Appian, Mithr. 111.) [E. H. B.]

MITHRINES. [ΜΙΘΡΗΝΕΣ.]

MITHROBARZANES (Μιθροβαρζάνης). 1. Father-in-law of Datames, with whom he joined in his revolt from the Persian king [DATAMES]; but afterwards despairing of his cause, went over to Artabazus, the Persian general, with all the cavalry under his command. Datames, however, on learning his desertion, followed him so closely that he attacked the enemy at the very moment that Mithrobarzanes had joined them. The Persians in consequence distrusted their new confederate, and refused to receive them, so that Mithrobarzanes and his followers found themselves hemmed in between two armies, and were quickly cut to pieces. (Diod. xv. 91; Corn. Nep. Datam. 6; comp. Polyæn. vii. 21. § 7.)

2. General of the Cappadocian forces, which formed part of the Persian army at the passage of the Granicus: he was killed in the battle (Arrian, Anab. i. 16. § 5; Diod. xvii. 21). His name is written in many of the MSS. both of Diodorus and Arrian, Mithrobarzanes, but analogy is certainly in favour of the other form.

3. King or ruler of the district of Sophene, in the possession of which he was established by Ariarathes V., king of Cappadocia, notwithstanding the opposition of Artaxias, king of Armenia, who in vain endeavoured to induce Ariarathes to put the young prince to death, and divide his dominions between them. (Diod. xxxi. Exc. Vales. p. 584.)

4. A general of Tigranes I., king of Armenia, who was the first of the king's friends and courtiers that ventured to apprise him of the near approach of Lucullus. Hereupon he was despatched by that monarch with a force of 3000 horse and a numerous body of infantry, with orders to crush the Roman army, and bring the general away prisoner. Mithrobarzanes, though he does not seem to have shared in this foolish confidence, advanced to meet Lucullus, but was encountered by the advanced guard of the Romans under Sextilius, and cut to pieces, with the greater part of his troops. (Plut. Lucull. 25; Appian, Mithr. 84.) [E. H. B.]

MITROBATES (Μιτροβάτης), a Persian, governor of Dascyleium, is said by Herodotus to have taunted Oroetes, satrap of Sardis, with his allowing Samos to continue free from the Persian yoke. During the disturbed period which followed the death of Cambyses and the usurpation of the Magi (B.C. 521), Oroetes put Mitrobates and his son Cranaspes to death. (Herod. iii. 120, 126, 127.) [E. E.]

MIXOPAR'THENOS (Μιχοπαρθένος), i. e. half maiden, a surname of the Erinnyes or Furies. (Lycophr. 669; comp. Herod. iv. 9.) [L. S.]

MNASALCAS (Μνασάλκας), an epigrammatic poet, a native of a village or township in the territory of Sicyon called Plateæ (Strab. ix. p. 412).

Eighteen of his epigrams are given in Bruck's Anal. i. p. 190. The time when he flourished is uncertain. Reiske (Not. p. 245, &c.) is somewhat disposed to consider him a contemporary of Alexander the Great. Schneider (Anal. p. 6) places him a century later. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 483; Athen. iv. p. 163.) [C. P. M.]

MNASEAS (Μνασείας). 1. A Phocian, who, on the death of Phayllus, B.C. 353, was appointed guardian to the young Phalaecus, the son of Onomarchus, and the successor of Phayllus in the supreme command of the Phocians in the Sacred War. Mnaseas was soon after slain in a night-battle with the Thebans. He was perhaps the same person whose private quarrel with one Euthycrates about an heiress had, according to Aristotle, given occasion to the war. (Diod. xvi. 38; comp. Paus. x. 2; Arist. Polit. v. 4, ed. Bekk.)

2. An Argive, mentioned by Demosthenes (de Cor. p. 324) as one of those who betrayed their country to Philip. Polybius (xvii. 14) blames Demosthenes for what he calls his reckless and sweeping accusation against so many distinguished men. (Comp. Dem. de Cor. p. 245, de Chæra. p. 105; Diod. xvi. 38, 69.) [E. E.]

MNASEAS (Μνασείας), literary. 1. Of PATARA, in Lycia, the most celebrated literary person of this name. He is sometimes called δ Παταρεύς, and at other times δ Πατρεύς: the former would make him a native of Patara in Lycia; the latter, of Patrae in Achaia. Clinton calls him (P. H. vol. iii. p. 534) Mnaseas of Patrae; but it appears more probable that Πατρεύς is a corruption of Παταρεύς than the contrary; and we know that Asia Minor produced many literary persons from the time that literature flourished at Alexandria. From a passage in Suidas (s. v. Ἐρατοσθένης), Voasius, Clinton, and others have supposed that Mnaseas was a disciple of Aristarchus; but the words may also mean that he was a pupil of Eratosthenes; and that this is their real meaning, Preller has shown, from another source, in the essay referred to below. (Comp. Epimerium Hom. p. 277, 29; Welcker, Epische Cyclas, p. 459.) Mnaseas belonged to the period when the school of Callimachus and Eratosthenes was prosecuting literary and grammatical studies; but when likewise a very large number were devoting themselves to a description of lands and places, with an account of their local traditions, monuments, and antiquities. Such were Polemon of Ilion, Neantes of Cyzicus, Philostephanus of Cyrene, and many others, who were contemporary with Mnaseas, and who were called by the general name of Periegetæ (Περιηγηταί). To these Mnaseas belonged, and was one of the worst of his class. It is true that he was diligent and learned, and that he travelled in Europe, Africa, and Asia, for the purpose of collecting materials for his work; but he was singularly destitute both of taste and judgment, and belonged to that class of Alexandrine compilers who placed more value upon the quantity of their materials than their quality or arrangement, and who recorded more diligently all extraordinary and fabulous tales in history and nature than events and occurrences of real interest and importance. He was also a follower of the rationalistic school of Evemerus, and resolved many of the ancient legends into ordinary natural occurrences, quite in accordance with the principles of the school. [EVMERUS.]

Mnaseas was the author of two works, one of a chorographical description, and the other a collection of oracles given at Delphi. These works seem to have had extensive circulation in antiquity, and to have been preserved for a considerable time. The oldest writer by whom they are referred to is Lysimachus, who wrote Περὶ νοστῶν (Athen. iv. p. 158, d.), and they were extant in the time of Athenaeus, who frequently refers to them.

I. Περὶ πλοῦς is the name given to the former of Mnaseas's two works by Athenaeus (viii. p. 331, e.), Photius, and Suidas (s. v. πλοῦς χελιδόνος), and seems to be its correct title. Stephanus of Byzantium (s. v. Ἐγγυαῖος) calls it, The Three Books of Periegesis (τὰ τῶν περιήγησιν), where the plural probably refers to the work being divided into three sections, each of which was again subdivided into several books. Periplus was thus the general title; but the three sections, which treated of Europe, Asia, and Africa respectively, are frequently referred to as distinct works.

1. Ἐδρώπη, or Ἐδρωπικὴ, was divided into three books: at least we have a quotation from the third book of this section. The first book appears to have treated of the history of inventions, and consequently of the civilisation of Europe; and the second and third to have been devoted to a description of the coasts of the various parts of Europe. (Athen. iv. p. 158, d., vii. p. 296, b., xii. p. 530, c.; Harpocrat. s. v. Ἰσπρία; Bekker, Anecd. Graec. p. 350, 26; Schol. ad Theoc. i. 64; Ammon. s. v. Νηπιδες; Phot. and Suid. s. v. Πραξιδικῶν; Schol. ad Germanic. Prognost. apud Arat. vol. ii. p. 111, ed. Buhl; Fulgent. Mythol. ii. 19.)

2. Asia, was also divided into several books, of which the first and second are quoted. (Schol. ad Apollon. i. 1128; Eudocia, p. 103; Athen. viii. p. 346, d. e.)

3. Λιβύη, likewise contained several books (Μνασῆας ἐν τοῖς περὶ Λιβύης), but their number is not mentioned. (Hesych. s. v. Βαρκαλοῖς ὄχους; Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 11. s. 38.)

11. Δελφικῶν χρησμάτων συναγωγή, is the name of the other work of Mnaseas on the Delphic oracles. (Schol. ad Hes. Theog. 117.) Sometimes it is simply called Περὶ χρησμάτων. (Schol. ad Pind. Al. ii. 70.) The following passages, in which Mnaseas is quoted, seem to be taken from this collection of Delphic oracles:—Zenob. v. 74; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 411; Phot. and Suid. s. v. ἡμῖς ὁ Μεγαρίτης; Tzetz. Chil. ix. 871—894.

(Vossius, de Hist. Graec. p. 178, ed. Westermann; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 534; Jahn, de Palmyrae, p. 31; and more especially Preller, in the Zeitschrift für die Alterthumswissenschaft, 1846, pp. 673—688, from whom the preceding account is chiefly taken.)

2. AN AGRICULTURAL writer, who translated into Greek the works of the Carthaginians Mago and Hamilcar on this subject. (Varro, R. R. i. 1; Colum. xii. 4.)

3. OF BERYTUS, a rhetorician, who, according to Suidas (s. v.), wrote a τέχνη ῥητορικῆς, and περὶ Ἀττικῶν ὀνομάτων.

4. OF LOCRI OR COLOPHON, a poet, who left behind him a collection of Παλγύμν. (Athen. vii. p. 321, f.; Eustath. p. 1163, 14.)

5. A DISCIPLE of the great grammarian Aristarchus (Suid. s. v. Ἐρασθένης). He is mentioned also in the Venetian scholia on the Iliad. (Villoison, Prolegom. p. xxx.)

MNA'SEAS (Μνασῆας), or MNASAEUS (Μνασαῖος), a physician, who belonged to the ancient sect of the Methodici (Gal. Introd. c. 4. vol. xiv. p. 684), and lived probably in the first century after Christ. He wrote some medical works, which are not now extant; and he is quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. i. 4, 17, vii. 5, vol. xiii. pp. 392, 445, 962, 963, 965), Soranus (De Arte Obster. pp. 21, 23, 279, 289, ed. Diets), Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 5, 29, De Morb. Chron. i. 5, ii. 1, 7, pp. 81, 142, 329, 348, 380), Aëtius (ii. 2, 18, 89, pp. 258, 290), Paulus Aegineta (vii. 17, p. 676), and Alexander Trallianus (iii. 7, vii. 1, pp. 187, 213). [W. A. G.]

MNASICLES (Μνασικλῆς), a Cretan officer of mercenaries, who joined Thimbron the Lacedaemonian, in his expedition against Cyrene; but quickly deserted him, and went over to the Cyrenaean, by whom he was ultimately appointed general, and carried on the war against Thimbron. (Diod. xviii. 20, 21.) [E. H. B.]

MNASILOCHUS (Μνασίλοχος), was a chief of the Acarnanians, who, in B. C. 191, was bribed by Antiochus the Great, and, in return, persuaded or fraudulently compelled a diet of his countrymen to embrace the Syrian instead of the Roman alliance. In all the preliminaries of peace between Rome and Antiochus, after the defeat of the latter at Magnesia in B. C. 190, one article was the surrender of Mnasilochus to the Romans. (Polyb. xxi. 14. § 7, xxii. 26. § 11; Liv. xxxvi. 11, 12, xxxvii. 45, xxxviii. 38.) [W. B. D.]

MNASINUS (Μνασίνοος), a brother of Anaxia, and a son of one of the Dioscuri; he and his brother were represented on the throne of Apollo at Amyclae. (Paus. ii. 22. § 6, iii. 18. § 7.) [L. S.]

MNASIPPUS (Μνασίππος), a Lacedaemonian, was appointed to the command of the armament which was sent to Corcyra, in B. C. 373, to recover the island from the Athenians. Having landed there, he ravaged the country, and, blockading the city by sea and land, reduced the Corcyraeans to the greatest extremities. Imagining, however, that success was now within his grasp, he dismissed some of his mercenaries and kept the pay of the rest in arrears. It would appear, too, that discipline was less strictly preserved among his men than heretofore; for we read that the several posts of the besiegers were now imperfectly guarded, and that their soldiers were dispersed in straggling parties throughout the country. The Corcyraeans, observing this, made a sally, in which they slew some, and made some prisoners. Mnasippus proceeded in haste against them, ordering his officers to lead out the mercenaries; and, when they represented to him that they could not answer for the obedience of the men while they remained unpaid, he met their remonstrances with blows—an exhibition of coarse arrogance by no means uncommon with Spartans in power. It may well be conceived that the spirit which animated his troops was not one of alacrity or of attachment to his person. In the battle which ensued close to the gates of the town, the Corcyraeans were victorious and Mnasippus was slain. According to Diodorus, these successful operations were conducted under the command of Cleicles (doubtless the Stesicles of Xenophon), whom the Athenians had sent to the aid of Corcyra with a body of 500 or 600 tar-getera. (Xen. Hell. vi. 2 § 4—23; Diod. xv. 40, 47; Wesseling, ad loc.; Schneider, ad Xen. Hell. vi. 2 § 10; Rehdants, Vitae Iphicratis, Chabrias, Timothei, iv. § 3. Berol. 1845. [E. E.]

MNASITHEUS. [MNESITHAEUS.]

MNASITIMUS. [MNESITIMUS.]

MNASON (Μνάων). 1. A Phocian, a friend and disciple of Aristotle. He seems to have incurred considerable odium on account of the large number of domestic slaves whom he kept. (Athen. vi. p. 264, d. 272, b.) Whether it was this Mnason who came on an embassy to Athens, and was appealed to as a witness by Aeschines (de Falsa Leg. p. 47, ed. Steph.), we are not informed.

2. Tyrant of Elateæ. He seems to have distinguished himself by his liberal patronage of the fine arts. For a picture painted by Aristides he paid 1000 minæ; and for pictures of the twelve gods by Asclepiodorus 300 minæ for each. (Plin. H. N. xxv. 36. § 18, 21.) [C. P. M.]

MNEMARCHUS (Μνημαρχος), is the name sometimes given to the father of Pythagoras; but his proper name is Mnesarchus. [MNESARCHUS, No. 1.] [C. P. M.]

MNEME (Μνήμη), i. e. memory, was one of the three Muses that were in early times worshipped at Ascra in Boeotia. (Paus. ix. 29. § 2.) But there seems to have also been a tradition that Mneme was the mother of the Muses, for Ovid (Mét. v. 268) calls them Mnemonides; unless this be only an abridged form for the daughters of Mnemosyna. [Comp. MUSEÆ.] [L. S.]

MNEMON (Μνήμων), a physician of Side, in Pamphylia, who was a follower of Cleophantus, and lived in the third century B. C. (Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "Epid. III." ii. 4, iii. 71, vol. xvii. pt. i. pp. 603, 606, 731.) He is known only as one of the individuals whose name occurs in connection with the marks or characters (χαρακτήρες) appended to certain medical cases in the third book of Hippocrates, "De Morbis Popularibus," of which Mnemon was by some persons (but probably without sufficient reason) supposed to be the author. (See Littre's Hippocrates, vol. i. p. 274.) [W. A. G.]

MNEMOSYNE (Μνημοσύνη), i. e. memory, a daughter of Uranus, and one of the Titanides, became by Zeus the mother of the Muses. (Hom. Hymn. in Merc. 429; Hes. Theog. 54, 915; Diod. v. 67; Orph. Hymn. 76; Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 21.) Pausanias (i. 2. § 4) mentions a statue of Mnemosyne at Athens; and near the oracle of Trophonius she had a sacred well and a throne. (Paus. ix. 39. § 4, &c.) [L. S.]

MNESAECHEMUS (Μνησαίχμος), an Athenian orator of the time of Demosthenes, is also called Menesæchmus. [MNESAECHMUS.]

MNESARCHUS (Μνημαρχος). 1. The son of Euphron or Euthyphron, and father of Pythagoras. He was generally believed to be not of purely Greek origin. According to some accounts, he belonged to the Tyrhenians of Lemnos and Imbros, and is said to have been an engraver of rings. (Clemens Alex. Strom. i. p. 300; Schol. ad Plat. Rep. p. 420, ed. Bekk.; Diog. Laërt. viii. 1; Porphy. Vit. Pyth. 1, 2.) According to other accounts, the name of the father of Pythagoras was Marmacus, whose father Hipponus came from Phlius. (Paus. ii. 13; Diog. Laërt. viii. 1.)

2. Grandson of the preceding, and son of Pythagoras and Theano. According to some accounts he succeeded Aristæus [ARISTÆUS] as president of the Pythagorean school. (Suid. s. v. Μνήσιμαχ; Iamblich. Vit. Pyth. c. 36.) According to a notice in Photius (Cod. 259, p. 438, b. ed. Bekker), he died young.

3. A Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Panætius. He flourished about B. C. 110, and appears to have been one of the most distinguished of his sect. He taught at Athens. Among his pupils was Antiochus of Ascalon. [ANTIOCHUS.] (Cic. de Fin. i. 2, de Orat. i. 11, Acad. ii. 22; Euseb. Præp. Evang. xiv. p. 739.) [C. P. M.]

MNESICLES (Μνησικλῆς), one of the great Athenian artists of the age of Pericles, was the architect of the Propylææ of the Acropolis, the building of which occupied five years, A. C. 437—433. It is said that, during the progress of the work, he fell from the summit of the building, and was supposed to be mortally injured, but was cured by an herb which Athens showed to Pericles in a dream. (Philoch. Frug. p. 55; Plut. Peric. 13.) Pliny relates the same story of a slave (servus) of Pericles, and mentions a celebrated statue of the same slave by Stipax, which, from its attitude, was called Splanchnoptes. (Plin. H. N. xxii. 17. c. 20, xxiv. 8. a. 19. § 21.) [P. S.]

2. The father of Choerine or Choerilla, the first wife of Euripides [EURIPIDES]. He is introduced by Aristophanes as one of the dramatic personae in the Thesmophoriazusæ. Teleclides (as quoted by the author of the life of Euripides, published by Elmsley in his edition of the Bacchæ) asserted that Mnesilochus assisted Euripides in the composition of some of his plays. (Suidas s. v. Εὐριπίδης.)

3. Son of Euripides by his wife Choerilla. He was an actor. (Eurip. Vit.) [C. P. M.]

MNESIMACHE (Μνησιμάχη), is the name given by Apollodorus (ii. 5. § 5) to the daughter of Dexamenus, more usually called Delianira. [DEXAMENUS.] [L. S.]

MNESIMACHUS (Μνησίμαχος). 1. A comic poet of the Middle Comedy, according to Suidas (s. v.) and Athenæus (vii. p. 329, d.). This is also confirmed by the titles of his pieces. Endecim (p. 303) calls him a poet of the New Comedy. Nothing further is known respecting him. The following plays of his are mentioned:—1. Βοδύρις (Athen. x. p. 417, c.; Suid.). 2. Διδυκάριος (Athen. viii. p. 359, c.). 3. Ἰπποπότροφος (Suidas and Athen. vii. p. 301, d. 322, e. and ix. p. 402, f. where a passage of considerable length is quoted). 4. Φιλίππος. 5. Ἀλκμαίων (Diog. Laërt. vii. 37). The Alcmaeon referred to in this play is supposed by Meineke to have been the Pythagorean philosopher of that name [ALCMAEON], from the tenor of the lines quoted by Diogenes Laërtius. 6. Ἰσθμιαίη (Aelian, H. A. xiii. 4). 7. Θαρρακιστῆς (Schol. Arist. Avæ, 471; according to the correction of Menagius on Diog. Laërt. ii. 18.) (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. ii. 470; Meineke, Hist. Vit. Com. Græc. p. 423.)

2. An historical writer, a native of Phœsida, the author of a work entitled Διόδοσμος, quoted by the scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, iv. 1412. The first book, which treated of the Scythians, is also referred to by the Schol. on ii. 1015. (Voisin, de Hist. Græc. p. 471, ed. Westermann; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. ii. 470.) [C. P. M.]

MNESIPHILUS (Μνησίφιλος), an Athenian, who pointed out to Themistocles, B.C. 480, the extreme impolicy of the measure which had been agreed on by the Greek generals, viz. to withdraw the fleet from Salamis and fight the Persians at the isthmus of Corinth. Hereupon Themistocles persuaded Eurybiades to call another council, and therein with much difficulty prevailed on the generals to maintain their position at Salamis. According to Plutarch, Themistocles had, in a great measure, formed himself on the model of Mnesiphilus, who, he tells us, was addicted neither to the arts of rhetoric nor to the speculations of physical philosophy; but was a man of sound, strong, practical, good sense. With nothing of the sophist about him, he applied himself entirely to politics, and was a good specimen of an Athenian statesman of the old school of Solon. This intellectual connection of his with the great legislator is, by a bold fiction of chronology, converted into one of personal friendship, in the Banquet of the Seven Sages, ascribed to Plutarch. (Herod. viii. 57, &c.; Plut. Them. 2, 11, de Herod. Malign. 37, Conv. Sept. Sapp. 11.) [E. E.]

MNESIOTOLEMUS (Μνησιτολέμος), an historical writer, who was in great favour with Antiochus the Great. (Athen. xv. p. 697, d.) He was satirised by the comic poet Epicharmus. (Athen. x. p. 432, b.) [C. P. M.]

MNESISTRATUS. 1. An astronomer mentioned by Censorinus (de Die Nat. c. 18). He was the author of a modification of the cycle, called ἀνατολὴς.

2. A native of Thasos, a disciple of Plato. (Diog. Laërt. iii. 47.)

There was a sect of philosophers called Mnesistratæans, but who their founder was is not known. (Athen. vii. p. 279.) [C. P. M.]

MNESITHEUS or MNASITHEUS, a Sicyonian painter of some note. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. c. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

MNESITHEUS (Μνησίθεος), a physician, who was a native of Athens, and lived probably in the fourth century B.C., as he is quoted by the comic poet Alexis (ap. Athen. Deipn. x. § 14. p. 419). He belonged to the medical sect of the Dogmatici (Galen, Introd. c. 4, vol. xiv. p. 683, De Venas Sect. adv. Erasistr. c. 5, vol. xi. p. 163). He enjoyed a great reputation, and was particularly celebrated for his classification of diseases (Id. ad Glauco. de Meth. Med. l. 1, vol. xi. p. 3). He wrote a work "On Diet," Περὶ Ἑσθιῶν, or, according to Galen (De Alim. Facult. ii. 61, vol. vi. p. 645), Περὶ Ἑσθιμάτων, which is several times quoted by Athenæus (ii. 54, 57, iii. 80, 92, 96, 106, 121, viii. 357, &c.). He wrote another work, Περὶ Κωθυσμῶν, "On Tippling" (Id. Ibid. xi. 483), in which he recommended this practice. He is frequently mentioned by Galen, and generally in favourable terms; as also by Rufus Ephesius, A. Gellius (xiii. 30), Soranus (De Arte Obetetr. pp. 184, 201), Pliny (H. N. xxi. 9), Plutarch (Quæst. Nat. c. 26, vol. v. p. 334, ed. Tauchn.), and Oribasius (Coll. Medic. viii. 9, 38, pp. 342, 357). See also Dietz's Scholia in Hippocr. et Gal. vol. i. pp. 239, 240, 241; and Matthæi's Collection, entitled "XXI. Vet. et Clar. Medicor. Græc. Opusc." His tomb was still existing in Attica in the time of Pausanias (Att. c. 37. § 3).

2. A physician of Cyzicus in Mysia, quoted by

Oribasius (Coll. Medic. iv. 4, p. 251). See also Matthæi's Collection quoted above. [W. A. G.]

MNESITIMUS or MNASITIMUS, a painter of some note, was the son and disciple of Aristonides. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. c. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

MNESTER (Μνηστήρ). 1. A celebrated pantomime actor in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius. The former emperor prized Mnester's acting so highly, that he used to kiss him before the audience, and once chastised with his own hands an eques who had made some disturbance during his performance. It was accounted among the portents of Caligula's death that on the morning of his assassination Mnester played a character which the tragedian Neoptolemus, centuries before, had acted on the day of Philip of Macedon's murder by Pausanias, B.C. 336. Under Claudius Mnester retained his popularity and his favour at court. He was among the many lovers of Poppæa Sabina, the mother of Nero's empress, and of Messalina, the wife of Claudius. [MESSALINA.] At first, through dread of the emperor, Mnester rejected Messalina's advances. But she had the art to persuade her imbecile husband to command the reluctant player to be compliant to her in all things; and, till supplanted by C. Silius, he remained her favourite. That she might have his society without interruption, she compelled him to abandon the stage, and thereby nearly occasioned a serious riot at Rome, for the people resented the sacrifice of their pleasures to those of the empress. The tumult was in some measure appeased by a foolish excuse which Claudius assigned for Mnester's absence: he told the people that "Mnester belonged to his wife—he had no power to make him act." On the triumph for the campaign in Britain, A.D. 44, the brass money issued in Caligula's reign was called in and melted down, and part of the metal cast into statues of Mnester. He was involved in Messalina's ruin, and was put to death pleading the emperor's own order of compliance to her will. (Suet. Cal. 36, 55, 57; Tac. Ann. xi. 4, 36; Sen. Mort. Claud. ed. Bipont. p. 256; Dion Cass. lx. 22, 28, 31.)

2. A freedman of Agrippina, the mother of Nero, who, after her death, either from grief for his patroness, or from dread of exile, slew himself on her tomb, near Misenum, A.D. 60. (Tac. Ann. xiv. 9.) [W. B. D.]

MNESTHEUS, a Trojan, who accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and is described by Virgil as the ancestral hero of the Memmii. (Virg. Aen. v. 117, &c.) [L. S.]

MOA'GETES, tyrant of the Cibyrates, in Upper Phrygia, had made himself conspicuous by his enmity to Rome during the war with Antiochus the Great. In B.C. 189, the consul Cn. Manlius Vulso, condemned Moagetes to pay a fine of 100 talents and to furnish 10,000 medimni of wheat for the use of the legions. (Polyb. xxii. 17; Liv. xxxviii. 14.) [W. B. D.]

MOCHUS (Μωχός) a native of Phœnicia, the author of a work on Phœnician history quoted by Athenæus (iii. p. 126, a). Strabo (xvi. p. 757) speaks of one Mochus or Moschus (the reading varies) of Sidon, as the author of the atomic theory, and says that he was more ancient than the Trojan war. This statement he gives on the authority of Posidonius. It is impossible, of course, to tell from such a scanty notice whether he refers to the same person, or whether he really lived so early.

It has generally been supposed that the Ochnus mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (i. 1) is the same person as the Mochus referred to by Athenæus. Suidas also calls him Ochnus; but he has evidently only copied the passage in Diogenes Laërtius. But the mistake, if it is one, may easily have crept into the MSS. before his time. Josephus (Ant. Jud. i. 8. s. 5) refers to Mochus, as do also Tatianus (adv. Gent. p. 217) and Eusebius (Præp. Evang. x. p. 289). (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 226, vol. iii. p. 807; Vossius, de Hist. Græc. p. 471, ed. Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

MOCILLA, L. JULIUS, a man of prætorian rank, who espoused the republican party after the death of Julius Caesar, and fought in the army of Cassius and Brutus at the battle of Philippi (s. c. 42). After the loss of that battle he fled to Samothrace, with his son and others of his party, and their wants were supplied by Pomponius Atticus, who sent from Epeirus every thing that they needed. (Corn. Nep. Attic. 11.)

MODERATUS, a native of Gades, a distinguished follower of the Pythagorean system, who flourished in the time of the emperor Nero. He wrote a work on the dogmas of his sect. He was a man of considerable eloquence, and was to some extent imitated by Iamblichus. (Porphy. p. 32; Suidas, s. v. Μόδερα.) A fragment of his is preserved in Stobæus (Eclog. p. 3). [C. P. M.]

MODESTINUS, HERENNIIUS, a Roman jurist, and a pupil of Ulpian, whom Modestinus cites in terms of high commendation. (Dig. 26. tit. 6. s. 2.) His name, Herennius, is mentioned in a passage of Ulpian (Dig. 47. tit. 2. s. 53. § 20), if the Herennius Modestinus there mentioned is the jurist, which we assume to be the fact. The words of Ulpian, "Herennio Modestino studioso meo de Dalmatia consulenti rescripsi," are ambiguous: some take them to mean that Modestinus was a native of Dalmatia, which cannot be the meaning of the words; others more probably take the words to mean that Modestinus was then in Dalmatia. But the assumption that he was proconsul of Dalmatia is not proved by the words of Ulpian, who would hardly have omitted his title if Modestinus held that rank. All that we can conclude from the words of Ulpian is that Modestinus asked his advice about Dalmatia. Zimmern says that "he may have been the person who in the year 979 (A. D. 226), as proconsul of Dalmatia, decided an eighteen years' suit;" and this decision, he says, is mentioned in an inscription in Fabretti (p. 278). This is one of the strangest blunders ever made. The matter is stated correctly by Puchta. (Cursus, vol. i. p. 489.) The name of Herennius Modestinus occurs in an inscription, which inscription also states that the first decision in the matter referred to by the inscription was made by Aelius Florianus; it was confirmed by Herennius Modestinus, and again confirmed by Faltonius Restitutus, præfectus vigiliæ. This inscription was found at Rome, and it contains nothing about Dalmatia; and yet the conclusion of Zimmern is that the passage in Ulpian, which was probably written in the time of Caracalla, and this inscription, which records a judgment in the time of Alexander Severus, establish the fact of Modestinus being governor of Dalmatia.

Modestinus was writing under Alexander Severus, as appears from the terms in which he mentions the emperor (Dig. 48. tit. 10. s. 29); and he was one of his consilarii. He also taught law to the younger Maximinus. (Capitol. Maximin. Jun. 1.) In a rescript of Gordian (A. D. 239) mention is made of a Responsum which Modestinus had given to the person to whom the rescript is directed. (Cod. 3. tit. 42. s. 5.) Modestinus often cites Ulpian, and he is cited by Aurelius Arcadius Charisius.

Though Modestinus is the latest of the great Roman jurists, he ranks among the most distinguished. There are 345 excerpts in the Digest from his writings, the titles of which show the extent and variety of his labours.

Modestinus wrote both in Greek and Latin. From the six books of Excursationes, which were written in Greek, an extract, which contains the beginning of the work, is preserved in the Digest (27. tit. 1). There are also excerpts from the nine books of Differentiæ, ten books of Regulæ, nineteen books of Responsa, twelve books of Pandectæ, from which there are many extracts, four books on Poenæ, and the single treatises De Evadenti Caribus, De Erematicis or Hærematicis, De Inofficioso Testamento, De Maximianianis, and De Præscriptionibus. This last work must be distinguished from another of the same name, which is not mentioned in the Florentine Index, and which consisted of four books at least. (Dig. 46. tit. 1. s. 101.) Other works were, De Ritus Nuptiarum, De Differentiis Dotis, and the single treatises De Legatis et Fideicommissis, and De Testamentis, which are mentioned in the Florentine Index.

The Florentine Index does not mention the Libri ad Quintum Mucium, though there are two excerpts from this work in the Digest, from the fourteenth and thirty-first books respectively. (Dig. 41. tit. 1. s. 53, 54.)

A rescript of the emperors Septimius Severus and Antoninus Caracalla, A. D. 204 (Cod. 4. tit. 2. s. 1), can hardly have been directed to this Modestinus, who lived to the time of Gordian; for it is dated thirty-five years before the time of Gordian, and, besides this, the demand of Modestinus is characterised as neither equitable nor usual. (G. Groen. Vitæ Jurisconsultorum, &c.; Puchta, Cursus der Institutionen, vol. i. p. 459; Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, p. 383; Fabretti, Inscript. Antiq., Romæ, 1699, p. 278.) [G. L.]

MODESTUS. 1. The author of a Libellus de Vocabulis Rei Militaris, addressed to the emperor Tacitus. It contains an explanation of some common terms, and an outline of the system pursued at that period in classifying and disciplining soldiers. It is very brief, and presents no features of interest or importance. The compiler has been most unjustly charged with copying Vegetius, who flourished nearly a century later under Valentinianus.

Modestus first appeared in a 4to volume without date and without name of place or printer, but which, according to the best bibliographical authorities, was printed at Rome by Jo. Schæffer de Bopardia about 1474, and contains also Pomponius Laetus de Magistratibus Urbis. The tract was subsequently included in all the chief collections of Scriptores de Re Militari, and appears under its best form in the edition of that Corpus published with the notes of Stevechius, Modius, and Schæfferius at Wesel (Vesalia Civorum), 8vo. 1680.

2. The name of Modestus is prefixed to three elegiac disticha in the Latin Anthology, the words of the dying Lucretia. The verses are very bad, and we know nothing of the author. (Burmamn, Anthol. Lat. ii. 171, No. 557, Meyer.) [W. R.]

MODESTUS, JU'LIUS, a freedman of Julius Hyginus, who was himself a freedman of the emperor Augustus [HYGINUS], followed in the footsteps of his patron, and like him became distinguished as a Roman grammarian. He wrote a work entitled Quaestiones Confusae, in at least two books, containing, as it would seem, discussions on various grammatical and antiquarian subjects. (Suet. de Illust. Gramm. 20; Gell. iii. 9; Macrobian. Saturn. i. 4, 10, 16.)

MO'DIUS, a Roman name, which rarely occurs. Varro (de Re Rust. ii. 7) speaks of a Q. Modius Equiculus, and Cicero (Ferr. ii. 48) of a M. Modius. Juvenal (iii. 130) also mentions a rich Roman matron of the name of Modia.

MOERAGENES (Μοιραγενής), one of the royal body-guards at the Egyptian court, was suspected by the profligate Agathocles, who had been minister of Ptolemy Philopater, and was now guardian of the young Epiphaneus, of being leagued with Tlepolemus and others in a conspiracy against him. Agathocles accordingly ordered Nicostratus, his secretary, to examine Moeragenes with torture. When the latter had been stripped for this purpose, a servant entered and whispered something in the ear of Nicostratus, who immediately left the room in great agitation. The attendants, who were to have administered the torture, gazed at one another in wonder for some time, and then one by one withdrew. Moeragenes, thus left alone, fled forth, naked as he was, to a tent near the palace, where a party of soldiers were taking their mid-day meal, and by his exhortations incited them to raise the tumult which ended in the murder of Agathocles and his family, B.C. 202. (Polyb. xv. 27, &c.) [AGATHOCLEA.] [E. E.]

MOERIS or MYRIS (Μοῖρις, Μύρις), a king of Egypt, who, Herodotus tells us, reigned some 900 years before his own visit to that country, which seems to have been about B.C. 450. According to Diodorus, he was twelve generations after Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. We hear of Moeris that he erected the northern gateway of the temple of Hephæstus at Memphis, and that he formed the lake known by his name and joined it by a canal to the Nile, in order to receive the waters of the river when they were superabundant, and to supply the defect when they did not rise sufficiently. In the lake he built two pyramids, on each of which was a stone statue, seated on a throne, and intended to represent himself and his wife. The revenue from the fishing of the lake was very large, and was given to the queen for her personal expences in dress and perfumes. According to a statement of Anticleides, quoted by Diogenes Laërtius, Moeris was the discoverer of the elements of geometry. (Herod. ii. 13, 101, 149; Diod. i. 52; Plin. H. N. v. 9, xxxvi. 13; Strab. xvii. pp. 789, 809, 810; Diog. Laërt. viii. 11; comp. Menag. ad loc.; Plat. Phædr. p. 274; Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. ii. p. 198, &c.) [E. E.]

MOERIS (Μοῖρις), commonly called MOERIS ATTICISTA, a distinguished grammarian, the author of a work which is still extant, entitled Μοῖριδος Ἀττικιστοῦ Λέξεις Ἀττικῶν καὶ Ἑλληνῶν κατὰ στοιχείον, though the title varies somewhat in different manuscripts. Photius (Cod. 157) gives Ἀττικιστής as the name of the treatise itself. In some manuscripts the name of the author is given as Eumoeiris or Eumoeirides. Of the personal history of the author nothing is known. He is conjectured to have lived about the end of the second century after Christ. His treatise is a sort of comparison of the Attic with other Greek dialects; consisting of a list of Attic words and expressions, which are illustrated or explained by those of other dialects, especially the common Greek. Though various manuscripts had been referred to by different scholars, the work was first published in 1712, at Oxford, edited by Hudson. A better edition is that by Pierson. More recent editions have appeared in Germany by Koch and Jacobitz. [C. P. M.]

MOERO (Μοῖρῶς), or MYRO (Μυρῶς), a Byzantine poetess, the wife of Andromachus surnamed Philologus, and mother of the grammarian and tragic poet Homerus [HOMERUS]. She wrote epic, elegiac, and lyric poems. Athenæus (xi. p. 490, e.) quotes a passage from a poem written by her, named Μνημοσύνη. Eustathius (ad Il. ii. p. 247) mentions a hymn to Poseidon, the production of Myro, who is probably identical with Moero, who is called Myro by Suidas. One of her epigrams is contained in the Anthology (iv. 1). Other fragments are given in Brunck's Anal. vol. i. p. 202. (Suidas, s. v. Μυρῶς, with Küster's note; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 131, &c.; Groddeck, Initia Hist. Græc. Lit. ii. p. 4.) [C. P. M.]

MOEROCLES (Μοιροκλῆς), an Athenian orator, a native of Salamis. He was a contemporary of Demosthenes, and like him an opponent of Philip and Alexander, and was one of the anti-Macedonian orators whom Alexander demanded to have given up to him after the destruction of Thebes, though he subsequently withdrew his demand on the mediation of Demades. (Arrian, i. 10. § 7.) We find mention of him as the advocate of Theocrines [THEOCRINES], and in the oration against Theocrines, which is usually placed among those of Demosthenes (p. 1339, ed. Reiske), he is spoken of as the author of a decree in accordance with which the Athenians and their allies joined their forces for the suppression of piracy. On one occasion he was prosecuted by Eubulus for an act of extortion practised upon those who rented the silver mines (Dem. de Falsa Leg. c. 81, p. 435), and Timocles, the comic poet (ap. Athen. viii. p. 341) speaks of him as having received bribes from Harpalus. At one period of his life he had been imprisoned, though we do not know on what charge. He was afterwards the accuser of the sons of Lycurgus, according to Demosthenes (Epist. 3, p. 1478). According to Plutarch, however, it was Menesæchmus on whose charge they were imprisoned (Vit. X. Orat. p. 8428). Moerocles is mentioned by Aristotle (Ihet. iii. 10). [C. P. M.]

MOIRA (Μοῖρα) properly signifies "a share," and as a personification "the deity who assigns to every man his fate or his share," or the Fates. Homer usually speaks of only one Moira, and only once mentions the Μοῖραι in the plural. (Il. xxiv. 29.) In his poems Moira is fate personified, which, at the birth of man, spins out the thread of his future life (Il. xxiv. 209), follows his steps, and directs the consequences of his actions according to the counsel of the gods. (Il. v. 613, xx. 5.) Homer thus, when he personifies Fate, conceives her as spinning, an act by which αἶσα the power of other gods over the life of man is expressed. (Il. xxiv. 525, Od. i. 17, iii. 208, iv. 208.) But the personification of his Moira is not complete, for he mentions no particular appearance of the goddess, no attributes, and no parentage; and his Moira is therefore quite synonymous with Alora. (Il. xx. 127, xxiv. 209.) If in Od. vii. 197. the Karaidōtes are the Moirae, and not the Eileithyiae, as some suppose, Alora and Moira would indeed be two distinct beings, but still beings performing entirely the same functions.

The Homeric Moira is not, as some have thought, an inflexible fate, to which the gods themselves must bow; but, on the contrary, Zeus, as the father of gods and men, weighs out their fate to them (Il. viii. 69, xxii. 209; comp. xix. 108); and if he chooses, he has the power of saving even those who are already on the point of being seized by their fate (Il. xvi. 434, 441, 443); nay, as Fate does not abruptly interfere in human affairs, but avails herself of intermediate causes, and determines the lot of mortals not absolutely, but only conditionally, even man himself, in his freedom, is allowed to exercise a certain influence upon her. (Od. i. 84, Il. ix. 411, xvi. 685.) As man's fate terminates at his death, the goddess of fate at the close of life becomes the goddess of death, μῆϊσα θανάτῳ (Od. xxiv. 29, ii. 100, iii. 238), and is mentioned along with death itself, and with Apollo, the bringer of death. (Il. iii. 101, v. 83, xvi. 434, 853, xx. 477, xxi. 101, xxiv. 132.)

Hesiod (Theog. 217, &c., 904; comp. Apollod. i. 3. § 1) has the personification of the Moirae complete; for he calls them, together with the Keres, daughters of Night; and distinguishes three, viz. Clotho, or the spinning fate; Lachesis, or the one who assigns to man his fate; and Atropos, or the fate that cannot be avoided. According to this genealogy, the Moirae must be considered as in a state of dependence upon their father, and as agreeing with his counsels. Hence he is called Μοιραγένης, i. e. the guide or leader of the Moirae (Paus. v. 15. § 4), and hence also they were represented along with their father in temples and works of art, as at Megara (Paus. i. 40. § 3), in the temple of Despoena in Arcadia (viii. 37. § 1), and at Delphi (x. 24. § 4; comp. viii. 42. § 2). They are further described as engraving on indestructible tables the decrees of their father Zeus. (Claudian, xv. 202; comp. Ov. Met. xv. 808, &c.) Later writers differ in their genealogy of the Moirae from that of Hesiod; thus they are called children of Erebus and Night (Cic. De Nat. Deor. iii. 17), of Cronos and Night (Tzet. ad Lyc. 406), of Ge and Oceanus (Athenag. 15; Lycoph. 144), or lastly of Ananke or Necessity. (Plat. De Re Publ. p. 617, d.)

It cannot be surprising to find that the character and nature of the Moirae were conceived differently at different times and by different authors. Sometimes they appear as divinities of fate in the strict sense of the term, and sometimes only as allegorical divinities of the duration of human life. In the former character they are independent, at the helm of necessity, direct fate, and watch that the fate assigned to every being by eternal laws may take its course without obstruction (Aeschyl. Prom. 511, 515); and Zeus, as well as the other gods and men, must submit to them. (Herod. i. 91; Lactant. Institut. i. 11, 13; Stob. Eclog. i. pp. 152, 170.) They assign to the Erinnyes, who inflict the punishment for evil deeds, their proper functions; and with them they direct fate according to the laws of necessity, whence they are sometimes called the sisters of the Erinnyes. (Aeschyl. Eum. 335, 962, Prom. 516, 696, 895; Tzet. ad Lyc. 406.) Later poets also conceive the Moirae in the same character. (Virg. Aen. v. 798, xii. 147; Tibull. i. 8. 2; Ov. Trist. v. 3. 17, Med. xv. 781; Horat. Carm. Saec. 25, &c.) These grave and mighty goddesses were represented by the earliest artists with staffs or sceptres, the symbol of dominion; and Plato (De Re Publ. p. 617) even mentions their crowns. (Mus. Pio-Clem. tom. vi. tab. B.)

The Moirae, as the divinities of the duration of human life, which is determined by the two points of birth and of death, are conceived either as goddesses of birth or as goddesses of death, and hence their number was two, as at Delphi. (Paus. x. 24. § 4; Plut. de Tranq. An. 15, de Ei ap. Delph. 2.) From this circumstance we may perhaps infer that originally the Greeks conceived of only one Moira, and that subsequently a consideration of her nature and attributes led to the belief in two, and ultimately in three Moirae; though a distribution of the functions among the three was not strictly observed, for in Ovid, for example (Ad Liv. 239), and Tibullus (i. 8. 1.), all three are described as spinning, although this should be the function of Clotho alone, who is, in fact, often mentioned alone as the representative of all. (Pind. Ol. i. 40; Ov. Ad Liv. 164, Fast. vi. 757, Ex Pont. iv. 15. 36.) As goddesses of birth, who spin the thread of beginning life, and even prophesy the fate of the newly born, they are mentioned along with Eileithyia, who is called their companion and ῥαδισπός. (Paus. viii. 21. § 2; Plat. Sympos. p. 206, d.; Pind. Ol. vi. 70, Nem. vii. 1; Anton. Lib. 29; comp. Enrip. Iphig. Taur. 207.) In a similar capacity they are also joined with Prometheus, the former, or creator of the human race in general. (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 15.) The symbol with which they, or rather Clotho alone, are represented to indicate this function, is a spindle, and the idea implied in it was carried out so far, that sometimes we read of their breaking or cutting off the thread when life is to end. (Ov. Am. ii. 6. 46; Plat. de Re Publ. p. 616.) Being goddesses of fate, they must necessarily know the future, which at times they reveal, and thus become prophetic divinities. (Ov. Met. viii. 454, Trist. v. 3. 25; Tibull. i. 8. 1, iv. 5. 3; Caull. 64. 307.) As goddesses of death, they appear together with the Keres (Hes. Scat. Horr. 258) and the infernal Erinnyes, with whom they are even confounded, and in the neighbourhood of Sicily the annual sacrifices offered to them were the same as those offered to the Erinnyes. (Paus. ii. 11. § 4; comp. Schol. ad Aesch. Agam. 70; Aelian, H. A. x. 33; Serv. ad Aen. i. 86.) It belongs to the same character that, along with the Charites, they lead Persephone out of the lower world into the regions of light, and are mentioned along with Pluto and Charon. (Orph. Hymn. 428; Ov. Fast. vi. 157; comp. Aristoph. Ran. 453.) The various epithets which poets apply to the Moirae generally refer to the severity, indelibility, and sternness of fate.

They had sanctuaries in many parts of Greece, such as Corinth (Paus. ii. 4. § 7), Sparta (iii. 11. § 8), Olympia (v. 15. § 4), Thebes (ix. 25. § 4), and elsewhere. The poets sometimes describe them as aged and hideous women, and even as lame, to indicate the slow march of fate (Catull. 64, 306; Ov. Met. xv. 781; Trütz. ad Lgc. 584); but in works of art they are represented as grave maidens, with different attributes, viz., Clotho with a spindle or a roll (the book of fate); Lachesis pointing with a staff to the horoscope on the globe; and Atropos with a pair of scales, or a sun-dial, or a cutting instrument. It is worthy of remark that the Muse Urania was sometimes represented with the same attributes as Lachesis, and that Aphrodite Urania at Athens, according to an inscription on a Hermes-pillar, was called the oldest of the Moiræ. (Paus. i. 19. § 2; comp. Welcker, Zeitschrift für alt. Kunst, p. 197, &c.; Blümner, Ueber die Idee des Schicksals, p. 115, &c.; Hirt, Mytholog. Bilderb. p. 200.)

Moiræ also occurs as the proper name of a daughter of Cinyras, who is more commonly called Smyrna. (Schol. ad Theocrit. i. 109.) [L. S.]

MOIRA/GETES (Μοιραγέτης), the guide or leader of fate, occurs as a surname of Zeus and Apollo at Delphi. (Paus. x. 24. § 4.) [L. S.]

MOLAE, Roman divinities, are called daughters of Mars. (Gell. xiii. 22.) Hartung (Die Relig. d. Röm. vol. i. p. 130) is inclined to consider their name to be identical with Mōai and Μούσαι, and accordingly thinks that they were the same as the Camenæ; but in another passage (vol. ii. p. 172) he admits the probability that, as their name plainly indicates, they were in some way connected with the pounding or grinding of grain. [L. S.]

MO'LION (Μολίων). 1. One of the sons of Eurytus who were slain by Heracles along with their father. (Diod. iv. 37; comp. EURYTUS.)

2. A Trojan, the charioteer of Thymbraeus. (Hom. Il. xi. 322.) [L. S.]

MO'LIONE. [MOLIONES.]

MO'LIONES or MOLIO'NIDAE (Μολίονες, Μολιονίδαι), a patronymic name by which Eurytus and Cteatus, the sons of Actor, or Poseidon, by Molione, are often designated. They were nephews of Augæas, king of the Epeians. As sons of Actor, they are also called Actoridae, or 'Ακτορίδαι. (Hom. Il. xxiii. 638; Ov. Met. viii. 308.) According to a late tradition, they were born out of an egg (Athen. ii. p. 58); and it is further stated, that he two brothers were grown together, so that they had only one body, but two heads, four arms, and four legs. (Athen. l. c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 882; 'Hercyid. Fragm. 47, ed. Sturz; Plut. De frat. am..)

Homer mentions none of these extraordinary circumstances; and, according to him, the Moliones, when yet boys, took part in an expedition the Epeians against Neleus and the Pylians. (Z. xi. 709, 750.)

When Heracles marched against Augæas to chastise him for refusing to give a reward he had promised, he entrusted the conduct of the war to the Moliones; but Heracles, who, in the mean time was taken ill and concluded peace with Augæas, was then himself attacked and slain by them. In order to take vengeance, he afterwards slew them near Cleonæ, on the frontiers Argolis, as they had been sent from Elis to officiate at the Isthmian games, on behalf of the Argives. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 2; Pind. Ol. xi. 33, &c., and the Schol.; Paus. viii. 14. § 6.) The Eleians branded of the Argives to atone for this murder; as the latter refused, and were not excluded from the Isthmian games, Molione cursed the Argives who should ever take part again in those games. (Paus. v. 2. § 1.) Heracles, on the other hand, dedicated, on account of his victory, six altars at Olympia, and instituted special honours at Nemea for the 360 Cleoneans who had assisted him, but had fallen in the contest. (Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xi. 29; Aelian, V. H. iv. 5.) The Moliones are also mentioned as conquerors of Nestor in the chariot race, and as having taken part in the Calydonian hunt. (Athen. l. c.; Hom. Il. xxiii. 638, &c.; Ov. Met. viii. 308.) (Cteatus was the father of Amphimachus by Theronice; and Eurytus, of Thaliptus by Theraphone. (Hom. Il. ii. 620; Paus. v. 3. § 4.) Their tomb was shown in later times at Cleonæ. (Paus. ii. 15. § 1; comp. TARAXIPPUS.) [L. S.]

MOLLI'CVLUS, MINU'CIUS. [AUGURINUS, No. 9.]

MOLON (Μόλων), a general of Antiochus the Great, who held the satrapy of Media at the accession of that monarch (a. c. 223); in addition to which, Antiochus conferred upon him and his brother Alexander the government of all the upper provinces of his empire. But their hatred to Hermeias, the chief minister of Antiochus, soon led them both to revolt: the two generals at first sent against them by the king were unable to oppose their progress, and Molon found himself at the head of a large army, and master of the whole country to the east of the Tigris. He was, however, foiled in his attempts to pass that river; but Xenoctas, the general of Antiochus, who was now sent against him with a large force, having ventured to cross it in his turn, was surprised by Molon, and his whole army cut to pieces. The rebel satrap now crossed the Tigris, and made himself master of the city of Seleucia together with the whole of Babylonia and Mesopotamia. But the formidable character which the insurrection had thus assumed, at length determined Antiochus to march in person against the rebels. After wintering at Nisibis, he crossed the Tigris, a. c. 220, and advanced southwards against Molon, who marched from Babylon to meet him. A pitched battle ensued, in which the desertion of the left wing of the rebel army at once decided the victory in favour of the king. Molon himself put an end to his own life, to avoid falling into the hands of the enemy; but his body was crucified by order of Antiochus, or rather of his minister Hermeias. (Polyb. v. 40—54; Trog. Pomp. Prod. xxx.) [E. H. R.]

MOLON (Μόλων). 1. A tragic actor of the time of Aristophanes. (Aristoph. Ran. 55.) According to the scholiast, Aristophanes in the passage referred to is speaking ironically, for Molon was a very large man. The scholiast also informs us that Molon had a contemporary of the same name, who was a notorious thief.

2. A surname of Apollonius, the rhetorician of Rhodes. [APOLLONIUS, No. 3.] [C. P. M.]

MOLORCHUS (Μόλορχος), the mythical founder of Molorchia, near Nemea, was a poor man of Cleonæ, who hospitably received Heracles when he went out to slay the Nemean lion. (Stephan. Byzant. s. v. Μόλορχία; Apollod. ii. 5. § 1.) [L. S.]

MOLOSSUS (Μολοσσός), a son of Pyrrhus, or Neoptolemus, and Andromache, from whom the country of Molossia was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. i. 11. § 1; Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 56; Serv. ad Aen. iii. 297.) [L. S.]

MOLPADIA (Μολπαδία), an Amazon, who was said to have killed Antiope, another Amazon, and was afterwards slain herself by Theseus. Her tomb was shown at Athens. (Plut. Thea. 27; Paus. i. 2. § 1.) [L. S.]

MOLPA'GORAS (Μολπαγόρας), a demagogue of Cios, in Bithynia, who, by the usual arts of his class, raised himself to absolute power in his state. To the imprudence of the men of Cios, in placing confidence in him and in persons like him, Polybius ascribes mainly the capture of their city by Philip V. of Macedon, in B. C. 202. (Polyb. xv. 21; comp. Liv. xxxii. 33, 34.) [E. E.]

MOLPIS (Μόλπις), a Laconian, the author of a work on the constitution and customs of the Lacedaemonians, entitled Λακεδαιμονίων πολιτεία, quoted by Athenaeus (iv. p. 140, xiv. p. 664). [C. P. M.]

MOLPIS (Μόλπις), a Greek surgeon mentioned by Heracleides of Tarentum (ap. Gal. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iv. 40, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 736), who must therefore have lived in or before the third century B. C. He wrote apparently on fractures and luxations. [W. A. G.]

MOLUS (Μῶλος or Μόλος). 1. A son of Ares and Demonicæ, and a brother of Thestius. (Apollod. i. 7. § 7. DEMONICÆ.)

2. A son of Deucalion, and father of Meriones. (Hom. Il. x. 269, xiii. 279; Apollod. iii. 3. § 1; Diod. v. 79; Hygin. Fab. 97; comp. MERIONES.) According to a Cretan legend, he was a son of Minos, and a brother of Deucalion (Diod. l. c.); and it was said, that as he had attempted to violate a nymph, he was afterwards found without a head; for at a certain festival in Crete they showed the image of a man without a head, who was called Molus. (Plut. De Def. Orac. 13.) [L. S.]

MOMUS (Μῶμος), a son of Nyx, is a personification of mockery and censure. (Hes. Theog. 214.) Thus he is said to have censured in the man formed by Hephaestus, that a little door had not been left in his breast, so as to enable one to look into his secret thoughts. (Lucian, Hermotim. 20.) Aphrodite alone was, according to him, blameless. (Philost. Ep. 21.) [L. S.]

MONAÆSES (Μοναῖσις). 1. One of the most distinguished men in Parthia in the time of Antony, the triumvir, is spoken of in Vol. I. p. 357, a.

2. A general of the Parthian king, Vologeses I. [See Vol. I. p. 358, b.]

MONETA, a surname of Juno among the Romans, by which she was characterised as the protectress of money. Under this name she had a temple on the Capitoline, in which there was at the same time the mint, just as the public treasury was in the temple of Saturn. The temple had been vowed by the dictator L. Furius in a battle against the Aurunci, and was erected on the spot where the house of M. Manlius Capitolinus had stood. (Liv. iv. 7, 20, vi. 20, vii. 28, xlii. 1; Ov. Fast. i. 638, vi. 183.) Moneta signifies the mint, and such a surname cannot be surprising, as we learn from St. Augustine (De Civ. Dei. vii. 11), that Jupiter bore the surname of Pecunia; but some writers found such a meaning too plain, and Livius Andronicus, in the beginning of his translation of the Odyssey, used Moneta as a translation of Μνημοσύνη, and thus made her the mother of the Muses or Camenæ. (Comp. Hygin. Fab. Praef.) Cicero (de Dir. i. 43, ii. 32) relates an etymological tale. During an earthquake, he says, a voice was heard issuing from the temple of Juno on the Capitol, and admonishing (monens) that a pregnant sow should be sacrificed. A somewhat more probable reason for the name is given by Suidas (s. v. Μοῦνη), though he assigns it to too late a time. In the war with Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, he says, the Romans being in want of money, prayed to Juno, and were told by the goddess, that money would not be wanting to them, so long as they would fight with the arms of justice. As the Romans by experience found the truth of the words of Juno, they called her Juno Moneta. Her festival was celebrated on the first of June. (Ov. Fast. vi. 183, &c.; Macrobi. Sat. i. 12.) [L. S.]

MO'NIMA (Μοῦνη), daughter of Philopoemen, a citizen of Stratoniceia, in Ionia, or according to Plutarch, of Mileta. At the capture of her native city by Mithridates, in A. C. 88, her beauty made a great impression on the conqueror, but she had the courage to refuse all his offers, until he consented to marry her, and bestow on her the rank and title of queen. She at first exercised great influence over her husband, but this did not last long, and she soon found but too much reason to repent her elevation, which had the effect of removing her from Greek civilisation and consigning her to a splendid imprisonment. When Mithridates was compelled to abandon his own dominions and take refuge in Armenia, B. C. 72, Monima was put to death at Pharnacia, together with the other wives and sisters of the fugitive monarch. Her correspondence with Mithridates, which was of a licentious character, fell into the hands of Pompey at the capture of the fortress of Caenon Phronion. (Appian, Mithr. 21, 27, 48; Plut. Lucul. 18, Pomp. 37.) [F. H. B.]

MO'NIMUS (Μόνιμος), son of Pythion, a Macedonian officer, who espoused the cause of Olympias in her final struggle with Cassander, and was one of the last who remained faithful to her; but finding himself unable to relieve her at Pydna, he withdrew to Pella, which city he held for a time, but surrendered it to Cassander after the fall of Pydna, B. C. 316. (Diod. xix. 50.) From an anecdote related by Phylarchus (ap. Athen. xiii. p. 609, b), it appears that he had been attached to the court of Olympias for some time. [E. H. B.]

MO'NIUS. [MONUNIVS.]

MONOBA'ZUS (Μονόβαζος), was king or tetrarch of Adiabene in A. D. 63, when Tigraes, king of Armenia, invaded his kingdom. Monobazus applied for aid to Vologeses, the Parthian monarch; and the troops of Adiabene and Parthia entered Armenia, and invested its capital, Tigranocerta. Monobazus afterwards accompanied Vologeses to the camp of Corbulo (Consul) at Randaia, to negotiate a truce between Parthia and Rome. The sons of Monobazus were in the suite of Tiridates on his visit to Nero in A. D. 66. (Tac. Ann. xv. 1, 14; Dion Cass. lxi. 20, 23, lxii. 1.) [W. B. D.]

MONOECUS (Μονοῦκος), a surname of Hercules, signifying the god who lives solitary, perhaps because he alone was worshipped in the temples dedicated to him. (Strab. iv. p. 202; Virg. Aen. vi. 831; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 87.) In Liguria there was a temple called Monoecus (now Monaco; Strab. Virg. U. c.; Tacit. Hist. iii. 42; Steph. Byz. s. v.). [L. S.]

MONTANUS, ALPINUS. [ALPINUS.]

MONTA'NUS, ATTICI'NUS, legatus in Trajan's reign to Lustricus Bruttianus (Mart. iv. 22), was accused by him of various misdemeanours, and of destroying the evidence which had been collected to prove them. Montanus brought against his accuser a counter-charge of malversation in his province. But it completely failed, and Trajan, who presided in person at the trial, condemned Montanus to banishment. (Plin. Ep. vi. 22.) [W.B.D.]

MONTA'NUS, CURTIUS, was accused by Epirus Marcellus in A. D. 67 of libelling Nero. The charge was disproved, but Montanus was exiled. At his father's petition, however, he was shortly afterwards recalled, on condition of abstaining from all public employments. In A. D. 71 Montanus was present in the senate, and, on Domitian's moving the restoration of Galba's titles and statues, he proposed that the decree against Piso also should be rescinded. At the same time Montanus vehemently attacked the notorious de-lator, Aquilius Regulus. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 28, 29, 33, Hist. iv. 40, 42, 43.) If the same person with the Curtius Montanus satirised by Juvenal (iv. 107, 131, xi. 34), Montanus in later life sullied the fair reputation he enjoyed in youth. (Tac. Ann. xvi. 28.) For Juvenal (ll. cc.) describes him as a corpulent epicure, a parasite of Domitian, and a hackneyed declaimer. Pliny the Younger addressed two letters to Curtius Montanus (vii. 29, viii. 6.) [W. B. D.]

MONTA'NUS, JU'LIUS, a versifier of some repute in the reign of Tiberius, and one of the emperor's private friends. He is cited by Seneca the rhetorician (Contr. 16), and by Seneca the philosopher (Ep. 122). (Ovid. Ep. ex Pont. iv. 16, 11.) [W. B. D.]

MONTA'NUS, JU'LIUS, was of senatorian rank, but had borne no office when unluckily meeting Nero on one of his drunken nocturnal frolics, he defended himself and beat the emperor. The assault might have been overlooked, but Montanus recognised his assailant, and begged forgiveness. Nero then compelled Montanus to commit suicide, that he might not afterwards boast of the encounter. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 25; comp. Dion Cass. lxi. 9; Suet. Ner. 26.) [W. B. D.]

MONTA'NUS, SP. TARPEIUS CAPITOLINUS. [CAPITOLINUS, p. 606.]

MONTA'NUS, VOTI'ENUS, was an orator and declaimer in the reign of Tiberius. From his propensity to refine upon thought and diction, he was named the "Ovid" of the rhetorical schools. Seneca the rhetorician describes the eloquence of Montanus (Contr. Prooem. iv., excerpt. ix. 5), and cites him (Contr. 18, 20, 24, 25, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32). Montanus was convicted on a charge of majestas, and died an exile in the Balearic islands A. D. 25. (Tac. Ann. iv. 42; Euseb. Chron. a. 778.) [W. B. D.]

MONU'NIUS (Μονούνιος), a chief of the Illyrian tribe of the Dardanians, whose daughter Etuta was married to the Illyrian king Gentius. (Liv. xlv. 30; Athen. x. p. 440, a.) The name is corruptly written in our editions of Livy Honunius; in those of Athenæus, Menunius; the true orthography is learnt only from his coins, from which also it appears that he was master of the important Greek city of Dyrrhachium. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 157.) Probably MONIUS, which appears at an earlier period as the name of an Illyrian prince at war with Ptolemy Ceraunus (Trog. Pomp.

Prolog. xxiv), is only another corruption of the same name, perhaps that of an ancestor of the preceding. (See Droysen, Hellenism. vol. ii. p. 171.) [E. H. B.]

MON'YCHUS, a centaur who is mentioned by Ovid (Met. xii. 499) and Valerius Flaccus (i. 145). [L. S.]

MOPSUS (Μόψος). 1. A son of Amphyx or Ampycus by the nymph Chloris; and, because he was a seer, he is also called a son of Apollo by Himantia. (Hes. Scut. Herc. 181; Val. Flac. i. 384; Stat. Theb. iii. 521; comp. Orph. Arg. 127.) He was one of the Lapithæ of Oecalia or Titeron (Thessaly), and one of the Calydonian hunters. He is also mentioned among the combatants at the wedding of Peirithous, and was a famous prophet among the Argonauts. He was represented on the chest of Cypselus. (Pind. Pyth. iv. 336; Apollon. Rhod. i. 65; Hygin. Fab. 14; Ov. Met. viii. 316, xii. 456; Paus. v. 17. § 4; Strab. ix. p. 443.) He is said to have died in Libya by the bite of a snake, and to have been buried there by the Argonauts. He was afterwards worshipped as an oracular hero. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 80, iv. 1518, &c.; Tetz. ad Lyc. 881.)

2. A son of Apollo (or according to Paus. vii. 3. § 2, of Rhucius) and Manto, the daughter of Teiresias. He was believed to be the founder of Meliss in Asia Minor, where his oracle existed as late as the time of Strabo (xiv. p. 675; comp. Plut. de Def. Orac. 45; Conon, Narrat. 6). [L. S.]

MORCUS (Μάρκος), an Illyrian, who, in A. C. 168, was sent by Gentius, king of the Illyrians, to receive the hostages and the money which Perseus, king of Macedonia, had engaged to give him as the conditions of his aid against Rome. [GENTIUS.] Morcus proceeded from the court of Perseus to Rhodes, where he was lodged in the Prytæneum, and persuaded the Rhodians to declare themselves neutral for the remainder of the war between Macedon, Illyricum, and Rome. (Polyb. xxix. 2. § 9, 5 § 1; Liv. xlv. 23.) [W. B. D.]

MO'RIUS (Μόριος), that is, the protector of the sacred olive trees, occurs as a surname of Zeus. (Soph. Oed. Col. 705; comp. Liddell and Scott, Gr. Lex. s. v. Mopla.) [L. S.]

MORMO (Μορμό), a female spectre, with which the Greeks used to frighten little children. (Aristoph. Acharn. 582, Pax, 474.) Mormo was one of the same class of bugbears as Empusa and Lamia. [L. S.]

MORMO'LYCE or MORMOLYCEION (Μορμολύκη, Μορμολυκείον), the same phantom or bugbear as Mormo, and also used for the same purpose. (Philostr. Vit. Apollon. iv. 25; Menandr. Reliq. p. 145, ed. Meineke; Aristoph. Thesm. 417; Strab. i. p. 19; Stob. Ecluy. p. 1010.) [L. S.]

MORPHEUS (Μορφέος), the son of Sleep, and the god of dreams. The name signifies the fashioner or moulder, because he shaped or formed the dreams which appeared to the sleeper. (Ov. Met. xi. 635; Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 199.) [L. S.]

MORPHO (Μορφή), or the fair shaped, occurs as a surname of Aphrodite at Sparta. She was represented in a sitting posture, with her head covered, and her feet fettered. (Paus. iii. 15. § 8; Lycoph. 449.) [L. S.]

MO'RSIMUS (Μάρσιμος), a tragic poet, the son of Philocles [PHILOCLEES], and father of Astydama. He is attacked and ridiculed more than once by Aristophanes, who classes with villains of the deepest dye in Hades any one who ever copied out a speech of Morsimus. Besides his profession as a poet, he seems to have practised as a physician and oculist, in which departments, according to all accounts (Schol. ad Arist. Equit. 401; Hesychius, s. v. Κλύμενος), he was not much more successful. (Ran. 151; comp. Equit. 401, Pax. 776, with the scholia on those passages.) Frigidity seems to have been the predominant characteristic of his poetry. (Suidas, s. v.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 311; Meineke, Fragmenta Com. Graec. vol. ii. part ii. p. 659.) [C. P. M.]

MORYCHUS (Μόρυχος), a tragic poet, a contemporary of Aristophanes, noted especially for his gluttony and effeminacy. (Aristoph. Acharn. 887, Vesp. 504, 1137, Pax. 1008, with the note of the scholiast.) There was a proverb: Μορύχου εὐθρότερος, More foolish than Morychus; but whether it had reference to the tragic poet of that name, or not, we do not know. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 311; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. part i. p. 548.) [C. P. M.]

MORZES, or, according to Polybius, M'ORZIAS (Μορζίας), a king of Paphlagonia, who fought against the Romans in the Gallo-Graecian war, B. C. 189. Morzes had been conquered by Pharnaces, king of Pontus, and was indemnified in the treaty of peace imposed on the latter prince by Eumenes II. king of Pergamus, in B. C. 189—188. (Polyb. xvi. 6. § 9; Liv. xxxviii. 26; Strab. xii. p. 562.) [W. B. D.]

MOSCHAMPAR, GEORGIUS (Γεωργίος δ Μοσχάμπαρ), chartophylax magnae ecclesiae at Constantinople, was a friend and contemporary of George of Cyprus, patriarch of Constantinople A. D. 1283—1289 [ΓΕΩΡΓΙΟΣ, literary, No. 20]. He took a leading part in opposition to the doctrine of the Latin church on the procession of the Holy Spirit, and to the distinguished advocate of that church, Joannes Beccus or Veccus. He seems, however, to have had little weight even with his own party. He published several treatises in opposition to Veccus, to which the latter ably replied; but neither the attacks of the one nor the answers of the other seem to be preserved. There is a letter of Moschampar to his friend George of Cyprus, printed in the life of the latter, which was published by J. F. Bernard de Rubens, Venice, 1753. (Pachymer. Hist. i. 8; Allatius, Graec. Orthodox. vol. ii. pp. 3, 9, 10; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. pp. 46, 47, comp. vol. viii. pp. 53, 54.)

MOSCHION (Μοσχίων). 1. A tragic and comic poet, mentioned more than once by Stobaeus, who has preserved the names of three of his plays. 1. Θερμοστοκλής. 2. Τηλεφος. 3. Φεραίοι. (Stobaeus, Ecl. Phys. i. 38; Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. p. 623; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 311.)

2. A Greek writer, who drew up an account of the construction of the enormous ship which was built by command of Hieron, under the direction of the celebrated Archimedes. [HIERON; ARCHIMEDES.] Moschion's account is quoted at length by Athenaeus (v. p. 206, d, 209, e).

3. A celebrated cook, who was purchased by Demetrius Phalereus, and speedily realised a large fortune from the perquisites allowed him by his extravagant master. (Athen. xii. p. 542.) A parasite of the same name seems to have enjoyed sufficient notoriety to be mentioned in more than one passage quoted by Athenaeus (vi. p. 246, b, c, ix. p. 392, d). [C. P. M.]

MOSCHION (Μοσχίων), the author of a short Greek treatise, Περὶ τῶν Γυναικῶν Παθῶν, De Mulierum Passionibus, who is supposed to have lived in the beginning of the second century after Christ, as he mentions Soranus (c. 151). Nothing is known of the writer's personal history, nor can it be determined with certainty whether he is the same person as either of the physicians mentioned below. The work is composed in the form of question and answer, and is an interesting little book, containing much useful and valuable matter. It is supposed to have been written originally in Latin, and to have been translated into Greek by some late author: this Greek text is all that now remains. It was first published in Casp. Wolf's Collection of Writers on Female Diseases, Basil. 1566, &c., and in the two subsequent editions of that work. These editions contain eleven chapters at the end which are supposed to be spurious, and omit the author's preface. Probably the latest and best edition is that by F. O. Dewez, 8vo. Vienn. 1793, Greek and Latin. (See Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 702, ed. vet.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Ältere Medicin.)

2. A physician quoted by Soranus (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. i. 2, vol. xii. p. 416), Andromachus (ibid. vii. 2, vol. xiii. p. 80), and Aesclepiades Pharmacion (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. iii. 9, vol. xiii. p. 646), and who lived, therefore, in or before the first century after Christ. He may perhaps be the same person who was called Διοφθόρρις, Corrector, because, though he was one of the followers of Aesclepiades of Bithynia, he ventured to controvert his opinions on some points. (Galen, De Differ. Puls. iv. 16, vol. viii. p. 758).

A physician of the same name is mentioned also by Soranus (De Arte Obster. p. 184), Plutarch (Sympos. iii. 10. § 2), Alexander Trallianus (l. 15, p. 156), Aëtius (ir. 3, § 13, p. 765), Pliny (H. N. xix. 26, § 4), and Tertullian (De Anima, c. 15). [W. A. G.]

MOSCHION (Μοσχίων), the son of Adamas, an Athenian sculptor, made, in conjunction with his brothers Dionysodorus and Ladamas, a statue of Isis in the island of Delos. The names of the artists are preserved by an inscription on the statue, which is now at Venice. (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. Kunst, bk. ix. c. 2. § 10.) [P. S.]

MOSCHOPULUS, MANUEL or EMANUEL (Μανουήλ α. Έμανουήλ Μοσχόπουλος), a Greek grammarian of the later period of the Byzantine empire. There are few writers whose works have had so extensive a circulation whose time and history are so uncertain. According to the account generally current among the historians of literature, there were two Moschopuli, both bearing the name of Manuel, uncle and nephew; the uncle, a native of Crete, who lived in the time of the emperor Andronicus Palaeologus the Elder, about A. D. 1392; the nephew, a native of Constantinople, who, on the capture of that city by the Turks, A. D. 1453, fled into Italy. Of his fortunes, connections, or place of residence in that country, nothing appears to have been known, nor do we find any record or notice of his death. (Comp. Walder. Praef. ad Moschopuli Grammat. Artis Method., A. D. 1540; Burton, Ling. Graec. Historia, p. 57, 12mo. Lond. 1657; Scherpezeelina, Praef. ad Moschopuli Scholia ad Iliad. Hardwick, A. D. 1702; Fabric. Bibl.

Græc. vol. i. p. 407, note gg, and vol. vi. pp. 190, 322, &c.; Saxius, Onomasticon, vol. ii. pp. 387, 445, 591; Montucla, Hist. des Mathém. pt. i. liv. v. § 10, vol. i. p. 533, note b, ed. Paris, 1759; or § 11, vol. i. p. 346, ed. 1799—1802; Bandini, Codd. Codd. Græc. Laur. Medic. vol. ii. col. 553; Harles, Introd. in Hist. Ling. Græc. vol. ii. p. 544.) Hody (De Græcis Illustribus, p. 314, &c.) was disposed to identify the younger Moschopulus with Emanuel Adramytenus, a Cretan, who was preceptor of the celebrated Joannes Picus, count of Mirandola, and is mentioned with the highest praises for his erudition in the letters of Aldus Manutius and Angelus Politianus.

Of the above scanty account some of the particulars are evidently incorrect, others rest on no sure foundation. An ancient Greek MS. of the Sylloge Dictionum Atticarum, quoted by Ducange (Glossar. Med. et Inf. Græcistis Notæ, col. 29) states it to be a work of Moschopulus "a Byzantine (or native of Constantinople), nephew of the Cretan;" and may be considered as establishing the facts that there were two Moschopuli, an uncle and a nephew; that the uncle was a Cretan, and a man of such reputation that relationship to him was a thing to be recorded; and that the nephew was a native of Constantinople, and a writer on grammatical subjects. The date at which the elder is said, in the account given above, to have lived, appears to have been derived from a passage in the Turco-Græcia of Crusius, who states (in Hist. Politicæ. C'Polos Annotat. p. 44) that he had a MS. of the Erotemata s. Questiones of Moschopulus, to which the owner had appended a note that it was given him by the priest Clubea, A. D. 1392; and then Crusius states his opinion that Moschopulus flourished in the reign of the Byzantine emperor Andronicus the Elder, about A. D. 1300. A careless reader, confounding the date of the gift with that of the writer, brought down the reign of Andronicus to the latter part of the 14th century; and this gross anachronism appears to have passed unnoticed. If the author of the Questiones, whether he was the uncle or the nephew, lived in the time of the elder Andronicus, who reigned from A. D. 1282 to 1328, neither of the Moschopuli could have lived so late as the capture of Constantinople by the Turks (A. D. 1453), so that the story of the nephew's flight into Italy, consequent on that event, must be rejected. Hody's identification of the tutor of Joannes Picus with the younger Moschopulus must, of course, be rejected also: it appears indeed never to have had any other foundation than the common name of Manuel and the fact of the preceptor being a Cretan; which latter circumstance furnishes an argument, as Hody evidently felt, not for but against the identity; the nephew, who is said to have fled into Italy, having been a Constantinopolitan; to say nothing of the diversity of the surnames Adramytenus and Moschopulus.

The date assigned by Crusius, A. D. 1300, to the elder Moschopulus is perhaps a little too late: he can hardly have long survived the accession of Andronicus, A. D. 1282, if indeed he lived till then. Crusius founded his calculation on an historical notice given in illustration of the use of the preposition κατά in his MS. of the Erotemata; but this notice does not appear in the printed editions of that work, and was perhaps added by the transcriber of the MS., and if so, it furnishes no clue to the age of the author. Even if genuine, we are disposed to understand it as referring to the rupture of the union of the churches, A. D. 1282, so that it does not support the date given by Crusius. Another historical notice given in the Nova Grammaticæ Epitome (p. 49, ed. Titzæ), as illustrating the ten categories, seems to fix the composition of that work to the time (A. D. 1273 to 1282) when Andronicus reigned in conjunction with his father; but this notice has so little connection with the context, that it is, like the preceding, liable to the suspicion of being interpolated. It is conjectured that Moschopulus the Cretan, who wrote a commentary upon Hesiod, is one of the commentators referred to by Georgius Pachymeres (De Andronico Palæolog. iv. 15, where see Possin's note): this conjecture, which, however, separately regarded, rests on very slight ground, would render it probable that Pachymeres, who was born in or about A. D. 1240, studied in his boyhood under Moschopulus. In a MS. ascribed by Montfaucon (Biblioth. Coislin. p. 455) to the fourteenth century, are some Ἐπιστολαὶ, Epistolæ, of Manuel Moschopulus, addressed "to Acropolita the great Logotheta," "to the Logotheta Metochita," "to his uncle the Cretan" (τῷ Δεῖλῳ αὐτοῦ τῷ Κρήτι, perhaps an error for τῷ Κρητί), from which it appears that the nephew was contemporary with Georgius Acropolita (who died about A. D. 1282) or his son Constantinus Acropolita, and with Theodorus Metochita, who was Logotheta in A. D. 1294, and perhaps earlier. (Niceph. Gregoras, Hist. Byzant. vi. 8.) A work of Georgius Metochita, published in the Græcia Orthodoxa of Allatius, vol. ii. p. 959, is entitled Ἀντίρρησις τῶν ἐν συνερπύρατῳ Μανουὴλ δ' τοῦ Κρήτις ἀνεψιῶς, i. e. "A reply to certain writings of Manuel, the nephew of the Cretan." These notices, together with the existence in manuscript, in the library of St. Mark at Venice (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vi. p. 323, note pp), of a work of Moschopulus, Contra Latinos, combine to show that the younger Moschopulus was contemporary with and was engaged in the religious discussions occasioned by the attempt begun by the emperor Michael Palæologus (A. D. 1260), and abandoned by his son the elder Andronicus, a short time after his accession (A. D. 1282), to unite the Greek and Latin churches; and that he survived the appointment to the office of Logotheta of Theodorus Metochita, who held that office in perhaps A. D. 1294. These dates are consistent with the supposition that his uncle the Cretan was one of the teachers of Pachymeres, and afford some probability to the conjecture that Pachymeres refers to him. These scanty notices have been industriously gleaned by Titzæ in his Diatribe Literaria de Moschopulis, which we have chiefly followed.

The works ascribed to the Moschopuli are numerous; the greater part of them are on grammatical subjects, and are usually ascribed to the nephew; but in most cases without evidence. Lascaris indeed (Epitome Ling. Græc. lib. iii. Epilog.) speaks of the grammatical works of Moschopulus, as if only one of the name had written upon that subject; and Titzæ infers from this that they were all written by the uncle, and that the nephew wrote only on theology. The MSS. in a few cases speak of their respective authors determinately, as "the Cretan," "the nephew of the Cretan," or the "Byzantine;" but are in most cases indeterminate, the author being described as "Moschopulus," "Manuel Moschopulus," or "Manuel Grammaticus." We believe that it is in most cases vain to attempt to assign them to one or the other, and therefore give in one list the whole of those which have been printed. 1. Scholus ad Homeri Iliados Librum I. et II., published by Jo. Scherpezelius, 8vo. Harderwyk (in Guelderland), 1702, and re-issued, with a new title-page and an additional preface, at Utrecht, 1719. In the title-page Moschopolus is termed Byzantinus, but whether on MS. authority is not clear: in the work itself, at the head of the Scholus, they are described as Ἐμμανουήλου τοῦ Μοσχόπουλου τεχνολογία καὶ ἀνάπτυξις τῶν λέξεων. They are chiefly or wholly grammatical. A Paraphrasis of Homer by Moschopolus, different from these scholia, is said to be extant in the Vatican library (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 401; but comp. Scherpezelius, Praef. in Moschopuli Scholia in Homerum). 2. Τοῦ σοφοτάτου καὶ λογιωτάτου κυρίου Μανουήλ τοῦ Μοσχόπουλου ἀνεύθυν τοῦ Κρήτης ἐξήγησις τῶν ἔργων καὶ ἡμερῶν Ἡσίοδου, Sapientissimi Doctissimique Manuēlis Moschopuli Cretensis Patruelis Interpretatio Operum et Dierum Hesiodi. These scholia are included wholly or in part in the editions of Hesiod, 4to. Venice, 1537, and Basel, 1544, and in the edition of Heinsius, 4to. Leyden, 1603. 3. Scholus in Euripidis Tragoedias, employed by Arsenius, archbishop of Monembasia, in his collection of Scholus in Septem Euripidis Tragoedias, 8vo. Ven. 1534. Scholus on the Odas of Pindar (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 67), and perhaps on the Ajax Flagellifer and Electra of Sophocles (see Scherpezeel. ibid.), by Moschopolus, are extant in MS. 4. Grammaticae Artis Graecae Methodus; consisting of three parts, i. Erotemata s. Quaestiones; ii. Canones; iii. Declinationes s. Declinationis Paratymata. This work was first printed with the Erotemata of Demetrius Chalcondylas, 4to. about A. D. 1493, but the copies have no note either of time or place; nor has the work of Moschopolus any general title; that which we have prefixed is from the edition of Walder, 8vo. Basel, 1540. 5. Τῶν ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν συλλογή, Vocum Atticarum Collectio. The words are professedly collected from the Εκλογαί, Icones s. Imagines, of Philostratus, and from the poets. This sylloge was given at the end of the Dictionary Graecum published by Aldus, fol. Venice, 1524, and was printed again, with the similar works of Thomas Magister and Phrynicius, 8vo. Paris, 1532. A MS. of this work, as already observed, expressly ascribes it to the nephew. 6. Περὶ τῶν ὀνομάτων καὶ ῥημάτων συντάξεις, De Constructione Nominum et Verborum; and 7. Περὶ προσώπων, De Accentibus, both included in the little volume of grammatical treatises published by Aldus and Asulanus, Venice, 1525. The De Accentibus was reprinted with the work of Varennius on the same subject, 12mo. Paris, 1544, and again in 1559. 8. Περὶ γραμματικῆς γυμνασίας, De Grammatica Exercitatione, formerly ascribed to Basil, the Greek father, and printed in several of the older editions of his works. This work is ascribed to Moschopolus by Crusius (Turco-Graec. p. 44), and is substantially coincident with the work mentioned next. 9. Περὶ σχεδίων s. De Ratione examinae lae Orutionis Libellus, 4to. Paris, 1545, and reprinted at Vienna, 1773. 10. De Vocum Passivibus, first published by O. H. Schaeffer, in the appendix to his edition of Gregorius Corinthius De Dialectis, 8vo. Leipzig, 1811 (pp. 675—681, conf. not. in pag. 908). 11. Excerpta in Agapetum, given by Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 306, ed. vet. vol. viii. p. 41, ed. Harles. 12. Ἐπιτομή νέα γραμματικῆς. The first book of this was published by F. N. Titze, 8vo. Leipzig and Prague, 1822; it is a work of interest as treating of the ancient Greek pronunciation of the diphthongs. The perfect work is probably contained in MS. in the library of St. Mark, at Venice. Many other works of the Moschopuli are extant in MS. Titze prefixed to this work the valuable Diatribe de Moschopulis already quoted. He thinks that Moschopolus of Crete wrote a large work on grammar, entitled Ἐροτήματα, Erotemata Grammatica, of which many of those extant under his name, in MS. or in print, are fragments or detached portions. One of the Moschopuli wrote a little treatise, De Quadratis Magicis, on the mathematical puzzle of arranging numbers, so that the sum of them, whether added horizontally, vertically, or diagonally, shall be the same. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 401, 407, vol. ii. pp. 67, 259, vol. vi. pp. 190, 298, 319, 322—324, vol. viii. p. 41, vol. ix. p. 416, and the authors cited in the body of the article.) [J. C. M.]

MOSCHUS (Μόσχος). 1. A grammarian and bucolic poet, a native of Syracuse. He lived about the close of the third century A. C., and according to Suidas (s. v. Μόσχος), was acquainted with Aristarchus. He calls himself a pupil of Bion, in the Idyl in which he bewails the death of the latter [BION]. But it is difficult to say whether he means more than that he imitated Bion. Of his personal history we know nothing further. Of his compositions we have extant four idyls. 1. Ἔπος δραπετής. 2. Εὐρηκή. 3. Ἐπιτάφιος Βίανος. 4. Μεδρά. The last of these is written in the Ionic dialect, with but few Dorisms. Besides these larger pieces, there are three small fragments and an epigram extant. The idyls of Moschus were at first intermixed with those of Theocritus, and one or two of those ascribed to Theocritus have been, though without sufficient reason, supposed to be the productions of Moschus, as, for example, the 20th and 28th. Eudocia (p. 408) ascribes to Theocritus the third of the Idyls of Moschus. But they have since been carefully separated, on the authority of MSS. and quotations in Stobaeus. To judge from the pieces which are extant, Moschus was capable of writing with elegance and liveliness; but he is inferior to Bion, and comes still farther behind Theocritus. His style labours under an excess of polish and ornament. The idyls of Moschus have been usually edited with those of Bion. The editions are too many to be enumerated; for the best the reader is referred to BION. The poems of Moschus have been frequently translated and imitated in English, German, French, Italian, Hungarian, and Russian. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 805, &c.)

2. See MOSCHUS.

3. A writer on mechanics, mentioned by Athenaeus (xiv. p. 634, b).

4. A grammarian, apparently, the author of a work entitled Ἐξήγησις Ῥοδιακῶν Λέξεων, mentioned by Athenaeus (xi. p. 485, e). [C. P. M.]

MOSCHUS, JOANNES, or, as Photius calls him, JOANNES the son of MOSCHUS, surnamed Εὐκπαράς, or, what appears to be a corruption of that, Epiratus, was first a monk in the monastery of St. Theodosius at Jerusalem, afterwards lived among the anchorites in the desert on the banks of the Jordan, and subsequently filled the office of canonarchus in the convent of St. Saba. Dollandus gives A. D. 620 as the date of his death. After visiting a large number of the monasteries in Syria, Egypt, and the West, he applied himself to the composition of a work giving an account of the lives of the monks of that age, down to the time of Heraclius. It was addressed to Sophronius or Sophronas, his friend and pupil, who accompanied him on his travels, and became subsequently patriarch of Jerusalem. The work was entitled Ἀγίων or Λειτουργίων, or Νέος παράδεισος. In the editions it is divided into 219 chapters; Photius speaks of it as consisting of 304 διηγήματα, but mentions that in other manuscripts it was divided into a larger number of chapters. In compiling it Moschus did not confine himself to giving the results of his own observations, but availed himself of the labours of predecessors in the same field. His narratives contain a plentiful sprinkling of the marvellous. He every where attacks the heresy of Severus Acephalus. The style of the work, as Photius says, is mean and unpolished. But Joannes Damascenus and Nicephorus assigned Sophronius himself as the author of the work, from which it has been supposed that it was in reality mainly his work, though the name of Joannes Moschus was allowed to stand as that of the writer. The work was first published in an Italian translation, and incorporated in several collections of lives of the saints. The Latin translation of Ambrosius Camaldulensis is in the seventh volume of Aloysius Lipomannus, Venice, 1558. It appeared in Greek and Latin in the second volume of the Auctarium Bibl. Patrum Ducuonum, Paris, 1624, and in the Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1644, 1654. (Phot. Cod. 199; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 124; Voss. de Hist. Græc. p. 334, Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

MOSCHUS, VULCA TIUS, was banished from Rome, and admitted as a citizen of Massilia, to which town he left his property. (Tac. Ann. iv. 43.)

MOSTIS, a king of Epeirus, known only to us from coins, a specimen of which is annexed.

COIN OF MOSTIS.

MOTHO'NE (Μοθώνη), a daughter of Oeneus, from whom the town of Mothone was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. iv. 35. § 1.) [L. S.]

MUC'IA. 1. The elder daughter of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the celebrated angur, and Laelia, daughter of C. Laelius Sapiens [LAELIA, No. 1]. She married L. Licinius Crassus, the orator, and was renowned for her conversational excellence. (Cic. Brut. 58. § 211, de Orat. iii. 12; Val. Max. viii. 8. § 1; Quint. Inst. i. 1. § 6.)

2. With the epithet TERTIA, was the daughter of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the angur, consul in B. C. 95. She was a cousin (soror) of Q. Metellus Celer, consul in B. C. 60, and of Q. Metellus Nepos, consul in B. C. 57. Mucius married Cn. Pompey, by whom she had two sons, Cneius and Sextus, and a daughter, Pompeia. She was divorced by Pompey just before his return from the Mithridatic war in A. C. 62.

Mucia next married M. Aemilius Scaurus, a stepson of the dictator Sulla. In B. C. 39, Mucia, at the earnest request of the Roman people, went to Sicily to mediate between her son Sex. Pompey and Augustus. She was living at the time of the battle of Actium, A. C. 31. Augustus treated her with great respect. (Ascon. in Scaur. p. 19, Orelli; Cic. ad Fam. v. 2, ad Att. i. 12; Dion. Cass. xxxvii. 49, xlviii. 16, li. 2, lvi. 38; Appian. B. C. v. 69, 72; Suet. Cæsa. 50; Plut. Pomp. 42; Zonar. x. 5; Hieron. in Jovin. i. 48.) Whether the Mucia mentioned by Valerius Maximus (ix. 1. § 8) be the same person is uncertain.

MUC'IA GENS, was a very ancient patrician house, ascending to the earliest æra of the republic (Dionys. v. 25; Liv. ii. 12). It existed in later times, however, only as a plebeian house. Its only cognomens are CORDUS and SCAEVOLA, under which are given all persons of the name of Mucius. [W. B. D.]

MUCIANUS, P. LICINIUS CRASSUS DIVES, was the son of P. Mucius Scaevola, consul A. C. 175, and brother of P. Mucius Scaevola, who was consul A. C. 133, in the year in which Tib. Gracchus lost his life. (Plut. Tib. Gracchus, 9.) Mucianus was adopted by P. Licinius Crassus Dives, who was the son of P. Licinius Crassus Dives, consul A. C. 205. This at least is Drumann's opinion, who thinks that it is more probable that he was adopted by the son than by the father. On being adopted he assumed, according to Roman fashion, the name of Crassus, with the addition of Mucianus, which indicated his former gens. Cicero (de Orat. i. 56) speaks of his being a candidate for the ædileship; and he gives an anecdote of Serv. Sulpicius Galba, who was a distinguished orator, pressing Crassus hard on a question of law, and of Crassus being compelled to support his legal opinion against the equitable arguments of Servius by referring to the writings of his brother, P. Mucius, and of Sext. Aelius.

Mucianus attained the dignity of pontifex maximus, and A. D. 131 he was elected consul, in which year he left Rome to conduct the war against Aristonicus in Asia, who maintained his claim to the kingdom of Pergannus against the will of Attalus III., who had bequeathed it to the Romans. Crassus was the first pontifex maximus, according to Livy (Epit. 59) who went beyond the limits of Italy; but this is not true, unless Scipio Nasica was deprived of his office, for Nasica was pontifex maximus A. C. 133, after the death of Tib. Gracchus, and retired to Asia, where he soon died. (Plut. Tib. Gracchus, 21.) Crassus succeeded Nasica in the pontificate. Crassus was unsuccessful in the war. He was attacked at the siege of Leucæ by Aristonicus, and defeated. Between Elæa and Smyrna he was overtaken by the Thracian body-guard of Aristonicus; and to avoid being made prisoner, he provoked one of the Thracians to kill him. His head was carried to Aristonicus.

The historian Sempronius Asellio (Gellius, i. 13) says that Crassus possessed five things, which of all good things are the greatest and the chief. He was most wealthy, noble, eloquent, most learned in the law, and pontifex maximus. The same historian records an instance of the unreasonable severity with which he punished at the siege of Leucæ a deviation from the strict letter of his orders. Crassus had two daughters; the elder Licinia, was the wife of C. Sulpicius Galba, the son of Serv. Sulpicius Galba, consul a. c. 144. (Cic. Brut. 26, 33.) The younger Licinia was the wife of C. Sempronius Gracchus (Plut. Tib. Gracchus, 21; Dig. 24. tit. 3. a. 66), according to Plutarch, whose opinion is supported by the passage in the Digest.

Crassus was both an orator and a lawyer. As an orator, however, he is considered by Cicero to have been inferior to his contemporary P. Sulpicius Galba. He was, however, a distinguished speaker, an eminent jurist (Cic. de Orat. i. 37, 56, Brut. 26), and a man of exemplary industry, which is shown by the fact of his mastering the various dialects of Greek, when he was in Asia, so completely, as to be able to make his decrees in the dialect which the suitor had adopted. (Val. Max. viii. 7. § 6.) No legal work of his is mentioned.

Crassus is mentioned by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. a. 2. § 40, &c.) in the following terms:—"Etiam Lucius Crassus, frater Publii Mucii, qui Mucianus dictus est. Hunc Cicero ait jurisconsultorum disertissimum." Grotius considers the words "frater . . . dictus est," to be an interpolation, and that the L. Crassus is not Mucianus, because he is called Lucius, and because the description does not suit him. But it is remarked by Zimmern that Cicero calls Mucianus "in numero disertissimorum" (De Orat. i. 56), and he says the same in substance in another passage (Brut. 26). Besides this, L. Crassus, who must be taken to be Crassus the orator, if the reading of Grotius is right, was not a jurist. The criticism of Grotius is therefore groundless. The authorities for the life of Mucianus are contained in Drumann, Geschichte Roms, Licinii Crassi, No. 21. [G. L.]

MUCIANUS, LICINIUS, three times consul in A. D. 52, 70, and 75 respectively, must have passed by adoption from the Mucian to the Licinian gens. His character is drawn in a few strokes by the masterly hand of Tacitus. (Hist. i. 10.) He was alike distinguished for good and for evil, for luxurious indulgence and energetic work, for affability and haughtiness; when he had nothing to attend to, he revelled in excessive pleasures; but when business required his attention, he displayed great abilities. Thus his public conduct deserved praise, his private condemnation. As a youth, he courted with assiduity the favour of the powerful, and succeeded in obtaining the consulship in the reign of Claudius, A. D. 52; but having squandered his property, and becoming likewise an object of suspicion to Claudius, he went into retirement in Asia, and there lived, says Tacitus, as near to the condition of an exile as afterwards to that of an emperor. We gather from Pliny (H. N. xii. 1. a. 5) that the place of his retirement was Lycia, into which he was sent as legatus by Claudius, as a kind of honourable banishment. Under Nero he was again received into the favour of the imperial court; and at the death of that emperor, A. D. 68, he had the command of the province of Syria, with four legions, while Vespasian was in the neighbouring country of Judaea, at the head of three. Up to Nero's death Mucianus and Vespasian had not been on good terms; but after that event they were induced, by the interposition of friends, to become reconciled to one another, and to act together for their mutual advantage; and their reconciliation was rendered real and lasting by the mediation of Titus, to whom Mucianus became such attached. Mucianus and Vespasian both took the oath of allegiance to Otho; but when the civil war broke out between him and Vitellius, Vespasian resolved to seize the imperial throne. In this resolution he was warmly encouraged by Mucianus, who hoped to have a great share in the exercise of the imperial power while Vespasian bore the name. When Vespasian at length, after great hesitation, assumed the imperial title, Mucianus immediately administered to his own soldiers the oath of allegiance to the new emperor; and it was resolved that he should march into Europe against Vitellius, while Vespasian and Titus remained behind in Asia. Mucianus used great efforts to provide his army with everything that was necessary; he liberally contributed from his own purse, and unmercifully plundered the provincials to obtain a sufficient supply of money. However, there was little occasion for his services, for the Vitellians were entirely defeated by Antonius Primus (PAMEL), of whom, in consequence, Mucianus became very jealous. Mucianus marched through Phrygia and Cappadocia, and arrived in Europe just in time to repress a rising of the Dacians, who had seized both banks of the Danube. Primus had entered Rome before Mucianus; but on the arrival of the latter he had to surrender all the power into his hands. Domitian, the son of Vespasian, was nominally at the head of affairs; but Mucianus was the real sovereign, and lived in almost regal splendour. Still, although he boasted haughtily of the services he had rendered to Vespasian, his fidelity never seems to have wavered; and all his various measures were calculated to support and strengthen the new dynasty. When Vespasian was on his way to Italy, Mucianus went to Brundisium to meet him, accompanied by the principal Roman nobles. The services of Mucianus had been so great, that Vespasian continued to show him his favour, although his patience was not a little tried by the arrogance of his subject. The last circumstance recorded of Mucianus is that he persuaded Vespasian to banish the philosophers from Rome. He seems to have died in the reign of Vespasian, as his name does not occur either under Titus or Domitian.

Mucianus was not only a general and a statesman, but an orator and an historian. His powers of oratory are greatly praised by Tacitus, who tells us that Mucianus could address an auditory even in Greek with great effect. He made a collection of the speeches of the republican period, which he arranged and published in eleven books of Acta and three of Epistolae. The subject of his history is not mentioned; but, judging from the references which Pliny makes to it, it appears to have treated chiefly of the East, and to have contained considerable information on all geographical subjects. (Tac. Hist. i. 10, 76, ii. 4, 5, 76—84, iii. 8, 46, 53, 78, iv. 4, 11, 39, 80, 85; Suet. Vesp. 6, 13; Dion Cass. lxx. 3, 9, 22, lxxv. 2, 9, 13; Joseph. B. J. iv. 10, 11; Plin. H. N. xii. 1. a. 5, xviii. 2. a. 5, xxxiv. 7. a. 17, et passim; Vossius, De Hist. Lat. i. 27, p. 140, Lug. Bat. 1651; Westermann, Gesch. d. Römischen Beredsamkeit, § 82, n. 19.)

MUCIANUS, M. NONIUS AFRICUS, consul A. D. 201, in the reign of Septimius Severus (Fasts.)

MUCIANUS or MUTIANUS, surnamed SCHOLASTICUS, lived in the middle of the sixth century of our aera, and translated into Latin, at the request of Cassiodorus, the thirty-four homilies of St. Chrysostom on the Epistle to the Hebrews. He had also previously made a Latin translation of the treatise of Gaudentius on Music [GAUDENTIUS], as we learn from Cassiodorus, who calls Mucianus "vir disertissimus." (Cassiod. Dicta. Lect. 8.) The translation of the above-mentioned homilies of Chrysostom is still extant, and has been highly praised by Savil and the other editors of and commentators on Chrysostom. It was first printed at Cologne, 1530, 8vo., and subsequently appeared in the Latin editions of the works of this father, in which Mucianus is erroneously called Mutius. In the Greek editions of the Homilies the translation of Hervetus is usually given; but Montfaucon has also printed in the twelfth volume of his edition the version of Mucianus. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. pp. 558, 559.)

MUGILLANUS, the name of a family of the gens Papiria at Rome. The Mugillani were a Latin family from Mugilla. (Dionys. viii. 36.)

1. L. PAPIRIUS L. F. MUGILLANUS, was consul for the first time in B. C. 444, and for the second in A. C. 427. No remarkable event signalled either of his consulates, but Mugillanus was one of the original pair of Censors. (Liv. iv. 7, 8, 30; Dionys. xi. 62; Fasti.)

2. L. PAPIRIUS L. F. L. N. MUGILLANUS son probably of the preceding, was consular tribune in A. C. 422. As interrex for holding the plebeian comitia in the following year, Mugillanus was the author of a law directing the quaestors to be chosen indifferently from the patricians and the plebeians (Liv. iv. 44). He was censor in B. C. 418 (Fasti).

3. M. PAPIRIUS L. F. MUGILLANUS was consular tribune in B. C. 418, and again in 416, and consul in 411 (Liv. iv. 45, 47; Fasti). Livy, however, in 411 gives Atratinus, not Mugillanus, as the cognomen of the Papirius consul in that year. (Ib. 52.)

4. L. PAPIRIUS MUGILLANUS was consul in A. C. 326 (Liv. viii. 23; Fasti). It is doubtful, however, whether for Mugillanus should not be read Censor, as the surname of the consul. [W. B. D.]

MULCIBER, a surname of Vulcan, which seems to have been given to the god as a euphemism, and for the sake of a good omen, that he might not consume by ravaging fire the habitations and property of men, but might kindly and benevolently aid men in their pursuits. It occurs very frequently in the Latin poets. (Ov. Met. ii. 5; Arg. Am. ii. 562.) [L. S.]

MULIUS (Μούλιος). 1. The son-in-law of Augæus, and husband of Agamède, was slain by Nestor. (Hom. Il. xi. 738.)

2. Two Trojans, one of whom was killed by Patroclus, and the other by Achilles. (Hom. Il. xvi. 696, xx. 472.)

3. A servant and herald from Dulichium, in the house of Odysseus. (Hom. Od. xviii. 422.) [L. S.]

MUMMIA ACHAICA, grand-daughter of Q. Lutatius Catulus (CATULUS, No. 4), and great grand-daughter of L. Mummius Achaicus [MUMMIUS, No. 3], was the wife of Serv. Galba, and mother of the emperor Galba and his brother Caius. (Sueton. Galb. 3.) [W. B. D.]

MUMMIUS. 1. L. MUMMIUS was tribune of the plebs in B. C. 187. He opposed the bill of M. Porcius Cato for inquiring into the amount of monies paid by Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, as the price of peace in B. C. 188, to the brothers P.

and L. Scipionea. Mummius, intimidated by Cato, withdrew his opposition, and the bill was passed. He was praetor in B. C. 177, and obtained Sardinia for his province. In his praetorship Mummius was instructed by the senate to put in force a decree for dismissing to their respective cities all residents at Rome, who were possessed merely of the Jus Latii. (Liv. xxxvii. 54, xli. 8.)

2. Q. MUMMIUS, brother of the preceding, was his colleague in the tribunate of B. C. 187. (Liv. xxxvii. 54.)

3. L. MUMMIUS L. F. L. N. ACHAICUS, son of No. 1, was praetor in B. C. 154. His province was the further Spain, where, after some serious reverses, he finally retrieved his reputation by victories over the Lusitanians and Blasto-Phoenicians, and triumphed De Lusitanis in the following year. (Appian, Hispan. 56—57; Eutrop. iv. 9; Fasti.) Mummius was consul in B. C. 146, when he won for himself the surname of Achaicus, by the destruction of Corinth, the conquest of Greece, and the establishment of the Roman province of Achaia. His surname was the more remarkable from the circumstance that Mummius was the first self-raised man—novus homo—who attained a national appellation from military service. From the double name of his descendant, Mummia Achaica, the surname appears to have been perpetuated in the Mummian family. The Achaean league, under its weak and rash leaders, the praetors Critolæus and Diaeus, had been for some time inspired by a warlike spirit alien to their interests and the sounder policy of earlier years. Q. Caecilius Metellus Macedonicus, praetor in B. C. 148, had humbled Greece by his victories; but his leniency deceived the Achaean chiefs, and they persuaded themselves that Rome was unable to complete its conquest. They had assembled an army in the Isthmus shortly before the arrival of Mummius. He promptly dismissed his predecessor, Metellus, defeated the army of the league, whose hasty levies were no match for the discipline of the legions, and entered Corinth without opposition, since the garrison and principal inhabitants had abandoned it, and the spirit of Greece was at length completely broken. The city was burnt, rased, and given up to pillage: the native Corinthians were sold for slaves, and the rarest specimens of Grecian art, which the luxury and opulence of centuries had accumulated, were given up to the rapacity of an ignorant conqueror. Polybius the historian, who, on the fall of Corinth, had come from Africa to mitigate, if possible, the calamities of his countrymen, saw Roman soldiers playing at draughts upon the far-famed picture of Dionysus by Aristides; and Mummius himself was so unconscious of the real value of his prize, that he sold the rarer works of painting, sculpture, and carving, to the king of Pergamua, and exacted securities from the masters of vessels who conveyed the remainder to Italy, to replace by equivalents any picture or statue lost or injured in the passage. But although ignorant, Mummius was more scrupulous in his selection of the spoils than the Roman generals of later times, or even than some of his contemporaries. He appropriated secular or private property alone, and religiously abstained from all that had been consecrated to religious uses. Mummius remained in Greece during the greater part of B. C. 146—145, in the latter year with the title of proconsul. He arranged the fiscal and municipal constitution of the newly acquired province, and won the confidence and esteem of the provincials by his integrity, justice, and equanimity. Mummius was one of the few Roman commanders in the republican æra who did homage to the religion of the Hellenic race. He dedicated a brazen statue of Zeus at Olympia, and surrounded the shrine of the god with gilt bucklers of brass. The Corinthian bronze, so celebrated in the later art of the ancient world, was an accidental discovery, resulting from the burning of the city. The metallic ornaments of its sumptuous temples, basilicæ, and private dwellings, formed the rich and solid amalgam which was employed afterwards in the fusile department of sculpture. Mummius triumphed in B. C. 145. His procession formed an epoch in the history of Roman art and cultivation. Trains of waggons laden with the works of the purest ages moved along the Via Sacra to the Capitoline Hill: yet the spectator of the triumph, who had seen them in their original sites and number, must have mourned many an irreparable loss. The fire had destroyed many, the sea had engulfed many; and the royal connoisseurs, the princes of Pergamus, had carried off many for their galleries and temples. Mummius, with a modesty uncommon in conquerors, refused to inscribe the spoils with his name. He viewed them as the property of the state, and he lent them liberally to adorn the triumphs, the buildings, and even the private houses of others, while in his own villa he retained the severe simplicity of early Rome. Mummius was censor in B. C. 142. His colleague was Cornelius Scipio, better known as the younger Africanus; and no colleagues ever disagreed more heartily. The polished Scipio was rigid to excess; the rustic Mummius culpably lenient. On laying down his office, Scipio declared that "he should have discharged his functions well, had he been paired with a different colleague, or with none at all." Mummius, however, in private life, was not exempt from the prevailing immorality of the times, to which his conquest of Corinth, by causing a sudden influx of wealth into Rome, contributed. He was a respectable orator; and, as his government of Achaia showed, possessed administrative talents. His political opinions inclined to the popular side. Though he brought so much wealth into the state-treasures, Mummius died poor, and the commonwealth furnished a marriage portion to his daughter. (Polyb. iii. 32, xl. 7, 8, 11; Liv. Ep. 52; Appian, Pun. 135; Dion Cass. 81; Flor. ii. 16; Eutrop. iv. 14; Val. Max. vi. 4, § 2, vii. 5, § 4; Cic. in Verr. i. 21, iii. 4, iv. 2, pro Muræna. 14, de Leg. Agrar. i. 2, de Orat. ii. 6, Orat. 70, Brut. 22, de Off. ii. 22, ad Att. xiii. 4, 5, 6, 30, 32, 33, Parad. v. 2, Cornel. ii. fr. 8; Pseudo-Ascon. in Cic. Verr. ii. p. 173, Orelli; Plin. *H. 4. SP. MUMMIUS, brother of the preceding, and his legatus at Corinth in B. C. 146—145, was an intimate friend of the younger Scipio Africanus. In political opinions Spurius was opposed to his brother Lucius, and was a high aristocrat. He was one of the opponents of the establishment of rhetorical schools at Rome. Mummius composed ethical and satirical epistles, which were extant in Cicero's age, and were probably in the style which

Horace afterwards cultivated so successfully. (Cic. de Rep. i. 12, iii. 35, v. 9, de Amic. 19, 27, ad Att. xiii. 5, 6, 30.)

5. SP. MUMMIUS, grandson of the preceding, died shortly before B. C. 46. He had preserved and used to recite to Cicero the epistles of his grandfather, Sp. Mummius [No. 4.] (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6.)

6. M. MUMMIUS, was praetor in B. C. 70, and presided at the trial of Verres in that year. (Cic. in Verr. iii. 52.)

7. MUMMIUS, a legatus of M. Crassus in the servile war, B. C. 73, was defeated by the gladiator Spartacus. (Plut. Crass. 10.)

8. MUMMIUS, was a writer of farces, Atellanæ, after the year B. C. 90. He is mentioned by Charisius (p. 118) and Priscian (x. 9, p. 514, ed. Krehle). In Macrobius (Sat. i. 10) and Gellius (xix. 9) he is called MEMMIUS. [W. B. D.]

MUMMIUS LUPERCUS. [LUPERCUS.] MUNA'TIA GENS, plebeian, unknown before the second century B. C. Its usual cognomens are FLACCUS, GRATUS, PLANCUS, and RUFUS. A few Munatii occur without a surname. [W. B. D.]

MUNATIUS. 1. C. MUNATIUS, was commissioner for allotting lands in Liguria and Cisalpine Gaul, B. C. 173. (Liv. xlii. 4.)

2. P. MUNATIUS, was imprisoned, in what year is uncertain, by the triumviri capitales, for taking a crown from the statue of Marius in the forum (Hor. Sat. i. 6. 120; Serv. ad Æn. iv. 58), and placing it on his own head. The tribunes of the plebs refused to take cognizance of his appeal to them. (Plin. H. N. xxi. 6.)

3. MUNATIUS, a ruined spendthrift, who engaged in Catiline's plot. He remained at Rome while his leader organised the insurrection in Etruria. Cicero derides the insignificance and ignobility of Munatius. (Cat. ii. 2.)

4. C. MUNATIUS, C. F., was in some official situation in a province when Cicero commended to him L. Livinius Trypho, a freedman of L. Regulus (ad Fam. xiii. 60.)

5. T. MUNATIUS, was a kinsman of L. Munatius Plancus [PLANCUS], proconsul in Narbonne, B. C. 44. Munatius received reports from his kinsman of the movements in his province, one of which, addressed to the senate, he previously imparted to Cicero. Munatius subsequently joined M. Antonius. (Cic. ad Fam. x. 12.) [W. B. D.]

MUNATIUS, of Tralles, surnamed apertus, is mentioned as one of the teachers of Herodes Atticus. (Philostr. Herod. 14, Polemon, 7.)

MUNATIUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.]

MUNY'CHIA (Μουνυχία), a surname of Artemis, derived from the Attic port-town of Munchia, where she had a temple. Her festival was celebrated at Athens in the month of Munchien. (Paus. i. 1. § 4; Strab. xiii. p. 639; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 331.) [L. S.]

MURCIA, MU'RTEA, or MU'R'TIA, a surname of Venus at Rome, where she had a chapel in the circus, with a statue. (Fest. p. 148, ed. Müller; Apul. Met. vi. 395; Tertull. De Spect. 8; Varro, De Ling. Lat. v. 154; August. De Civ. Dei. iv. 16; Liv. i. 33; Serv. ad Æn. viii. 636.) This surname, which is said to be the same as Myrtea (from myrtus, a myrtle), was believed to indicate the fondness of the goddess for the myrtle tree, and in ancient times there is said to have been a myrtle grove in the front of her chapel at the foot of the Aventine. (Plin. H. N. xv. 36; Serv. ad Aen. i. 724; Plut. Quaest. Rom. 20.) Some of the ecclesiastical writers preferred the derivation from marcus, i. e. stupid or awkward. (August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 16; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 9.) Others again derived the name from the Syracusan word μυρπός, tender. (Salmas. ad Solin. p. 637.) [L. S.]

MURCUS, L. STATIUS, was Caesar's legatus in B. C. 48, and one of three commissioners appointed by him to treat with the Pompeians at Oricum (Caes. B. C. iii. 15). Murcus was one of the praetors in B. C. 45—44, and went into Syria after his year of office expired, with the title of proconsul, and as successor to Sextus Caesar, slain by his own soldiers in Apameia, at the instigation of Caecilius Bassus [CAESAR, No. 24; BASSUS]. With the aid of Marcus Crispus, proconsul of Bithynia [CRISPUS], Murcus besieged Bassus in Apameia, and compelled him to surrender. But on the arrival of C. Cassius Longinus [LONGINUS, No. 11], Murcus and Crispus both surrendered their legions to him. Henceforward Murcus was an active supporter of the senatorian or Pompeian party. Cassius appointed him prefect of the fleet. He defeated Dolabella [DOLABELLA] and the Rhodians off the coast of Cilicia, and blockaded Laodiceia. Murcus was next stationed off the coast of Peloponnesus, and subsequently in the Ionian sea, where he seized and occupied a small island opposite the harbour of Brundisium, and prevented M. Antony for some time from transporting his forces to Illyricum and the main-land of Greece. After the ruin of the republican party at Philippi, in B. C. 42, Murcus carried his fleet over to Sextus Pompey in Sicily. But his past services to the Pompeians were ill-requited by their present leader; for at the instigation of his freedmen Menas and Menodorus, to whom Murcus had borne himself loyally, Sextus caused him to be assassinated, and promulgated a report that he had been murdered by his own slaves. (Cic. Phil. xi. 12, ad Att. xii. 2, ad Fam. xii. 11; Pseudo-Brut. ad Cic. ii. 5; Vell. ii. 69, 72, 77; Joseph. Antiq. xiv. 11. §§ 1, 3, 4, B. J. i. 10. § 4; Appian, B. C. ii. 119, iii. 77, 78, iv. 58, 59, 74, 82, 86, 100, 108, 115—117, v. 2, 15, 50, 70; Dion Cass. xlvii. 27, 28, 30, 35, 36, 47, xlviii. 19.) [W. B. D.]

COIN OF STATIUS MURCUS.

MURENA, the name of a family of the Licinia gens, which was originally from Lanuvium, now Città Lavigna, an old Latin town near the Via Appia. The name Murena, which is the proper way of writing the word, not Muræna, is said to have been given in consequence of one of the family having a great liking for the lamprey (murena), and building tanks (vivaria) for them, (Plin. H. N. ix. 54, ed. Hard.; Macrob. Saturn. ii. 11.)

1. P. LICINIUS was praetor, but in what year is unknown.

2. P. LICINIUS MURENA, the son of P. Licinius, VOL. II.

attained the rank of praetor, and was a contemporary of the orator L. Crassus. He was the first of the family who had the cognomen Murena.

3. P. LICINIUS MURENA, the son of the preceding, was a man of moderate talent, but he paid great attention to the study of antiquity, and was a man of some literary knowledge. (Cic. Brut. 54.) He lost his life in the wars of Marius and Sulla (B. C. 82); for his death is mentioned by Cicero as taking place at the same time with the murder of Q. Mucius Scaevola, the jurist and Pontifex Maximus, or shortly after; and Cicero seems to mean that he died a violent death; and if so, he must have perished by the hands of the Marian faction, though there is no direct authority for that statement, which is made by Drumann. (Cic. Brut. 90; Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 184.)

4. L. LICINIUS MURENA, the brother of the preceding, was praetor probably before he served under Sulla in Greece. He was in the battle of Chaeroneia, B. C. 86, in which Sulla defeated Archelaus, the general of Mithridates. Murena had the command of the left wing, and was opposed to Taxiles. (Plut. Sulla, 17, &c.) Murena accompanied Sulla into the Troad, where peace was made with Mithridates (B. C. 84), and Murena was left as proprietor in Asia, with the command of the two legions of Fimbria which had deserted their commander and come over to Sulla (Appian, Mithrid. 64). Murena, who wished to have a triumph, sought a quarrel with Mithridates, took Comana in Cappadocia, and robbed the rich temple. His answer to Mithridates, who complained of the infraction of the treaty, was that he could see no treaty; and, in fact, there was no written treaty between Sulla and Mithridates. Mithridates sent to Rome to complain, and in the mean time Murena crossed the swollen Halys, ravaged the country of Mithridates, and returned into Galatia and Phrygia loaded with booty. Calpurnius, who had been sent by the Roman senate, gave him verbal orders to stop hostilities, but he brought no written instructions with him, and Murena again commenced his ravages. Mithridates now sent Gordius against Murena, and soon joined Gordius with a larger force. A fierce battle was fought on the river, which was probably the Halys, though Appian (Mithrid. 65) mentions no name, in which Murena was defeated with great loss, and he made his retreat over the mountains into Phrygia. In the early part of B. C. 81 Sulla sent A. Gabinus with strict orders to Murena to stop hostilities, and with instructions to reconcile Mithridates and Ariobarzanes. Murena returned to Rome, and had a triumph in B. C. 81, which he did not deserve. He probably died soon after. His wife lived to see her son consul. (Cic. pro Muren. 41.)

5. L. LICINIUS MURENA, the son of No. 4, served under his father (B. C. 83) in the war against Mithridates. He was quaestor at Rome with the jurist Serv. Sulpicius, who was afterwards his opponent in the canvass for the consulship. In his sedileship Murena adorned the walls of the Comitium with Lacedaemonian stone (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 14). In the third Mithridatic war, which began B. C. 74, he served under L. Lucullus (Plut. Lucull. 15, &c.), and was left by him to direct the siege of Amisus, while Lucullus advanced against Mithridates. At the capture of Amisus (B. C. 71), Tyrannio was made prisoner, and he was given to Murena at his request, who thereupon made him free, by which act it was implied that he had been a slave. Plutarch (Lucull. 19) blames Murena for his conduct in this matter, and adds that it was not in this instance only that Murena showed himself far inferior to his general in honourable feeling and conduct. Murena followed Tigranes in his retreat from Tigranocerta to the Taurus, and took all his baggage, and he was left to maintain the siege of Tigranocerta while Lucullus marched from before that city to check Tigranes, who was again in sight of Tigranocerta with a large army. He returned to Rome before the end of the war, and was one of ten commissioners who were sent out to settle affairs in the countries conquered by Lucullus. (Cic. ad Att. xiii. 6.) In B.C. 65, he was praetor with Serv. Sulpicius, and had the jurisdiction, while Sulpicius had the unpopular function of presiding at the quaestio peculatus (Cic. pro Murena. 20). Murena expended considerable sums on the public exhibitions (ludi Apollinares), which he had to superintend during his office. (Plin. H. N. xxxiii. 3; Cic. pro Murena. 18, 19.) After his praetorship (B.C. 64) he was proprætor of Gallia Cisalpina, where his brother Caius served under him, and he settled the disputes between debtor and creditor in a satisfactory and equitable way, as Cicero says.

In B.C. 63 he was a candidate for the consulship, and was elected with D. Junius Silanus. Serv. Sulpicius, an unsuccessful candidate, instituted a prosecution against Murena for bribery (ambitus), and he was supported in the matter by M. Porcius Cato, Cn. Postumius, and Serv. Sulpicius the younger (Plut. Cat. Min. 21, Cic. 35, and the oration of Cicero for Murena). Murena was defended by Q. Hortensius, M. Tullius Cicero, who was then consul, and M. Licinius Crassus. The speech of Cicero, which is extant, is of the same class as his later speech in defence of Cn. Plancius, who was also tried for ambitus. The time when the speech for Murena was delivered is shown by the fact that Catiline had then left the city, but the conspirators who remained behind had not been punished: it was therefore delivered in the latter part of November of the unreformed calendar. The orator handled his subject skilfully, by making merry with the formulae and the practice of the lawyers, to which class Sulpicius belonged, and with the paradoxes of the Stoics, to which sect Cato had attached himself. Yet he did not attack the character and motives of either Sulpicius or Cato, which would have been injurious to his client, for both the prosecutors were men above suspicion. But he defended the private character of Murena against the imputations that had been cast on him, and he represents him as a man of merit in his public and private capacity, and with more virtues than we can readily give him credit for. As in the oration for Cn. Plancius he says comparatively little on the main charge, which, indeed, it was the business of the prosecutors to prove; and he rather labours to show that there were sufficient reasons for his election without supposing that he had purchased votes. He shows that under present circumstances, with Catiline at the head of an army in the field, and his associates in the city, it was necessary to have a vigorous consul to protect the state in the coming year. Murena was acquitted. (Plut. Cat. Min. 21.)

Early in the month of December following Cicero moved in the senate the question of punishing the conspirators who had been seized. Silanus, who was first asked his opinion, was for putting them to death, and Murena ultimately voted the same way (Cic. ad Att. xii. 21). The consulship of Silanus and Murena was a stormy period, owing to the agitation of Q. Metellus Nepos, who wished for the return of Pompeius to oppose the party of the Optimates. The disturbances in Rome grew so high that the senate empowered the consuls in the usual form to preserve the safety of the commonwealth. Cato, who was a colleague of Metellus, was opposed to the consuls, but Murena protected him in an affray (Plut. Cat. Min. 28). In this consulship was passed the Lex Licinia Junia, which enacted that a lex should be promulgated for three nundinae before the people voted upon it. There is no mention of Murena having a province after his consulship, and nothing more is said about him.

His stepson, L. Natta, was the son of Murena's wife by a previous husband, probably one Pinaris Natta, as Drumann shows (vol. ii. p. 370).

6. C. LICINIUS MURENA, the brother of No. 5, and his legatus in Cisalpine Gallia, which he administered in the year after his brother's administration, and seized some of the band of Catiline (Sall. B. C. 42), before the defeat and death of their leader.

7. A. TERENTIUS VARRO MURENA, was adopted by A. Terentius Varro, whose name he took, according to the custom in such cases. Drumann conjectures that he was the son of the consul, which seems probable. In the civil wars he is said to have lost his property, and that C. Proculus, a Roman equester, gave him a share of his own property. This Proculus is called the brother of Varro, but, if we take the words of Horace literally (Carmin. ii. 2), Proculus had more than one brother. Drumann conjectures that this Proculus was a son of C. Licinius Murena, the brother of the consul, who had been adopted by one Proculus. This would make Proculus the cousin of Varro. It was common enough among the Romans to call cousins by the name of brothers (frater patruelis, and frater).

Murena was sent by Augustus, in B.C. 25, to attack the Salassi in the Alps: he reduced the people to obedience, sold the male prisoners for slaves, and the chief part of the territory was distributed among Praetorian soldiers, who founded the town of Augusta, now Aosta, in the province of Aosta, one of the eight divisions of the continental dominion of the king of Sardinia (Dion Cass. liii. 25; Strab. p. 206, ed. Casaub.). Murena was named consul suffectus for B.C. 25. In B.C. 22 he was involved in the conspiracy of Fannius Caepio, and was condemned to death and executed, notwithstanding the intercession of Proculus and Terentia, the sister of Murena. Dion Cass. (liv. 3), when speaking of the death of Murena, calls him Licinius Murena, though he had already (liii. 25) called him Terentius Varro. Such confusion is common enough with the Roman writers, when they are speaking of adopted persons. Horace (Carmin. ii. 10) addresses Murena by the name of Licinius, and probably intended to give him some advice as to being more cautious in his speech and conduct.

The authorities for the Licinii Murenae are given by Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 183, &c. [G. L.]

MURE'NA, ABLA'VIUS, praefectus praetorio in the reign of Valerian (A. D. 253—260), who addressed Ablavius a letter respecting Claudius, afterwards emperor. (Trebell. Poll. Clod. 15.)

MURRHE'DIUS, a rhetorician, frequently mentioned by the elder Seneca. (Suas. 2, Controv. 2, 4, 17, &c.)

MUS, the name of a family of the plebeian Decii gens, which was renowned in early Roman history for two of its members devoting themselves to death in order to save the republic.

1. P. Decius Mus, is first mentioned in A. C. 352, when he was appointed one of the quinqueviri mensarii for the purpose of liquidating in some measure the debts of the citizens. In A. C. 343 he served as tribune of the soldiers under M. Valerius Corvus Arvina, in the Samnite war, and by his heroism saved the Roman army from the most imminent danger. While marching through the mountain passes of Samnium, the consul had allowed his army to be surrounded in a valley by the enemy: destruction seemed inevitable; when Decius offered, with the hastati and principes of the legion, in all sixteen hundred men, to seize a height which commanded the way by which the Samnites were hastening down to attack the Roman army. Here he maintained himself, notwithstanding the efforts of the Samnites to dislodge him, while the Roman army gained the summit of the mountain. In the ensuing night he broke through the Samnites who were encamped around him and joined the Roman consul, whom he forthwith persuaded to make an immediate attack upon the enemy. The result was a brilliant victory and the capture of the enemy's camp. The consul rewarded Decius with a golden crown, a hundred oxen, and a magnificent white bull with gilt horns, the army with a crown of twisted grass, an honour bestowed upon the soldier who had delivered an army from an enemy, and his comrades gave him a similar crown. (Liv. vii. 21, 34—37; Frontin. Strateg. i. 5. § 14, iv. 5. § 9; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 26; Appian, Samn. 1; Cic. de Div. i. 24; Plin. H. N. xvi. 4. a. 5, xxii. 5.)

In A. C. 340 Decius was consul with T. Manlius Torquatus, and he and his colleague had the conduct of the great Latin war. The two consuls marched into the field, and when they were encamped opposite the enemy near Capua a vision in the night appeared to each consul, announcing that the general of one side and the army of the other were devoted to the gods of the dead and the mother earth. They thereupon agreed that the one whose wing first began to waver should devote himself and the army of the enemy to destruction. The decisive battle took place at the foot of Vesuvius; and when the troops of Decius, who commanded the left wing, began to give way, he resolved to fulfil his vow. He called for the pontifex maximus, M. Valerius, and repeated after him the form of words by which he devoted himself and the enemy to the gods of death, with his toga wrapt around his head and standing upon a weapon: he then jumped upon his horse, wearing the cinctus gabinus or sacrificial dress, rushed into the thickest of the enemy, and was slain, leaving the victory to the Romans. Such is the common story of his death; but other accounts relate it somewhat differently. Zonaras (vii. 26) says that he was killed as a devoted victim by a Roman soldier. (Liv. viii. 3, 6, 9, 10; Val. Max. i. 7. § 3, v. 6. § 5; Flor. i. 14; Frontin. Strateg. iv. 5. § 15; Oros. iii. 9 Aurel. Vict. l. c.; Cic. in Orosii Onom. Tull. p. 210; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 121, &c. 136, &c.)

2. P. Decius Mus, the son of the preceding, was consul A. C. 312, with M. Valerius Maximus. Livy relates that Decius remained in Rome in consequence of illness, while his colleague prosecuted the war against the Samnites, and that he nominated a dictator at the wish of the senate, in consequence of the apprehension of a war with the Etruscans; but Aurelius Victor, on the contrary, tells us that Decius gained a triumph over the Samnites in his first consulship, and dedicated to Ceres the booty he had obtained in the war. An inscription recording the victory of Decius in his first consulship has been supposed by some to be genuine, but it is evidently a forgery concocted from the words of Aurelius Victor. (Liv. ix. 28, 29; Diod. xix. 105; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 27; Orelli, Inscript. No. 546.)

In A. C. 309 Decius served as legate under the dictator L. Papirius Cursor, in the war with the Samnites; and in the following year, A. C. 308, he was consul a second time with Q. Fabius Maximus. While his colleague marched against the Samnites, Decius had the conduct of the war against the Etruscans, which he prosecuted with so much vigour that the Etruscans were contented to purchase a year's truce by paying and clothing the Roman army for that year. In A. C. 306 he was magister equitum to the dictator P. Cornelius Scipio Barbatus, and in A. C. 304 censor with Q. Fabius Maximus, his colleague in his second consulship, in conjunction with whom he effected the important reform in the constitution by which the libertini were confined to the four city tribes. In A. C. 300 Decius was the great advocate of the Ogulnian law for throwing open the pontificate and augurate to the plebeians, in opposition to the patrician App. Claudius Caecus; and upon the enactment of the law in this year, he was one of the first plebeians elected into the college of pontiffs.

In A. C. 297 Decius was elected consul a third time with his former colleague Q. Fabius Maximus, at the express wish of the latter. Both consuls marched into Samnium by different routes: Decius defeated the Apulians near Maleventum, and then traversed Samnium, and probably Apulia also, devastating the country in every direction. He continued in Samnium during the following year as proconsul, and took three Samnite towns; but the capture of these towns is in other accounts attributed to Fabius or the new consuls.

In A. C. 295 Decius was elected consul a fourth time with his old colleague Fabius Maximus. The republic was menaced by a formidable coalition of Etruscans, Samnites, Umbrians, and Gauls; the aged Fabius was unanimously called to the consulship in order to meet the danger, but he would not accept the dignity without having his former colleague associated with him in the honour and the peril. Decius was first posted in Samnium, but subsequently hastened into Etruria to the assistance of his colleague, and commanded the left wing of the Roman army at the decisive battle of Sentinum. Here he was opposed to the Gauls, and when his troops began to give way under the terrible attacks of the latter, he resolved to imitate the example of his father, dedicated himself and the army of the enemy to the gods of the dead, and fell as a sacrifice for his nation. (Liv. ix. 40, 41, 44, 46, x. 7—9, 14—17, 22, 24 26—29; Aurel. Vict. l. c.; Zonar. viii. 1; Flor. i. 17; Val. Max. v. 6 § 6; Cic. in Orelli, l. c.)

3. P. DECIVS MUSA, son of the preceding, was consul in A. C. 279, and fought with his colleague P. Sulpicius against Pyrrhus at the battle of Asculum. Before the battle alarm had been spread in the camp of Pyrrhus, by the report that the consul Decius intended, like his father and grandfather, to devote himself to death and the army of the enemy to destruction. Pyrrhus in consequence sent word to the consuls that he had given orders that Decius should not be killed but taken alive, and that he would put him to death as a malefactor. A later legend, recorded by Cicero (Tusc. i. 37, ii. 19), related that Decius sacrificed himself at this battle like his father and grandfather; and it is not improbable, as Niebuhr has conjectured, that Cicero may have found this statement in Ennius. In other passages, however, Cicero speaks only of two Decii—Decii duo fortes viri (Cic. de Off. iii. 4, Cat. 20). As to the result of the battle of Asculum, it is differently stated by different writers. Hieronymus of Cardia related that Pyrrhus gained a victory, Dionysius represented it as a drawn battle, and the Roman annalists claimed the victory for the Romans. The last statement is certainly false, and it appears that Pyrrhus was superior in the contest, though the victory was not a very decisive one. (Zonar. viii. 5; Plat. Pyrrh. 21; Eutrop. ii. 13; Oros. iv. 1; Flor. i. 18 § 9; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. pp. 502—505.)

At a later time Decius, according to the account in Aurelius Victor (de Vir. Ill. 36), was sent against Volsinii, where the manumitted slaves had acquired the supreme power, and were treating their former masters with severity. He killed a great number of them, and reduced the others to slavery again. Other accounts, however, ascribe the expedition against the slaves of Volsinii to Q. Fabius Maximus Gurges, in his third consulship, A. C. 265 (Flor. i. 21; Zonar. viii. 7); but as Zonaras states that Fabius died of a wound during the siege of the town, it has been conjectured by Freinsheim that Decius may have commanded the army after the death of the consul, and may thus have obtained the credit of the victory.

MUSA, a rhetorician, frequently referred to by the elder Seneca, who calls him a man "multi ingenii, nullius cordia." (Controv. Praef. v.) Schott conjectures that this Musa may be the same person as Antonius Musa, the physician of Augustus mentioned below, but this is not very probable.

MUSA, AEMI/LIA, a rich woman, who died intestate in the reign of Tiberius, A. D. 17. Her property was claimed for the fiscus or imperial treasury, but was surrendered by the emperor to Aemilius Lepidus, to whose family she appeared to belong. Her surname Musa shows that she was a freed woman. (Tac. Ann. ii. 48.)

MUSA, ANTONIUS, a celebrated physician at Rome about the beginning of the Christian era. He was brother to Euphorbus, the physician to king Juba, and was himself the physician to the emperor Augustus. He was originally, according to Dion Cassius (liii. 30, p. 517), a freedman, an assertion which some persons, who are over-jealous about the dignity of the medical profession among the Romans, have controverted. When the emperor was seriously ill, and had been made worse by a hot regimen and treatment, A. C. 23, Antonius Musa succeeded in restoring him to health by means of cold bathing and cooling drinks, for which service he received from Augustus and the senate a large sum of money and the permission to wear a gold ring, and also had a statue erected in his honour near that of Aesculapius by public subscription. (Dion Cass. l. c.; Schol. ad Horat. Epist. i. 15, 3; Sueton. August. 59, 81; Plin. H. N. xix. 38, xxv. 38, xxix. 5.) He seems to have been attached to this mode of treatment, to which Horace alludes (l. c.), but failed when he applied it to the case of M. Marcellus, who died under his care a few months after the recovery of Augustus, A. C. 23. (Dion Cass. l. c.) He is by some scholars supposed to be the person to whom one of Virgil's epigrams is inscribed (Catal. 13); but it is hardly likely, that, in a complimentary poem addressed to so eminent a physician, no mention whatever should be made of his medical acquirements. He has also been supposed to be the person described by Virgil in the Aeneid (xii. 390, &c.) under the name Iopis. (See Atterbury's Reflections on the Character of Iopis, &c.) He wrote several pharmaceutical works (Galen, De Compos. Medicam. sec. Gen. ii. 1, vol. xiii. p. 463), which are frequently quoted by Galen (vol. xiii. pp. 47, 206, 263, 326, &c.), but of which nothing but a few fragments remain. There are, however, two short Latin medical works ascribed to Antonius Musa, but these are universally considered to be spurious. One of these is entitled "De Herba Betonica," which is to be found in the collection of medical writers published by Torinus, Basil. 1528, fol.; in Ackermann's "Parabulum Medicamentorum Scriptores Antiqui," Norimb. 1788, 8vo.; and elsewhere. The other little work is entitled "Instructio de Bona Valetudine Conservanda," and is appended to the edition of Sextus Placitas published in 1538, Norimb., 4to. Neither of these works require any particular notice here. The genuine fragments of his writings that remain were collected and published by Flor. Caldani, Bassano, 1800, 8vo. Further information respecting his life and writings may be found in J. C. G. Ackermann's work, "De Antonio Musa et Libris qui illi adscribuntur," Altorf. 1786, 4to. See also Fabricius, *Bibl. MUSA, Q. POMPONIUS, only known to us from coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The head on the obverse is uncertain: the figure on the reverse is one of the Muses, having reference to the cognomen of this Pomponius.

COIN OF Q. POMPONIUS MUSA.

MUSAE (Μοῦσαι). The Muses, according to the earliest writers, were the inspiring goddesses of song, and, according to later notions, divinites presiding over the different kinds of poetry, and over the arts and sciences. They were originally regarded as the nymphs of inspiring wells, near which they were worshipped, and bore different names in different places, until the Thraco-Boeotian worship of the same Muses spread from Boeotia over other parts of Greece, and ultimately became generally established. (Respecting the Muses conceived as nymphs see Schol. ad Theocrit. vii. 92; Heaych. s. v. Νέμειν; Steph. Byz. s. v. Τάβητες; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vii. 21.)

The genealogy of the Muses is not the same in all writers. The most common notion was, that they were the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, and born in Pieria, at the foot of Mount Olympus (Hes. Theog. 52, &c., 915; Hom. Il. ii. 491, Od. i. 10; Apollod. i. 3. § 1); but some call them the daughters of Uranus and Gaea (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. iii. 16; Paus. ix. 29. § 2; Diod. iv. 7; Arnob. a/v. Gent. iii. 37), and others daughters of Pierus and a Pimpleian nymph, whom Cicero (De Nat. Deor. iii. 21) calls Antiope (Tzetz. ad Hes. Op. et D. p. 6; Paus. l. c.), or of Apollo, or of Zeus and Plusia, or of Zeus and Moneta, probably a mere translation of Mnemosyne or Mneine, whence they are called Mnemonides (Ov. Met. v. 268), or of Zeus and Minerva (Isid. Orig. iii. 14), or lastly of Aether and Gaea. (Hygin. Fab. Praef.) Eupheme is called the nurse of the Muses, and at the foot of Mount Helicon her statue stood beside that of Linus. (Paus. ix. 29. § 3.)

With regard to the number of the Muses, we are informed that originally three were worshipped on Mount Helicon in Boeotia, namely, Melete (meditation), Mneme (memory), and Aoede (song); and their worship and names are said to have been first introduced by Ephialtes and Otus. (Paus. ix. 29. § 1, &c.) Three were also recognised at Siccyon, where one of them bore the name of Polymatheia (Plut. Sympos. ix. 14), and at Delphi, where their names were identical with those of the lowest, middle, and highest chord of the lyre, viz. Nete, Mese, and Hypate (Plut. l. c.), or Cephiasso, Apollonia, and Borysthenia, which names characterise them as the daughters of Apollo. (Tzetz. l. c.; Arnob. iii. 37; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vii. 21; Diod. iv. 7.) As daughters of Zeus and Plusia we find mention of four Muses, viz. Thelxinoe (the heart delighting), Aoede (song), Arche (beginning), and Melete. (Cic., Arnob., Tzetz. l. c.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 12.) Some accounts, again, in which they are called daughters of Pierus, mention seven Muses, viz. Neilo, Tritone, Asopo, Heptapora, Achelolia, Tippolo, and Rhodia (Tzetz. Arnob. l. c.), and others, lastly, mention eight, which is also said to have been the number recognised at Athens. (Arnob. l. c.; Serv. ad Aen. i. 12; Plat. De Re Publ. p. 116.) At length, however, the number nine appears to have become established in all Greece. Homer sometimes mentions Musa only in the singular, and sometimes Musae in the plural, and once only (Od. xxiv. 60) he speaks of nine Muses, though without mentioning any of their names. Hesiod (Theog. 77, &c.) is the first that states the names of all the nine, and these nine names henceforth became established. They are Cleio, Euterpe, Thaleia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polymnia, Urania, and Calliope. Plutarch (l. c.) states that in some places all nine were designated by the common name Mneinae, i. e. Remembrances.

If we now inquire into the notions entertained about the nature and character of the Muses, we find that, in the Homeric poems, they are the goddesses of song and poetry, and live in Olympus. (Il. ii. 484.) There they sing the festive songs at the repasts of the immortals (Il. i. 604, Hymn. in Apoll. Pyth. 11), and at the funeral of Patroclus they sing lamentations. (Od. xxiv. 60; comp. Pind. Isthm. viii. 126.) The power which we find most frequently assigned to them, is that of bringing before the mind of the mortal poet the events which he has to relate; and that of conferring upon him the gift of song, and of giving gracefulness to what he utters. (Il. ii. 484, 491, 761, Od. i. 1, viii. 63, &c., 481, 488; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 259.) There seems to be no reason for doubting that the earliest poets in their invocation of the Muse or Muses were perfectly sincere, and that they actually believed in their being inspired by the goddesses; but in later times among the Greeks and the Romans, as well as in our own days, the invocation of the Muses is a mere formal imitation of the early poets. Thamyris, who presumed to excel the Muses, was deprived by them of the gift they had bestowed on him, and punished with blindness. (Hom. Il. ii. 594, &c.; Apollod. i. 3. § 3.) The Sirens, who likewise ventured upon a contest with them, were deprived of the feathers of their wings, and the Muses themselves put them on as an ornament (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 85); and the nine daughters of Pierus, who presumed to rival the Muses, were metamorphosed into birds. (Anton. Lib. 9; Ov. Met. v. 300, &c.) As poets and bards derived their power from them, they are frequently called either their disciples or sons. (Hom. Od. viii. 481, Hymn. in Lun. 20; Hes. Theog. 22; Pind. Nem. iii. 1; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. ii. 476.) Thus Linus is called a son of Amphimarus and Urania (Paus. ix. 29. § 3), or of Apollo and Calliope, or Terpsichore (Apollod. i. 3. § 2); Hyacinthus a son of Pierus and Cleio (Apollod. i. 3. § 3); Orpheus a son of Calliope or Cleio, and Thamyris a son of Erato. These and a few others are the cases in which the Muses are described as mothers; but the more general idea was, that, like other nymphs, they were virgin divinities. Being goddesses of song, they are naturally connected with Apollo, the god of the lyre, who like them instructs the bards, and is mentioned along with them even by Homer. (Il. i. 603, Od. viii. 488.) In later times Apollo is placed in very close connection with the Muses, for he is described as the leader of the choir of the Muses by the surname Movavayérys. (Diod. i. 18.) A further feature in the character of the Muses is their prophetic power, which belongs to them, partly because they were regarded as inspiring nymphs, and partly because of their connection with the prophetic god of Delphi. Hence, they instructed, for example, Aristaeus in the art of prophecy. (Apollon. Rhod. ii. 512.) That dancing, too, was one of the occupations of the Muses, may be inferred from the close connection existing among the Greeks between music, poetry, and dancing. As the inspiring nymphs loved to dwell on Mount Helicon, they were naturally associated with Dionysus and dramatic poetry, and hence they are described as the companions, playmates, or nurses of Dionysus.

The worship of the Muses points originally to Thrace and Pieria about mount Olympus, from whence it was introduced into Boeotia, in such a manner that the names of mountains, grottoes, and wells, connected with their worship, were likewise transferred from the north to the south. Near mount Helicon, Ephialtes and Otus are said to have offered the first sacrifices to them; and in the same place there was a sanctuary with their statues, the sacred wells Aganippe and Hippocrene, and on mount Leibethion, which is connected with Helicon, there was a sacred grotto of the Muses. (Paus. ix. 29. § 1, &c., 30. § 1, 31. § 3; Strab. pp. 410, 471; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. x. 11.) Pierus, a Macedonian, is said to have been the first who introduced the worship of the nine Muses, from Thrace to Thespie, at the foot of mount Helicon. (Paus. ix. 29. § 2.) There they had a temple and statues, and the Thespians celebrated a solemn festival of the Muses on mount Helicon, called Mouŕeia. (Paus. ix. 27. § 4, 31. § 3; Pind. Fragm. p. 656, ed. Boeckh; Diod. xvii. 16.) Mount Parnassus was likewise sacred to them, with the Castalian spring, near which they had a temple. (Plut. De Pyth. Orac. 17.) From Boeotia, which thus became the focus of the worship of the nine Muses, it afterwards spread into the adjacent and more distant parts of Greece. Thus we find at Athens a temple of the Muses in the Academy (Paus. i. 30. § 2); at Sparta sacrifices were offered to them before fighting a battle (iii. 17. § 5); at Troezen, where their worship had been introduced by Ardalus, sacrifices were offered to them conjointly with Hypnos, the god of sleep (Paus. iii. 31. § 4, &c.); at Corinth, Peirene, the spring of Pegasus, was sacred to them (Pers. Sat. Prolog. 4; Stat. Silo. ii. 7. 1); at Rome they had an altar in common with Hercules, who was also regarded as Musagetes, and they possessed a temple at Ambra-cia adorned with their statues. (Plut. Quaest. Rom. 59; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 36.) The sacrifices offered to them consisted of libations of water or milk, and of honey. (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 100; Serv. ad Virg. Eclog. vii. 21.) The various surnames by which they are designated by the poets are for the most part derived from the places which were sacred to them or in which they were worshipped, while some are descriptive of the sweetness of their songs.

In the most ancient works of art we find only three Muses, and their attributes are musical instruments, such as the flute, the lyre, or the barbiton. Later artists gave to each of the nine sisters different attributes as well as different attitudes, of which we here add a brief account. 1. Calliope, the Muse of epic poetry, appears with a tablet and stylus, and sometimes with a roll of paper; 2. Cleio, the Muse of history, appears in a sitting attitude, with an open roll of paper, or an open chest of books; 3. Euterpe, the Muse of lyric poetry, with a flute; 4. Melpomene, the Muse of tragedy, with a tragic mask, the club of Hercules, or a sword, her head is surrounded with vine leaves, and she wears the cothurnus; 5. Terpsichore, the Muse of choral dance and song, appears with the lyre and the plectrum; 6. Erato, the Muse of erotic poetry and mimic imitation, sometimes, also, has the lyre; 7. Polymnia, or Polyhymnia, the Muse of the sublime hymn, usually appears without any attribute, in a pensive or meditating attitude; 8. Urania, the Muse of astronomy, with a staff pointing to a globe; 9. Thaleia, the Muse of comedy and of merry or idyllic poetry, appears with the comic mask, a shepherd's staff, or a wreath of ivy. In some representations the Muses are seen with feathers on their heads, alluding to their contest with the Sirens. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 203, &c.) [L. 8.]

MUSAEUS (Μουσῆος), an officer of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. After the decisive battle of Sipylos, B. C. 190, he came as an ambassador to the Scipios, then at Sardis, to request permission for the king to send commissioners to treat of peace. (Polyb. xiii. 13; Liv. xxxviii. 45; App. Syr. 38.) In B. C. 188 Musaeus was again sent by Antiochus to Cn. Manlius Vulso, the Roman proconsul in Asia, to learn the terms on which the peace between his master and the Romans would be finally ratified. (Polyb. xxii. 24; Liv. xxxviii. 37; App. Syr. 39.) [E. E.]

MUSAEUS (Μουσῆος), literary. 1. A semi-mythological personage, to be classed with Orpheus, and Parnassus. He was regarded as the author of various poetical compositions, especially as connected with the mystic rites of Demeter at Eleusis, over which the legend represented him as presiding in the time of Heracles. (Diod. iv. 25.) He was reputed to belong to the family of the Eumolpidae, being the son of Eumolpus and Selece. (Philochor. op. Schol. ad Arist. Ran. 1065; Diog. Laërt. Prooem. 3.) In other variations of the myth he was less definitely called a Thracian. According to other legends he was the son of Orpheus, of whom he was generally considered as the imitator and disciple. (Diod. iv. 25; Serv. ad Virg. Aen. vi. 667.) Others made him the son of Antiphemus, or Antiopehus, and Helena. (Schol. ad Soph. Oed. Col. 1047; Suid. s. v. Μουσῆος.) In Aristotle (Mirab. p. 711, a.) a wife Deioce is given him; while in the elegiac poem of Hermesianax, quoted by Athenaeus (xiii. p. 597), Antiope is mentioned as his wife or mistress. Suidas gives him a son Eumolpus. The scholiast on Aristophanes mentions an inscription said to have been placed on the tomb of Musaeus at Phalerus. Pausanias (i. 25. § 8) mentions a tradition that the Μουσῆος in Peiraeus bore that name from having been the place where Musaeus was buried. We find the following poetical compositions, accounted as his among the ancients:—1. Χρησμοί, Oracles. (Aristoph. Ran. 1031; Paus. x. 9. § 11; Herod. viii. 96.) Onomacritus, in the time of the Peisistratidae, made it his business to collect and arrange the oracles that passed under the name of Musaeus, and was banished by Hipparchus for interpolating in the collection oracles of his own making. (Herod. vii. 6; Paus. i. 22. § 7.) 2. Τροφίαι, or precepts, addressed to his son Eumolpus, and extending to the length of 4000 lines (Suid. l. c.). 3. A hymn to Demeter. This composition is set down by Pausanias (i. 22. § 7) as the only genuine production of Musaeus extant in his day. 4. Ἐξακτὸς νόμος. (Aristoph. Ran. 1031; Plin. H. N. xxi. 8. a. 21.) 5. Θεογγορία. (Diog. Laërt. Prooem. 3.) 6. Τραγογυγία. (Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. iii.) 7. Σφαίρα. (Diog. Laërt. l. c.) What this sphaera was, is not clear. 8. Παλαίστρας, Teleral and Katapspoi. (Schol. ad Arist. l. c.; Plut. Respubl. ii. p. 364, extr.) Aristotle (Polit. viii. 3, Hist. Anim. vi. 6) quotes some verses of Musaeus, but without specifying from what work or collection. Some have supposed the Musaeus who is spoken of as the author of the Θεογγορία and Σφαίρα, to be a different person from the old bard of that name. But there does not appear to be any evidence to support that view. The poem on the loves of Hero and Leander is by a very much later author. Nothing remains of the poems attributed to Musaeus but the few quotations in Pausanias, Plato, Clemens Alexandrinus, Philostratus, and Aristotle. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. p. 119.)

2. An ancient Theban lyric poet, the son of Thamyra and Philammon, who, according to Suidas (s. v.), lived considerably before the Trojan war.

3. An epic poet, a native of Ephesus, who lived probably about the middle of the second century A. C. According to Suidas, he wrote a poem entitled Περσέως, in ten books, dedicated to Eumenes and Attalus. What Suidas means by the expression, τὰν εἰς τοὺς Περσέως καὶ αὐτὸς κύκλους, it is not easy to say.

4. A grammarian, the author of the celebrated poem on the loves of Hero and Leander. Nothing is known of his personal history; and the elder Scaliger even supposed that the poem was the work of the ancient Athenian bard. But in many of the manuscripts the author is distinctly called Musaeus the grammarian; and it is now agreed on all hands that the poem is quite a late production. According to Schrader and other critics the author did not live earlier than the fifth century of our era. The general style is quite different from the simplicity of the older poets, and several individual expressions betray the lateness of its origin. The poem was first discovered in the thirteenth century. Numerous editions of it have been published. The first, with a Latin version by Marcus Musurus, without any indication of the date or place. Of the rest may be mentioned those by Kromayer, Halm Magd. 1721; by Schrader, 1742; by Heinrich, 1793; by Passow, Leipzig, 1810; and by Schaefer, Leipzig 1825. There are several translations of the poem. In English, by Marlowe, Stapylton, Stirling, &c.; in German, by Stollberg, Passow, &c.; in French, by Marot, &c.; in Italian, by Bernardo Tasso, Bettoni, &c. [C. P. M.]

MUSAGETES. [MUSAE.]

MUSCA, a surname of the Sempronius gens. 1. T. SEMPRONIUS MUSCA, one of the five commissioners appointed in B. C. 168 to settle the disputes between the Pisani and Lunenses. (Liv. xiv. 13.)

2, 3. A. SEMPRONIUS and M. SEMPRONIUS, his brother, bore undoubtedly the surname of MUSCA, since it is related that when they embraced a certain Vargula in their canvass, the latter called out Puer abige Muscas. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 60.)

4. SEMPRONIUS MUSCA, detected C. Gallius in the act of adultery with his wife, and scourged him to death. (Val. Max. vi. 1. § 13.)

5. MUSCA, mentioned by Cicero in B. C. 45, appears to have been a freedman or steward of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. xii. 40.)

MUSICANUS, the ruler of a kingdom on the banks of the Indus, the capital of which was probably near Bukkur. On the sudden approach of Alexander (s. c. 325) Musicanus, who had hitherto sent no tokens of submission to Alexander, being dismayed by his sudden appearance, hastened to meet him with humble acknowledgements of his fault and rich presents. He was graciously received by Alexander, who allowed him to retain his kingdom, with the fertility and opulence of which he was greatly struck. But when Alexander marched westwards to attack Porticauus

Musicanus was induced by the Brahmins to revolt. Alexander sent a force against him under Pythion, who overran the country, captured the towns, which he either destroyed or garrisoned, and took Musicanus prisoner, together with his principal Brahmins. Alexander ordered them to be crucified. It has been conjectured that the name Musicanus means the khan or rajah of Moosh; but Thirlwall (History of Greece, vol. vii. p. 48) doubts whether the title khan was in use in the time of Alexander on the lower Indus. Curtius gives the name Musicanus to the people. (Arrian, vi. 15—17; Curt. ix. 8.) [C. P. M.]

MUSONIANUS, a native of Antioch, an officer under the emperor Constantine the Great and his successors. His first name was Strategus. He was an eloquent speaker both in Greek and Latin, and first acquired the favour of Constantine by acquiring for him an acquaintance with the doctrines of the Manichaeans and other sectaries. Pleased with his diligence, the emperor gave him the name of Musonianus, and promoted his advancement in office. (Amm. Marc. xv. 13.) He is well spoken of in other respects, but is charged with avarice and the love of being flattered. He supported the Arian party, and under the Arian emperor, Constantius, attained the rank of praefectus praetorio Orientis, which he held from A. D. 354 to 358. He was employed to punish a sedition at Antioch, in A. D. 354. According to Libanius, he obeyed the emperor's orders, to act with moderation; but Ammianus (l. c.) charges him with cruelty to some poor people who were innocent, and letting the guilty rich escape, on their paying him heavy sums for his own advantage. In 355, he was too much employed in pillaging the country to defend it against the Persians, with whom he sought in vain to conclude a peace. Nothing more is known of him. (Liban. Epist. pasim; Amm. Marc. l. cc. and xvi. 9, xvii. 5; Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, vol. iv.) [J. C. M.]

MUSONIUS RUFUS. [RUFUS.]

MUSSIDIA GENS, only occurs on coins, with the cognomen Longua. A specimen of these coins is given under LONGUS.

MUSTELA, was a person with whom Cicero, in B. C. 46, had some negotiations respecting the purchase of the Villa Clodiana (ad Att. xii. 5, 44, 47, xiii. 3.) [W. B. D.]

MUSTELA, TAMI'SIUS, a native of Anagnin in the Hernican territory, was one of M. Antony's retainers in B. C. 44—3. (Cic. Phil. ii. 4, v. 6, viii. 9, xii. 6, xiii. 2, ad Att. xvi. 11.) [W. B. D.]

MU'STIUS, was a Roman equester and revenue-farmer, about the time of the praetorship of Verres, B. C. 75, who defrauded M. Junius, a ward and stepson of Mustius. He was once defended by Cicero, but the speech is lost and its occasion unknown. (Cic. in Verr. i. 51, 52; Pseud-Ascon. in Act. II. Verrian. p. 195, ed. Orelli.) [W. B. D.]

MU'STIUS, an architect, and a friend of the younger Pliny. (Ep. ix. 39.) [P. S.]

MUTIANUS. [MUCIANUS.]

MUTILUS, C. PA'PIUS, one of the principal Samnite generals in the Marsic or Social war, B. C. 90—89. At the head of the greater part of the Samnite forces, he invaded Campania, took several of its towns, and obliged almost all the rest to surrender to him; but having made an attack upon the camp of the consul, Sex. Caesar, he was repulsed with a loss of 6000 men, B. C. 90. In the following year he had to resist Sulla, who had penetrated into Samnium, but he experienced a total defeat, was badly wounded in the engagement, and fled with a few troops to Aesernia. (Appian, B. C. i. 40, 42, 51; Oros. v. 18; Vell. Pat. ii. 16; Diod. xxxvii. Ecl. 1.) The name of this Samnite leader is given differently; but C. Papius Mutilus seems to have been his real name. Orosius calls him Papius Mutilus; Velleius terms him Papius Mutilus; and Appian styles him in two passages (i. 40, 42) C. Papius, and in the third (i. 51) Motilus, who is evidently the same person as the one he had previously called C. Papius. Diodorus names him C. Aponius Motulus (Μότυλος). The name Mutilus has been conjectured by a recent writer to be the same as Metellus, but there is no certainty on this point. (Comp. Prosper Mérimée, Études sur l'Histoire Romaine, vol. i. pp. 137, 138, Paris, 1844.)

Appian relates (B. C. iv. 25), in his account of the proscription of B. C. 43, that there was one Statius proscribed who had distinguished himself greatly as a leader of the Samnites in the Social war, and who had afterwards been admitted into the Roman senate on account of the renown of his exploits, his wealth, and his noble birth. He was then eighty years of age, and his name was put down on the fatal list on account of his wealth. Now, as there is no one known in the Social war of the name of Statius, Wesseling conjectured (ad Diod. l. c.) that we ought to read Papius instead; and this correction has been generally received by subsequent writers. The principal objection to it, however, is that Livy speaks (Epit. 89) of the death of a Mutilus in the proscription of Sulla; and from the prominence given to the death of this person in the Epitome, it would almost appear as if he intended the great Samnite leader. (Comp. Prosper Mérimée, Ibid. vol. i. p. 325.)

MUTILUS, PAPIUS, a flatterer of Tiberius, proposed in the senate, A. D. 16, that the 13th of September—the day on which Scribonius Libo Drusus destroyed himself—should be observed as a public holiday, and that offerings should be made at the shrines of Jupiter, Mars, and Concordia. (Tac. Ann. ii. 32.)

MUTINES (Μούτινας, Polybius calls him Μυρτίνας), an African by birth, belonging to the half-caste race called the Lybio-Phoenicians. He was brought up and trained in war under the eye of Hannibal, and having given frequent proofs of his ability and activity as an officer, was selected by that general to take the command in Sicily after the death of Hippocrates. He accordingly joined Epicydes and Hanno at Agrigentum before the close of the year B. C. 212, and being placed at the head of the Numidian cavalry, quickly spread his ravages through great part of the island. Marcellus was now compelled to turn his arms against this new enemy, and advanced as far as the river Himera, where he sustained a severe check from the cavalry of Mutines; but shortly after the jealousy of Hanno and Epicydes prompted them to give battle during a temporary absence of the Numidian leader, and they were totally defeated. (Polyb. ix. 22; Liv. xxv. 40, 41.) But even after this blow Mutines was soon able to resume the offensive, and, instead of shutting himself up within the walls of Agrigentum, carried his daring and destructive excursions into every part of the island. Lævinus, the new consul, who had succeeded Marcellus in the command, seems to have been wholly unable to repress these sallies; but the envy and jealousy of the Carthaginian general at length effected what the Roman arms could not, and Hanno having been prompted by three base motives to the dangerous step of superseding Mutines in his command, the latter, fired with resentment at the indignity, immediately entered into communication with the Romans, and betrayed Agrigentum into the hands of Lævinus. (Liv. xxvi. 21, 40; Zonar. ix. 7.) For this service he was rewarded with the rights of a Roman citizen, in addition to other honours. (Liv. xxvii. 5.) [E. H. B.]

MUTIUS, a Roman architect of very great skill, who flourished in the first century B. C., and built the temple Honoris et Virtutis Mariannæ. (Vitruv. vii. Praef. § 17.) [P. S.]

MUTO or MUTTO, Q. was a man of the lowest rank, who was prosecuted by L. Lælius. (Cic. pro Scaur. 2, pro Fundan. Fr. i. p. 443, of the fourth volume of Orelli's Cicero.) [W. B. D.]

MUTUNUS or MUTINUS, that is, the phallus, or Priapus, which was believed to be the most powerful avenger of demons, and of all evil that resulted from pride and boastfulness, and the like. The name is probably connected with μῦθος or μῦθος, i. e. δὲ σὺν τῷ ἀποβίοντι δακρυμύθος. Mutunus is usually mentioned with the surname Tutunus or Tutinus, which seems to be connected with the verb tueri. A public Mutunus, that is, the one who averted evil from the city of Rome and the republic, had a sanctuary in the upper part of Velia, which existed there down to the time of Augustus, when it was removed outside the city. (Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7; August. De Civ. Dei, iv. 11; Lactant. i. 20; Tertull. Apol. 25; Fest. p. 154, ed. Müller.) [L. S.]

MYAGRUS, a Phocaean, is mentioned by Pliny among those statuary who made athletas et armatos et venatores sacrificiosque (H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 34), and by Vitruvius as one of those artists who failed to attain to eminence, not for the want of industry and skill, but of good fortune (iii. Praef. § 2). [P. S.]

MYCALESIDES (Μυκαλῆσιδες), the mountain nymphs of Mycale. (Callim. Hymn. in Del. 50; Paus. vii. 4. § 1.) [L. S.]

MYCALESSIA (Μυκαλῆσσία), a surname of Demeter, derived from Mycaleus in Boeotia, where the goddess had a sanctuary. (Paus. ix. 19. § 4.) [L. S.]

MYCE/NE (Μυκήνη), a daughter of Inachus and wife of Arestor, from whom the town of Mycenae or Mycene was believed to have derived its name. (Hom. Od. ii. 120; Paus. ii. 16. § 3.) [L. S.]

MYCERINUS, or MECHERINUS (Μυκερίνους, Μεχερίνους), was son of Cheops, king of Egypt, according to Herodotus and Diodorus, and succeeded his uncle Chephren on the throne. His conduct formed a strong contrast to that of his father and uncle, being as mild and just as theirs had been tyrannical. On the death of his daughter, he placed her corpse within the hollow body of a wooden cow, which was covered with gold. Herodotus tells us that it was still to be seen at Sais in his time. We further hear of Mycerinus that, being warned by an oracle that he should die at the end of six years, because he had been a gentle ruler and had not wreaked the vengeance of the gods on Egypt, he gave himself up to revelry, and strove to double his allotted time by turning night into day. He built a pyramid also, or rather began to build it, but died before it was finished. It was smaller than those of Cheops and Chephren, and, according to Hesiodus, was wrongly ascribed by some to the Greek hetaera Rhodopia. (Herod. ii. 129—134; Diod. i. 64; Ath. x. p. 438, b.) [E. E.]

MYDON, of Soli, a painter of some note, was the disciple of the statuary Pyromachus. He therefore flourished about O. L. 138 or B. C. 228. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. li. s. 40. § 42.) [P. S.]

MYGDON (Μύγδων). 1. A brother of Amycus, king of the Bebrycæ, was slain by Hercules, who assisted Lycus in his war with Mygdon. (Apollod. ii. 5. § 9.)

2. A son of Acmon, a Phrygian king, who fought with Otreus and Priam against the Amazons. (Hom. Il. iii. 186, &c.; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 402.) A part of the Phrygians are said to have been called after him Mygdonians. (Paus. x. 27, init.; comp. COROEBUS.) [L. S.]

MYIA (Μύια). 1. Daughter of Pythagoras and Theano (Porphyr. p. 3; Clemens Alex. Strom. iv. p. 522; Suidas), was, according to Iamblichus, the wife of Milon of Crotona. A letter, addressed to a certain Phyllis, is extant under her name. (Lucian, Musææ Ec. extr.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. pp. 883, 886.)

2. A Spartan poetess, who composed hymns to Apollo and Diana (Suidas, s. v.). Lucian (Musææ Ec. extr.) mentions an ancient poetess of the name, celebrated for her beauty and learning, but whether he refers to the Spartan poetess or not, is uncertain.

3. A Thespian poetess, who wrote some lyrical poems (Suidas, s. v.). She is probably the same with Corinna [CORINNA], who bore that surname. [C. P. M.]

MYIAGRUS or MYIODES (Μυιάγρος), that is, the fly-catcher, is the name of a hero, who was invoked at Aliphera, at the festival of Athena, as the protector against flies. (Paus. v. 14. § 2, viii. 26. § 4.) [L. S.]

MYLES (Μύλης), a son of Lelex, brother of Polyaon, father of Eurotas, and king of Lacedæmon, was regarded as the inventor of mills. (Paus. iii. 1. § 1, 20. § 2, iv. 1. § 2.) Stephanus Byzantius mentions Μυλάντριοι θεοί as the protectors of mills. [L. S.]

MYLLUS (Μύλλος), a comic poet, a contemporary of Epicharmus, who with Euetes and Euxenides revived comedy in Athens at the same time that Epicharmus was labouring in the same direction in Sicily. He appears to have been especially successful in the representation of a deaf man, who, nevertheless, hears every thing; whence arose a proverb, Μύλλος πᾶσι ἀκούει. According to Eustathius he was an actor as well as a dramatist, and still adhered to the old practice of having the faces of his actors beamed with red-ochre. (Suidas, s. v. Ἐπιχάρμος; Hesychius, vol. ii. p. 632; Eustathius, ad Il. p. 906, 53, ad Od. p. 1885, 21; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Græc. p. 26.) [C. P. M.]

MYNES (Μύνης), a son of Evenus of Lynæsus, and husband of Briseis, was slain by Achilles. (Hom. Il. ii. 692, xix. 296; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 322.) [L. S.]

MYNISCUS (Μυνίσκος), a tragic actor, a native of Chalcis, who was attacked by Plato in his comedy called Σόφοι, on account of his gluttony. A man named Myniscus was one of the actors of Aeschylus.

The Myniscus who was ridiculed by Plato was perhaps his grandson. (Athen. viii. p. 344, d. e.; Meineke, Fragmenta Poët. Com. vol. ii. p. 668.) [C. P. M.]

MYREPSUS, NICOLAUS. [NICOLAUS;]

MYRINA (Μύρινα). 1. A daughter of Cretheus and the wife of Thoas, from whom the town of Myrina in Lemnos was believed to have derived its name. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 604.)

2. An Amazon, who is likewise said to have given the name to the town of Myrina in Lemnos. (Strab. xii. p. 573; Steph. Byz. s. v.)

3. A daughter of Teucer and the wife of Dardanus. (Hom. Il. ii. 814; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 351.) [L. S.]

MYRINUS appears as the name of an epigrammatic writer in Bruck's Anal. (ii. p. 107). Nothing more is known of him. It has been conjectured that he is no other than Agathias of Myrina. [AGATHIAS.] (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iv. p. 483.) [C. P. M.]

MYRMECIDES (Μυρμηκίδης), a sculptor and engraver, of Miletus or Athens, is generally mentioned in connection with Callicrates, like whom he was celebrated for the minuteness of his works. [CALLICRATES.] His works in ivory were so small that they could scarcely be seen without placing them on black hair. (Varro, L. L. vii. ix. 62; Cic. Acad. ii. 38; Suid. s. v. Μυρμηκίδης and γελείος.) [P. S.]

MYRMEX (Μύρμηξ), that is, an ant, from which animal, according to some traditions, the Myrmidons in Thessaly derived their name. An Attic maiden of the name of Myrmex, it is said, was beloved by Athena; and when the goddess had invented the plough, Myrmex boastfully pretended to have made the discovery herself, whereupon she was metamorphosed into an ant. But when afterwards Zeus made his son Aeacus king of Thessaly, which was not inhabited by human beings, he metamorphosed all the ants of the country into men, who were thence called Myrmidones. (Virg. Aen. iv. 402, with the note of Serv.; Hygin. Fab. 52; Strab. viii. p. 375, ix. p. 433; comp. ΑΙΑΚΟΣ.) According to Philochorus (ap. Harpoc. s. v. Μελίτη), Myrmex was the father of Melite, from whom the Attic demos of Melite derived its name. [L. S.]

MYRMIDON (Μυρμιδών), a son of Zeus and Eurymedusa, the daughter of Cleitos, whom Zeus deceived in the disguise of an ant. Her son was for this reason called Myrmidon (from μύρμηξ, an ant), and was regarded as the ancestor of the Myrmidons in Thessaly. He was married to Peisidice, by whom he became the father of Antiphus and Actor. (Apollod. i. 7. § 3; Apollon. Rhod. i. 56; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 320; Clem. Alex. Protrept. p. 34; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 26.) [L. S.]

MYRMIDON (Μυρμιδών), an Athenian, who commanded a force of 10,000 men, which formed part of the armament sent by Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, under his brother Menelaus, to effect the reduction of Cyprus, B. C. 315. He was afterwards despatched to the assistance of Asander in Caria, against the generals of Antigonus. (Diod. xix. 62.) [E. H. B.]

MYRIS. [MOERIS.]

MYRO (Μυρῶ). 1. The elder of the two daughters of Aristotimus, tyrant of Elis. [ARI-Ἰστορίμω.] When Aristotimus was killed, Myro and her sister were compelled by those into whose hands they had fallen to hang themselves. (Plut. de Virt. Mul. p. 252.)

2. A Rhodian lady mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) as having addicted herself to philosophy and literature: she wrote fables, and a work called ἡμετέρας γυναικῶν βασιλίδων. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. i. p. 628.)

3. See ΜΟΡΡΟ.

[C. P. M.]

MYRON (Μύρων), historical. 1. An Athenian of the deme Phlya, in the tribe Cecropia, is mentioned by Plutarch (Solon, p. 84, c.) as the prosecutor of Megacles and the other Alcmaeonidae who had rendered themselves impious by the massacre of the partisans of Cylon, when they were prevailed on by Solon to submit their cause to the decision of an extraordinary court of three hundred persons.

2. Tyrant of Sicily, the father of Aristonymus, and grandfather of Cleisthenes. He gained the victory at Olympia in the chariot-race in the thirty-third Olympiad (B. C. 648). In commemoration of this victory he erected a treasury at Olympia, consisting of two chambers, lined with plates of brass. (Paus. vi. 19. § 1; Herod. vi. 126.)

3. One of the generals of Mithridates, sent by him, together with Menemachus, at the head of a large force of infantry and cavalry against the Romans in the course of the campaign of Lucullus. The two generals, with all their forces, were defeated and cut to pieces. (Plut. Lucull. p. 502, a.)

[C. P. M.]

MYRON, a native of Priene, the author of an historical account of the first Messenian war, from the taking of Ampeia to the death of Aristodemus. His date cannot be ascertained accurately, but he belongs in all probability to the Alexandrine period, not earlier than the third century B. C. According to Pausanias he was an author on whose accuracy very little reliance could be placed. Both Diodorus and Myron placed Aristomenes in the first Messenian war. Müller (Dorians, i. 7. § 9) affirms that this statement was "in the teeth of all tradition"; but Grote (Hist. of Greece, vol. ii. p. 558) is inclined to think that censure too unqualified. There is, however, sufficient reason for believing that the old traditions suffered quite as much corruption and interpolation at the hands of Myron, as at those of the poet Rhianus. (Paus. iv. 6, &c.; Athen. vi. p. 271, f. xiv. p. 657, d.; Voss. de Hist. Græc. p. 472, ed. Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

MYRON (Μύρων), one of the most celebrated of the Greek statuary, and also a sculptor and engraver, was born at Eleutheræ, in Boeotia, about B. C. 480. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19. § 3.) Pausanias calls him an Athenian, because Eleutheræ had been admitted to the Athenian franchise. He was the disciple of Ageladas, the fellow-disciple of Polycleitus, and a younger contemporary of Phidias. Pliny gives for the time when he flourished the 87th Olympiad, or B. C. 431, the time of the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. (H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19.)

The chief characteristic of Myron seems to have been his power of expressing a great variety of forms. Not content with the human figure in its most difficult and momentary attitudes, he directed his art towards various other animals, and he seems to have been the first great artist who did so. To this characteristic Pliny no doubt refers, when he says, Primus hic multiplicasse veritatem videtur, numerarius quam Polydectus (L. c. § 3). To this love of variety he seems in some degree to have sacrificed accuracy of proportion and intellectual expression. (Plin. L. c.; comp. Cic. Brut. 18.) Neither did he pay much attention to minute details, distinct from the general effect, such as the hair, in which he seems to have followed, almost closely, the ancient conventional forms. (Plin. L. c.)

Quintilian (xii. 10) speaks of his works as softer than those of Callon, Hegesias, and Calamis. The author of the Rhetorica ad Herennium (iv. 6) speaks of his heads as especially admirable.

Myron's great works were nearly all in bronze, of which he used the variety called Delian, while Polycleitus preferred the Aeginetan. (Plin. H. N. xxxiv. 2. a. 5; Dict. of Antiq. a. v. aea.)

The most celebrated of his statues were his Discobolus and his Cow. The encomiums lavished by various ancient writers on the latter work might surprise us if we did not remember how much more admiration is excited in a certain stage of taste by the accurate imitation of an object out of the usual range of high art, than by the most beautiful ideal representation of men or gods; and there can be no doubt that it was almost a perfect work of its kind. Still the novelty of the subject was undoubtedly its great charm, which caused it to be placed at the head of Myron's works, and celebrated in many popular verses. Piny says of it: "Myronem bucula maxime nobilitavit, celebratis veribus laudata." The Greek Anthology contains no less than thirty-six epigrams upon it, which, with other passages in its praise, are collected by Sontag in the Unterhaltungen für Freunde der alten Literatur, pp. 100—119. Perhaps the best, at least the most expressive of the kind of admiration it excited, is the following epigram, which is one out of several epigrams on Myron's Cow by Ausonius (Epig. 58.):—

"Bucula sum, caelo genitoris facta Myronis

Aera; nec factam me puto, sed genitam.

Sic me taurus init: sic proxima bucula magis:

Sic vitulus sitiens ubera nostra petit.

Miraris, quod fallo gregem? Gregis ipse magister

Inter pascentes me numerare solet."

These epigrams give us some of the details of the figure. The cow was represented as leaving and the statue was placed on a marble base, in the centre of the largest open place in Athens, where it still stood in the time of Cicero. (Cic. in Ferr. iv. 60.) In the time of Pausanias it was no longer there; it must have been removed to Rome, where it was still to be seen in the temple of Peace, in the time of Procopius. (Bell. Goth. iv. 21.)

A work of higher art, and far more interesting to us, was his Discobolus, of which there are several marble copies in existence. It is true that we cannot prove by testimony that any of these alleged copies were really taken from Myron's work, or from imitations of it; but the resemblance between them, the fame of the original, and the well-known frequency of the practice of making such marble copies of celebrated bronzes, all concur to put the question beyond reasonable doubt. Of these copies we have the good fortune to possess one, in the Townley Gallery of the British Museum, which was found in the grounds of Hadrian's Tiburtine Villa, in 1791: another, found on the Esquiline in 1782, is in the Villa Massimo at Rome: a third, found in Hadrian's Villa, in 1793, is in the Vatican Museum; a fourth, restored as a gladiator, is in the Capitoline Museum. To these may, in all probability, be added (5) a torso, restored as one of the sons of Niobe, in the gallery at Florence; (6) the torso of an Endymion in the same gallery; (7) a figure restored as a Diomed, and (8) a bronze in the gallery at Munich. (Müller, in the Amalthea, vol. iii. p. 243.) The original statue is mentioned by Quintilian and Lucian. The former dilates upon the novelty and difficulty of its attitude, and the triumph of the artist in representing such an attitude, even though the work may not be in all respects accurate (ii. 13). Lucian gives a much more exact description. (Philopseud. 18, vol. iii. p. 45):—Μῶν τὸν διακεκόντα, ἢ δ' ἐγὼ, φησὶ, τὸν ἐκκεκρότα κατὰ τὸ χῆμα τῆς ἀφίσεως, ἀπεστραμμένον εἰς τὸ διακοφρόν, ἥρμα διελόντα τὸ ἔσθρ, τοῦκτα ἐνασσησμένον μετὰ τῆς βολῆς; οὐκ ἐκείνον, ᾧ δ' ὅς, ἐπεὶ καὶ Μύρωνος ἔργον ἐν καὶ τοῦτο ἔστιν, ὃ διακεκός ἐν λέγει. We have given the passage at length in order to make manifest the absurdity of supposing that the figure was not in the action of throwing the quoit, but merely stretching back the hand to receive the quoit from some imaginary attendant who held it (τὸν διακοφρόν). The real meaning is that the head was turned round backwards towards the hand which held the quoit. The two most perfect copies, the Townley and the Massimi, agree with Lucian's description, except that the former has the head in quite a different position, bending down forwards. Barry preferred this position (Works, vol. i. p. 479; ed. 1809, &c.); but the attitude described by Lucian, and seen in the Massimi statue, gives a better balance to the figure. There is, also, great reason to doubt whether the head of the Townley statue really belongs to it. (See Townley Gallery, Lib. Ent. Knowledge, vol. i. p. 240, where it is figured.) On the whole, the Massimi copy is the best of all, and probably the most faithful to the original. It is engraved in the Abbildungen zu Winckelmann's Werke, fig. 80; and in Müller's Denkmäler d. alten Kunst, vol. i. pl. xxxii. fig. 139, b.

Of Myron's other works Pliny (xxxiv. 8. s. 19. § 3) enumerates the following:—a dog; Perseus, which Pausanias saw in the Acropolis at Athens (i. 23. § 8); sea-monsters (proctas, see Böttiger, inf. cit.); a satyr admiring a double flute and Minerva, probably a group descriptive of the story of MARVAS; Delphic pentathletes; pancratiasts; a Hercules, which, in Pliny's time, was in the temple of Pompey, by the Circus Maximus; and an Apollo, which was taken away from the Ephesians by M. Antonius, and restored to them by Augustus, in obedience to an admonition in a dream. The words in the passage of Pliny, fecisse et cicadas monumentum ac locustae curmibus suis Erinna significat, are a gross blunder, which Pliny made by mistaking the name of the poetess Myro in an epigram by Anyte (or Erinna, Anth. Pal. vii. 190) for that of the sculptor Myron.

In addition to Pliny's account, the following works of Myron are mentioned by other writers: Colossal statues of Zeus, Hera, and Heracles, at Samos, the three statues on one base. They were removed by M. Antonius, but restored by Augustus, except the Zeus, which he placed on the Capitol and built a shrine for it (Strab. xiv. p. 637, b.) A Dionysus in Helicon, dedicated by Sulla. (Paus. ix. 30. § 1.)

A Hercules, which Verres took from Heius the Mamertine. (Cic. Verr. iv. 3.) A bronze Apollo, with the name of the artist worked into the thigh, in minute silver letters, dedicated in the shrine of Aesculapius at Agrigentum by P. Scipio, and taken away by Verres. (Cic. Verr. iv. 43.) A wooden statue of Hecate, in Aegina. (Paus. ii. 20. § 2.) Several statues of athletes. (See Sillig, s.v.) Lastly, a striking indication how far Myron's love of variety led him beyond the true limits of art, a drunken old woman, in marble, at Smyrna, which of course, according to Pliny, was expressis indicata. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 5. s. 4.) His Cow was not his only celebrated work of the kind: there were four oxen, which Augustus dedicated in the portico of the temple of Apollo on the Palatine, a.c. 28 (Propert. ii. 23. 7); and a calf carrying Victory, decried by Tatian. (Adv. Graec. 54, p. 117, ed. Worth.)

He was also an engraver in metals: a celebrated patera of his is mentioned by Martial (vi. 92).

Nothing is known of Myron's life except that, according to Petronius (88), he died in great poverty. He had a son, LYCIUS, who was a distinguished artist.

(Besides the usual authorities, Winckelmann, Meyer, Thiersch, Müller, Junius, Sillig, &c., there is an excellent lecture on Myron in Böttiger's Andeutungen zu 24 Vorträgen über die Archäologie, Vorles. 21.) [P. S.]

MYRONIA'NUS (Μυρωνιάνας), of Amastria, a Greek writer of uncertain age, was the author of a work entitled Ἰστορικῶν ὁμοίων κεφάλαια. (Diog. Laërt. iv. 14, v. 36.) It is also cited by Diogenes under the title of Ἰστορικὰ κεφάλαια (x. 3), and of Ὀμοία simply (i. 115, iii. 40, iv. 8).

MYRO'NIDES (Μυρωνίδης), a skilful and successful Athenian general. In a.c. 457, the Corinthians invaded Megara with the view of relieving Aegina, by drawing away thence a portion of the Athenian troops, which were besieging the chief city of the island. The Athenians, however, who had at the same time another force in Egypt, acting with Inarus, did not recal a single man from any quarter for the protection of Megara: but the old and young men who had been left behind at home, marched out under Myronides, and met the Corinthians in the Megarian territory. After a battle, in which victory inclined, though not decisively, to the Athenians, the Corinthian troops withdrew, and Myronides erected a trophy. But the Corinthians, being reproached at home for leaving the field, returned; and were setting up a rival trophy, when the Athenians made a sally from Megara, and, in the battle which ensued, completely defeated them. The fugitives, in their retreat, entered an enclosure fenced in by a large ditch, where they were surrounded by the Athenians, who occupied with a part of their force the only egress, and slew with their darts every man within. In the following year, a.c. 456, and sixty-two days after the battle of Tanagra, Myronides led an Athenian army into Boeotia, and defeated the Boeotians at Oenophyta, a victory which made his countrymen masters of Phocis, and of all the Boeotian towns, with the single exception of Thebes while even there it seems to have led to the temporary establishment of democracy. After his victory, Myronides marched against the Opuntian Locrians, from whom he exacted a hundred hostages; and then, according to Diodorus, he pentrated into Thessaly, to take vengeance for the desertion of the Thessalian troops to the Lacedaemonians at the battle of Tanagra; but he failed in his attempt on the town of Pharsalus, and was obliged to return to Athens. It is possible that the subject of the present article may have been the father of ARCHINUS, the Athenian statesman, who took a chief part in the overthrow of the thirty tyrants, B.C. 403; for Demosthenes mentions a son of Archinus, called Myronides, who may have been named after his grandfather, according to a custom by no means uncommon. (Thuc. i. 105, 106, 108, iv. 95; Aristoph. Lys. 801, Ecc. 303; Aristot. Polit. v. 3, ed. Bekk.; Lys. Ἐνταφ. p. 195; Diod. xi. 79—83; Plat. Menez. p. 242; Dem. c. Timocrat. p. 742; Herm. Pol. Ant. § 162, note 1; Wachsmuth, Hist. Ant. vol. ii. p. 133, Eng. transl.; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. iii. p. 30, note 2, p. 33, notes; Thuc. i. iii.) [E. E.]

MYRRHA (Μύρρα), a daughter of Cinyras and mother of Adonia. (Luc. D. Syr. 6; comp. ADONIA.) Lycophron (829) calls Byblos in Phoenicia Μύρρας ἄστυ. [L. S.]

MYRSILUS. [CANDAULES.]

MYRSILUS, a Greek historical writer, a native of Lesbos. When he lived is not known. Dionysius of Halicarnassus (i. 23) has borrowed from him almost verbatim a part of his account of the Pelasgians. He refers to him again in i. 28. Myrsilus was the author of the notion that the Tyrrhenians, in consequence of their wandering about after they left their original settlements, got the name of Πελαγγοί, or storks. Athenaeus (xiii. p. 610, a.) quotes from a work by Myrsilus, entitled Ἰστορικὰ παραβολαί. He is also quoted by Strabo (i. p. 60, xiii. p. 610), and by Pliny (H. N. iii. 7, iv. 12). By Amobius (iii. 37, iv. 24), he is called Myrtilus. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 473, ed. Westermann.) [C. P. M.]

MYRSUS (Μύρσος), a Lydian, son of Gyges, was the bearer to Polycrates of the letter containing the treacherous promises by which he was induced to place himself in the power of Oroetes, satrap of Sardis. Myrsus was one of those who were slain in an ambuscade by the Carians in the Ionian war, B.C. 498. (Herod. iii. 122, v. 121.) [E. E.]

MYRTILUS (Μυρτιάς), a son of Hermes by Cleobule, or by Clytia (Hygin. Poet. Astr. ii. 13), or, according to others, by Phaetusa or Myrto. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 752.) He was the charioteer of Oenomaus, king of Elis, and, having betrayed his master, he was thrown into the sea by Pelope near Geræstus in Euboea; and that part of the Aegean is said to have thenceforth been called after him the Myrtoan sea. At the moment he expired, he pronounced a curse upon the house of Pelops, which was hence harassed by the Erinyes of that curse. His father placed him among the stars as auriga. (Soph. Elect. 509; Eurip. Or. 993, &c.; Apollon. Rhod. i. 755; Paus. ii. 18, § 2, v. 1. § 5, viii. 14, § 8; Tzet. ad Lyc. 156, 162; Hygin. Fab. 84, Poet. Astr. ii. 13; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 205, iii. 7; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 184.) His tomb was shown at Pheneus, behind the temple of Hermea, where the waves were believed to have washed his body on the coast. There he was also worshipped as a hero, and honoured with nocturnal sacrifices. (Paus. vi. 20, § 8, viii. 14, § 7.) [L. S.]

MYRTILUS (Μυρτιάς), a Greek comic poet, the brother of Hermippus. Suidas has preserved the names of two of his plays, the Τριπύραρες, and the Ἐπώρες. One object of his ridicule in the former was the tasteless love of display shown by the Megarian Choregi. (Aspasius ad Aristot. Ethic. Nic. iv. 2; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 100; Bode, Geschichte der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. part ii. p. 170.) [C. P. M.]

MYRTILUS, a slave or a freedman, seems to have been bribed by Antony, or some one of that party, to make an attempt upon the life of D. Brutus, but was detected and put to death. (Cic. ad Att. xv. 13, xvi. 11.)

MYRTILUS, L. MINUCIUS, was handed over to the Carthaginians, because he had beaten the ambassadors of the latter, B.C. 187. (Liv. xxxviii. 42.)

MYRTIS (Μέρτις), an Argive, whom, with several others of that and other states, Demosthenes (de Cor. p. 324, ed. Reiske) charged with treachery on the ground of their having misled their fellow-citizens with respect to the danger to be apprehended from the growing power of Philip, and so kept them from combining against him. He charges them also with having done so from corrupt motives. Polybius (xvii. 14) exonerates them from the charge of treachery. [C. P. M.]

MYRTIS (Μέρτις), a lyric poetess, a native of Anthedon. She was reported to have been the instructress of Pindar, and to have contended with him for the palm of superiority. This is alluded to in an extant fragment of Corinna. (Bergk's Poetae Lyrici Graeci, p. 815.) There were statues in honour of her in various parts of Greece. She was also reckoned amongst the nine lyric Muses. (Anthol. Pal. ix. 26; Suidas s. v. Μέρτις, Κόρινθα; Tatian. Orat. ad Graec. 52; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 133; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. ii. pt. 2, p. 112.) [C. P. M.]

MYRTO (Μυρτώ), a woman from whom, according to some, the Myrtoan sea derived its name. (Paus. viii. 14, § 8; Apollon. Rhod. i. 752; comp. MYRTILUS.) [L. S.]

MYRTO (Μυρτώ), a daughter of one Anisteides, was, according to some accounts, the first wife of Socrates. (Ath. xiii. p. 555, d.; Böckh, Publ. Econ. of Athens, b. i. c. 20.) [E. E.]

MYRTOESSA (Μυρτιάσσα), the nymph of a well of the same name in Arcadia; she was represented at Megalopolis along with Archiree, Hagno, Anthracia and Nais. (Paus. viii. 31, § 2.) [L. S.]

MYRTON (Μέρτων), and his son NICANOR (Νικάνωρ), were men of weight and influence in Epeirus, and are mentioned by Polybius (who bears testimony at the same time to their previous high character for uprightness) as having lent themselves to abet the cruel and oppressive conduct of CHAROPUS [No. 2]. Charopus was accompanied by Myrton, when he went to Rome to endeavour to obtain the senate's confirmation of his proceedings. (Polyb. xxxii. 21, 22.) [E. E.]

MYRS (Μῦρ), an artist in the toreutic department, engraved the battle of the Lapithae and the Centaurs and other figures on the shield of Phidias's colossal bronze statue of Athena Promachos, in the Acropolis of Athens. (Paus. i. 28, § 2.) If we are to believe Pausanias, these works were executed from designs by Parrhasius, who flourished half a century later than Phidias. It is probable that there is a mistake in the passage of Pausanias, and that Myr ought to be considered as a contemporary of Phidias, about A. C. 444. (Sillig, s. v.) He is mentioned as one of the most distinguished engravers by Pliny (H. N. xxxiii. 12. s. 55), Propertius (iii. 7. 14), Martial (viii. 33, 50, xiv. 93), and Statius (Silv. i. 3. 50). [P. S.]

MYSCELLUS (Μύσκελλος, or Μύσκελος), a native of Rhyepæ, one of the twelve divisions of Achaia, and, according to Ovid (Melam. xv. 15) a Heracleide, and the son of an Argive named Alemon. He led the colony which founded Crotona, A. C. 710. They were assisted in founding the city by Archias, who was on his way to Sicily [ARCHIAS]. The colony was led forth under the sanction of the Delphic oracle, Myscellus having previously been to survey the locality. He was so much better pleased with the site of Sybaris, that on his return he made an unsuccessful attempt to persuade the Delphic god to allow the colonists to select Sybaris as their place of settlement. Respecting the choice offered to Archias and Myscellus by the oracle, and the selection which each made, see ARCHIAS, Vol. I. p. 265. (Strab. vi. pp. 262, 269, viii. p. 387; Dionys. ii. p. 361; Schol. ad Arist. Equit. 1089; Suidas s. v. Μύσκελος; Clinton, F. H. vol. i. anno 710, vol. ii. p. 265; Müller, Dorians, i. 6. § 12.) [C. P. M.]

MY'SIA (Μυσία). 1. A surname of Demeter, who had a temple, Μυσιαῖον, between Argos and Mycenæ and at Pellene. It is said to have been derived from an Argive Mysius, who received her kindly during her wanderings, and built a sanctuary to her. (Paus. ii. 18. § 3, 35. § 3, vii. 27. § 4.)

2. A surname of Artemis, under which she was worshipped in a sanctuary near Sparta. (Paus. iii. 20. § 9.) [L. S.]

MYSON (Μύσων), a native of Chenæ or Chen, a village either in Laconia (according to Stephanus Byz.) or on Mount Oeta (according to Pausanias, x. 24. § 1), who is enumerated by Plato (Protag. 28, p. 343) as one of the seven sages, in place of Perander. [C. P. M.]

MYTILE'NE (Μυτιλήνη), a daughter of Macar or Pelops, became by Poseidon the mother of Myton. The town of Mytilene in Lesbos was believed to have derived its name from her, or from her son, or from a personage of the name of Mytilus. (Steph. Byz. s. v.) [L. S.]

N.

NABARZA'NES (Ναβαρζάνης), a Persian in the service of Darius. He is first spoken of by Q. Curtius on the occasion of his sending a letter to Sisines, a Persian attached to Alexander, exhorting him apparently to contrive his assassination. Nabarzanès commanded the Persian cavalry on the right wing at the battle of Issus. Afterwards, when the fortunes of Darius seemed desperate, Nabarzanès joined Bessus and Barsaentes in plotting either to kill Darius, or to give him up to Alexander. In a council held after quitting Ecbatana, he had the audacity to propose that Darius should retire into one of the remote provinces of the empire, and for a time resign his authority as king into the hands of Bessus. Darius was so incensed at the proposal, that he drew his scimitar, and was with difficulty prevented from killing Nabarzanès on the spot. The conspirators now resolved to seize Darius, who, notwithstanding that their designs were discovered by Patron, and made known to the king, refused to take refuge among the Greek mercenaries. By command of Bessus, Darius was seized, and thrown into chains, and murdered, when they were overtaken by Alexander. Nabarzanès fled into Hyrcania; and when Alexander reached the river Zioberis or Stibosteas, sent a letter to him, offering to surrender himself if assured of personal safety. This was promised him, upon which he gave himself up, bringing with him a large amount of presents, among which was the beautiful eunuch Bagoas [BAGOAS], through whose entreaties mainly Alexander was induced to pardon Nabarzanès. Of his further fate we have no notice. (Q. Curt. iii. 9. § 1, 7. § 22, v. 9. § 2, 10. § 1, &c., 11. § 8, 12. § 15, 13. § 18, vi. 3. § 9, 4. § 8, 5. § 22; Arrian, iii. 21.) [C. P. M.]

NABDALSA, a Numidian chief, conspicuous both from his birth and wealth, who enjoyed a high place in the favour of Jugurtha, by whom he was frequently employed in services of the most important nature. In consequence of the confidence thus reposed in him by the Numidian king, he was the person selected by Bomilcar as his intended minister in his designs against the life of that monarch [BOMILCAR]; but the negligence of Nabdalsa suffered these projects to transpire. Bomilcar was seized and put to death, but we are not informed whether Nabdalsa shared the same fate. (Sall. Jug. 70—72.) [E. H. B.]

NABIS (Νάβης), succeeded in making himself tyrant of Lacedæmon on the death of Machanidas, B. C. 207. To obviate the inconvenience of having a rival at any future time, he had Pelops, son of the king Lycurgus, who was still quite young, assassinated. To secure himself still further, he carried the licence of tyranny to the furthest possible extent; put to death or banished all the wealthiest and most eminent citizens, and even pursued them in exile, sometimes causing them to be murdered on their road; at other times, when they had reached some friendly city, getting persons not likely to be suspected to hire houses next to those in which the exiles had taken up their abode, and then sending his emissaries to break through the party-walls, and assassinate them in their own houses. All persons possessed of property who remained at Sparta were subjected to incessant exactions, and the most cruel tortures if they did not succeed in satisfying his rapacity. One of his engines of torture resembled the maiden of more recent times: it was a figure resembling his wife Apega, so constructed as to clasp the victim and pierce him to death with the nails with which the arms and bosom of the figure were studded. (Polyb. xiii. 7.) The money which he got by these means and by the plunder of the temples enabled him to raise a large body of mercenaries, whom he selected from among the most abandoned and reckless villains: murderers, burglars, thieves, and reprobates of every kind found an asylum in Sparta and a patron in Nabis. He likewise manumitted a great number of helots and slaves, and apportioned them lands. He extended his protection over the pirates of Crete, whom he sheltered and assisted, receiving a share of their booty. Nor did he content himself with making Sparta a den of robbers, emissaries of the same sort were scattered over all parts of Peloponnesus, the proceeds of whose plunder he shared, while he afforded them a refuge whenever danger threatened. When he first opened negotiations with the Romans we are not informed, but we find him included as one of the allies of the Romans in the treaty made between them and Philip in the year B. C. 204. (Liv. xxxi. 12.) The impunity with which Nabis pursued the course which has been described for two or three years encouraged him to form greater projects. An opportunity soon presented itself. Some Boeotians induced one of the grooms of Nabis to abscond with them, carrying off the most valuable of his horses. The fugitives were pursued, and overtaken at Megalopolis. The pursuers were allowed to carry off the horses and groom; but when they attempted to lay hands on the Boeotians also, they were hindered by the people and magistrates of the town, and compelled to quit it. Nabis seized upon this as a pretext for making inroads into the territory of Megalopolis. These he followed up by seizing the city of Messene, though he was at the time in alliance with the Messenians. (Polyb. xvi. 13.) Philopoemen, by his private influence, collected the forces of Megalopolis, and marched to Messene, upon which Nabis evacuated the town, and hastily returned into Laconia (in the latter part of B. C. 202, or the beginning of B. C. 201). In B. C. 201 Philopoemen became Achaean praetor, and in the third year of his office he collected the forces of the Achaean league with the greatest possible secrecy at Tegea, drew the mercenaries of Nabis into an ambush on the borders of Laconia, at a place called Scotitas, and defeated them with great slaughter. For the rest of the year Nabis was compelled to keep within his own borders. (Polyb. xiii. 8, xvi. 36, 37; Paus. iv. 29. § 10, viii. 50. § 5.) As soon as Philopoemen was replaced by other and inferior leaders, Nabis renewed his attacks upon Megalopolis, and, according to Plutarch (Philop. p. 363), reduced them to such distress, that they were compelled to sow corn in the streets of their city, to avoid starvation. It was at this juncture, when the Achaean army had been disbanded, and the contingents had not been fixed for the different states, that Philip undertook to repel Nabis, on condition that the Achaeans would help him to defend Corinth and some other places. As his object was evidently to involve the Achaeans in his contest with the Romans, his offer was prudently declined, and the assembly at which it was made was dismissed, after a decree had been passed for levying troops against Nabis. (Liv. xxxi. 25.) Philip now (B. C. 198), finding it inconvenient to defend Argos himself, instructed Philocles to give up the custody of the city to Nabis, who, after having betrayed the people into an open expression of the hatred they felt towards him, was admitted by night into the city. He forthwith proceeded to extort the money of the citizens by means similar to those which he had found so successful at Sparta; and then, to secure the support of at least one portion of the community, he proposed a decree for the cancelling of debts, and for a fresh partition of the lands. (Liv. xxxii. 38, &c.) Having procured an interview with Flamininus and Attalus, he agreed to grant a truce for four months to the Achaeans, and placed a body of his Cretans at the disposal of Flamininus. He then returned to Sparta, leaving a garrison in Argos, and sent his wife Apege in his place. She seems to have been a fit helpmate for her husband, whom she even outdid at Argos, robbing and spoiling the women of the city in much the same fashion as her husband had robbed the men. (Polyb. xvii. 17; Liv. xxxii. 40.)

Upon the representations of the commissioners employed in settling the affairs of Greece after the conclusion of the war with Philip, the Roman senate took into consideration the question of peace or war with Nabis, and finally referred the matter to Flamininus. He laid it before a congress of the allies at Corinth when war was unanimously decreed. Pythagoras, who was at once brother-in-law and son-in-law of Nabis, and was in command at Argos, prevented the Romans from getting the city into their possession without a siege; and Flamininus, by the advice of Aristaeus, chose rather to carry the war into Laconia. With a powerful force he descended to the banks of the Eurotas. Nabis strengthened the defences of Sparta, and struck terror into his subjects by the sanguinary execution of eighty suspected citizens. His troops sustained some losses in engagements with the enemy, and Gythium, the arsenal of Sparta, was taken. Nabis, though reinforced by Pythagoras, was fain to solicit an interview with Flamininus. A conference ensued which lasted two days, a long account of which is given by Livy (xxxiv. 30—33). A truce was granted, that Nabis might consult his friends, and Flamininus his allies. The latter could only be induced to consent to peace at all by the representations which Flamininus made to them of the magnitude of the contributions which he should be obliged to lay upon them for the expenses of the war. The terms offered were such as Nabis refused to accept, and the negotiations were broken off. But being more closely pressed by the besieging army, and the city having been nearly carried by assault, Nabis was compelled to implore peace, which was granted on the former conditions, according to which he was to evacuate all the places he held beyond Laconia, to give up to the Romans the ports of Laconia, and the whole of his navy, to confine himself to Laconia, to give up to the exiles their wives and children, and pay 500 talents. This treaty was ratified by the Roman senate; and amongst other hostages, Arsenas, the son of Nabis, was sent to Rome, where he died some time after. The Argives, meantime, had expelled the garrison of Nabis from their city, B. C. 195. (Liv. xxxiv. 33—43; Polyb. xx. 13.)

When the Aetolians, after the departure of Flamininus from Greece, were endeavouring to rekindle the flames of war, they invited Nabis to commence hostilities. He immediately began to make attempts upon the maritime towns of Laconia. The Achaeans, who had been constituted the protectors of them, sent to Rome. Directions were given by the senate to the praetor, Atilius, to repel the aggressions of Nabis; but before his arrival it was deemed necessary by the Achaeans, who were again headed by Philopoemen, as once to relieve Gythium. The attempts of Philopoemen to effect this by sea failed, to some extent, from his having placed his admiral, Tiso, on board a large ship which was utterly unworthy, and went to pieces at the first shock; and notwithstanding a favourable diversion by land, Gythium was taken by Nabis, and Philopoemen retired to Tegea. On re-entering Laconia, he was surprised by Nabis; but through his skilful conduct, the forces of the tyrant were defeated with great slaughter, and Philopoemen ravaged Laconia unmolested for thirty days. The war was now intermitted for a time, probably through the weakness of Nabis (Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 335), who appealed for help to the Aetolians. A small force was sent by them under Alexamenus, by whom Nabis was soon after assassinated, B. C. 192. (Liv. xxxv. 12, 13, 22, 25—35; Paus. viii. 50. § 7, 10; Plut. Philop. p. 364.) [C. P. M.]

NABONASSAR (Nabōnassar). Among the most perplexing questions of Eastern history, is the comparative state of the Assyrian and the Babylonian or Chaldean empire, and the succession of their kings. There seems to be little doubt, however, that the Babylonian kingdom did not extend its conquests till the reign of Nebuchadnezzar B. C. 604. Till this time the kings of Babylon were often dependent on the kings of Assyria, and acted as their viceroys, in the same manner as Cyrus the younger was dependent on his brother. From this general fact, as well as from an inference to be stated immediately, Rosenmüller is of opinion that Nabonassar, the king of Babylon B. C. 747, was, without doubt, a vassal of Assyria. We find in sacred history (2 Kings, xvii. 24) that the king of Assyria, while colonising Samaria, "brought men from Babylon." Rosenmüller assumes that this king was Shalmaneser, or Salmanassar, and argues that we must hence conclude that Babylon was at that time—a period subsequent to Nabonassar's reign—and consequently before, tributary to Assyria. Paulus, in his Key to Isaiah (quoted by Rosenmüller), is of a different opinion, and is corroborated by Clinton. This latter writer infers from Ezra (iv. 2), that the colonisation of Samaria took place under Esarhaddon, the Assyrian monarch, who undoubtedly effected a change in the Babylonian monarchy, and placed his son there as viceroy. In the absence of all positive authority, therefore, we can draw no inference from the event referred to by Rosenmüller. Clinton concludes, on the authority of Polyhistor and the astronomical canon, that Babylon had always kings of her own from the earliest times, and conjectures that Nabonassar and his successors were independent till the reign of Esarhaddon. This conclusion is strengthened by the existence of the celebrated Era of Nabonassar. We may fairly infer, from this monarch's reign having been fixed upon by the Babylonian astronomers as the era from which they began their calculations, that there was some distinguished event—probably the temporary establishment of Babylon as an independent kingdom—which led to their choice. In the absence of any thing like certainty to guide us, we may, notwithstanding, pronounce the opinion which Scaliger once held, but afterwards retracted, that Nabonassar and Baladon are identical, to be untenable.

The Era of Nabonassar. This era serves, in astronomical, the same purpose as the Olympiads in civil history. It was the starting point of the Babylonian chronology, and was adopted by the Greeks of Alexandria, by Hipparchus, Berosus, and Ptolemy. Its date is ascertained from the eclipses recorded by Ptolemy, and the celestial phenomena with which he marks the day of Nabonassar's accession to the throne. It is fixed as the 26th of February, B. C. 747. Scaliger De Emend. Temp. (p. 392) notices the coincidence between the years of this era and the sabbatical year of the Samaritans. Thus, to take the year of Christ, 1584: 1584 + 747 = 2331 of the era of Nabonassar, which is both divisible by 7 and a sabbatical year. (Rosenmüller, Biblic. Geogr. of Central Asia, vol. ii. p. 41, &c., Edinburgh; Clinton, P. H. vol. i. p. 278; Scaliger, De Emend. Temp. p. 352, &c.) [W. M. G.]

NACCA. [NATTA.]

NAENIA, i. e. a dirge or lamentation, equivalent to the Greek Sphros, such as was uttered at funerals, either by relatives of the deceased or by hired persons. At Rome Naenia was personified and worshipped as a goddess, who even had a chapel, which, however, as in the case of all other gods in connection with the dead, was outside the walls of the city, near the porta Viminalis. The object of this worship was probably to procure rest and peace for the departed in the lower world; this may be inferred from the fact of Naeniae being compared with lullabies, and they seem to have been sung with a soft voice, as if a person was to be lulled to sleep. (August. de Civ. Dei, vi. 9; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7, vii. 32; Horat. Carm. iii. 28. 16; Fest. pp. 161, 163, ed. Müller.) [L. S.]

NAEVIA ENNIA. [ENNIA.]

NAEVIA GENS, plebeian, is not mentioned in history till the time of the second Punic war, towards the close of which one of its members, Q. Naevius Matho, was praetor. None of the Naevii, however, obtained the consulship under the republic, and it was not till A. D. 80, when L. Naevius Surdinus was consul, that any of the gens was raised to this honour. The principal surnames under the republic are BALBUS and MATHO: besides these we also find the cognomina Crista, Pollio, Twrpio, which are given under NAEVIUS. On coins we find the cognomina Balbus, Capella, Surdinus. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 259.)

NAEVIUS. 1. Q. NAEVIUS, or NAVIUS, as the name is written in the MSS. of Livy, was a centurion in the army of Q. Fulvius Flaccus, who was engaged in the siege of Capua in B. C. 211, when Hannibal attempted to relieve the town. Naevius greatly distinguished himself by his personal bravery on this occasion, and by his advice the velites were united with the equites and did good service in repulsing the Campanian cavalry. (Liv. xxvi. 4, 5; Frontin. Strateg. iv. 7. § 29; Val. Max. ii. 3. § 3.)

2. Q. NAEVIUS CRISTA, a praefect of the allies, served under the praetor M. Valerius in the war against Philip in B. C. 214, during the course of the second Punic war, and distinguished himself by his bravery and military skill. (Liv. xxiv. 40.)

3. Q. NAEVIUS, was one of the triumvirs appointed in B. C. 194, for founding a Latin colony among the Brutii. He and his colleagues had the imperium granted to them for three years. (Liv. xxxiv. 53, xxxv. 40.)

4. M. NAEVIUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 184, entered upon his office in B. C. 185, in which year, at the instigation of Cato the censor, he accused Scipio Africanus the elder of having been bribed by Antiochus to allow that monarch to come off too leniently. Scipio's speech in his defence was extant in the time of A. Gellius, who quotes a striking passage from it; but there was some dispute whether Naevius was the accuser of Scipio; some authorities spoke of the Petilii as the parties who brought the charge. (Liv. xxxviii. 56, xxxix. 52; Gell. iv. 18; Aur. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 49.) The short quotation which Cicero (de Orat. ii. 61) makes from a speech of Scipio against Naevius must have been delivered upon another occasion, since Livy (xxxviii. 56) tells us that the speech which Scipio delivered in his defence on the occasion referred to, did not contain the name of the accuser. (Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 6, &c., 2d ed.)

5. SEXT. NAEVIUS, a praeco, the accuser of P. Quintius whom Cicero defended. (Cic. pro Quint. 1, &c.) [QUINTIUS.]

6. SER. NAEVIUS, a person defended by C. Curio against Cicero. (Cic. Brut. 60.)

7. NÆVIUS TURPIO, a quadruplator or public informer, was one of the unscrupulous agents of Verres in plundering the unhappy Siciliiana. He had been previously condemned for injuria by the praetor C. Sacerdos. (Cic. Ferr. ii. 8, iii. 39, 40, v. 41.)

8. NÆVIUS POLLIO, a Roman citizen, who was stated by Cicero to have been a foot taller than the tallest man that ever lived. This statement of Cicero, which is quoted by Columella (iii. 8. § 2), was doubtless contained in his work entitled Admiranda. Pliny also speaks (H. N. vii. 16) of the great height of this Naevius Pollio, but says that the annals did not specify what his height was.

CN. NAEVIUS. Of the life of this ancient Roman poet but few particulars have been recorded. It has been commonly supposed that he was a native of Campania, because Gellius (i. 24) characterises the epitaph which he composed upon himself as "plenum superbiae Campanae." Klusmann, however, the most recent editor of Naevius's fragments, thinks that he was a Roman, from the circumstance of Cicero's alluding to him in the De Oratore (iii. 12) as a model of pure elocution, and contends that no inference can be drawn from the mention of Campanian pride, which, as is shown by Cicero's speech, De Lege Agr. (ii. 33), had become proverbial. But to this it may be objected, that in the passage of the De Oratore the name of Plautus, an Umbrian, is coupled with that of Naevius; a fact which invalidates that argument for his Roman birth. And though the pride of the Campanians may have become a proverb, it is difficult to see how it could with propriety be applied to any but those Gascons of ancient Italy. However this may be, it is probable that Naevius was at least brought early to Rome; but at what time cannot be said, as the date of his birth cannot be fixed with any accuracy. The fact, however, of his having died at an advanced age about the middle of the sixth century of Rome, may justify us in placing his birth some ten or twenty years before the close of the preceding one, or somewhere between the years 274 and 264 B.C. And this agrees well enough with what Gellius tells us (xvii. 21), on the authority of Varro, about his serving in the first Punic war, which began in 264 B.C., and lasted twenty-four years. The first literary attempts of Naevius were in the drama, then recently introduced at Rome by Livius Andronicus. According to Gellius, in the passage just cited, Naevius produced his first play in the year of Rome 519, or B.C. 235. Gellius, however, makes this event coincident with the divorce of a certain Carvilius Ruge, which, in another passage (iv. 3) he places four years later (B.C. 231), but mentions wrong consuls. Dionysius (ii. 25) also fixes the divorce of Carvilius at the latter date; Valerius Maximus (ii. 1) in B.C. 234. These variations are too slight to be of much importance.

Naevius was attached to the plebeian party; an opponent of the nobility, and inimical to the innovations then making in the national literature. These feelings he shared with Cato; and, though the great censor was considerably his junior, it is probable, as indeed we may infer from Cicero's Cato (c. 14), that a friendship existed between them. It was in his latter days, and when Cato must have already entered upon public life, that Naevius, with the licence of the old Attic comedy, made the stage a vehicle for his attacks upon the aristocracy. Gellius (vi. 8) has preserved the following verses, where a little scandalous anecdote respecting the elder Scipio is accompanied with the praise justly due to his merits:—

Etiam qui res magnas manu saepe gessit gloriose, Cujus facta viva nunc vigent, qui apud gentes solus
praestat,
Eum suus pater cum pallio uno ab amica abduxit.

These lines, a fragment probably of some interlude, would have derived much of their piquancy from their contrast with the current story of Scipio's continence after the taking of Carthago Nova, in B.C. 210. Asconius (Cic. Ferr. i. 10) has preserved the following lampoon on the Metelli:—

Fato Metelli Romae fiunt consules;

where the insinuation is, as Cicero explains in the passage to which the note of Asconius refers, that the Metelli attained to the consular dignity, not by any merit of their own, but through the blind influence of fate. In what year could this attack have been made? From the way in which the answer to it is recorded by Asconius, it would seem to have been during the actual consulship of one of the family. (Cui temp. Metellus consul iratus responderat senario hypercatalecto, qui et Saturnius dicitur, Dabunt malum Metelli Naevio poetae).

It can hardly be doubted, therefore, that the person in question was Q. Caecilius Metellus, consul in B.C. 206. The haughty aristocracy of Rome were by no means disposed to let such attacks pass unpunished. By the law of the Twelve Tables a libel was a capital offence, and Metellus carried his threat into execution by indicting Naevius. The poet escaped with his life, but was given into the custody of the triumviri capitales (Gell. iii. 3); an imprisonment to which Plautus alludes in his Miles Gloriosus (ii. 2. 56). Confinement brought repentance. Whilst in prison he composed two plays, the Hariculus and Lea, in which he recanted his previous imputations, and thereby obtained his release through the tribunes of the people. (Gell. l. c.) His repentance, however, did not last long, and he was soon compelled to expiate a new offence by exile. At that time a man might choose his own place of banishment, and Naevius fixed upon Utica. Here it was, probably, that he wrote his poem on the first Punic war, which, as we learn from Cicero (De Senect. 14), was the work of his old age; and here it is certain that he died; but as to the exact year there is some difference of opinion. According to Cicero (Brut. 15), his decease took place in the consulship of Cethegus and Tuditanus, B.C. 204. As we learn, however, from the same passage that this was by no means a settled point, and that Varro, diligentissimus investigator antiquitatis, extended his life rather longer, it may be safer to place his death, with Hieronymus (in Euseb. Chron. Ol. cxliv. 3), in A. C. 202, which was probably the date of Varro. The epitaph which he composed upon himself, preserved by Gellius in the passage alluded to at the beginning of this notice, runs as follows:—

Mortales immortales flere si foret fas,
Flerent Divae Camenae Naevium poetam.
Itaque postquam est Orcino traditus thesauro Obliiti sunt Romani loquier Latina lingua.

Naevius seems to have transmitted an hereditary enmity against the nobility, if, indeed, the tribune Naevius, who accused Scipio of peculation in A. C. 185, was of his family. (Liv. xxxviii. 56; Gell. iv. 18.) [See above, NAEVIUS, No. 4.]

Naevius was both an epic and a dramatic poet. The work which entitled him to the former appellation was his poem before alluded to on the first Punic war, of which a few fragments are still extant. It was written in the old Saturnian metre; for Ennius, who introduced the hexameter among the Romans, was not brought to Rome till after the banishment of Naevius. The poem appears to have opened with the story of Aeneas's flight from Troy, his visit to Carthage and amour with Dido, together with other legends connected with the early history both of Carthage and of Rome. Originally the poem was not divided into books, and we learn from Suetonius (De Ill. Gram. 2), that Lampadio distributed it into seven. It was extensively copied both by Ennius and Virgil. The latter author took many passages from it; particularly the description of the storm in the first Aeneid, the speech with which Aeneas consoles his companions, and the address of Venus to Jupiter. (Cic. Brut. 19; Macrob. Sat. vi. 2; Serv. ad Aen. i. 198.)

A translation of the Cypria Ilias has been ascribed to Naevius; but the heroic metre in which it is executed is a sufficient proof that it was the production of some later writer, probably Laevius, whose fragments seem to have been frequently confounded with those of Naevius. (Pontan. ad Macro. Sat. i. 18.)

His dramatic writings comprised both tragedies and comedies; and, among the latter, that more peculiarly Roman species of composition, the Comœdius Togatae. Welcker, however, doubts about his claims to be considered as a tragic poet, and altogether denies that he wrote Togatae. (Die Griech. Tragödien, pp. 1345, 1372.) Among his tragedies have been reckoned Andromache sive Hector Proficiscens, Danaë, Hesione, Iphigenia, Lycurgus (by some thought to have been a comedy), the Equus Trojanus (also ascribed to Livius), and the Dolus, a title variously spelt (see Müller, ad Varr. L. L. p. 163). Klusamann (p. 100) holds the Equus Trojanus and Dolus to be one and the same play. Several other tragedies seem to have been wrongly ascribed to Naevius, whose dramatic fragments have been frequently confounded with those of Livius, Ennius, and other writers.

Of his Togatae the titles of two only can be cited; the Romulus, a Prætextata, and the Clasidium, probably a Tubernaria. (Donat. ad Ter. Adelph. iv. 1, 21; Varr. L. L. p. 163, Müll.)

In addition to these, we find the titles of between thirty and forty comedies, many of which, from their names, seem to have been taken from the Greek, but were probably adapted to Roman manners with considerable freedom, in the fashion of Plautus rather than of Terence. Of most of these comedies, as well as of the plays before enumerated, several short fragments are extant.

Besides these regular dramas, Naevius seems to have written entertainments called Ludi or Satyræ (Cic. Cato, 6); and it was probably in these that he attacked the aristocracy.

The remains of Naevius are too insignificant to afford any criterion of his poetical merits, concerning which we must therefore be content to accept the testimony of antiquity. That he was so largely copied by subsequent poets, is a proof of his genius and originality. Plautus alludes to him more than once; and Terence, in the prologue to his Andria, ranking him with Ennius and Plautus, prefers even his more careless scenes to the obscure diligence of his own contemporaries. Cicero (Brut. 18) sets his Punic War as much above the Odyssey of Livius Andronicus as Myro surpassed Daedalus in the art of sculpture. His antiquated style did not suit the fastidious refinement of the Augustan age. Yet he was still a favourite with the admirers of the genuine old school of Roman poetry; and the lines of Horace (Ep. ii. 1. 53) show that his works, if not so much read as formerly, were still fresh in the memories of men.

The fragments of Naevius have been published, together with those of other Latin poets, by the Stephani, 8vo. Paris, 1564; but in this collection many are wrongly attributed to Naevius. There is another collection by Almeloveen, 12mo. Amster. 1686. The fragments of the Bellum Punicum, together with those of Ennius, were published by P. Merula, 4to. Leyden, 1595; and by Spangenberg, 8vo. Leipzig, 1825. They have also been collected by Hermann in his Elementa Doctrinae Metricæ (iii. 9), and by Düntzer and Lersch, in a treatise entitled De versu quem vocant Saturnio, 8vo. Bonn, 1839. The dramatic fragments by Delrio, Syllabus Tragœdiarum Latinarum, 4to. Paris, 1619; Mittaire, London, 1713; Bothe, Poëtarum Latii comicorum fragmenta, Leipzig, 1834. The most convenient collection of the entire fragments is that of Klusamann, 8vo. Jena, 1843, accompanied with a life of Naevius, and an essay on his poetry. See also Weichert, Poëtarum Latinorum Reliquiæ; and Neukirch, De fabula togata Romanorum, Leipzig, 1833. [T. D.]

NAIADES. [NYMPHÆ.]

NAMUSA, AUFIDIUS, one of the numerous pupils of Serv. Sulpicius. There were ten of the pupils of Sulpicius who wrote books, and from the works of eight of them Namusa compiled a work which was distributed into one hundred and eighty parts or divisions (libri). The work of Namusa is cited by Ulpian (Dig. 13. tit. 6. s. 5. § 7), Javolenus (Dig. 35. tit. 1. s. 40. § 3), and Paulus (Dig. 39. tit. 3. s. 2. § 6); and we are thus made acquainted with some of the legal opinions of Servius. As to the expression "his auditoribus," used by Pomponius (Dig. 1. tit. 2. s. 2. § 44) see Grotius, Vitæ Jurisconsulti, and Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Privatrechts, vol. i. p. 293. [G. L.]

NANNII or NANNEII, persons of property prescribed by Sulla. (Cic. de Pat. Cons. c. 2.)

When Cicero speaks (ad Att. i. 16. § 3) of Culeus ex Nannianis illis, he means to indicate Crassus, who was one of the purchasers of the confiscated property of the Nanni.

NANNO (Nannō), a flute-player, beloved by Minnermus, and repeatedly celebrated by him, as well as mentioned in connection with his name by Poseidippus. (Anth. Græc. vol. ii. p. 48, vol. viii. p. 142, ed. Jacobs; Stobæus, vol. i. p. 303, vol. iii. pp. 332, 435, ed. Gaisford.) [W. M. G.]

NAPAEÆ. [NYMPHÆ.]

NARAVAS (Napavās), a Numidian chief, who bears a conspicuous part in the war of the Carthaginians against their revolted mercenaries and African subjects. He at first espoused the cause of the rebels, and joined the army of Spendius with a considerable force, but was afterwards induced to go over to the Carthaginians. The latter change, which took place at so critical a period that it was probably the means of saving the whole army of Hamilcar Barca from destruction, is ascribed to the influence exercised over the mind of Naravas by the personal character of that general, who received him with open arms and promised him his daughter in marriage. Throughout the remainder of the war Naravas was distinguished for his zeal and fidelity in the Carthaginian cause, and contributed essentially to the ultimate success of Hamilcar. (Polyb. i. 78, 82, 84, 86.) Naravas is the Greek form of the name, which is not mentioned by any Latin writer: the more correct form would probably be Narbal, or rather, Naarbaal. (Gesenius, Ling. Phœn. Mon. p. 410.) [E. H. B.]

NARCAEUS (Napkaïos), a son of Dionysus and Narcæa, established a sanctuary of Athena Narcaea in Elia, and also introduced there the worship of Dionysus. (Paus. v. 16. § 5.) [L. S.]

NARCISSUS (Nápκισσος), a son of Cepheus and the nymph Liriope of Thespiae. He was a very handsome youth, but wholly inaccessible to the feeling of love. The nymph Echo, who loved him, but in vain, died away with grief. One of his rejected lovers, however, prayed to Nemesis to punish him for his unfeeling heart. Nemesis accordingly caused Narcissus to see his own face reflected in a well, and to fall in love with his own image. As this shadow was unapproachable Narcissus gradually perished with love, and his corpse was metamorphosed into the flower called after him narcissus. This beautiful story is related at length by Ovid (Mét. iii. 341, &c.). According to some traditions, Narcissus sent a sword to one of his lovers, Ameinius, who killed himself with it at the very door of Narcissus' house, and called upon the gods to avenge his death. Narcissus, tormented by love of himself and by repentance, put an end to his life, and from his blood there sprang up the flower narcissus (Conon, Narrat. 24). Other accounts again state that Narcissus melted away into the well in which he had beheld his own image (Paus. ix. 31. § 6); or that he had a beloved twin sister perfectly like him, who died, whereupon he looked at his own image reflected in a well, to satisfy his longing after his sister. Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 266) says that Narcissus was drowned in the well. [L. S.]

NARCISSUS. 1. A freedman of the emperor Claudius, over whom he possessed unbounded influence. He had charge of the emperor's letters. Reimar (ad Dion. Cass. lx. 84) quotes an old inscription (ap. Fabrettum, p. 543) which runs thus:

NARCISSUS AUG. L. AB. EPISTULIS. (Comp. Suet. Claud. 28; Zonar. p. 363, d.) When Messallina wished to compass the death of C. Appius Silanus, Narcissus, between whom and herself there existed at that time a good understanding, pretended to the emperor that in a dream he had seen him fall by the hand of Silanus. The preconcerted entrance of Silanus immediately afterwards was alleged as a confirmation of the vision, and the unfortunate youth was immediately put to death. The emperor thanked his freedman in the senate, A. D. 42. (Suet. Claud. 37; Dion Cass. lx. 14.) Narcissus soon afterwards seized the opportunity afforded by the conspiracy of Furius Camillus Scribonianus to get the emperor to order the death of a number of innocent persons. Messallina and Narcissus even went so far as to put to the torture many knights and senators. (Dion Cass. lx. 15, 16.) Several of those most involved in the conspiracy, who could propitiate Narcissus and Messallina by money, escaped. In A. D. 43 we find Vespasianus sent as legatus of a legion into Germany through the influence of Narcissus. (Suet. Vesp. 4.) When the soldiers under A. Plautius in Britain mutined, Narcissus was sent by the emperor to restore order; but on his attempting to address the soldiers he was received with shouts of indignation, and not suffered to speak. His mission, however, accomplished its purpose, for the soldiers, under the influence of this revulsion of feeling, suffered Plautius to take the command of them. (Dion Cass. lx. 19.)

When Messallina, having lost the confidence of the freedmen of the palace, in consequence of her having caused the death of Polybius, proceeded in her mad extravagance to marry C. Silius, information was given to the emperor, who at the time was at Ostia, by Narcissus, through some women. Narcissus persuaded the emperor that his only chance of safety lay in entrusting to him the command of the praetorian soldiers; and to prevent any one else from having access to the ear of Claudius, he asked and obtained permission to ride back to Rome in the same carriage with him. As they approached the city he diverted the attention of the emperor from the appeals of Messallina, who had come out to meet them, and prevented her children from being brought to their father. Finding Claudius not so prompt in ordering the death of Messallina as he wished, and fearing the effects of her habitual influence over him, Narcissus himself gave orders for putting her to death. The emperor was told that she had perished, and made no further inquiries. Narcissus shortly after received the insignia of a praetor. (Tac. Ann. xi. 30—38; Suet. Claud. 28.) In the discussions which ensued as to whom Claudius should marry, Narcissus supported the claims of Aelia Petina. (Tac. Ann. xii. 1.) Dion Cassius (lx. 34) relates an anecdote which shows that Narcissus thoroughly appreciated the stupidity of the emperor. He however got into considerable disgrace on account of the insufficient manner in which the canal for draining the lake Fucinus, the construction of which he had superintended, had been made. Agrippina charged him with the fraudulent appropriation of great part of the money apportioned for the work. Narcissus, in return, did not leave unnoticed her imperious temper and ambitious designs, and threw his influence into the scale in favour of Britannicus. (Tac. Ann. xii. 37, 65; Dion Cass.)

lx. 34.) Agrippina, to make sure of the succession for her son, resolved to poison the emperor. She accordingly sent away Narcissus to Campania, on the pretext of his making use of the warm baths for the gout, with which he seems to have been affected. Here he was put to death almost immediately on the accession of the emperor Nero, A. D. 54. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 1; Dion Cass. lx. 34.) Before his death he burnt all the letters of Claudius which were in his possession. He amassed an enormous fortune, amounting, according to Dion Cassius, to 400,000,000 sesterces, equivalent to 3,125,000*l.* of our money. (Comp. Juvenal, xiv. 329.) If the following inscription refers to him, he had a wife named Claudia Dicæosyna: D. M. || CLAVDIAE || DICÆOSYNÆ || TL CLAVDIVS NARCISVS LIB. EID. COIV. || PIENTISSIMAE || ET FRVGALISSI || B. M. (Orell. Inscript. Lat. Select. vol. i. p. 177.) In another inscription we have: NARCISVS TL CLAVDIVS || BRITANICVS || I. || SVPERA || INSVLAS. (Orell. I. c. and No. 2927, p. 505.) His name also occurs in Inscript. No. 4902, vol. ii. p. 414.

2. A freedman of the emperor Nero, who was put to death by the emperor Galba. (Dion Cass. lxxv. 3.) [C. P. M.]

NARCISSVS, a celebrated athlete, with whom Commodus was in the habit of practising his gymnastic exercises, was employed by Marcia to strangle the emperor, when the poison that had been administered to him proved too slow in its operation, A. D. 192. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 22; Lamprid. Commod. 17; Aur. Vict. de Caes. 18, Epit. 17.) Narcissus appears to have had great influence with this emperor, for we are told that it was at his suggestion that Pescennius Niger was placed by Commodus in the command of the Syrian armies. (Spartian. Pescen. Nig. 1.) Narcissus was afterwards exposed to the lions by the emperor Severus on account of his having strangled Commodus. (Dion Cass. lxxiii. 16; Spartian. Sever. 14.)

NARSES, son of Artaxerxes III. [ARSES.]

NARSES, king of Persia. [SASSANIDÆ.]

NARSES (Ναρσής), the rival of Belisarius. This celebrated general and statesman was perhaps born as early as A. D. 472. He was of foreign descent and of quite obscure parentage; indeed, it seems that his parents sold him, or that he was made a prisoner of war when a mere boy, and his fate was that of so many other boys captured in war: he was castrated. Of his earlier life nothing is known. He came, however, to Constantinople and was employed in the imperial household. He was of material service to the emperor Justinian during the Nika riots (532), in which the name of Belisarius likewise became conspicuous. Narses was then cubicularius or chamberlain, as Theophanes states, and it was perhaps the judicial use he made of the funds entrusted to him, by bribing over the emperor's opponents, which caused him to be appointed treasurer to his master. In later years he was employed in several embassies, and discharged his duties to the complete satisfaction of his master, whose confidence he enjoyed in the highest degree. In 538 he was sent to Italy with reinforcements for Belisarius, who was then in the field against the Goths; but it is more than probable that he had secret instructions to thwart that great commander, and prevent him from obtaining advantages which might have rendered him dangerous to the suspicious Justinian. The contingent commanded by Narses consisted of 5000 veterans and 2000 Herules, savage but gallant warriors, and one of his lieutenants was another Narses, the brother of Aratius, an excellent general, whom Baronius would not have confounded with the great Narses had he been aware that the second Narses fell in the battle of Anglone in 543. Narses and Belisarius effected their junction at Firmum, and soon afterwards they relieved Rimini, an exploit the honour of which was attributed to Narses, though the fact was that he tried to persuade Belisarius from venturing his army in such an expedition. Belisarius became soon aware that Narses had not only secret designs against him, but acted agreeably to Justinian's wishes; for in the council of war he never proposed any measure of importance without finding Narses of a contrary opinion, and had the mortification, moreover, to see him supported by a crowd of jealous or dissatisfied officers. Vexed at these unfair proceedings, Belisarius claimed absolute obedience, and produced his imperial commission in which Justinian commanded the officers of every degree to obey him implicitly; but Narses, pointing out the last words of the letter, in which it was said "that the officers should obey him in every thing compatible with the welfare of the empire," continued in his disobedience, pretending that the plans of Belisarius were dangerous to the empire. Hence arose violent quarrels, and Narses with his troops separated himself from Belisarius. About this time the Goths, or, more correctly speaking, the Franks and Burgundians, their allies, had reduced Milan to extremities, after besieging it for a considerable time; and, anxious to save that large city, Belisarius sent orders to Joannes and Justin to hasten to its relief. They answered that they had only to obey orders emanating from Narses. Belisarius endured this insult with forbearance, and at last prevailed upon Narses to give his consent to the contemplated expedition of those two generals; but it was then too late, the Roman garrison of Milan surrendered, and that splendid city was reduced to a heap of ruins, while its inhabitants were massacred by the victors. Justinian now became afraid that the jealousy between the two commanders would lead to still greater calamities, and he consequently recalled Narses (539). This was the first equivocal début of a general who afterwards put an end to the Gothic dominion in Italy.

During the following twelve years the name of Narses is scarcely mentioned in the annals of the empire, but he continued nevertheless to exercise a predominant influence in the privy council of Justinian. The world, however, was more accustomed to look upon him as a statesman than as a general, and great was consequently the surprise when, in 551, the emperor put him at the head of a formidable expedition destined to retrieve the fortune of the Roman arms in Italy, where the Goths had had the upper hand ever since the recall of Belisarius in 548. The campaign of Narses in Italy 553, had been no proof of his military skill, and the Roman veterans revolted at fighting under a eunuch, whom the very laws of the country seemed to exclude from any command over men. Little affected by their demonstrations, and despising the ridicule which the people tried to throw upon him, Narses, availing himself of the unlimited confidence of Justinian, drained the imperial treasury, and vigorously pushed on his preparations for the ensuing campaign. In the spring of 552 every thing was ready,

However, Ancona was the only port left to the Romans in Italy between Ravenna and Otranto; the Gothic fleet covered the sea; and it was consequently dangerous to trust the safety of 100,000 men, and the issue of the whole undertaking to the chances of the weather or a naval battle. However, the Gothic fleet was beaten and destroyed off Sinigaglia. Narses nevertheless resolved to march round the Adriatic. This road presented no less formidable difficulties: the whole low country traversed by the Po, the Adige, &c., and their countless branches, was an impassable swamp; the bridges over the Po and the Adige had been broken down by the enemy; and the only remaining passage over the latter river, at Verona, was guarded by the gallant Teias with a strong body of veteran Goths. Narses consequently chose a middle course. He coasted the Dalmatian shore of the Adriatic as far as the northern corner of that sea, whence his army continued by land, while the fleet took a parallel course along the shore, and wherever a river or a canal checked the progress by land, the ships conveyed timber and other materials to the spot for the speedy construction of bridges. Thus he reached Ravenna, Teias being all the while quite unable to molest him. He remained nine days in that city. Thence he marched upon Rimini, and the Gothic garrison having dared to insult him, he drove them back within their walls, and slew their commander Udrilas. Without losing time in besieging Rimini he proceeded on the Flaminian way to Rome, where king Totilas awaited him with his main army. They met in the plain of Lentaglio, between Tagina (Taginae, Tadinæ) and the tombs of the Gauls: the left of the Romans was under the immediate command of Narses and Joannes, the nephew of Vitalienus, and the right was commanded by Valerianus, John Phagas, and Dagistheus. The Romans carried the day: 6000 Goths fell on the field, and king Totilas was slain in his flight: his armour was sent to Constantinople (July 552). Teias was now chosen king of the Goths. Narses reaped the fruits of his victory by receiving the keys of the strongest fortresses of the Goths in that portion of Italy. Rome was forced to surrender by Dagistheus, a distinguished general, whose name and that of his colleague Bessus are strangely connected with the chances of warfare; for it was Bessus who commanded in Rome when it was reduced by the Goths in 546, a misfortune which he afterwards retrieved by reducing Petra, the bulwark of the empire towards the Caucasus, over which Dagistheus was appointed commander; and Dagistheus having been compelled to surrender Petra again to the Persians, took in his turn his revenge by reducing Rome. In the course of the Gothic war Rome had been five times taken and retaken: in 536 by Belisarius, in 546 by Totilas, in 547 again by Belisarius, in 549 again by Totilas, and in 552 by Narses. Narses despatched Valerian to the Po for the purpose of preventing the fugitive Goths from rallying round the headquarters of Teias at Pavia and Verona; but Teias eluded his vigilance, and, aided by a body of Franks whose alliance he had bought, suddenly broke forth from behind his lines, and appeared in Southern Italy to avenge the death of Totilas. But, instead of avenging it, he shared his fate on the banks of the Sarnus (Draco), a little river which flows into the bay of Naples (March, 553). In a bloody battle, which lasted two days, the Gothic army was utterly defeated, Teias and a countless number were slain, and the rest capitulated, but were allowed to withdraw from Italy: this condition was never well observed. Narses now marched to the north, reducing one fortress after the other, and gaining the confidence of the inhabitants through his firm yet generous and faithful conduct. He thought he had subdued Italy when he was undeceived by the appearance of a host of 75,000 Alemanni and Franks, who came down the Alps under the command of the two gallant dukes of the Alemanni, Leutharis and Buccellinus. The Roman vanguard, commanded by Fulcaris, a brave but rash Herulian, was cut to pieces in the amphitheatre of Parma, and, in spite of the efforts of Narses, the barbarians rushed down into Southern Italy. Leutharis ravaged Apulia and Calabria, and Buccellinus plundered Campania, Lucania, and Bruttium; but they were more formidable as marauders than as soldiers; they could overrun the country, but they oppressed it too much to be able to maintain themselves in it, and they consequently thought of returning to the Alps. Their ranks were thinned through losses and diseases, to which Leutharis fell a victim with his whole band, and while Buccellinus was staying near Capua, Narses came on with his veterans and slew him and his followers in a fierce battle at Casilinum, on the Volturnus. Agathias says, that out of 30,000 men only 5000 escaped in this battle. The power of the Goths was now irretrievably ruined, and Italy was once more a province of the Roman empire, which Justinian finally pacified and organised by his famous "Pragmatica." Narses was appointed governor of Italy, and took up his residence at Ravenna.

During many subsequent years the name of Narses is not once mentioned; but we cannot but presume that in regulating the domestic affairs of Italy he acted in a way that did credit to his genius, although we know that his conduct was far from being free from avarice. In 563 he had an opportunity of proving that he was still the old general. Viduinus, comes, caused a fierce revolt in Verona and Brescia, and was supported by some Franks and a band of Alemanni under Amingus, who made sad havoc in Upper Italy, till Narses fell upon them and crushed them at once, whereupon Verona and Brescia submitted. Sindual, a chief of the Herules, who had served Narses faithfully during many years, imitated the example of Viduinus and shared his fate; but while Narses spared the life of the comes he ordered Sindual to be hanged, so incensed was he at his want of loyalty. These victories caused great joy in Constantinople; but the death of Justinian, which took place in the same year, and the accession of Justin, were heavy checks upon the influence of Narses at the imperial court, and finally contributed to his ruin.

The death of Justinian and the extreme age of Narses caused two movements of great importance. The administration of the great eunuch of Italy was vigorous but oppressive; and although the Gothic war had impoverished that unhappy country to an enormous degree, he extracted the last coin from its inhabitants. Had he continued to send a proportionate share of it into the imperial treasury, he might have continued his extortions without feeling the consequences; but it appears that he was less liberal to Justin than to Justinian, and the wealth and oriental luxuries with which he surrounded himself in his palace at Ravenna excited the indignation of the Romans. During the life of Justinian, however, they did not complain, knowing that every attempt to shake Justinian's confidence in his great minister would have been in vain; but no sooner was he dead than a deputation of Romans waited upon his successor, exposing the extortions of Narsees, and declaring that they would prefer the rude yet frank despotism of the Goths to the system of craft and avarice carried on by their present governor. Their complaints were not only listened to with attention, but were taken up by Justin as a pretext for getting rid of a man who was not his creature, and Narsees was consequently dismissed, and Longinus appointed in his stead. He might have borne his disgrace with magnanimity but for the insulting message of the empress Sophia, who bade him leave the profession of arms to men, and resume his former occupations among the eunuchs, and spin wool with the maidens of the palace. Stung to the quick by this woman-like yet ungenerous taunt, Narsees answered that "he would spin her such a thread as she would not unravel during her life." ("Narsees dicitur hæc responsa dedisse: Talem se eidem telam orditurum qualem ipsa, dum viveret, depingere non posset," Paul. Diacon. de Gest. Long. ii. 6.) Narsees retired quietly from office and took up his residence at Naples. An opportunity for gratifying his revenge was at hand. The Longobards were meditating an invasion of Italy, a scheme of which Justin was well aware when he dismissed Narsees, who was, however, the only man able to prevent such a calamity. "Full of rage," says Paulus Diaconus (l. c.), "Narsees sent messengers to the Longobards, and invited them to leave the poor fields of Pannonia and take possession of rich Italy. At the same time he sent them all kinds of fruits and other products of Italy, in order to make them greedy and hasten their arrival." King Alboin accordingly descended from the Alps into Italy. No sooner, however, was Narsees informed of it, than he repaired to Rome, and tried to soothe the emperor by a submissive letter. The invasion of Italy, however, of which he could not but accuse himself as the cause, preyed upon his mind, and he died of grief (568). All this appears strange; his conduct seems unaccountable; and weighty doubts have been raised by competent historians against the authenticity of the tale. But severe critics, Pagi, Muratori, Horatius Blancus, Petavina, &c., as well as the more modern Le Beau and Gibbon, are of opinion that there is no ground for disbelieving it. One might ask, why the emperor did not immediately resent his treachery? and how Narsees, after playing such a dangerous game, could venture to repair to Rome, instead of joining the Longobards? The fact of the Romans being disaffected to Justin and devotedly attached to Narsees does not explain the mystery. The following hypothesis might perhaps throw some light on the matter. The ambition of Narsees was not only unlimited, but it was coupled with that irritable and resentful temper which is peculiar to women and eunuchs. His deposition was sufficient to rouse the former, and the bitter taunt of the empress Sophia could not but provoke the latter. He thus invited the Longobards, not in order that they might conquer Italy, but to compel Justin to put him once more at the head of the army, since he was the only man who could check the barbarians; and had death not prevented him he would certainly have triumphed over his enemies, and taken ample revenge for the insults he had suffered. Such stratagems have often been invented by adventurers aspiring to power, as well as by men high in office, aiming at still greater power. It is said that Narsees attained the age of ninety-five. Gibbon doubts it, and perhaps not without reason. "Is it probable," says he, "that all his exploits were performed at fourscore?" It is certainly not probable; but when Blucher performed his great exploits he was past seventy, and he was as fresh in the field as a young man.

Narsees was one of those rare men who are destined by Providence to rise above all others, and, according to circumstances or the particular shape of their genius, to become either the benefactors or the scourges of mankind. Of low and perhaps barbarian parentage, slave, eunuch, with the body of a boy and the voice of a woman, he made himself equal to the greatest, and was inferior to none, for his soul was that of a hero; his mind, bold and inflexible in its resolution, was yet of that elastic kind that adapts itself to circumstances; and through the labyrinth of schemes and intrigues his talents guided him with the same security that leads the plain warrior on the broad way of heroic action. Equal to Belisarius as a general, he was his superior as a statesman; but his virtues were less pure than those of the unfortunate hero; and in a moral point of view he stands far below his rival. (Procop. Bell. Goth. ii. 13, &c., iii. iv.; Paul. Diacon. de Gest. Long. ii. 1—5; Marcellin. Chron.; Agathias, lib. i. ii.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 68, &c.; Cedren. p. 387; Malela, p. 83; Theoph. p. 201—206 (the index confounds the great Narsees with Narsees the general of Maurice and Tiberius); Evagrius, iv. 24; Anastasius, Hist. p. 62, &c.; Vita Joan. iii. p. 43; Agnellus, Liber Pontific.) [W. P.]

NA'SAMON (Nacdmwv), a son of Amphithemis and Tritonia, the ancestral hero of the Nasamones in the north of Africa, who are said to have derived their name from him. (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1496.) [L. S.]

NA'SCIO, a Roman divinity, presiding over the birth of children, and accordingly a goddess assisting Lucina in her functions, and analogous to the Greek Eileithyia. She had a sanctuary in the neighbourhood of Ardea. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 18.) [L. S.]

NASENNIUS, C., served as a centurion in Crete, under Metellus Creticus, and, after the assassination of Julius Caesar, united himself to Cicero, who gave him a letter of introduction to Brutus. (Cic. ad Brut. i. 8.)

NASI'CA, an agnomen in the family of the Scipios. [SCIPIO.]

NASI'CA, CAE'SIUS, commanded a Roman legion under Didius Gallus in Britain. (Tac. Ann. xii. 40.) [GALLUS, DIDIUS.]

NASIDIE'NUS, a wealthy (beatus) Roman, who gave a supper to Maecenas, which Horace ridicules so unmercifully in the eighth satire of his second book. It appears from v. 58, that Rufus was the cognomen of Nasidienus. The scholiasts tell us that Nasidienus was a Roman eque; but it is probable that the name is fictitious, as it is not very likely that Horace would have satirized in this way a man who was honoured by Maecenas with his company. There is another Nasidienus mentioned by Martial (vii. 54).

NASI'DIUS, Q. or L.<sup>s</sup>, was sent by Pompey, in B. C. 49, with a fleet of sixteen ships to relieve Masilia, when it was besieged by Caesar's troops, under the command of D. Brutus. He was unable, however, to effect his object, was defeated by Brutus, and fled to Africa, where it appears that he had the command of the Pompeian fleet. (Caes. B. C. ii. 3—7; Cic. ad Att. xi. 17; Auctor, Bell. Afr. 64, 98.) After the conquest of Africa by Caesar, Nasidius probably fled to Spain and followed the fortunes of the Pompeian party, but he is not mentioned again for some time. Cicero, in his seventh Philippic (c. 9), speaks of an L. Visidius, a Roman eques, who had assisted him in suppressing the conspiracy of Catiline, and who was at that time (B. C. 43) engaged in levying troops to oppose Antony at Mutina. For L. Visidius Orelli proposes to read L. Nasidius, which occurs in a few manuscripts, but Garatoni objects (ad loc.) that it is unlikely that Pompey would have given him the command of a fleet, unless he had held some office in the state, and we know that the appellation of Roman eques was not applied to a person after he had been quaestor. But whether this passage refers to Nasidius or not, we do not hear of him again till A. C. 35, when he is mentioned as one of the principal officers of Sex. Pompey, who deserted to Antony upon the failing fortunes of the former. (Appian, B. C. v. 139.) He continued faithful to the fortunes of Antony in the civil war between him and Octavian, and commanded part of Antony's fleet, which was defeated by Agrippa off Patrae, in B. C. 31, previous to the decisive battle of Actium. (Dion Cass. l. 13.) The coin annexed refers to Nasidius; it bears on the obverse the head of Pompey with a trident and NEPTVNI, and on the reverse a ship with Q. NASIDIUS.

COIN OF NASIDIUS.

NASO, P. a man whom Cicero speaks of as "omni carens cupiditate," was praetor B. C. 44 (Cic. Philipp. iii. 10). He seems to be the same as Naso, the augur, whom Cicero mentioned in a letter in the preceding year (ad Att. xii. 17). The gentile name of Naso does not occur.

NASO, M. ACTORIUS. [ACTORIUS.]

NASO, ANTONIUS, a tribune of the praetorian troops, A. D. 69 (Tac. Hist. i. 20). He may be the same person as the L. Antonius Naso, who, as we learn from coins, was procurator of Bithynia in the reign of Vespasian. (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 404.)

NASO, L. A'XIUS, only mentioned on coins, a specimen of which is annexed. The obverse represents a woman's head surmounted with a helmet, with NASO. A. C.; the reverse, Diana in a chariot drawn by stags, with one dog before her and two behind her, and the legend L. AXIUS. L. P.

* He is called Lucius in Caesar, but Quintus in Dion Cassius and on coins.

COIN OF L. AXIUS NASO.

NASO, JU'LIUS, an intimate friend of Pliny and Tacitus, both of whom interested themselves much in his success, when he became a candidate for the public offices of the state (Plin. Ep. vi. 6, 9). One of Pliny's letters (iv. 6) is addressed to him.

NASO, L. OCTA'VIUS, whose heres was L. Flavius, praetor designatus in B. C. 59. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. i. 2, § 3.)

NASO, CN. OTACI'LIVS, is recommended by Cicero to the notice and favour of Aclius, in A. C. 46. (Cic. ad Fam. xiii. 33.)

NASO, OVI'DIVS. [OVIDIVS.]

NASO, SE'XTIVS, one of the conspirators against Caesar, A. C. 44. (Appian, B. C. ii. 113.)

NASO, VALERIVS, who had previously been praetor, was sent to Smyrna in A. D. 26, to superintend the erection of a temple to Tiberius (Tac. Ann. iv. 56).

NASO, Q. VOCONIUS, the judex quaestionis in the trial of Cluentius, B. C. 66. Since Cicero in one passage calls him Q. Naso (pro Cluent. c. 53), and in another Q. Voconius (Ibid. c. 54), Garatoni and Klotz, in their notes upon Cicero's oration, make two different persons out of Q. Voconius Naso, namely Q. Voconius, the judex quaestionis, and Q. Naso, the praetor. But Madvig has shown satisfactorily (de Ascon. p. 121), that Cicero refers only to one person, the judex quaestionis, pointing out moreover that the judices quaestionum were appointed to preside in those cases which the praetors, from their limited number, could not attend to, and that accordingly a praetor and a judex quaestionis would not be in the same court. This opinion of Madvig is also adopted by Zumpt (ad Cic. Ver. p. 234). Cicero in his oration for Flaccus, B. C. 59, speaks (c. 21) of Q. Naso, as having been praetor, but the year of his praetorship is unknown. (Orelli, Onom. Thell. p. 649.)

NATA'LIS, ANTONIUS, a Roman eques, was one of Piso's friends, and joined him in the conspiracy against Nero, A. D. 66, but having become suspected, and being threatened with the torture, he disclosed the names of the conspirators, and thus escaped punishment. (Tac. Ann. xv. 54, 54—56, 71.)

NATA'LIS, CAECI'LIVS, the person who maintains the cause of paganism in the dialogue of Minucius Felix, entitled Octavius. [FELIX, MINUCIVS.] Various conjectures have been made as to who this Natalis was; but there are no sufficient data for deciding the question. (Bähr, Cursus Röm. Theologie, § 19.)

NATA'LIS, MINU'CIUS or MINICIUS. There is a rescript of Trajan to Minucius Natalis (Dig. 2. tit. 12. c. 9), who was probably a procurator, and may be the jurist Natalis. In this passage of the Digest his name is written Minitius Natalis. This person appears to have been also consul and augur. The letter of Pliny the Younger to his friend Minucius may probably be addressed to Minucius Fundanus. (Plin. Ep. vii. 12.)

The time of the jurist Natalis is determined as prior to that of Salvius Julianus, by the fact that Julianus wrote notes in six books Ad (apud, in) Minutium or Ad Minicium, from which books there are some citations in the Digest (6. tit. 1. s. 61). In one passage, the tenth book of the work, Ad Minutium is cited (Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 11. § 15), but as Zimmern suggests, x. is a blunder for v.

Pomponius (Dig. 19. tit. 1. s. 6. § 4) quotes Minicius as quoting Sabinus. [G. L.]

NATTA or NACCA, "a fuller" (Festus, s. v.; Appul. Met. ix. p. 636, ed. Ouden.), was the name of a family of the Pinaria gens. Natta, or Nata, which we find upon coins, seems to be the correct orthography. The Nattæ are very rarely mentioned, but appear to have been a very ancient family. Cicero speaks in general of the Pinarii Nattæ as nobiles, and mentions an ancient bronze statue of a Natta, which was struck by lightning in the consulship of Torquatus and Cotta, B. C. 65. (Cic. de Div. i. 12, ii. 20, 21.)

1. L. PINARIUS NATTA, magister equitum to the dictator L. Manlius Capitolinus, B. C. 363, and praetor, B. C. 349. Livy does not give his cognomen, but it is preserved in the Fasti Capitolini. (Liv. vii. 3, 25.)

2. L. (PINARIUS) NATTA was the brother of the wife of the celebrated tribune P. Clodius, and obtained a seat in the college of pontiffs through the influence of his brother-in-law, who passed over his own brother in favour of Natta. Through his connection with Clodius, he was one of the enemies of Cicero, who mentions him on one or two occasions. (Cic. pro Dom. 45, 52, ad Att. iv. 8, b. § 3.) The gentile name of Natta is only mentioned in a passage of Servius (ad Virg. Aen. viii. 269), who calls him Pinarius Natta, but the genuineness of this passage has been called in question by Wolf (ad Cic. pro Dom. l. c.). Now as we read of only one wife of Clodius, namely, Fulvia, it has been usually supposed that the above L. Natta was the brother of this Fulvia, and that his full name was therefore L. Fulvius Natta*; but Drumann has brought forward (Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. p. 370) reasons which render it very probable, that Clodius had, previous to his marriage with Fulvia, married another wife of the name of Pinaria, and that L. Natta was the brother of the latter and not the brother of Fulvia. The name of Natta is otherwise unknown in the Fulvia gens. The mother of Natta and of his sister Pinaria married a second time L. Murena, consul B. C. 62, and we consequently find Natta described as a step-son of Murena. (Cic. pro Muren. 35, pro Dom. 52.)

3. PINARIUS NATTA, a client of Sejanus, and one of the two accusers of Cremutius Cordus, A. D. 25. (Tac. Ann. iv. 34.)

4. NATTA, a person satirised by Horace (Sat. i. 6. 124) for his dirty meanness, was probably a member of the noble Pinarian family, and therefore attacked by Horace for such conduct.

The coin annexed refers to some Pinarius Natta, but who he was is quite uncertain. The obverse represents a winged head of Pallas, the reverse Victory in a chariot drawn by two horses.

COIN OF PINARIUS NATTA.

NAUBOLIDES (Ναυβολίδης), a patronymic from Nanbolus, and accordingly applied to his sons, Iphitus (Hom. Il. ii. 518) and Clytoneus (Apollon. Rhod. i. 135). It also occurs as the name of a Phaeacian. (Hom. Carm. viii. 116.) [L. S.]

NAUBOLUS (Ναυβόλος). 1. A son of Lernus and the father of Clytoneus, was king of Tanagra in Boeotia. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 135, &c., 208; Orph. Argon. 144; Lycoph. 1068.)

2. A son of Ornytus, and father of Iphitus, was king of Phocia. (Hom. Il. ii. 518; Apollod. i. 9. § 16.) [L. S.]

NAUCERUS, a statuery, who made a paining wrestler. (Plin. xxiv. 8. s. 19.) [P. S.]

NAUCLEIDES (Ναυκλείδης). 1. A Plataean, the leader of the faction who invited and opened the gates for the Thebans who seized upon Plataeae B. C. 431. (Thuc. ii. 2; Dem. c. Naerum, 25, p. 1378.)

2. One of the two Spartan ephors, sent, according to the Spartan custom, with the king Pausanias into Attica in B. C. 403, at the time when the Athenians were hard pressed by Lysander. He entered cordially into the plans of Pausanias for defeating the designs of Lysander. (Xen. Hellen. ii. 4. § 36.) He is perhaps the same with the Naucleidas, son of Polybiades, whom Lysander ridiculed and assailed on account of his obesity and luxurious mode of life in an assembly of the people, to such an extent that he was near being exiled forthwith. The people, however, contented themselves with threatening him with banishment if he did not reform his mode of life. (Athen. xii. p. 550 d.) [C. P. M.]

NAUCRATES (Ναυκράτης), historical. 1. A native of Carystus, who, with Androcles of Sphectus, lent a sum of money to Artemon and Apollodorus, for the recovery of which a suit was instituted by Androcles against Lacritus, the brother of Artemon. This matter is the subject of the speech of Demosthenes Πρὸς τὴν Λακρίτου παραγραφὴν.

2. A Lycian demagogue, who incited the Lycians to offer some fruitless resistance to M. Brutus. (Plut. Brut. p. 998, b.) [C. P. M.]

NAUCRATES (Ναυκράτης), literary. 1. Surnamed Erythraeus, and termed by Suidas (s. v. Isocrates) Ἐρυθράλος Ναυκράτης, was a disciple of Isocrates. He is mentioned among the orators who competed (B. C. 352) for the prize offered by Artemisia for the best funeral oration delivered over Mausolus. (Suidas, s. v. Theodectes, et L. c.; Gell. x. 68.) He wrote on the subject of rhetoric. From the incidental notice taken of his writings by Cicero (De Orat. iii. 44), we may infer that he shared in and defended the technical refinement of his master. In one of his treatises we learn from Quintilian (iii. 6) that he applied the word στέρας, as the appropriate technical term for the status or questio, the consideration of a case in its most general aspect, and that some regarded him as the inventor of the term so applied.

* Hence we frequently find Natta or Nacca given as a cognomen in the Fulvia gens, as is stated in the article FULVIA GENS; but if Drumann's supposition is correct, and we believe it is, this is a mistake.

As Isocrates wrote models for judicial and political orations, Naucrates furnished models (none of which are extant) of funeral orations, celebrating men of public fame. (Dionys. vol. ii. p. 39, ed. Sylburg.)

Eustathius twice refers to a commentary on Homer by Naucrates Erythraeus, who may, perhaps, be regarded as identified with the rhetorician by the term Sophista which he applies to him. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 484, 517.) But the manner in which the commentator is mentioned by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ερυθραῖος), solely in connection with the commentary, renders it doubtful whether there may not have been two of the same name.

2. Stobaeus mentions the saying of one Naucrates, whom he designates δ σοφός (vol. i. p. 390, ed. Gaisford). [W. M. G.]

NAUCYDES (Ναυκίδης), an Argive statuary, the son of Mothon, and the brother and teacher of Polycleitus II. of Argos, made a gold and ivory statue of Hebe, which stood by the celebrated statue of Hera by Polycleitus I. in the Heraeum near Mycenae; a bronze statue of Hecate at Argos; and several statues of athletes. (Paus. ii. 17. § 5, 22. § 8, vi. 6. § 1, 8. § 3, 9. § 1.) Tatian mentions his statue of Erinna the poetess. (Adv. Graec. 51, p. 113, Worth.) Pliny, who places him at Ol. 90, a. c. 420 (H. N. xxxiv. 8. a. 19), mentions his Mercury, Discobolus, and a man sacrificing a ram (Ibid. § 19). Besides his brother Polycleitus, Alypus of Sicyon was his disciple. (Paus. vi. 1. § 2; comp. Thiersch, Epochen, pp. 143, 150, 282, 283, and Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.) [P. S.]

NA'VIUS. [NAEVIUS, No. 1.]

NA'VIUS, ATTUS, a renowned augur in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. In his boyhood he showed his skill in the art before he had received any instruction; but after he had been taught by the Etruscans, he excelled all the augurs of his time. The most extraordinary proof of his knowledge of augury is related in the legend of Tarquinius Priscus. This king proposed to double the number of the equestrian centuries, and to name the three new ones after himself and two of his friends, but was opposed by Navius, because Romulus had originally arranged the equites under the sanction of the auspices, and consequently no alteration could be made in them without the same sanction. The tale then goes on to say that the king thereupon commanded him to divine whether what he was thinking of in his mind could be done, and that when Navius, after consulting the heavens, declared that it could, the king held out a whetstone and a razor to cut it with. He immediately cut it. A statue of Attus was placed in the comitium, on the steps of the senate-house, the place where the miracle had been wrought, and beside the statue the whetstone was preserved. There was a current report, according to Dionysius, that Attus fell a victim to the anger of Tarquin. Attus Navius seems to be the best orthography, making Attus an old praenomen, though we frequently find the name written Attius. (Liv. i. 36; Flor. i. 5; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. II. 6; Dionys. iii. 70–72; Cic. de Div. i. 17, de Nat. Deor. ii. 3, iii. 6, de Rep. ii. 20; Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. i. pp. 360, 361.)

NAUMA'CHIUS (Ναυμάχιος), a Gnostic poet. Of the age in which he lived nothing is known.

In addition to the verses which bear his name, there has been conjecturally attributed to him a moral poem, assigned by Gesner to Phocylides, which Brunck thinks inferior to the known productions of Naumachius. There are three fragments of this author in hexameters preserved by Stobaeus. 1. Eleven lines of what seems to be an introduction to a poem on the due management of the marriage state on the part of women; the introduction, however, dissuading from marriage, and recommending celibacy. 2. Fifty-eight lines of what seems to be the poem itself. The instructions are exceedingly comprehensive, including most sensible and prudent directions for the behaviour of a good wife to a wise and to a foolish husband, for the regulation of her household, her choice of companions, and her dress. He disapproves of second marriages, and enjoins cheerfulness and discretion. 3. Four lines and a portion of a fifth, depreciating gold, precious stones, and purple clothing. The first and third fragments have more of poetry than the larger piece, but the language of all is pure, and the style glowing and spirited. It must have been from a seeming allusion in the first to the superiority of celibacy, as introducing to a mystic marriage, where the virgin becomes queen of women, that the suggestion has been made that Naumachius was a Christian writer. If so, however, we could not have failed to detect in the second extract some allusion to the injunctions of Scripture on the subject. But there seems to be no reason to doubt that his notions were purified by an acquaintance with the maxims of Christianity. (Stobaeus, vol. iii. pp. 22, 68, 234, ed. Gaisford; translated by Hugo Grotius in Stobaeus, iv. p. 164, &c. p. 187, &c., 224, ed. Gaisford; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 721, 726.) [W. M. G.]

NAUPLIUS (Ναυπλίος). 1. A son of Poseidon and Amynone, of Argos, a famous navigator, and father of Proetus and Damastor (Apollon. Rhod. i. 136, &c.; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1091). He is the reputed founder of the town of Nauplia, which derived its name from him (Paus. ii. 38. § 2, iv. 35. § 2; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 54). He is also said to have discovered the constellation of the great bear. (Theon, ad Arat. Phaen. 27; Paus. viii. 48. § 5; Strab. viii. p. 368.)

2. A son of Clytioneus, was one of the Argonauts and a descendant of Nauplius, No. 1. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 134.)

3. A king of Euboea, and father of Palamedes, Oeax and Nausimedon, either by Clymene or Philira or Hesione (Apollod. ii. 1. § 4). Clymene was a daughter of Catreus, and she and her sister Aerope had been given by their father to Nauplius, who was to carry them to some foreign country; but Nauplius married Clymene, and gave Aerope to Pleisthenes, who became by her the father of Agamemnon and Menelaus (Apollod. iii. 2. § 2). His son Palamedes had been condemned to death by the Greeks during the siege of Troy, and as Nauplius considered his condemnation to be an act of injustice, he watched for the return of the Greeks, and as they approached the coast of Euboea, he lighted torches on the most dangerous part of the coast. The sailors thus misguided suffered shipwreck, and perished in the waves or by the sword of Nauplius (Philostr. Her. x. 11; Schol. ad Eurip. Orest. 422; Tzetzes, ad Lycoph. 384; Hygin. Fab. 116). He is further said to have wrecked his vengeance on the Greeks by sending false messages to the wives of the heroes fighting at Troy, and thus to have led them to faithlessness towards their husbands or to self-destruction. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 24; Tzet., l.c.; Paus. i. 22. § 6.) [L. S.]

NAUSICAA (Ναυσικάα), the daughter of Alcinous, king of the Phaeacians and Arete, became the friend of Odysseus (Hom. Od. vi. 16, &c.; comp. ODYSSEUS). Later writers represent her as the wife of Telemachus, by whom she is said to have become the mother of Persepolis or Ptoliporthus. (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1796; Dict. Cret. vi. 6.) [L. S.]

NAUSICRATES (Ναυσικράτης), a Greek comic poet, doubtfully placed by Clinton (F. H. vol. ii. p. xlv.) among the writers of the middle comedy. Meineke (Frag. Com. Graec. vol. i. p. 495) infers the same thing, from his tragicomic style. Suidas (s. v.) attributes to him two plays, Ναυκλήροι and Νεπείς. Athenaeus (ix. p. 399, c.), when giving an extract from the play called Νεπείς, calls him Naucrates; but this is clearly an error; or it may be a shortened form, similar to those adduced by Lobeck, in his edition of Aglaophamus (pp. 994, 996). From the fragments preserved by Athenaeus, consisting of twelve lines from the Ναυκλήροι and three from the Νεπείς, we can infer nothing of the plot; but there is some humour in his inflated description of the mollet and the blue shark in the passages from the former play. These passages are most ingeniously dovetailed and amended by Meineke (vol. iv. p. 575, &c.). (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 471; Athen. l. c. vii. p. 296, a. p. 325, e. p. 330, b.) [W. M. G.]

NAUSIMEDON. [NAUPLIUS, No. 3.]

NAUSIPHANES (Ναυσίφάνης), a native of Teos, attached to the philosophy of Democritus, and, according to Sextus Empiricus, a disciple of Pyrrhon. He had a large number of pupils, and was particularly famous as a rhetorician. Epicurus was at one time one of his hearers, and as he could not deny this, though he was anxious to be considered a self-taught man, he was obliged to content himself with abusing him, and maintaining that he had learnt nothing from him. (Cic. de Nat. Deor. i. 26, 33; Diog. Laërt. ix. 69, 102, x. 8, 14; Sext. Empir. adv. Math. i. 1, p. 215.) [C. P. M.]

NAUSITHOUS (Ναυσίθοος). 1. A son of Poseidon and Periboea the daughter of Eurymedon, was the father of Alcinous and Rhezenor, and king of the Phaeacians, whom he led from Hyperia in Thrinacia to the island of Scheria, in order to escape from the Cyclopes. (Hom. Od. vi. 7, &c. vii. 56, &c. viii. 564; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 547.)

2. [NAUSINOUS.] [L. S.]

NAUTES or NAUTIUS. [NAUTIA GENS.]

NAUTIA GENS, an ancient patrician gens, a member of which obtained the consulship as early as B. C. 488. It claimed to be descended from Nautius or Nautes, one of the companions of Aeneas, who was said to have brought with him the Palladium from Troy, which was placed under the care of the Nautii at Rome. (Dionys. vi. 4; Virg. Aen. v. 704, with the note of Servius.) Like many of the other ancient gentes, the Nautii disappear from history about the time of the Samnite wars. All the Nautii bore the surname of RUTILUS.

NAXUS (Νάξος), a son of Polemo and father of Leucippus, gave his name to the island of Naxos, which had before been called Dia. (Diod. v. 51.) [L. S.]

NAZA'RIUS. The ninth piece in the collection of the "Panegyrici Veteres" [see DRZPANIUS] bears the title Nazarii Panegyricus Constantino Augusto. It was delivered at Rome (c. 38) at the beginning of the fifth year of the Caesars, Crispus and Constantine, which commenced on the 1st of March A. D. 321 (cc. 1, 2). It is chiefly occupied with the praises of Constantine, the father, who is proposed as the bright exemplar of every virtue to his sons. The circumstance that the emperor was not present (c. 3, comp. c. 36), renders the grossness of the flattery somewhat less odious. With regard to the author we find two notices in the version of the Eusebian Chronicle by Jerome, the one under A. D. 315, "Nazarius insignis rhetor habetur;" the other under A. D. 337, "Nazarii rhetoris filia in eloquentia patri coaequatur," both of which we may fairly conclude refer to the author of this oration. Ausonius also notices incidentally an "illustrious" rhetorician, Nazarius, who may be the same person. (Prof. Burdig. xiv.)

The eighth piece in the above collection, styled Incerti Panegyricus Constantino Augusto dictus, from the resemblance in style as well as from an expression in the ninth (c. 30), is generally believed to be also the work of Nazarius. It was pronounced at Trèves by a native of Gaul (c. 1), in the year A. D. 313, and celebrates in the most turgid language the victory over Maxentius. (For authorities and illustrations see the references at the end of DRZPANIUS, EUMENIUS, MAMERTINUS.) [W. R.]

NEAERA (Νεάρα). 1. A nymph, who became by Helios the mother of Lampetia and Phaetusa. (Hom. Od. xii. 133.)

2. A daughter of Pereus, and the wife of Aleus, by whom she became the mother of Auge, Cepheus, and Lycurgus. (Apollod. iii. 9. § 1; Paus. viii. 4. § 3, who calls her the wife of Autolyca.)

3. One of the daughters of Niobe. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 3.)

4. The wife of Strymon, and mother of Evadne. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 2.)

5. A nymph, who became by Zeus the mother of Aegle. (Virg. Ecol. vi. 20; comp. AEGLE, No. 1.) [L. S.]

NEALCES (Νεάλκης), a painter who flourished in the time of Aratus, B. C. 245. Plutarch relates that, when Aratus was destroying the pictures of the tyrants, Melanthius's picture of Aristatus was saved by the intercession of Nealces, who painted over with a black colour the figure of Aristatus, but left the rest of the picture uninjured (Plut. Ara. 13). Pliny mentions with high praise his Venus and his naval battle between the Egyptians and the Persians (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40, §§ 36, 41). A curious story is told of another of his pictures by Pliny (xxxv. 10. s. 36, § 20). His daughter Alexandria was also a painter (Didymus, ap. Clem. Alex. Strom. iv. p. 381, c.) His colour-grinder Eriogon also became a distinguished painter. [P. S.]

NEANTHES (Νεάνθης), of Cyzicum, lived about B. C. 241, and was a disciple of the Milesian Philiscus, who himself had been a disciple of Isonates. He was a voluminous writer, principally of history, but very scanty materials have reached us, to form any judgment of his merits. The various authors, however, that quote him seem, with rare exceptions, to place great reliance on his accuracy and judgment. He is very largely referred to by Diogenes Laërtius, and by Athenæus, and by several of the early Christian writers, as well as by others. Vossius (de Hist. Græc. cap. xv.) refers to several of them, but by far the most complete list is that given by Clinton (F. H. vol. iii. p. 509). He gives as the writings of Nearchus: 1. Memoirs of king Attalus. 2. Hellenica. 3. Lives of illustrious men. 4. Pythagorica. 5. Τὰ κατὰ πόλιν μυθικά. 6. On Purification. 7. Annales. He probably also wrote an account of Cyzicum, as we may infer from a passage in Strabo (p. 45). And Harles (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 311, vol. vi. p. 134) attributes to him a work περὶ κακοῦ ηἰας ῥητορικῆς, as well as many panegyric orations. (Vossius, Clinton, Harles, l. c.; Westermann, Gesch. der Griech. Beredd. p. 86.) [W. M. G.]

NEARCHUS (Νέαρχος.) 1. Tyrant of Elea or Velia in Magna Græcia, known only from an anecdote of him in connection with the philosopher Zenon, whom he put to the torture for having conspired against his life. [ZENON.] (Diod. x. Exc. Vales. p. 557, Exc. Val. p. 36; Val. Max. iii. 3. ext. 3; Diog. Laërt. ix. 29.)

2. A friend and follower of Agathocles, who was sent by him to Syracuse with the tidings of his successes in Africa. (Diod. xx. 16.)

3. A Tarentine, who adhered to the cause of the Romans throughout the second Punic war, notwithstanding the defection of his countrymen. He was on terms of friendly intimacy with Cato the Censor, who lived in his house after the recapture of Tarentum by Fabius Maximus (B. C. 209), and derived from him instruction in the tenets of the Pythagorean philosophy, of which Nearchus was a follower. (Plut. Cat. Maj. 2; Cic. de Sen. 12.) [E. H. B.]

NEARCHUS (Νέαρχος), son of Androtimus, one of the most distinguished of the friends and officers of Alexander. He was a native of Crete, but settled at Amphipolis. (Arr. Ind. 18; Diod. xix. 19. Stephanus Byzantinus, s. v. Ἀμφί, calls him a native of Lete in Macedonia, but this is certainly a mistake.) Of his family or parentage we know nothing, but he appears to have occupied a prominent position at the court of Philip, where he attached himself to the party of Alexander, and was banished, together with Ptolemy, Harpalus, and others, for participating in the intrigues of the young prince. After the death of Philip, he was recalled, and, in common with all those who had suffered on the same account, treated with the utmost distinction by Alexander. (Plut. Alex. 10; Arr. Anab. iii. 6.) After the conquest of the maritime provinces of Asia, Nearchus was appointed to the government of Lycia, together with the adjoining provinces south of the Taurus (Arr. l. c.), a post which he continued to fill without interruption for five years. In B. C. 329 he joined Alexander at Zariaspa in Bactria with a force of Greek mercenaries; and from this time, instead of returning to his government, he accompanied the king in his subsequent campaigns. He appears to have held at first the rank of chiliarch of the hypaspists, a somewhat subordinate situation; but his acquaintance with naval matters, as well as the personal favour he enjoyed with Alexander, induced the latter during his Indian expedition to confide to Nearchus the chief command of the fleet which he had caused to be constructed on the Hydaspes. (Arr. Anab. iv. 7. § 4, 30, § 11, vi. 2. § 6, Ind. 18.) During the descent of that river and the Indus to the sea, his duties were comparatively easy, and he is only mentioned as commanding the fleet whenever the king himself was not with it; but it is evident that he had given sufficient proof of his skill and capacity, so that when Alexander, after having reached the mouth of the Indus, meditated the sending round his ships by sea from thence to the Persian gulf, he gladly accepted the offer of Nearchus to undertake the command of the fleet during this long and perilous navigation. When we consider the total ignorance of the Greeks at this time concerning the Indian seas, and the imperfect character of their navigation, it is impossible not to admire the noble confidence with which Nearchus ventured to promise that he would bring the ships in safety to the shores of Persia, "if the sea were navigable, and the thing feasible for mortal man." (Arr. Ind. 19. 20, Anab. vi. 5, 19; Curt. ix. 38; Diod. xvii. 104; Plut. Alex. 66.) Nor did his conduct throughout the expedition fall short of his promises; and Arrian expressly attributes the safe result of the enterprise on more than one occasion to the prudence and judgment, as well as courage, of the commander. (Ind. 32.)

Nearchus was compelled to remain in the Indus for some time after Alexander had set out on his return, waiting for the cessation of the etesian winds, or south-western monsoon. Meanwhile, the Indians had gathered again, after the king's departure, in considerable force, and began to annoy him with their attacks, which caused him to hasten his departure, and he set out on the 21st of September B. C. 325, before the winds had become altogether favourable. The consequence was, that after sailing out of the Indus, and a short distance along the coast, he was compelled to remain twenty-four days in a harbour near the confines of the Indians and Oreitæ, to which he gave the name of the port of Alexander. Leaving this on the 23d of October, he continued his voyage along the coast of the Oreitæ, and after encountering many dangers from rocks and shoals, and losing three of his ships in a storm, he arrived at a place called Cocala, where he halted ten days to repair his vessels. During this interval he entered into communication with Leonnatus, who had been left behind in charge of the province of the Oreitæ, and from whom he received supplies of provisions, and reinforcements of men to replace those whom he had found the least efficient of his crews. From this time, until he reached the coast of Carmania, Nearchus was entirely dependent upon his own resources, and had to contend not only with the perils of an unknown navigation, but with the greatest distress from want of provisions, as they coasted along the sandy and barren shores of the Ichthyophagi, and with the discontent of his own followers, to which that scarcity gave rise. Throughout this period he displayed the utmost firmness as well as energy; and the courage with which he confronted alike the novel dangers which threatened them from whales (Arr. Ind. 30), and the mysterious perils of the island reputed to be enchanted (Id. 31), proves him to have been a man altogether above the level of his age and country. At a fishing village called Mosarna, he for the first time obtained a pilot acquainted with the coast, which greatly facilitated his further progress, and at length on the eightieth day of his voyage (Dec. 9.) he anchored at the mouth of the river Anamis, in the fertile district of Harmozia, and had the happiness of learning that Alexander himself was encamped at a short distance in the interior. Nearchus himself hastened to the king, who received him with every demonstration of joy, and celebrated sacrifices and festivals for the safety of his fleet, in which the admiral was distinguished by every kind of honour. He was, however, unwilling to expose his friend to any further dangers, and was desirous to transfer to some one else the task of conducting the fleet up the Persian gulf, but Nearchus insisted on being allowed to complete what he had so successfully begun, and returned to his camp on the Anamis, from whence he continued his voyage with comparatively little of difficulty or danger along the north shore of the Persian gulf to the mouth of the Pasitigris, and up that river to Susa. Here he arrived in February 324, shortly after Alexander himself; and in the brilliant festivities with which the king here celebrated the conquest of Asia as well as his own nuptials with Stateira, Nearchus bore an important part, being one of those rewarded with crowns of gold for their distinguished services, at the same time that he obtained in marriage a daughter of the Rhodian Mentor and of Barsine, to whom Alexander himself had been previously married. (Arr. Ind. 21—42, Anab. vi. 28, vii. 4. § 9, 5. § 9; Strab. xv. pp. 721, 725, 726; Curt. x. i. § 10; Diod. xvii. 106; Plut. Alex. 68. Concerning the chronology of the voyage, see Vincent, vol. i., and Droysen, Gesch. Alex. pp. 478, 481.)

From this time Nearchus appears to have continued in close attendance upon Alexander till his death, as we find him mentioned as dissuading the king from entering Babylon on account of the predictions of the Chaldeans, and again during Alexander's last illness holding a conversation with him upon naval matters. It appears, indeed, that he had been already designated for the chief command of the fleet with which the king was at this time meditating the conquest of Arabia, a. c. 323; and the latter had just given him a sumptuous feast previous to his departure, when the illness of Alexander himself put an end to the expedition. (Plut. Alex. 73, 75, 76; Diod. xvii. 112; Arr. Anab. vii. 25.) It was natural that one who had held so high a place in the confidence of the king should take a prominent part in the discussions that ensued after his death: yet it is remarkable that Curtius is the only writer who mentions his name at all upon that occasion. But the statement of that author (x. 20), that it was Nearchus who put forward the claims of Hercules, the son of Barsine, to the throne, is rendered so probable by his near connexion with the latter, that there can be little doubt of its correctness. But it is probable that his not being a Macedonian by birth operated against Nearchus, and it would seem that his tranquil and unambitious character did not qualify him to take a leading part in the stormy disquisitions that followed: he not only acquiesced in the adoption of arrangements opposed to his advice, but seems to have been contented, in the division of the provinces, to obtain his former government of Lycia and Pamphylia, and to hold even these as subordinate to Antigonus. (Justin. xiii. 4; comp. Droysen, Hellenism., vol. i. p. 42.) To the fortunes of the latter, whether from motives of private friendship or policy, we find him henceforth closely attached: in a. c. 317 he accompanied Antigonus in his march against Eumenes; and generously interceded with him in favour of the latter, when he had fallen into his hands as a prisoner. (Diod. xix. 19; Plut. Eum. 18.) Again, in 314, he was one of the generals who were selected by Antigonus, on account of their mature age and experience in war, to assist with their counsels his son Demetrius, left for the first time in command of an army. (Diod. xix. 69.) This is the last occasion on which his name appears in history.

We learn from many ancient authors that Nearchus left a history or narrative of the voyage by which he had earned such great celebrity; and the substance of this interesting work has been fortunately preserved to us by Arrian, who has derived from it the whole of the latter part of his "Indica." The strange paradox put forward by Dodwell (Dissert. de Arriani Nearchi, ap. Geogr. Gr. Minores, tom. i., reprinted, together with a Latin translation of Vincent's refutation by Schmieder, in his edition of the Indica of Arrian, p. 232, &c.), that the work made use of by Arrian was not really the production of Nearchus, but the forgery of a later age, though adopted by Bohlen (das alte Indien, vol. i. p. 68), has been generally rejected by later writers, and is sufficiently refuted by Vincent in his elaborate work on "The Commerce and Navigation of the Ancients in the Indian Seas (vol. i. p. 68—77):" but he justly adds: "The internal evidence of the work speaks more forcibly for itself than all the arguments which can be adduced in its favour." The accuracy of the geographical details contained in it has been fully demonstrated by the same author, as well as by the eminent geographers d'Anville, Gosselin, and Ritter, who have also shown that many of the statements regarded by the ancients as marvellous or incredible have been confirmed by the researches of modern travellers. In other instances, although we cannot defend the accuracy of his assertions, it is at least possible to show how the error has originated. (See particularly Schmieder, ad Arr. Ind. 25.) Indeed Strabo himself, while he censures Nearchus, together with Megasthenes and Onesicritus, for his fabulous tales (ii. p. 70), has, in numerous instances, made use of his authority without scruple (xv. pp. 689, 691, 696, 701, 705, 706, 716, 717, &c.). On the other hand, it seems probable that Pliny, on whose authority Dodwell mainly relied, had not consulted the original work of Nearchus, but had contented himself with the abridgment of that of Onesicritus, as published by Juba. (Plin. H. N. vi. 23; comp. Vincent, l. c., and Geier, Alex. Magni Hist. Script. p. 80, &c.) Suidas, who accuses Nearchus of having falsely pretended to be commander of the whole fleet, when he was in fact only a pilot or captain (κυβερνήτης), has by a strange error transferred to him what Arrian, whose very words he copies, says of Onesicritus. (Suid. s. v. Νέαρχος; Arr. Anab. vi. 2.)

Schmieder and some other writers, relying partly upon a passage of Suidas (s. v. Νέαρχος), partly upon some statements quoted by Strabo, which have no immediate reference to the voyage, have maintained that, besides the Περσικόν, or narrative of his voyage, Nearchus had written a separate history of the wars of Alexander: but there is certainly no occasion for such a supposition. If, as appears probable, he began his narrative from the first construction of the fleet on the Hydaspes, it would naturally include an account of Alexander's wars against the Malli, as well as his subsequent march through Gedrosia; and it is evident that he prefixed to his work a general account of India, its inhabitants and their customs, from which both Strabo and Arrian have borrowed largely. Geier (L. c. p. 113—115) has justly pointed out that all the facts cited from Nearchus are such as would naturally be comprised in a work thus limited, or might readily have been introduced in digressions. All the questions, both literary and geographical, connected with the Parapliis of Nearchus, are fully discussed in the work of Dr. Vincent above cited (4to. London. 1807); in the preface, notes, and dissertations appended by Schmieder to his edition of Arrian's "India" (8vo. Hal. 1798); and in Geier's Alexandri Magni Historiarum Scriptores, pp. 108—150. The last author has brought together all the fragments of Nearchus, that is to say, all the passages where he is cited by name either by Strabo or Arrian; but there is no doubt that besides these his work is the sole authority followed by the latter writer throughout the narrative of his voyage.

NEARCHUS, painter. [ARISTARTE.]

NEBROPHONUS (Νεβροφόνος), a son of Jason and Hypsipyle, and brother of Euneus. (Apollod. i. 9. § 17.)

[L. S.]

NEBRUS (Νεβρός), the thirteenth in descent from Aesculapius, the son of Sostratus III., and the father of Gnosidicus and Chrysus, who lived in the seventh and sixth centuries B.C. (Jo. Tzetzes, Chil. vii. Hist. 155, in Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 680, ed. vet.; Poet. Epist. ad Artax. in Hippocr. Opera, vol. iii. p. 770; Thessal. Orat. ad Aram, ibid. p. 835, &c.) He was a native of the island of Cos, and the most celebrated physician of his time. During the Crissæan war he joined the camp of the Amphictyons (as has been mentioned in the article CHRYSAUS), taking with him his son Chrysus, and a panteconter fitted up at his own expence with both medical and military apparatus. Here they were of great use to the besiegers, and Nebrus is said to have poisoned the water used by the town, though, according to Pausanias (Phoc. c. 37. § 5), this barbarous expedient was adopted in consequence of the recommendation of Solon, B.C. 591. (Penny Cyclopaedia, art. Nebrus.)

[W. A. G.]

NECO, or NECHO (Νεκός, Νέχως, Νεχάω, Νεχάω, Νεχάω). 1. Father of Psammeticus, was put to death by Sabacon, the Aethiopian usurper of the Egyptian throne (Herod. ii. 152).

2. Son of Psammeticus, whom he succeeded on the throne of Egypt in B.C. 617. His reign was marked by considerable energy and enterprise, both in following up the career of conquest towards the north-east, for which his father had opened the way by the capture of Azotus, and also (as connected with this) in the formation of a navy, and the prosecution of maritime discovery. It was probably with a view to war at once, and to commerce, that he began to dig the canal intended to connect the Nile with the Arabian Gulf. He distated, however, from the work, according to Herodotus, on being warned by an oracle, that he was constructing it only for the use of the barbarian invader. But the greatest and most interesting enterprise with which his name is connected, is the circumnavigation of Africa by the Phoenicians, in his service, and acting under his directions, who set sail from the Arabian Gulf, and accomplishing the voyage in somewhat more than two years, entered the Mediterranean, and returned to Egypt through the Straits of Gibraltar. His military expeditions were distinguished at first by brilliant success, which was followed, however, by the most rapid and signal reverses. On his march against the Babylonians and Medes, whose joint forces had recently destroyed Nineveh, he was met at Megiddo, in the tribe of Manasseh, by Josiah, king of Judah, who was a vassal of Babylon. In the battle which ensued, Josiah was defeated and mortally wounded, and Necho advanced to the Euphrates, where he conquered the Babylonians and took Carchemish or Circesus, where he appears to have established a garrison. Herodotus tells us that, after the battle at Megiddo, he took the town of Cadytis, which, therefore, it has been argued, can hardly be identified with Jerusalem, according to the usual opinion, since that place lay far out of the line of his progress (See Ewing in the Classical Museum, vol. ii. p. 93, &c.) But the objection vanishes if we suppose it to have been taken by one of his generals immediately after the battle with Josiah, or afterwards by himself on his triumphant return homeward from the Euphrates, when we know that he deposed Jehoahaz and placed Eliakim (Jehoiakim) on the throne of Judah, as the tributary vassal of Egypt, B.C. 610. In the fourth year of the reign of Jehoikim, B.C. 606, Nebuchadnezzar attacked Carchemish, defeated Necho, who had marched thither to meet him, and, advancing onward with uninterrupted success, reduced to subjection all the country between "the river of Egypt" and the Euphrates. He would appear also to have invaded Egypt itself. From this period certainly Necho made no effort to recover what he had lost, if we except a preparation for war with Babylon (B.C. 603, the third year of Jehoikim), which was soon abandoned in fear. In B.C. 601, Necho died after a reign of sixteen years, and was succeeded by his son Psammis or Psammuthis (Herod. ii. 158, 159, iv. 42; Larch. ad ll. cc.; Diod. i. 33; Weis. ad loc.; Strab. i. p. 56, xvii. p. 804; Plin. H. N. vi. 29; Joseph. Ant. x. 5, 6; 2 Kings xxiii. 29, &c., xxiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20, &c., xxxvi. 1—4; Jerem. xlvii.; comp. Heeren, African Nations, vol. ii. pp. 374, 389, &c.; Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. iii. p. 141, &c.) [E. E.]

NECTANABIS, NECTANEBUS, or NECTANEBES (Νεκτανάβης, Νεκταρέβης, Νεκταρέβης).

1. King of Egypt, the first of the three sovereigns of the Sebennite dynasty, succeeded Nephertites on the throne about A.C. 374, and, in the following year, successfully resisted the invasion of the Persian force under Pharnabazus and Iphicrates, owing partly to the natural advantages of the country for defence, and partly to the dexterity and over-cautious conduct of Pharnabazus. Nectanabis died after a reign of ten years, according to Eusebius, and was succeeded by Tachos. (Diod. xv. 41—43; Nep. Iph. 2; comp. Rehdantz, Vit. Iph. Chabr. Tim. iv. § 3; Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgesch. vol. iii. Urkundenbuch, pp. 40, 41.)

2. Appears to have been the nephew of Tachos, who, in his expedition to Phœnicia, in B. C. 361, left his brother behind as governor of Egypt, and placed Nectanabis, who accompanied him, in the command of his Egyptian forces, and sent him to lay siege to the cities in Syria. Taking advantage of the power thus entrusted to him, and aided by his father, who had raised a rebellion at home, Nectanabis persuaded his troops to renounce their allegiance to Tachos, and revolted. Being acknowledged by the Egyptian people also as king, he made overtures and large promises to Agesilaus and Chabrias, both of whom were engaged with Greek mercenaries in the service of Tachos. Chabrias refused to transfer his assistance to him, but he was more fortunate with Agesilaus, and Tachos, finding himself thus deserted, fled for refuge to Artaxerxes III., and, notwithstanding the confused statement of Diodorus to the contrary, seems to have made no further attempt to recover the crown. It was, however, disputed with Nectanabis by a certain Mendesian, who for some time met with considerable success, but was ultimately defeated by the skill of Agesilaus, and the Spartan king left Egypt with rich presents from Nectanabis, whom he had thus firmly established on the throne. (Xen. Ages.; Plut. Ages. 37—40, Apoph. Lac. Ages. 76—78; Diod. xv. 92, 93; Wess. ad loc.; Nep. Chabr. 2, 3, Ages. 8; Ath. xiv. p. 616, d, e; Paus. iii. 10; Polyæn. ii. 1; Aelian. V.H. v. 1; Perizon. ad loc.; Clinton. F.H. vol. ii. App. pp. 213, 316; Rehdantz. Vit. Ph. Chabr. Tim. v. § 11.) Artaxerxes III. (Ochus), soon after his accession in B. C. 359, made several attempts to recover Egypt; but the generals, whom he sent thither, were utterly defeated by Nectanabis, through the skill mainly of two experienced commanders in his service, Diophantus, of Athens, and Lamius, of Sparta. The failure of the Persian attacks on Egypt encouraged Phœnicia also and Cyprus to revolt, and Artaxerxes accordingly (leaving the reduction of Cyprus to IDRIEUS) resolved to put himself at the head of an expedition which should crush the Phœnician rebellion, and should then proceed to take vengeance on Nectanabis. It therefore became necessary for his own defence that the Egyptian king should succour the Phœnicians, and we find him accordingly despatching MENTOR, the Rhodian, to their aid with 4000 mercenaries. But Mentor went over to Artaxerxes, and, after the subjugation of Phœnicia, accompanied him in his invasion of Egypt. Nectanabis had made large and active preparations for defence; but, according to Diodorus, his presumptuous confidence made him think that he could conduct the campaign alone, while his utter unfitness for the command of an army (obvious enough indeed in his former war with the Mendesian pretender) caused his ruin. Some of his troops having sustained a defeat from Nicostratus and Aristazanes, he adopted in alarm the fatal step of shutting himself up in Memphis. Here he remained without a struggle, while town after town submitted to the enemy, and at length, despairing of his cause, he fled with the greater part of his treasures into Aethiopia. Another account, viz. that of Lynceus (ap. Ath. iv. p. 150, b), represents him as having been taken prisoner by Artaxerxes, and kindly treated, while a third story brings him to Macedonia, and makes him become the father of Alexander the Great, having won the favours of Olympias by magic arts. But this deserves mention only as a specimen of those wild legends, by which Oriental vanity strove to reconcile itself to a foreign yoke by identifying the blood of its conqueror with its own (Diod. xvi. 40, 41, 42, 44, 46—51; comp. Isaiah xix. 11, &c.; Vitringer. ad loc.; Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vi. p. 142; Wess. ad Diod. xvi. 51). The date usually assigned to the conquest of Egypt by Ochus is B. C. 350; but see Thirlwall's Greece, vol. vi. p. 142, note 2. Nectanabis was the third king of the Sebennite dynasty, and the last native sovereign who ever ruled in Egypt (comp. Ezek. xxix. 14, 15, xxx. 13). We read in Diogenes Laërtius (viii. 87; comp. Menag. ad loc.) that he received at his court, and recommended to the priests the astronomer Eudoxus, who came to him with a recommendation from Agesilaus. Pliny (H. N. xxxvi. 9.) speaks of an obelisk which had been made by order of Nectanabis, and was set up at Alexandria by Ptolemy Philadelphus; but it does not appear to which of the two persons above-mentioned he is alluding. [E. E.]

NECTAR (Νέκταρ), was, according to the early poets, the wine or drink of the gods, which was poured out to them by Hebe or Ganymede, and the colour of which is described as red (Hom. Il. iv. 3, Od. v. 93, 195, &c.; Ov. Met. x. 161). Like the wine of mortals it was mixed with water when it was drunk, and the wine which Odysseus had carried with him is called by Polyphemus the cream of nectar (αὐτὸν δὲ νέκταρος, Od. ix. 359). Later writers sometimes by nectar understand a fragrant balm which prevents the decomposition of organic bodies, as, in fact, even in Homer (Il. xix. 39), Thetis prevents the body of Patroclus becoming decomposed by anointing it with ambrosia and nectar (comp. Ov. Met. iv. 250). Some of the ancient poets, moreover, described nectar not as the drink, but as the food of the immortals, that is, they made it the same as ambrosia. (Athen. ii. p. 39; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1632.) [L. S.]

NECTARIUS (Νεκτάριος), was the successor of Gregory of Nazianzus, and the predecessor of John Chrysostom, as bishop of Constantinople. His occupancy of the episcopal chair between two such men would have required extraordinary merit to make him conspicuous. But, in truth, though he does not seem to merit the epithet applied to him by Gibbon, "the indolent Nectarius," the fact of his having been appointed at all is the most remarkable thing in his personal history. When Gregory, as has been related [Vol. II. p. 313], resigned his office, A. D. 381, it was during the meeting of the second œcumenical council at Constantinople. Nectarius, a senator, and a man of the highest family, was a native of Tarsus. The ecclesiastical historians relate that, at this time, he intended to visit his native place, and previously waited on Diodorus, the bishop of Tarsus, who was in Constantinople attending the council. Diodorus, along with the other bishops, was perplexed as to whom they should nominate to the vacant see. Struck by the majestic appearance and the white hair of Nectarius, taking for granted that he had been baptized, Diodorus requested Nectarius to postpone his departure, and recommended him to Flavian, bishop of Antioch, as a fit person to succeed Gregory. Flavian laughed at the strange proposal, but, to oblige his friend, put his name last on the list, which he, as well as the other bishops, presented to the emperor. To the astonishment of all, Theodosius selected Nectarius, and persisted in his choice, even when it was ascertained that he had not yet been baptized. The bishops at last acceded to the wish of the monarch, who had so stoutly opposed the Arians, while the people, attracted probably by the gentle manners and the venerable appearance of the man, presenting as he did every way a strong contrast to Gregory, loudly applauded the choice. Nectarius was baptized, and, before he had time to put off the white robes of a neophyte, he was declared bishop of Constantinople. Most important matters came under the consideration of the council, over which it is probable he was now called to preside. He showed his discretion by putting himself under the tuition of Cyriacus, bishop of Adana; but we can hardly believe that he took any active part in the theological questions which were discussed. It is doubtful whether the canons that were enacted, under the name of the second oecumenical council, were not passed at two different sessions, a second taking place in 382. But this does not matter much, as they all bear the name of this council. The principal business transacted in the council, theologically considered, related to the confirming and extending of the Nicene Creed, mainly to meet the opinions of the Macedonians. The creed thus enlarged is that used at the mass of the Roman Catholic church. Other canons regulated discipline, the restriction of the authority of each bishop to his own diocese, and the restoration of penitent heretics. The most important article of all, however, historically considered, was one which was conceded not more to the natural propriety of the arrangement, than to the personal favour which the emperor bore to Nectarius. It was decreed, that as Constantinople was New Rome, the bishop should be next in dignity to the bishop of Rome, and hold the first place among the Eastern prelates. This, which was at first a mere mark of dignity, became a source of substantial power, embroiled Constantinople with Rome, and was pregnant with all those circumstances that have marked this important schism. Nectarius was the first who held the dignity of ex officio head of the Eastern bishops, as patriarch of Constantinople. These canons were signed on the 9th of July, 381. The zeal of Theodosius in the extirpation of Arianism led to the summoning of a council (not oecumenical) at Constantinople, in July, 383. There assembled the chiefs of all the sects. By the advice of Sisinnius, afterwards a Novatian bishop, given through Nectarius, the emperor ensnared his opponents into an approval of the writings of the early fathers. He then required of each sect a confession of its faith, which, having read and considered, he condemned them all, and followed up this condemnation by the most stringent laws, for the purpose of entirely rooting them out. As might have been expected, Nectarius was obnoxious to the Arians, and we find that in 388, while the emperor Theodosius was absent in Italy, opposing Maximus, a rumour that had arisen of the defeat and death of the prince having excited their hopes, a riot ensued, in the course of which they set fire to the house of Nectarius. In the year 390, Nectarius, alarmed by the public odium which had been excited by the seduction of a woman of quality by a deacon, abolished the practice of confession which had been introduced into the Eastern church—a penitential priest having been appointed, whose office it was to receive the confessions of those who had fallen into sin, after baptism, and prescribe acts of penitence previously to their being admitted to partake of the privileges of the church. The last council (not oecumenical) at which Nectarius presided was held in Constantinople in 394, regarding a dispute as to the bishopric of Bostris. Nectarius survived his patron, Theodosius, two years, dying on the 27th of September, 397. He seems to have borne his honours meekly, and to have acted with great discretion. In the subtle controversies that agitated the church, we learn that he avoided discussion himself, and was guided by the advice of men better skilled in the puzzling dialectics of the time. If the conjecture of Tillemont (vol. ix. p. 486) be correct, he was married, and had one son. His brother Arsadius succeeded John Chrysostom as patriarch of Constantinople. (Fleury, Hist. Eccles. vol. iv. cc. 18, 19; Socrat. H. E. v. 8, 13; Sozom. H. E. vii. 8, 9, 14, 16, viii. c. 23.) Nectarius wrote (Cave doubts this) a homily De S. Theodoro, a martyr, whose festival is held by the Greek church on the first sabbath of Lent. The original is said to exist in several libraries, and a Latin version was printed, Paris, 1554, with some Homilies of Chrysostom. Also his Sententia Synodalis de Episcopatu Bostrensi, is given in Jure Græc. Roman. lib. iv. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ix. p. 309, vol. x. p. 333; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 277.) [W. M. G.]

NEDA (Νέδα), an Arcadian nymph, from whom the river Neda and also a town (Steph. Byz. s. v.) derived their name. She was believed, conjointly with Theison and Hagno, to have nursed the infant Zeus (Callim. Hymn. in Jov. 38; Paus. viii. 38. § 3). In a Messenian tradition Neda and Ithome were called nurses of Zeus (Paus. iv. 33. § 2). She was represented at Athens in the temple of Athena. (Paus. viii. 47. § 2.) [L. S.]

NEDUSIA (Νέδυσια), a surname of Athena, under which she had a sanctuary on the river Nedon (from which she derived the name), and another at Poieessa in the island of Cos. The latter was said to have been founded by Nestor on his return from Troy, and to have derived its name from Nedon, a place in Laconia. (Strab. viii. p. 360, x. p. 487; Steph. Byz. s. v. Νέδωρ.) [L. S.]

NEIS (Νηϊς), a daughter of Zethus, or of Amphion by Niobe, from whom the Neitian gate at Thebes was believed to have derived its name (Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 1104). According to Pausanias Neis was a son of Zethus (ix. 8. § 3). [L. S.]

NELEIDES, NELEIADES, and NELEIUS (Νηλεΐδης, Νηλεΐάδης, Νηλεΐος), patronymics of Neleus, by which either Nestor, the son of Neleus, or Antilochus, his grandson, is designated. (Hom. Il. viii. 100, xi. 617, x. 87, xxiii. 514; Ov. Met. xii. 553; Herod. v. 65.) [L. S.]

NELEUS (Νηλεΐς), a son of Cretheus and Tyro, the daughter of Salomoneus. Tyro, previous to her marriage with Neleus, is said to have loved the river-god Enipeus; and in the form of Enipeus Poseidon once appeared to her, and became by her the father of Pelias and Neleus (Hom. Od. xi. 234, &c.). Tyro exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by horse-herds, and when they had grown up they learned who their mother was, and Pelias killed their foster-mother, who had ill-used Tyro (Apollod. i. 9. § 8).

After the death of Cretheus, the two brothers quarrelled about the succession to the throne of Iolcus. Neleus, who was expelled, went with Melampus and Bias to Pylos, which his uncle Aphareus gave to him (Apollod. i. 9. § 9; Diod. iv. 68). Neleus thus became king of Pylos, which town he found in existence when he arrived there; but some state that he himself built Pylos, or at least that he erected the royal palace there (Paus. iv. 2. § 3, 36. § 1). It should be observed that several towns of the name of Pylos claimed the honour of being the city of Neleus or of his son Nestor, such as Pylos in Messenia, Pylos in Elis, and Pylos in Triphylia; the last of which is probably the one mentioned by Homer in connection with Neleus and Nestor (Strab. viii. p. 337). Neleus was married to Chloris, who, according to Homer (Od. xi. 280, &c.), was a daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, and according to others (Diod. l. c.) a Theban woman, and by her he became the father of Nestor, Chromius, Periclymenus, and Pero, though the total number of his sons was twelve (Od. xi. 285, Il. xi. 692; Apollod. i. 9. § 9; Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. i. 156). When Hercules had killed Iphitus, he went to Neleus to be purified; but Neleus, who was a friend of Eurytus, the father of Iphitus, refused to purify Hercules (Diod. iv. 31). In order to take vengeance, Hercules afterwards marched against Pylos, and slew the sons of Neleus, with the exception of Nestor (Hom. Il. xi. 690), though some later writers state that Neleus also was killed (Apollod. ii. 6. § 2, 7. § 3; Hygin. Fab. 10). Neleus was thus reduced to a state of defencelessness, and Augeas, king of the Epeians, availed himself of the opportunity for harassing his kingdom; among other things Augeas intercepted and kept for himself a team of four horses which Neleus had sent to the Olympian games (Hom. Il. xi. 699, &c.). Neleus took vengeance for this by carrying away the flocks of the Epeians (Il. xi. 670, &c.), whereupon the latter invaded the territory of Pylos, and besieged Thryœssa on the Alpheius. Athena informed Neleus of it, but he would not allow his son Nestor to venture out against the Epeians, and concealed his war steeds. But Nestor fought against them on foot, and was victorious (Il. xi. 707, &c.). Pausanias says (ii. 2. § 2) that Neleus died at Corinth, and that he, in conjunction with Nestor, restored the Olympian games. The descendants of Neleus, the Neleidae, were expelled from their kingdom by the Heracleidae, and migrated for the most part to Athens (Paus. ii. 18. § 7, iv. 3. § 3). It should be observed that Hyginus (Fab. 10, 14) calls the father of Neleus Hippocoon, and that he mentions him among the Argonauts. [L. S.]

NELEUS (Νηλεΰς or Νηλεΐς), the younger son of Codrus, disputed the right of his elder brother Medon to the crown on account of his lameness, and when the Delphic oracle declared in favour of Medon, he placed himself at the head of the colonists who migrated to Ionia, and himself founded Miletus. His son Aepytus headed the colonists who settled in Priene. Another son headed a body of settlers who reinforced the inhabitants of Iasus, after they had lost a great number of their citizens in a war with the Carians. (Herod. ix. 97; Paus. vii. 2. § 1, who in the old edition calls him Neleus; Polyb. xvi. 12; Suidas, s. v. Νηλεΐα; Strab. xiv. p. 633.) [C. P. M.]

NELEUS, a native of Scepsia, the son of Coriscus. He was a disciple of Aristotle and Theophrastus, the latter of whom bequeathed to him his library, and appointed him one of his executors. The history of the writings of Aristotle as connected with Neleus and his heirs, is fully discussed elsewhere. [Vol. I. p. 323.] Of the personal history of Neleus nothing further is known. (Strab. xiii. p. 608, b; Diog. Laërt. v. 52, 53, 55, 56; Athen. i. p. 3, a; Plut. Sull. p. 468, b; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 499.) [C. P. M.]

NE'MEA (Νημεΐα), a daughter of Asopus, from whom the district of Nemea between Cleonae and Phlius in Argolis was said to have received its name. (Paus. ii. 15. § 3, v. 22. § 5.) [L. S.]

NEMEIUS (Νημεΐος), the Nemeian, a surname of Zeus, under which he had a sanctuary at Argos, with a bronze statue, the work of Lysippus, and where games were celebrated in his honour. (Paus. ii. 20. § 3, 24. § 2.) [L. S.]

NEMERTES (Νημερτής), that is, the Unerring, a daughter of Nereus and Doria. (Hom. Il. xviii. 46; Hes. Theog. 262.) [L. S.]

NEMESIANUS, M. AURELIUS OLYMPIUS, who, in all probability, was a native of Africa, since he is styled in MSS. Poeta Carthaginiensis, and is referred to as Aurelius Carthaginiensis by Hincmar archbishop of Rheims (A. D. 845), flourished at the court of the emperor Carus (A. D. 283), carried off the prize in all the poetical contests of the day (omnibus coronis [not coronis] illustratus emicuit), and was esteemed second to the youthful prince Numerianus alone, who honoured him so far as permit him to dispute, and, of course, to yield to the palm of verse. Vopiscus, to whom we are indebted for these particulars, informs us that he was the author of poems upon fishing, hunting, and aquatics (ἀλευτικά, κυνηγετικά, ναυτικά, unless we read ἰευστικά), all of which have perished, with the exception of a fragment of the Cynegetica, extending to 325 hexameter lines, which, in so far as neatness and purity of expression are concerned, in some degree justifies the admiration of his contemporaries. What has been preserved contains precepts for rearing horses and dogs, and for providing the apparatus of the huntsman, but is evidently merely an introduction to the main body of the work, which seems to have embraced a very wide field, and to have been intended to contain a complete account of all the beasts of chase, and of the various methods pursued for their capture or destruction.

Two short fragments, De Aucupio, which, with their history, will be found in the Poetae Latini Minores of Wernsdorf (vol. i. p. 128), and likewise a piece entitled Laudes Herculis, the work of some unknown writer, have been ascribed, on no good evidence, to Nemesianus (Wernsdorf, vol. i. p. 275); and he is by some erroneously supposed to have been the author of four out of the eleven pastorals which bear the name of Calpurnius Siculus [CALPURNIUS], and to have been shadowed forth in one of the others (the fourth) under the designation of Meliboeus. The inscription "Ad Nemesianum Carthaginiensem," prefixed to these eclogues, in many editions, rests upon the authority of no MSS., except such as are of recent date, and is now generally regarded as an interpolation.

The fragment of the Cynegetica was first published by the heirs of Aldus (8vo. Venet. 1534), in a volume containing also the poem of Gratius Faliscus upon hunting, and a bucolic ascribed to Nemesianus. It will be found along with the lines De Aucupio, in the Poetae Latini Minores of Burmann, 4to. Lug. Bat. 1731, vol. i. pp. 317, 451, and of Wernsdorf, 8vo. Altenb. 1780, vol. i. pp. 3, 123. The best edition is that of Stern, entitled "Gratii Falisci et Olympii Nemesiani carmina venatica cum duobus fragmentis De Aucupio," 8vo. Hal. Sax. 1832. There is a translation into French by M. S. Delatour, 18mo. Paris, 1799. [W. R.]

NE'MESIS (Némeſis), is most commonly described as a daughter of Night, though some call her a daughter of Erebus (Hygin. Fab. praef.) or of Oceanus (Tzetz. ad Lyc. 88; Paus. i. 33. § 3, vii. 5. § 1). Nemesis is a personification of the moral reverence for law, of the natural fear of committing a culpable action, and hence of conscience, and for this reason she is mentioned along with Αἰδώς, i. e. Shame (Hes. Theog. 223, Op. et D. 183). In later writers, as Herodotus and Pindar, Nemesis is a kind of fatal divinity, for she directs human affairs in such a manner as to restore the right proportions or equilibrium wherever it has been disturbed; she measures out happiness and unhappiness, and he who is blessed with too many or too frequent gifts of fortune, is visited by her with losses and sufferings, in order that he may become humble, and feel that there are bounds beyond which human happiness cannot proceed with safety. This notion arose from a belief that the gods were envious of excessive human happiness (Herod. i. 34, iii. 40; Pind. Ol. viii. in fin., Pylh. x. 67). Nemesis was thus a check upon extravagant favours conferred upon man by Tyche or Fortune, and from this idea lastly arose that of her being an avenging and punishing power of fate, who, like Dike and the Erinyes, sooner or later overtakes the reckless sinner (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1043; Sophocl. Philoct. 518; Eurip. Orest. 1362; Catull. 50, in fin.; Orph. Hymn. 60). The inhabitants of Smyrna worshipped two Nemesea, both of whom were daughters of Night (Paus. vii. 5. § 1). She is frequently mentioned under the surnames Adraſteia [ADRASTEIA, No. 2] and Rhamnusia or Rhamnusis, the latter of which she derived from the town of Rhamnus in Attica, where she had a celebrated sanctuary (Paus. i. 33. § 2). Besides the places already mentioned she was worshipped at Patrae (Paus. vii. 20, in fin.) and at Cysicus (Strab. p. 588). She was usually represented in works of art as a virgin divinity, and in the more ancient works she seems to have resembled Aphrodite, whereas in the later ones she was more grave and serious, and had numerous attributes. But there is an allegorical tradition that Zeus begot by Nemesis at Rhamnus an egg, which Leda found, and from which Helena and the Dioscuri sprang, whence Helena herself is called Rhamnusia (Callim. Hymn. in Dian. 232; Paus. i. 33. § 7). On the pedestal of the Rhamnusia Nemesis, Leda was represented leading Helena to Nemesis (Paus. l. c.). Respecting the resemblance between her statue and that of Aphrodite, see Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4; comp. Paus. i. 33. § 2; Strab. pp. 396, 399. The Rhamnusian statue bore in its left hand a branch of an apple tree, in its right hand a patera, and on its head a crown, adorned with stars and an image of victory. Sometimes she appears in a pensive standing attitude, holding in her left hand a bridle or a branch of an ash tree, and in her right a wheel, with a sword or a scourge. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 97, &c.) [L. S.]

NEME'SIUS (Némeſios). 1. The author of a Greek treatise, Περὶ ὁρίων Ἀνθρώπου, De Natura Hominis, of whose date and personal history little is known. He is called bishop of Emesa, in Syria, in the MSS. of his work, and also by Anastasius Nicenus (Quaest. in S. Script. ap. Biblioth. Patrum, vol. vi. p. 157, ed. Paris, 1575), and was evidently a Christian and a man of piety. The time in which he lived cannot be determined with much exactness, as the only ancient writers by whom he is quoted or mentioned are probably Anastasius and Moses Bar-Cepha (De Parad. i. 20, p. 55, ed. Antw. 1569), which latter author calls him "Nemysius Philosophus Christianus." He himself mentions Apollinaris (p. 77, ed. Oxon.) and Eunomius (p. 73), and therefore may be supposed to have lived at the end of the fourth or beginning of the fifth century after Christ. He has sometimes been confounded with other persons of the same name; but, as these erroneous conjectures have already been corrected by other writers, they need not be noticed here particularly. His work has sometimes been attributed to St. Gregory of Nyssa, an error which has probably arisen from confounding this treatise with that entitled Περὶ Κατασκευῆς Ἀνθρώπου, De Hominis Officio, written by St. Gregory to complete the Henæmeron of his brother St. Basil. The treatise by Nemesis is an interesting philosophical little work, which has generally been highly praised by all who have mentioned it. The author has indeed been accused of holding some of Origen's erroneous opinions, but has been defended by his editor, bishop Fell, who, however, confesses that, with respect to the pre-existence of souls, Nemesis differed from the commonly received opinion of the Church. (Annot. p. 20.) Probably the principal source of the celebrity obtained by Nemesis is his having been brought forward as a person who was aware of the functions of the bile, and also of the circulation of the blood; and the passages which have been supposed to contain these doctrines are certainly sufficiently striking to deserve to be given here at full length. The former is as follows (c. 24, p. 242, ed. Matth.):—"The motion of the pulse (called also the vital power) takes its rise from the heart, and chiefly from the left ventricle. . . . . The artery is, with great vehemence, dilated and contracted, by a sort of constant harmony and order, the motion commencing at the heart. While it is dilated, it draws with force the thinner part of the blood from the neighbouring veins, the exhalation or vapour of which blood becomes the aliment for the vital spirit. But while it is contracted, it exhales whatever fumes it has through the whole body and by secret passages, as the heart throws out whatever is fuliginous through the mouth and nose by expiration." The other passage is almost equally curious (c. 28, p. 260):—"The yellow bile," he says, "is constituted both for itself and also for other purposes; for it contributes to digestion and promotes the expulsion of the excrements; and therefore it is in a manner one of the nutritive organs, besides imparting a sort of heat to the body, like the vital power. For these reasons, therefore, it seems to be made for itself; but, inasmuch as it purges the blood, it seems to be made in a manner for this also." It is hardly necessary to say, that these passages are far enough from proving that Nemeseus had anticipated the discoveries of Harvey and Sylvius; but at the same time they show that the ancients had advanced much farther in the path of science than is commonly supposed. The work is included in several of the collections of Patristic Theology. It appeared for the first time in a separate form in a Latin translation by George Valla, Lugd. 8vo. 1538. The first Greek edition was published at Antwerp, 8vo. 1565, edited by Nicasius Ellebodius, with a Latin translation; the next was by Dr. (afterwards bishop) Fell, Oxon. 8vo. 1671; the last and best is by C. F. Matthæi, Halæ, 8vo. 1802. It was translated into Italian by Domin. Pizzimenti, 8vo. (s. l. et a.); into English by George Wither, London, 12mo. 1636; into German by Osterhammer, Saltzurg, 8vo. 1819; and into French by J. B. Thibault, Paris, 8vo. 1844. Further information respecting Nemeseus and his opinions, theological, philosophical, and physiological, may be found in Bayle's Dict. Hist. et Crit., and Chauffepié's Supplém.; Fabric. Bibl. Græc.; Brucker, Hist. Crit. Philosoph.; Haller, Biblioth. Anat.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Freind's Hist. of Physic. 2. A friend of St. Gregory Naziansen, a man of learning and cultivated taste, who was first an advocate, and afterwards prefect of Cappadocia. St. Gregory appears to have been on very intimate terms with him, and to have written to him numerous letters, of which only four are still extant (Epist. 198—201, vol. ii. p. 163, &c. ed. Paris), written about the year 386. He also addressed a poem to him (about the same time), in which he tries to persuade him to embrace the Christian faith (Carm. vii. vol. ii. p. 1070), but the result of his exhortation is not known. He has been supposed to be the author of the work Περὶ Θύσεως Ἀνθρώπου, but probably without sufficient reason; as, though it is quite possible that a heathen magistrate might afterwards become a Christian bishop, it is hardly probable that no notice of so eminent a conversion should have been preserved. In fact, there seems to be no reason for supposing the two persons to be one and the same, except that they probably lived about the same time.

3. Four letters of St. Isidorus, of Pelusium, written about the beginning of the fifth century after Christ, are addressed to a person named Nemeseus, in one of which he is called Ἀρχων, Proctor (i. 47, ed. Paris, 1638), but it is not quite certain that the same individual is meant in each instance (ii. 135, iv. 39, v. 86).

4. "Nemesei, legum periti, mentio apud Aeneam Jazaeum, Epist. xx." (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. viii. p. 448, ed. Harlea.) But the name in the passage in question is not Νεμέσιος, but Νεμεσίωρ.

5. An Alexandrian presbyter who subscribed to the deposition of Arius, A. D. 321. (Fabric. l. c.) [W. A. G.]

NEOCLES (Νεοκλῆς), historical. 1. The father of Themistocles, was an Athenian of distinguished rank, connected with the priestly house of the Lycomedæ (Plut. Them. i. p. 111; Herod. vii. 173).

2. A son of Themistocles and Archippe, who was killed while yet a boy by the bite of a horse. (Plut. Them. p. 128, b.) [C. P. M.]

NEOCLES, literary. 1. An Athenian, the father of Epicurus, was one of the cleruchi (agropoli, as Cicero, de Nat. Deor. i. 26, calls him) sent to Samos after its conquest in the time of Pericles. Not finding his land sufficient for his maintenance, he set up a school. (Strab. xiv. p. 638; Diog. Laërt. x. 1.)

2. Brother of Epicurus, wrote an account of the sect of the Epicureans, which is lost. He was the author of the maxim ἅθε βιώσας, upon which Plutarch wrote a small essay. (Plut. Non Sene. Viti Sec. Epic. pp. 1089, 1128, &c.; Suidas, s. v. Νεοκλῆς; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 608.)

3. A native of Crotona, from whom Athenæus (ii. p. 57, f.) quotes, to the effect that the egg from which Helena was produced fell from the moon, the women there being oviparous. [C. P. M.]

NEOCLES, painter. [XENON.]

NEOLA'US (Νεόλαος), brother of Molon and Alexander, who revolted against Antiochus the Great. [ANTIOCHUS, Vol. I. p. 196.] He commanded the left wing of the rebel army in the battle in which Molon was defeated. When all was lost he escaped from the battle, and went to Persia, where Alexander was. Having killed his mother, and the children of Molon, he slew himself upon their corpses, after persuading Alexander to follow his example. (Polyb. v. 58, § 11, 54, § 5.) [C. P. M.]

NEON (Νέων). 1. A Corinthian officer, who accompanied Timoleon in his expedition to Sicily, and was appointed by him to command the citadel of Syracuse, when that fortress was placed in his hands by the younger Dionysius. In this post Neon not only held out against the combined efforts of Hicetas and the Carthaginian general Mago, but took advantage of their absence on an expedition against Catana, to make himself master of the important quarter of Acradina. (Plut. Timol. 18.)

2. A Messenian, son of Philades, and brother of Thrasylbulus, who is accused by Demosthenes of having betrayed his country to Philip king of Macedon (Dem. de Cor. p. 324, ed. Reiske; Harpocration, s. v. Νέων). An elaborate vindication of his conduct, together with that of others of his contemporaries who had adopted the same line of policy, is found in Polybius (xvii. 14).

3. An officer who commanded under Demetrius Poliorcetes in the great sea-fight off Salamis in Cyprus, B. C. 306. (Diod. xx. 52.)

4. A Boeotian, who was one of the leaders of the Macedonian party in his native country, during the reign of Antigonus Doson. An accident put it in his power to confer a great personal obligation upon that monarch: for Antigonus having touched with his fleet on the coast of Boeotia, the ships were all left aground by a sudden change of tide: Neon, who was hipparch at the time, came up with the Boeotian cavalry, but instead of taking advantage of the situation of Antigonus, he allowed him to depart in safety. For this act he incurred much censure from his countrymen, but obtained a high place in the favour of Antigonus and his successor Philip. (Polyb. xx. 5.)

5. A Theban, probably grandson of the preceding, took a prominent part in the politics of Boeotia during the disputes between the Romans and Perseus. He was one of the principal authors of the alliance concluded by the Boeotians with the Macedonian king, on which account he was driven into exile, when the cities of Boeotia submitted to the Roman deputies Marcius and Atilius, B. C. 172. Hereupon he took refuge with Perseus, to whose fortunes he seems to have henceforward closely attached himself, as he was one of the three companions of the king's flight after the decisive battle of Pydna, B. C. 168. He eventually fell into the hands of the Romans, by whom he was executed the following year, B. C. 167. (Polyb. xxvii. 1, 2; Liv. xlv. 43, xlv. 31; Plut. Aemil. 23.) [E. H. B.]

NEOPHRON or NEOPHON (Νεόφρων, Νεοφών, Suidas gives both, Diogenes Laërtius Νεόφρων), of Sicyon, a tragic writer of doubtful age. In the Scholia to the Medeia of Euripides, we have two fragments of a play written by him on the same subject, one of four lines at v. 668, and another of five lines at v. 1354. Besides these we have fifteen lines quoted by Stobaeus, from the same tragedy. The account given of him by Suidas, as has been shown by Elmsley (ad Eurip. Med. p. 68), is manifestly inconsistent. Suidas states that he wrote 120 tragedies, that the Medeia of Euripides was sometimes attributed to him, and that he was the first to introduce on the stage the Παιδαγωγός, and the examination of slaves by torture. In one particular—that the Medeia of Euripides was sometimes attributed to him—Suidas is confirmed by Diogenes Laërtius. But Suidas goes on to say that he was involved in the fate of Callisthenes, and put to death by Alexander the Great. If the latter account be true, the former cannot but be an error, as Euripides lived long before the days of Alexander the Great, and, in the very play of the Medeia, among others, had introduced the Παιδαγωγός. Besides, Nearchus, a tragedian, is mentioned by Suidas (s.v. Καλλισθένης) as the unfortunate friend of Callisthenes who suffered with him. From this reasoning it seems certain that Suidas confounded the two, and that Clinton is right in placing Neophon, as he does, before the age of Euripides. This is further strengthened by an acute remark of Elmsley's, that men do not quote small plagiarists of great writers, but delight to trace wherever great writers have borrowed their materials. As far as we can judge from the fragments already mentioned, Euripides may have borrowed his plot and characters from Neophon, but certainly not his style. (Elmsley, l. c.; Gaisford's Stobaeus, vol. i. p. 385; Suid. s. v.; Diog. Laërt. ii. 134; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. xxxi.) [W. M. G.]

NEOPHYTUS. A short, but curious tract, published by Cotelerius in his Ecclesiae Graecae Monumenta, vol. ii. p. 457—462, bears this title: Νεοφύτου πρεσβυτέρου μοναχού καὶ ἐγκλησίου περὶ τῶν κατὰ χώραν Κύπρου σκυάν, Neophyti Presbyteri Monachi et Inclusi, De Calamitatibus Cypr. It gives a brief account of the usurpation of the island by Isaac Comnenus, its conquest, and the imprisonment of Isaac by Richard Coeur de Lion, king of England, and the sale of the island to the Latins (as the writer represents the transaction) by Richard. The writer was contemporary with these transactions, and therefore lived about the close of the twelfth century. He was a resident in and probably a native of Cyprus. There are several MSS. in the different European libraries bearing the name of Neophytus. Of these a MS. formerly in the Colbertine Library at Paris, contained thirty Orationes, evidently by our Neophytus: a Catena in Canticum, and some others on theological subjects, are of more dubious authorship, but are probably by our Neophytus: a Demonstratio de Plantis, and one or two chemical treatises, are by another Neophytus, surnamed Prodrömenus; and Definitiones et Divisiones Summariae totius Aristotelis Philosophiae et Epitome in Porphyrii quinque voces et in Aristotelis Organon are apparently by a third writer of the same name. (Cotelerius, l. c. and notes in col. 678, 679; Du Cange, Glossarium Med. et Inf. Graecitatis; Index Auctorum, p. 29; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 738, vol. viii. 661, 662, vol. xi. p. 339, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. ad Ann. 1190, vol. ii. p. 251, ed. Oxford, 1740, 1742.) [J. C. M.]

NEOPTOLEMUS (Νεοπτόλεμος), i. e. a young warrior, a son of Achilles and Deidameia, the daughter of Lyncomedes, was also called Pyrrhus (Apollod. iii. 13. § 8; Hom. Od. xi. 491, &c.). According to some, however, he was a son of Achilles and Iphigenia (Tzet. ad Lyc. 133; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1187), and after the sacrifice of his mother he was carried by his father to the island of Scyros. The name of Pyrrhus is said to have been given to him by Lyncomedes, because he had fair (ὑπέρβος) hair, or because Achilles, while disguised as a girl, had borne the name of Pyrrha (Paus. x. 26. § 1; Hygin. Fab. 97; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1187; Serv. ad Aen. ii. 469). He was called Neoptolemus because either Achilles or Pyrrhus himself had fought in early youth (Eustath. l. c.). From his father he is sometimes called Achilles (Ov. Her. viii. 3), and from his grandfather or great-grandfather, Pelides and Acaides (Virg. Aen. ii. 263, iii. 296). Neoptolemus was brought up in Scyros in the house of Lyncomedes (Hom. Il. xix. 326; Soph. Philoct. 239, &c.), whence he was fetched by Odysseus to join the Greeks in the war against Troy (Hom. Od. xi. 508), because it had been prophesied by Helenus that Neoptolemus and Philoctetes, with the arrows of Heracles, were necessary for the taking of Troy (Soph. Phil. 115). In order to obtain those arrows Neoptolemus and Odysseus were sent from Troy to the island of Lemnos, where Philoctetes was living, who was prevailed upon to join the Greeks (Soph. Phil. 1433). At Troy Neoptolemus showed himself in every respect worthy of his great father, and at last was one of the heroes that were concealed in the wooden horse (Hom. Od. xi. 508, &c. 521). At the taking of the city he killed Priam at the sacred hearth of Zeus Herceius (Paus. iv. 17. § 3, x. 27; Virg. Aen. ii. 547, &c.), and sacrificed Polyxena to the spirit of his father (Eurip. Hecub. 523). When the Trojan captives were distributed, Andromache, the widow of Hector, was given to Neoptolemus, and by her he became the father of Molossus, Pielus, Pergamus (Paus. i. 11. § 1), and Amphialus (Hygin. Fab. 123; comp. ANDROMACHE). Respecting his return from Troy and the subsequent events of his life the traditions differ. According to Homer (Od. iii. 188, iv. 5, &c.) he lived in Phthia, the kingdom of his father, whither Menelaus sent to him Hermione from Sparta, because he had promised her to him at Troy. According to others Neoptolemus himself went to Sparta to receive Hermione, because he had heard a report that she was betrothed to Orestes (Hygin. Fab. 123; Paus. iii. 25. § 1, 26. § 5). Servius (ad Aen. ii. 166, iii. 521, &c.) relates that on the advice of Helenus, to whom he subsequently gave Andromache and a district in Epeirus, Neoptolemus returned home by land, because he had been forewarned of the dangers which the Greeks would have to encounter at sea. Some again state that from Troy he first went to Molossia, and thence to Phthia, where he recovered the throne which had in the mean time been taken from Peleus by Acastus (Dict. Cret. vi. 7, &c.; Eurip. Troad. 1125; comp. Hom. Od. iv. 9). Others, that on his return to Scyros, he was cast by storm on the coast of Ephyra in Epeirus, where Andromache gave birth to Molossus, to whom the Molossian kings traced their descent (Pind. Nem. iv. 82, vii. 54, &c.). Others lastly say that he went to Epeirus of his own accord, because he would or could not return to Phthia in Thessaly (Paus. i. 11. § 1; Virg. Aen. iii. 333; Justin. xvii. 3). In Epeirus he is also said to have carried off Lanassa, a granddaughter of Hercules, from the temple of the Dodonean Zeus, and to have become by her the father of eight children (Justin. l. c.). Shortly after his marriage with Hermione, Neoptolemus went to Delphi, some say to plunder the temple of Apollo, who had been the cause of the death of Achilles, or to take the god to account for his father; and according to others to take offerings of the Trojan booty to the god, or to consult him about the means of obtaining children by Hermione (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 54, 58, ad Eurip. Or. 1649, Androm. 51). It is owing to this uncertainty that some ancient writers distinguish between two different journeys to Delphi, where he was slain, either by the command of the Pythia (Paus. i. 13. § 7), or at the instigation of Orestes, who was angry at being deprived of Hermione (Eurip. Androm. 891, &c. 1085, &c.; Virg. Aen. iii. 330); and according to others again, by the priest of the temple, or by Machaereus, the son of Daetas (Schol. ad Pind. Nem. vii. 62; Paus. x. 24. § 4; Strab. p. 421). His body was buried at Delphi, under the threshold of the temple, and remained there until Menelaus caused it to be taken up and buried within the precincts of the temple (Pind. Nem. vii. 62; Paus. x. 24. § 5). He was worshipped at Delphi as a hero, as presiding over sacrificial repasts and public games. At the time when the Gauls attacked Delphi he is said to have come forward to protect the city, and from that time to have been honoured with heroic worship. (Paus. i. 4. § 4, x. 23. § 3.)

NEOPTOLEMUS I. (Νεοπτόλεμος), king of Epeirus, was son of Alcetas I., and father of Alexander I., and of Olympia, the mother of Alexander the Great. On the death of Alcetas, Neoptolemus and his brother Arymbas or Arrybas agreed to divide the kingdom, and continued to rule their respective portions without any interruption of the harmony between them, until the death of Neoptolemus, which, according to Droysen, may be placed about a.c. 360. No further incidents of his reign have been transmitted to us. (Paus. i. 11. §§ 1, 3; Justin. vii. 6. § 10, xvii. 3. § 14; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. i. p. 250, not.) [E. H. B.]

NEOPTOLEMUS II., king of Epeirus, was son of Alexander I. and grandson of the preceding. At his father's death in a.c. 326, he was probably a mere infant, and his pretensions to the throne were passed over in favour of Acacides. It was not till a.c. 302 that the Epeirots, taking advantage of the absence of Pyrrhus, the son of Acacides, rose in insurrection against him, and set up Neoptolemus in his stead. The latter reigned for the space of six years without opposition, but effectually alienated the minds of his subjects, by his harsh and tyrannical rule. He thus paved the way for the return of Pyrrhus, who landed in Epeirus in a.c. 296, at the head of a force furnished him by Ptolemy, king of Egypt. Neoptolemus, alarmed at the disaffection of his subjects, consented to a compromise, and it was agreed that the two rivals should share the sovereignty between them. But such an arrangement could not last long; at a solemn festival, where the two kings and all the chief nobles of the land were assembled, Neoptolemus had formed the design to rid himself of his rival by poison; but the plot was discovered by Pyrrhus, who in return caused him to be assassinated at a banquet to which he had himself invited him. (Plut. Pyrrh. 4, 5; Droysen, vol. i. p. 250.) [E. H. B.]

NEOPTOLEMUS (Νεοπτόλεμος), historical.

1. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great. As we are told by Arrian that he belonged to the race of the Acacidae, he was probably related to the family of the kings of Epeirus. He is mentioned as serving in the royal guards (ἰσχυροὶ) and distinguished himself particularly at the siege of Gaza, a.c. 332, of which he was the first to scale the walls. (Arr. Anab. ii. 27.) We hear but little of him during the subsequent campaigns of Alexander, but he appears to have earned the reputation of an able soldier; and in the division of the provinces, after the death of the king, Neoptolemus obtained the government of Armenia. (Carmania, in Dexippus, ap. Phot. p. 64, b. is clearly a false reading; see Droysen, vol. i. p. 50.) It seems, however, that he had already given evidence of a restless and unsettled disposition, which caused Perdicas to regard him with suspicion, and in a.c. 321, when the latter set out for Egypt, he placed Neoptolemus under the command of Eumenes, who was enjoined to exercise particular vigilance in regard to him. The suspicions of the regent proved not unfounded: Neoptolemus immediately entered into correspondence with the hostile leaders, Antipater and Craterus, and, on being ordered by Eumenes to join him with his contingent, refused to comply. Hereupon Eumenes immediately marched against him, defeated his army, and compelled all the Macedonian troops in his service to take the oath of fidelity to Perdicas. Neoptolemus himself escaped with a small body of cavalry and joined Craterus, whom he persuaded to march immediately against Eumenes, while the latter was still elated with his victory, and unprepared for a fresh attack. But their cautious adversary was not to be taken by surprise, and met his enemies in a pitched battle. In this Neoptolemus commanded the left wing, on which he was opposed to Eumenes himself; and the two leaders, who were bitter personal enemies, sought each other in the fight, and engaged in single combat, in which, after a desperate struggle, Neoptolemus was slain by his antagonist. (Diod. xvii. 29—31; Plut. Eum. 4—7; Corn. Nep. Eum. 4; Justin. xiii. 6, 8; Dexippus, ap. Phot. p. 64, b.; Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 70, b., 71, a.)

2. A Macedonian, father of Meleager, the general of Alexander. (Arr. Anab. i. 24. § 1.)

3. A Macedonian officer, who was killed at the siege of Halicarnassus, a.c. 333. (Diod. xvii. 25.) He is doubtless the same who is called by Arrian, the son of Arrhabeus and brother of Amyntas, though that author represents him as having fought on the Persian side. (Arr. Anab. i. 20. § 15; and see Schmieder, ad loc.)

4. One of the generals of Mithridates, and brother of Archelaus. He had already distinguished himself previous to the breaking out of the wars with Rome, by an expedition against the barbarians north of the Euxine, whom he defeated in several battles, and appears to have pushed his conquests as far as the mouth of the Tyras (Dniester), where he erected a fortress which continued to bear his name. In the course of these wars he is said to have defeated the barbarians in a combat of cavalry, on the ice at the entrance of the Palus Maeotis, on the very same spot where he the following summer gained a naval victory. (Strab. ii. 1, p. 73. vii. 3, pp. 306, 307.) In B. C. 88 he was united with his brother Archelaus in the command of the great army with which Mithridates invaded Bithynia, and defeated Nicomedes III. at the river Amnias. This success was quickly followed up by Neoptolemus and Menophanes, who defeated the Roman general M. Aquilius in a second decisive action, and compelled him to fly for refuge to Pergamus. (App. Mithr. 17—19.) After this he appears to have accompanied Archelaus to Greece, where he was defeated by Sulla's lieutenant, Munatius, near Chalcis, with heavy loss, B. C. 86. (Ibid. 34.) After this we find him commanding the fleet of Mithridates, which was stationed at Tenedos (B. C. 85), where he was attacked and defeated by Lucullus, the quaestor of Sulla. (Plut. Lucull. 3.) From this time we hear no more of him. [E. H. B.]

NEOPTOLEMUS (Νεοπτόλεμος), literary. 1. Of Paros, the most eminent literary person of this name. The following works are ascribed to him. 1. Περί Έκγραμμάτων, probably a collection of epigrams. (Athen. x. p. 454, f.; Jacobs, Anthol. vol. vi. p. xxxvi.) 2. Περί Γλωσσών, to the third book of which Athenaeus refers (xi. p. 476, f.). It is probably to this work that Achilles Tatius refers, ἐν ταῖς Φρόναις φωναῖς. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 193.) 3. A Commentary on Homer. (Id. vol. i. p. 517.) 4. A Commentary on Theocritus, quoted in the Scholia on i. 52. (Id. vol. iii. pp. 781, 798.) 5. A Treatise on Poetry, to which Horace is said to have been indebted in his Ars Poetica. (Id. vol. vi. p. 373.)

2. According to a conjecture of Clinton (F. H. vol. i. p. 349), who has collected (L. c.) all the ancient notices on the subject, there was a Milesian Neoptolemus, to whom was falsely ascribed the epic Ναυκταρία. Pausanias thinks it the work of Carcinus. [CARCINUS.] The Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, however, expressly attributes it to Neoptolemus. Perhaps, however, Neoptolemus the Parian may have commented on this work also. Heyne latterly agreed with Pausanias that the Ναυκταρία was named from Naupactus, the birth-place of its author Carcinus. (Apollon. Rhod. v. 299; Schol. ad Apollod. iii. 10. § 12, and Ob-servat. in loc. by Heyne, ed. Gotting. 1803.)

3. A poet from whose work, Περί δασεωμῶν, two lines are quoted by Stobaeus (120. 5, vol. iii. p. 459, ed. Gaisford).

4. There was also a celebrated Athenian tragedian of this name, who performed at the games in which Philip of Macedon was slain, B. C. 336. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 312; Diod. xvi. vol.

ii. p. 152, ed. Amstel. 1745; Sueton. Cat. c. 57.) If Josephus (Ant. xix. 1) be correct, the play performed was on the subject of Cinyras and Myrrha. But Neoptolemus (Diod. L. c.), by order of the king, introduced some new lines (quoted by Diod. L. c.), probably composed by Neoptolemus himself. A saying of his on the murder of the king is recorded by Stobaeus (98. 70, vol. iii. p. 295, ed. Gaisford). He took an active part in the transactions between the Athenians and Philip. He had been intimate with and espoused the side of the latter, for whose court he ultimately left Athens. (Dem. pp. 58, 344, 442, ed. Reiske.) [W. M. G.]

NE'PHELE (Νεφέλη). 1. The wife of the Thessalian king Athamas, by whom she became the mother of Phrixus and Helle. (Apollod. i. 9. § 1; comp. ATHAMAS.)

2. The wife of Ixion, by whom she became the mother of the Centaurs. [CENTAURI.] [L. S.]

NEPOS, a friend of the younger Pliny, who addresses four letters to him (ii. 3, iii. 16, iv. 26, vi. 19), but whether he is the same as either the Calvisius Nepos or the Licinius Nepos mentioned below, is uncertain.

NEPOS, CALVISIUS, a friend of the younger Pliny, was a candidate for the office of military tribune, and was warmly recommended by Pliny to Sossius. (Plin. Ep. iv. 4.)

NEPOS, CORNELIUS, was the contemporary and friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Catullus. He was probably a native of Verona, or of some neighbouring village, and died during the reign of Augustus. No other particulars, with regard to his personal history, have been transmitted to us. (Catull. i. 3; comp. Auson. praef. Epigramm.; Cic. ad Att. xvi. 5; Plin. H. N. v. 1, ix. 39, x. 23; Plin. Ep. iv. 28; Hieron. Chron. Euseb. Olymp. clxxxv.) He is known to have written the following pieces, all of which are now lost.

1. Chronica. An Epitome of Universal History, it would appear, in three books. For the name and some idea of the contents we are indebted to Ausonius (Epist. xvi.), A. Gellius (xvii. 21. § 3, 8, 24), and Solinus (i. § 27, xlv. § 1), while Catullus, when dedicating his poems to Cornelius Nepos, indicates, though obscurely, the object and extent of the production in question,

Jam tum cum ausus es, unus Italorum,
Omne aevum tribus explicare chartis,
Doctis, Jupiter! et laboriosa.

(See also Minucius Felix, c. 22.)

2. Exemplorum Libri, of which Charisius (p. 119, ed. Putsch.) quotes the second book, and A. Gellius (vii. 18. § 11) the fifth. This was probably a collection of remarkable sayings and doings, of the same description as the compilation subsequently formed by Valerius Maximus.

3. De Viris Illustribus. Gellius (xi. 8) tells an anecdote of Cato, adding "Scriptum est hoc in libro Cornelii Nepotis De Illustribus Viris." (See also Serv. ad Virg. Aen. 372; Diomedes, p. 405, ed. Putsch.; and Charisius, pp. 113, 114, 195, ed. Putsch., who refers to books ii. xv. and xvi.) It is not impossible that it may be the same work as the preceding, quoted under a different title.

4. Vita Ciceronis, an error in which is corrected by A. Gellius (xv. 28).

5. Epistolae ad Ciceronem, from one of which Lactantius has preserved an extract (Justil. Dia.

ri. 15; comp. C.c. ad Att. xvi. 5), but we cannot tell whether they were ever formally collected into a volume. The Epistolæ Ciceronis ad Cornelium Nepotem are adverted to under CICERO, p. 743.

6. Perhaps poems also, at least he is named in the same category with Virgil, Ennius, and Accius by the younger Pliny (Ep. v. 3).

7. De Historicis. In the life of Dion (c. 3), which now bears the name of Cornelius Nepos, there is the following sentence, "Sed de hoc in eo meo libro plura sunt exposita qui De Historicis conscriptus est."

In the year 1471 a quarto volume issued from the press of Jenson at Venice, entitled Aemilii Probi de Vita excellentium, containing biographies of twenty distinguished commanders, nineteen Greeks and one Persian, in the following order, which, it has been subsequently ascertained, obtains in all MSS.:—1. Miltiades. 2. Themistocles. 3. Aristides. 4. Pausanias. 5. Cimon. 6. Lysander. 7. Alcibiades. 8. Thraymbulus. 9. Conon. 10. Dion. 11. Iphicrates. 12. Chabrias. 13. Timotheus. 14. Datames. 15. Epaminondas. 16. Pelopidas. 17. Agesilaus. 18. Eumenes. 19. Phocion. 20. Timoleon. Next came three chapters headed De Regibus, presenting very brief notices of certain famous kings of Persia and Macedonia, of the elder Sicilian Dionysius, and of some of the more remarkable among the successors of Alexander. The volume concluded with a biography of Hamilcar, and a biography of Hannibal. A preface, or introduction to the lives, commenced with the words, "Non dubito fore plerosque, Attice, qui hoc genus scripturæ, leve, et non satis dignum summorum virorum iudicent," and prefixed to the whole was a dedication, in verse, to the emperor Theodosius, in which we find the couplet

Si rogat Auctorem, paulatim detege nostrum
Tunc Domino nomen, me sciat esse Probum.

A second edition, in quarto, of the same book, without date, was printed at Venice by Bernardinus Venetus. In this a biography of Cato is added. The title in one part of the volume is Aemilii Probi Historici excellentium Imperatorum Vitæ, in another Aemilii Probi de Virorum Illustrium Vita. A third edition, in quarto, without date and without name of place or printer, but known to belong to Milan, and to be not later than 1496, was published as Aemilius Probus de Viris Illustribus; and here we have not only the biography of Cato, but a life of Atticus also. Numerous impressions appeared during the next half century, varying from the above and from each other in no important particular, except that in the Strasburg one of 1506, the life of Atticus is ascribed to Cornelius Nepos, a point in which it is supported by many MSS. But in 1569 a great sensation was produced among the learned by the edition of the celebrated Dionysius Lambinus (4to. Paris, 1569), who not only revised the text with much care, but strenuously maintained that the whole work was the production of that Cornelius Nepos who flourished towards the close of the Roman republic, and not of an unknown Aemilius Probus, living at the end of the fourth century. The arguments upon which he chiefly insisted were,—

1. The extreme purity of the Latinity, and the chaste simplicity of the style, which exhibit a striking contrast to the semi-barbarian jargon and meretricious finery of the later empire. Every critical scholar must feel the weight of this observation.

2. The person addressed in the preface or introduction must be Pomponius Atticus, the friend of Cicero. This is fully proved by a passage in the life of Cato (sub fin.) where we read, "Hujus de vita et moribus plura in eo libro persecuti sumus quem separatim de eo fecimus rogatu Pomponii Attici," words which are unquestionably perfectly decisive in so far as the memoir in which they occur is concerned, but this, as we have seen, was not included in the original edition, is wanting in some MSS., and, along with the Atticus, is separated, as it were, from the rest in all.

3. The lofty tone in which the grandeur and power of the Roman people are celebrated, the boldness of the comments on free institutions and tyrants, would have been totally out of place at an epoch of degradation and slavery. Allusions, also, it is affirmed, may be detected to the civil war between Caesar and Pompey. Upon a careful examination of all the quotations adduced it will be seen that no weight ought to be attached to this portion of the proof.

4. Lambinus was informed, upon what he considered good authority, that one MS. ended in this manner, "Completum est opus Aemilii Probi, Corneli Nepotia." But even if we admit the accuracy of a statement vouched for so imperfectly, it leads to no result, for the first clause might be intended to assign the 20 biographies, the De Regibus, the Hamilcar and the Hannibal, to Probus; the concluding phrase to mark Nepos as the author of the Cato and the Atticus.

The question thus started has given rise to interminable discussions; but the leading hypotheses may be reduced to three.

I. Many of the contemporaries of Lambinus, unable or unwilling to abandon the belief in which they had been reared, and clinging to the verses addressed to Theodosius, doggedly maintained that the old opinion was after all true, and that all the lives, except perhaps those of Cato and Atticus, which stood upon somewhat different ground, were the property of Probus, and of no one else. This position is now very generally abandoned.

II. Lambinus, as we have seen, pronounced the lives to belong entirely to Cornelius Nepos. Those who support this hypothesis, which has been more widely received than any other, hold, that what we now possess may be regarded, either as a portion of the voluminous collection, De Viris Illustribus, or as an independent work, which, having fallen into oblivion, was brought to light by Aemilius Probus, who fraudulently endeavoured to palm it off as his own; or, perhaps, meant to do nothing more than claim the credit of having discovered and described it; or, that the verses in question, which are absent from several MSS., refer to some totally different production, and have by mere accident found their way into their present position.

III. Barthius, steering a middle course, threw out that the biographies, as they now exist, are in reality epitomes of lives actually written by Nepos, and that we ought to look upon Probus as the abbreviator; others, adopting the general idea, think it more likely that the abridgements were executed at an earlier period.

Without attempting to enter at large into the merits of these conflicting systems, and of the many minor controversies to which they have given rise, all of which will be found stated in the works noted down at the end of this article, we may remark that the third hypothesis, under one form or other, will, if properly applied, tend to remove many of the difficulties, and explain many of the anomalies by which the subject is embarrassed more effectually than either of the two others. It will enable us to account for the purity of the language, and for the graceful unaffected ease of the clauses, when taken singly, and at the same time to understand the harsh and abrupt transitions which so frequently occur in passing from one sentence or from one paragraph to another. But while we may safely admit that we hold in our hands the abridgment of some writer of the Augustan age, we must bear in mind that the evidence adduced to prove that writer to be Cornelius Nepos is miserably defective, an exception being always made in respect of the life of Atticus, which is expressly assigned to him in at least two of the best MSS.

These biographies have, almost ever since their first appearance, been a favourite school-book, and hence editions have been multiplied without end. We have already described the earliest. After the labours of Lambinus, we may particularly notice those of Schottus, fol. Franc. 1609, of Gebhardus, 12mo. Amst. 1644, of Boeclerus, 8vo. Argentor. 1648, of Bosius, 8vo. Jen. 1675, of Van Staveren, 8vo. Lug. Bat. 1734, 1755, 1773, the last being the best, of Heusinger, 8vo. Krug. 1747, of Fischer, 8vo. Lips. 1759, of Harles, Hal. 1773, Lips. 1806, of Paufler, with useful notes written in German, 8vo. Lips. 1804, of Tzschucke, 8vo. Götting. 1804, with an excellent commentary in a separate volume, of Titze, 8vo. Prag. 1813, of Bremi, 8vo. Zurich, 1820, of Bardili, 2 vols. 8vo. Stuttgart, 1820, of Daehne, 12mo. Lips. 1827, of Roth, who has brought back Aemilius Probus on his title page, Basil, 8vo. 1841, and of Benecke, 8vo. Berol. 1843, which is purely critical. The editions of Van Staveren, 1773, of Tzschucke, 1804, of Bremi, 1820, contain every thing that the student requires, and perhaps no single edition will be found more serviceable than that of Lemaire, 8vo. Paris, 1820. The dissertation prefixed to the editions of Lambinus, Titze, Bardili, Daehne, Roth, and Benecke, will yield full information on the controversy. The translations into different languages are countless; the first into English is, "The Lives of illustrious Men, written in Latin by Cornelius Nepos, done into English by several [twelve] gentlemen of the University of Oxford, Lond. 1684," and frequently reprinted. Sir Matthew Hale had previously translated "The Life of Atticus, with moral and political Observations," 8vo. Lond. 1677. [W. R.]

NEPOS, JULIUS, the last emperor but one of the Western Empire, A. D. 474-475. He was the son of Nepotianus, by a sister of that Marcellinus who established a temporary independent principality in Illyricum, about the middle of the fifth century. [MARCELLINUS.] A law of the Codex of Justinian mentions a Nepotianus as general of the army in Dalmatia in A. D. 471, but it is doubtful whether this was the emperor's father or the emperor himself, as it is not clear whether the true reading of the Codex is Nepotianus or Nepos, and even the determination of the reading would not settle the point, as Theophanes (Chronographia, ad A. M. 5965) gives to the emperor himself the name of Nepotianus, and adds that he was a native of Dalmatia. It is not improbable that the family of Marcellinus preserved, after his death in A. D. 468, a portion of the power which he had possessed in Illyricum, and that this was the motive which induced the Eastern emperor Leo [Leo I.] to give to Nepos his niece (or, more accurately, the niece of his wife the empress Verina) in marriage, and to declare him, by his officer Domitianus, at Ravenna, Augustus (Jornandes incorrectly says Caesar) of the Western empire. (Jornand. de Regnor. Success.) The actual emperor, at the time when Nepos was thus exalted, was Glycerius [GLYCERIUS], who was regarded at Constantinople as an usurper. Nepos marched against his competitor, took him prisoner at Portus at the mouth of the Tiber, and obliged him to become a priest. These events took place, according to the more numerous and better authorities, in A. D. 474, but Theophanes, by contracting the reign of Glycerius to five months [GLYCERIUS], brings his deposition within the year 473. The elevation of Nepos is placed by the Chronicon of an anonymous author, published by Caspinianus (No. viii. in the Vetustior. Latinar. Chronica of Roncallius), on the 24th of June, which date, if correct, must refer to his victory over Glycerius, for his proclamation as emperor at Ravenna must have been antecedent to the death of Leo (which occurred in January 474), at least antecedent to the intelligence of Leo's death reaching Ravenna. If we suppose the proclamation of Nepos as emperor to have occurred in August 473, a supposition to which we see no objection, the date given by Theophanes, who, as a Byzantine, would compute the reign of Nepos from his accession de jure, may be reconciled with that of the Latin chroniclers, who date from the time of his becoming emperor de facto, and on this supposition the interval from August 473 to June 474 must have been occupied in preparing his armament or executing his march against Glycerius.

From hints in the letters of Sidonius Apollinarius (Ep. v. 16, viii. 7, ed. Sirmond) it may be gathered that Nepos had, before his accession, acquired some reputation both for warlike ability and for general goodness of character, and that during his brief reign his conduct was answerable to his previous character. But the condition of the empire was past remedy. The Visigoths, settled in Aquitania, were eagerly striving, under their king Euric, to expel the Romans from the territories of the Arverni, the modern Auvergne, the last part of the province which remained to its ancient masters, and which was bravely defended by its inhabitants under the conduct of Ecdicius (Jornandes calls him Decius), brother-in-law of Sidonius Apollinarius. The Goths besieged the town of Arverni or Clermont, in the summer of 474, but Epiphanius, bishop of Ticinum (Pavia), being sent by Nepos, concluded a peace (Ennod. Vita Epiphani.), which, however, Euric soon broke, and Nepos was obliged, in a second treaty, in which the quaestor Licinianus was his negotiator, to cede the disputed territory to its assailants. (Sirmond, Not. ad Sidon. Ep. iii. 1.) Tillemont makes the embassy of Licinianus unavailing, and considers that of Epiphanius to have been consequent on its failure; but we think Sirmond's view of the matter more consistent with the account of Ennodius.

These transactions with the Visigoths constitute almost the whole that is known of the reign of Nepos. He had recalled Ecdicius from Gaul, and had appointed Orestes to be magister militum of that diocese in his place. Orestes, assuming the command of the troops assembled at Rome, and, marching as if towards Gaul, came to Ravenna, where Nepos appears to have been, raised there the standard of revolt, and proclaimed his son Augustulus emperor. [AUGUSTULUS, ROMULUS.] Nepos fled into Dalmatia. His expulsion is fixed by the anonymous Chronicon already cited for the date of his accession, on the 28th of August 473, so that his actual reign was about fourteen months.

After his expulsion from Italy, he appears to have retained the Dalmatian territory, which he, or some of his family, had inherited from Marcellinus, and was still recognised at Constantinople and in the East as emperor of the West. Meanwhile, Orestes was defeated and killed, and Augustulus deposed, by Odoacer the Herulian [AUGUSTULUS; ORESTES; ODOACER], who sought the patronage of the Eastern emperor Zeno; but Zeno persisted in recognising the title of Nepos. (Malchus, apud Collectan. de Legation.) In A. D. 480 Nepos was killed near Salona, where he appears to have resided, by Viator and Ovida or Odiva, two of his own officers (Marcellin. Chronicon), probably at the instigation of his deposed predecessor Glycerius [GLYCERIUS], who held the bishopric of Salona. (Malchus, apud Phot. Bibl. Cod. 78.) Odiva or Ovida was vanquished and killed the next year, 481, by Odoacer who had invaded Dalmatia. (Cassiodor. Chron.) Tillemont thinks that the title of Nepos, till his death, was recognised by some of the cities of Gaul. The accounts of the life and reign of Nepos are brief and fragmentary. To the authorities cited in the course of the article may be added Marius Aventic. Chronicon; Chronici Prosperiani Auctarium, No. iv. apud Roncallium; Catalogus Imperatorum, No. xi. apud eundem; Jornandes, de Rebus Geticis; the Excerpta subjoined by Valesius to Amm. COIN OF JULIUS NEPOS.

NEPOS, LICINIUS, is frequently mentioned by the younger Pliny as an upright man and a severe praetor. (Plin. Ep. iv. 29, v. 4, 21, vi. 5.)

NEPOS, MARCIUS, expelled from the senate by Tiberius, A. D. 17, on account of his extravagance. (Tac. Ann. ii. 48.)

NEPOS, METELLUS. [METELLUS.]

NEPOS, P. VALERIUS, was one of the accusers of Milo, whom Cicero defended. (Ascon. in Mil. p. 35.)

xv.) Distinguished, if we can believe this complimentary address, as a grammarian, a rhetorician, a poet, and a philosopher, he died at the age of ninety, leaving behind him two children. [W. R.]

NEPOTIANUS, FLAVIUS POPILIUS, son of Eutropia, the half-sister of Constantine the Great [EUTROPIA; THEODORA], headed a rash enterprise whose object was to withstand the usurpation of Magnentius. Having collected a band of gladiators, runaway slaves, and similar desperadoes, he assumed the purple on the 3d of June 350, marched upon Rome, defeated and slew Anicius (or Anicetus), the new praetorian prefect, and made himself master of the city, which was deluged with blood by the excesses of contending factions. But after having enjoyed a confused shadow of royalty for twenty-eight days only, the adventurer was overpowered and put to death, along with his mother, by Marcellinus, who had been despatched by Magnentius to quell the insurrection, and many of the most noble and wealthy among the senators, by whom his pretensions had been admitted, shared a like fate. This Nepotianus is supposed to be the person who appears in the Fasti as the colleague of Faustinus for the year 336, and it has been conjectured that his father was the Nepotianus who held the office of consul in 301. [MAGNENTIUS; MARCELLINUS.] (Julian. Orat. i. ii.; Aur. Vict. de Cues. 42, Epit. 42; Eutrop. x. 6; Zosim. ii. 43; Chron. Alexandr.; Chron. Idat.) [W. R.]

COIN OF NEPOTIANUS.

NEPOTIANUS, JANUARIUS. [MAXIMUS, VALERIUS, p. 1002.]

NEPTUNUS, the chief marine divinity of the Romans. His name is probably connected with the verb valere or nato, and a contraction of navitus. As the early Romans were not a maritime people, and had not much to do with the sea, the marine divinities are not often mentioned, and we scarcely know with any certainty what day in the year was set apart as the festival of Neptunus, though it seems to have been the 23rd of July (X. Kal. Sext.). His temple stood in the Campus Martius, not far from the septa; but respecting the ceremonies of his festival we know nothing, except that the people formed tents (umbræ) of the branches of trees, in which they probably rejoiced in feasting and drinking (Varro, de Ling. Lat. vi. 19; Horat. Carm. iii. 28; Paul. Diac. p. 377, ed. Müller; Tertull. de Spect. 6; P. Vict. Reg. Urb. IX.; Dict. of Ant. s. v. Neptunalia). When a Roman commander sailed out with a fleet, he first offered up a sacrifice to Neptunus, which was thrown into the sea (Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 20; Liv. xxix. 27). In the Roman poets Neptunus is completely identified with the Greek Poseidon, and accordingly all the attributes of the latter are transferred by them to the former. [POSEIDON.] [L. S.]

NERATIUS MARCELLUS. [MARCELLUS.]

NERATIUS PRISCUS, a Roman jurist, who lived under Trajan and Hadrian. It is said that Trajan sometimes had the design of making Neratius his successor in place of Hadrian. (Spart. Hadr. 4.) He enjoyed a high reputation under Hadrian, and was one of his consiliarii. (Spart. Hadr. 18.) Neratius was consul, but the year is uncertain. The works of Neratius were fifteen books of Regulae, three books of Responsa, and seven books of Membranæ, from which there are sixty-four excerpts in the Digest. A fourth book of Epistolæ, and a treatise entitled Libri ex Plautio, are cited in the Digest (8. tit. 3. a. 5. § 1; 33. tit. 7. a. 12. § 35). He also wrote a book, De Nuptiis (Gell. iv. 4), if Neratius is the right reading there. It is a mistake to collect from a passage in the Digest (39. tit. 6. a. 43), that he wrote notes Ad Fulcinium. Paulus wrote Ad Neratium, in four books, from which there are excerpts in the Digest.

When Priscus is mentioned in the Digest, Javolenus Priscus is meant. Neratius wrote in a clear, condensed style, and is a good authority. He is often cited by subsequent jurists. (Grotius, Vitas Jurisconsult.; Zimmern, Geschichte des Röm. Rechts, vol. i. p. 324; Puchta, Cursum, &c. vol. i. p. 444, 1st ed.) [G. L.]

NEREIS (Nῆρῆς), or Nerine (Virg. Ecol. vii. 37), is a patronymic from Nereus, and applied to his daughters (Nereides, Nῆρῆίδες, and in Homer Nῆρηίδες) by Doris, who were regarded by the ancients as marine nymphs of the Mediterranean, in contra-distinction from the Naiades, or the nymphs of fresh water, and the Oceanides, or the nymphs of the great ocean (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 622). The number of the Nereides was fifty, but their names are not the same in all writers (Hom. Il. xviii. 39, &c.; Hes. Theog. 240, &c.; Pind. Isthm. vi. 8; Apollod. i. 2 § 7; Ov. Met. ii. 10, &c.; Virg. Aen. v. 825; Hygin. Fab. præf.) They are described as lovely divinities, and dwelling with their father at the bottom of the sea, and they were believed to be propitious to all sailors, and especially to the Argonauts (Hom. Il. xviii. 36, &c. 140; Apollod. i. 9. § 25; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 859, 930). They were worshipped in several parts of Greece, but more especially in sea-port towns, such as Cardamyle (Paus. iii. 26. § 5), and on the Isthmus of Corinth (ii. 1. § 7). The epithets given them by the poets refer partly to their beauty and partly to their place of abode. They were frequently represented in antiquity, in paintings, on gems, in relieves and statues, and commonly as youthful, beautiful, and naked maidens, and often grouped together with Tritons and other marine monsters, in which they resemble the Bacchic routs. Sometimes, also, they appear on gems as half maidens and half fish, like mermaids, the belief in whom is quite analogous to the belief of the ancients in the existence of the Nereides. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 150, tabb. 18, 19.) [L. S.]

NEREIS (Nῆρῆς), daughter of Pyrrhus I., king of Epeirus, was married, apparently long after her father's death, to Gelon, the son of Hieron, king of Syracuse, by whom she became the mother of Hieronymus. It appears that she outlived her niece Deidameia, and was thus the last surviving descendant of the royal house of the Acacidae. (Paus. vi. 12. § 3; Polyb. vii. 4. § 5; Justin. xxviii. 3 § 4; Vales. ad Diad. Erc. p. 668.) Her name is found in an inscription on the theatre of Syracuse, from which it appears that she bore the title of queen. (Raoul-Rochette, Mémoires de Numismatique et d'Antiquité, p. 73, 4ta. Paris, 1840.) Justin erroneously supposes her to be a sister of the Deidameia (or Laodameia, as he calls her) who was assassinated by Milon. That she was a daughter of the elder Pyrrhus, see Droysen, vol. ii. p. 275, note. [E. H. B.]

NEREIUS, a patronymic from Nereus, applied to his descendants, such as Phocus. (Ov. Met. vii. 685, xiii. 162; Virg. Aen. ix. 102.) [L. S.]

NEREUS (Nῆρῆς), a son of Pontus and Gaia and husband of Doris, by whom he became the father of the 50 Nereides. He is described as the wise and unerring old man of the sea, at the bottom of which he dwelt (Hom. Il. xviii. 141, Od. xxiv. 58; Hes. Theog. 233, &c.; Apollod. i. 2. § 6). His empire is the Mediterranean or more particularly the Aegean sea, whence he is sometimes called the Aegean (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 772; Stat. Theb. viii. 478). He was believed, like other marine divinities, to have the power of prophesying the future and of appearing to mortals in different shapes, and in the story of Heracles he acts a prominent part, just as Proteus in the story of Odysseus, and Glaucus in that of the Argonauts (Apollod. ii. 5. § 11; Horat. Carm. i. 15). Virgil (Aen. ii. 418) mentions the trident as his attribute, and the epithets given him by the poets refer to his old age, his kindliness, and his trustworthy knowledge of the future. In works of art, Nereus, like other sea-gods, is represented with pointed sea-weeds taking the place of hair in the eyebrows, the chin, and the breast. (Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 150, &c.)

There is another mythical personage of the name of Nereus. (Apollod. i. 7. § 4.) [L. S.]

NERIO, NERIENE, or NERIENIS, wife of the Roman god Mars. Very little is known about her, and the ancients themselves were doubtful as to the correct form of her name, though Gellius (xiii. 22) prefers Nerio, which is analogous with Anio. The name is said to be of Sabine origin, and to be synonymous with virtus or fortitudo. (Plant. Truc. ii. 6. 24; Martian. Cap. 3; L. Lydus, de Mens. iv. 42.) [L. S.]

NE'RITUS (Nῆριτος), a son of Pteroleus in Ithaca, from whom mount Neriton, in the west of Ithaca, was believed to have derived its name. (Hom. Od. ix. 22, xvii. 207; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1815.) [L. S.]

NERIUS, CN., of the Papinian tribe, accused P. Sestius of bribery in B. C. 56 (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 3. § 5). This Cn. NeriUS may be the same as the NeriUS who was quaestor in B. C. 49, as we learn from some interesting coins, of which a specimen is annexed. The obverse represents the head of Saturn, with NERI Q. VRE. (i. e. quaestor urbanus), and the reverse some military standards, with L. LXXV. C. MAR(C). COS. (i. e. L. Lentulus and C. Marcellus, consuls). The head of Saturn on the coin has evident reference to the temple of that deity, the aerarium at Rome, of which the quaestors had the charge, and where likewise the standards were kept, to which fact the reverse alludes (comp. Dict. of Ant. s. v. Aerarium). The names of the consuls prove both that the coin was struck in B. C. 49, and that NeriUS belonged to their party; and it is not improbable that the head of Saturn was employed as an emblem in allusion to the treasury having been broken open by Caesar, and with a without a train, but the popular opinion made up for his diminished honour. This great battle, which probably saved Rome, gave a lustre to the name of Nero, and consecrated it among the recollections of the Romans.

COIN OF NERIUS.

NERO, was a cognomen of the Claudia Gens, which is said to signify, in the Sabine tongue "fortis ac strenuus." (Sueton. Tib. Nero, 1; and the remarks of Gellius, xiii. 22.)

1. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO was one of the four sons of App. Claudius Caecus, censor B. C. 312. Nothing is known of him except that he was the paternal ancestor of the emperor Tib. Claudius Nero Caesar. (Sueton. Ner. 3.)

2. C. CLAUDIUS NERO (Liv. xxiv. 17), in the fourth consulship of Q. Fabius Maximus, and the third of M. Marcellus, a. c. 214, commanded a body of cavalry under the consul Marcellus. He was instructed to attack the rear of Hannibal's army near Nola, but he either lost his way or had not time to come up, and he was not present in the engagement in which the consul defeated Hannibal, for which he was severely rated by Marcellus. He is evidently the C. Claudius Nero who was praetor in the year but one after (Liv. xxv. 1, 2), and was stationed at Suessula, whence he was summoned by the consuls Q. Fulvius III. and Appius Claudius (b. c. 212) to assist at the siege of Capua. (Liv. xxv. 22, xxv. 5.) Nero was sent in the same year into Spain (Liv. xxvi. 17; Appian, Hispan. 17) with a force to oppose Hasdrubal. He landed at Tarraco (Tarragona), but Hasdrubal eluded his attack, and P. Cornelius Scipio was sent to command in Spain. Nero commanded as legatus (Liv. xxvii. 14) under Marcellus a. c. 209, and the battle in which Hannibal was defeated near Canusium (Canosa). In b. c. 207, Nero was consul with M. Livius II. Nero marched into the south of Italy against Hannibal, whom he defeated and pursued. In the mean time Hasdrubal, who was in the north of Italy, sent messengers to Hannibal, who was retreating to Metapontum, followed by Nero. The messengers were taken by the Romans, and the contents of their despatches being read, Nero determined not to confine himself to the limits of his command, but to march against Hasdrubal, who was intending to effect a junction with Hannibal in Umbria. He communicated his design to the Roman senate, and instructed them how to act. Nero joined his colleague M. Livius in Picenum. A sanguinary battle was fought with Hasdrubal on the river Metaurum, in which Hasdrubal fell: in no one battle in the campaign with Hannibal was the slaughter so great. Nero returned to his camp in the south, taking with him the head of Hasdrubal, which he ordered to be thrown before the posts of Hannibal, and he sent him two of his captives to tell him what had befallen his brother and his army. (Liv. xxvii. 41–51; Appian, Annibal. 52, &c.) Nero shared in the triumph of his colleague, but as the battle was fought in his colleague's province, Livius rode in a chariot drawn by four horses followed by his soldiers; Nero rode on horseback,

Quid debeas, o Roma, Neronibus,
Testis Metaurum flumen et Haadrubal
Devictus.                      Horat. Carm. iv. 4.

In B.C. 201, Nero and others were sent on a mission to Ptolemaeus, king of Egypt, to announce the defeat of Hannibal, thank the king for his fidelity to the Romans, and pray for his support if they should be compelled to go to war with Philippus, king of Macedonia.

The relationship of Nero to the other Claudii does not appear. He was censor B. C. 204, with M. Livius (Liv. xxix. 37).

3. C. CLAUDIUS NERO was praetor B.C. 181, and had the province of Sicily (Liv. xl. 18). He may be the son of No. 2.

4. APP. CLAUDIUS NERO was praetor B. C. 195 (Liv. xxxiii. 43), with Hispania Ulterior as his province. Nothing is recorded of his operations in Spain, and it is doubtful if he went there, for the fear of a Spanish war soon subsided. In B. C. 189, he was one of ten commissioners (legati) who were sent into Asia to settle affairs. (Liv. xxvii. 55.)

5. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO was praetor B.C. 204 (Liv. xxix. 11), and had Sardinia for his province. He may have been the son of No. 2. In A.C. 202 he was consul with M. Servilius Geminus (Liv. xxx. 26), and he obtained as his province Africa, where he was to have the command against Hannibal conjointly with P. Cornelius Scipio. But he was not present at the battle of Zama. A violent storm attacked his fleet soon after he set out, and he put in at Populonii. He thence passed on to Ilva (Elba), and to Corsica. In his passage to Sardinia his ships suffered still more, and he finally put into Carales (Cagliari) in Sardinia, where he was obliged to winter, and whence he returned to Rome in a private capacity, his year of office having expired. (Liv. xxx. 39.)

6. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO, praetor, B. C. 178, had the Peregrina Jurisdicatio, but he was sent to Pisae with a military command to take care of the province of M. Junius the consul, who was sent into Gallia to raise troops (Liv. xli. 98), and his command there was extended, (Liv. xlii. 18.) In B. C. 172 he was sent on a mission into Asia. (Liv. xlii. 19.) Tib. Claudius was praetor again in B. C. 165, with Sicily for his province. (Liv. cxv. 16.)

7. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO served under Cn. Pompeius Magnus in the war against the pirates, B. c. 67. (Florus iii. 6; Appian, Mithridat. 95.) He is probably the Tib. Nero mentioned by Sallust (Bell. Cat. 50) and by Appian (B. C. ii. 5), who recommended that the members of the conspiracy of Catiline, who had been seized, should be kept confined till Catiline was put down, and they knew the exact state of the facts.

8. TIB. CLAUDIUS NERO, the father of the emperor Tiberius, was probably the son of No. 7. He was a descendant of Tib. Nero [see above, No. 1], the son of App. Claudius Caeus. He served as quaestor under C. Julius Caesar (b. c. 48) in the Alexandrine war (B. Al. 25; Dion Cass. xlii. 40), and commanded a fleet which defeated the Egyptian fleet at the Canopic mouth of the Nile. He was rewarded for his services in Caesar's cause by being made a pontifex in the place of P. Cornelius Scipio, and was employed in establishing colonies in Gallia north of the Alps, among which Narbo (Narbonne) and Arelate (Arles) are mentioned; but the colony to Narbo was a supplementum, for it was settled A. D. 116. On the assassination of Caesar he went so far as to propose that the assassins should be rewarded. He was praetor probably in B. C. 42. On the quarrels breaking out among the triumviri he fled to Perusia and joined the consul L. Antonius, who was besieged there B. C. 41. In this year his eldest son Tiberius, the future emperor, was born: his mother was Livia Drusilla, the daughter of Livius Drusus. When Perusia surrendered in the following year, Nero effected his escape to Praeneste and thence to Naples, and after having made an unsuccessful attempt to arm the slaves by promising them their freedom, he passed over to Sext. Pompeius in Sicily (comp. Suet. Claud. 4, and Dion Cass. xlviii. 15). His wife and child, scarcely two years old, accompanied Nero in his flight. At Naples, while they were secretly trying to get a ship, they were nearly betrayed by the cries of the child. Nero, not liking the reception that he met with from Pompeius, passed over to M. Antonius in Achaea, and, on a reconciliation being effected between M. Antonius and Octavianus at the close of the year (B. C. 40), he returned with his wife to Rome. Livia, who possessed great beauty, excited the passion of Octavianus, to whom she was surrendered by her husband, being then six months gone with child of her second son Drusus. Nero gave Livia away as a father would his daughter (B. C. 38), but he must have formally divorced her first. The old and the new husband and the wife sat down together to the marriage entertainment. When Drusus was born, Caesar sent the boy to his father, for, being begotten during Nero's marriage with Livia, Nero was his lawful father. Caesar, who was a man of great method, made an entry in his memorandum-book, to the effect "that Caesar sent to Nero his father the child that was born of Livia his wife." (Dion Cass. xlviii. 44; Tacit. Annal. i. 10, v. 1.) Nero died shortly after, and left Caesar the tutor of his two sons. If Tiberius was born in B. C. 42 (see Clinton, Fasti, B. C. 42), Nero died in B. C. 34 or 33, for Tiberius, his son, pronounced his funeral oration in front of the Rostra, when he was nine years old. [G. L.]

NERO, Roman emperor, A. D. 54—68. The emperor Nero was the son of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus Caesar, and sister of Caligula. Nero's original name was L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, but after the marriage of his mother with her uncle, the emperor Claudius, he was adopted by Claudius A. D. 50, and was called Nero Claudius Caesar Drusus Germanicus. Claudius had a son, Britannicus, who was three or four years younger than Nero.

Nero was born at Antium, a favourite residence of many of the Roman families, on the coast of Latium on the 15th of December A. D. 37 (comp. Suet. Ner. c. 6, ed. Burmann; Tacit. Ann. xii. 25, ed. Oberlin, and the notes in both). Shortly after his adoption by Claudius, Nero being then sixteen years of age, married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius and Messallina. Among his early instructors was Seneca. Nero had some talent and taste. He was fond of the arts, and made verses; but he was indolent and given to pleasure, and had no inclination for laborious studies. His character, which was naturally weak, was made worse by his education; and when he was in the possession of power he showed what a man may become who has not been subjected to a severe discipline, and who in a private station might be no worse than others who are rich and idle.

On the death of Claudius, A. D. 54, Agrippina, who had always designed her son to succeed to the power of the Caesars, kept the emperor's death secret for a while. All at once the gates of the palace were opened, and Nero was presented to the guards by Afranius Burrhus, praefectus praetorio, who announced Nero to them as their master. Some of them, it is said, asked where was Britannicus; but there was no effort made to proclaim Britannicus, and Nero being carried to the praetorian camp, was saluted as emperor by the soldiers, and promised them the usual donation. The senate confirmed the decision of the soldiers, and the provinces quietly received Nero as the new emperor. (Tacit. Ann. xii. 69; Dion Cass. lxi. 1, &c.)

Nero showed at the commencement that he had not all the acquirements which the Romans had been accustomed to see in their emperors. His public addresses were written by Seneca, for Nero was deficient in one of the great accomplishments of a Roman, oratory. The beginning of his reign was no worse than might be expected in an ill-educated youth of seventeen; and the senate were allowed to make some regulations which were supposed to be useful (Tac. Ann. xiii. 4). The affairs of the East required attention. The Leae Armenia was given to Aristobulus, a Jew, and son of Herodes, king of Chalcia. Sophene was given to Sohemus.

The follies and crimes of Nero were owing to his own feeble character and the temper of his mother. This ambitious woman wished to govern in the name of her son, and she received all the external marks of respect which were due to one who possessed sovereign power. Seneca and Burrhus exerted their influence with Nero to oppose her designs, and thus a contest commenced which must end in the destruction of Agrippina or her opponents. Nero began to indulge his licentious inclinations without restraint, and one of his boon companions was an accomplished debauchee, Otho, who afterwards held the imperial power for a few months. Nero assumed the consulship A. D. 55, with L. Antistius Vetus for his colleague. The jealousy between him and his mother soon broke out into a quarrel, and Agrippina threatened to join Britannicus and raise him to his father's place. Nero's fears drove him to commit a crime which at once stamped his character and took away all hopes of his future life. Britannicus, who was just going to complete his fourteenth year, was poisoned by the emperor's order, at an entertainment where Agrippina and Octavia were present. Nero showed his temper towards his mother by depriving her of her Roman and German guard; but an appearance of reconciliation was brought about by the bold demeanour of Agrippina against some of her accusers, whom Nero punished. (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 19—22.)

In A. D. 57 Nero was consul for the second time with L. Calpurnius Piso as his colleague, and in A. D. 58, for the third time with Valerius Messalla. Nero, who had always shown an aversion to his wife Octavia, was now captivated with the beauty of Poppaea Sabina, the wife of his companion Otho, a woman notorious for her dissolute conduct. Otho was got out of the way by being made governor of Lusitania, where he acquired some credit, and passed the ten remaining years of Nero's life.

The affairs of Armenia, which had been seized by the Parthians, occupied the Romans from the beginning of Nero's reign, and Domitius Corbulo was sent there to conduct the war. This vigorous commander re-established discipline among the troops. The chief struggle commenced A. D. 58, with Tiridates, who had been made king of Armenia by the Parthian king Vologeses, who was his brother. Corbulo was ambitious to make the Roman arms again triumphant in the countries in which L. Lucullus and Cn. Pompeius had once acquired military fame. After some attempt at negotiation, Corbulo prosecuted the war with great activity. He took and destroyed Artaxata, the capital of Armenia; and afterwards, marching to the town of Tigranocerta, which the Romans had formerly captured under Lucullus, he took this strong place also, or, according to other accounts, it surrendered like Artaxata (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 41, xiv. 24). The capture of Tigranocerta took place A. D. 60, and the Romans were now complete masters of Armenia. The affairs of the Rhenish frontier were tolerably quiet in the early part of Nero's reign. The Roman soldiers, under Paullinus Pompeius on the lower Rhine, were employed in finishing the embankments which Drusus had begun sixty-three years before for checking the waters of the river; and L. Vetus formed the noble design of uniting the Arar (Saône) and Moselle by a canal, and thus connecting the Mediterranean and the German Ocean by an uninterrupted water communication, through the Rhone and the Rhine. But the mean jealousy of Aelius Gracilis, the legatus of Belgica, frustrated this design.

Nero's passion for Poppaea was probably the immediate cause of his mother's death. Poppaea aspired to marry the emperor, but she had no hopes of succeeding in her design while Agrippina lived, and accordingly she used all her arts to urge Nero to remove out of the way a woman who kept him in tutelage and probably aimed at his ruin. That Agrippina might have attempted to destroy her son, or at least to give the imperial power to some new husband of her choice, is probable enough; and it is a significant fact, that we find her own head and that of Nero on the same face of a medal, and that at the beginning of his reign she was hardly prevented from assuming the discharge of the imperial functions (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 5). After an unsuccessful attempt to cause her death in a vessel near Baiae, she was assassinated by Nero's order (A. D. 59), with the approbation at least of Seneca and Burrhus, who saw that the time was come for the destruction either of the mother or the son (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 7). The death of Agrippina was communicated to the senate by a letter which Seneca drew up, and this servile body, with the exception of Thrasea Pætus, returned their congratulations to the emperor, who shortly after returned to Rome. But though he was well received, he felt the punishment of his guilty conscience, and said that he was haunted by his mother's spectre (Suet. Ner. 34). A great eclipse of the sun happened during the sacrifices which were made for the death of Agrippina, and there were other signs which superstition interpreted as tokens of the anger of the gods (Dion Cass. lxi. 16, ed. Reimarus, and the note). Nero drowned his reflections in fresh riot, in which he was encouraged by a band of flatterers. One of his great passions was chariot-driving, and he was ambitious to gain credit as a musician, and actually appeared as a performer on the theatre. At the same time his extravagance was exhausting the finances, and preparing the way for his ruin, though unfortunately it was still deferred for some years.

In A. D. 60, Nero was consul for the fourth time with C. Cornelius Lentulus for his colleague. There was a comet in this year, which then, as in more recent times, was considered to portend some great change. In this year Tigranes was settled as king of Armenia, and the Roman commander Corbulo, leaving some soldiers to protect him, retired to his province of Syria. The fear of Nero now induced him to urge Rubellius Plautus, who belonged to the family of the Caesars through his mother Julia, the daughter of Drusus, to leave Rome. Plautus was a man of good character, and Nero considered him a dangerous rival. He retired to Asia, where he was put to death two years after by Nero's order (Tacit. Ann. xiv. 22; Dion Cass. lxxii. 14). In A. D. 61, the great rising in Britain under Boadicea took place, which was put down by the ability and vigour of the Roman commander Suetonius Paulinus.

The praetor Antistius was charged with writing scandalous verses against Nero, and he was tried under the law of majestas, and only saved by Thrasea from being condemned to death by the senate. Antistius was banished, and his property made public. Fabricius Veiento, who had written freely against the senate and the priests, was convicted and banished from Italy. His writings were ordered to be burnt, the consequence of which was they were eagerly sought after and read: when they were no longer forbidden they were soon forgotten, as Tacitus remarks (Ann. xiv. 49), and his remark has much practical wisdom in it. The death of Burrhus (A. D. 62) was a calamity to the state. Nero placed in command of the praetorian troops, Fennius Rufus and Sofonius Tigellinus: Rufus was an honest inactive man; Tigellinus was a villain, whose name has been rendered infamous by the crimes to which he urged his master, and those which he committed himself. Seneca, who saw his credit going, wisely asked leave to retire; and the philosopher, who could not approve of all Nero's excesses, though his own moral character is at least doubtful, left his old pupil to follow his own way and the counsels of the worst men in Rome.

Nero was now more at liberty. In order that he might marry Poppaea, he divorced his wife Octavia, on the alleged ground of sterility, and in eighteen days he married Poppaea. Not satisfied with putting away his wife, he was instigated by Poppaea to charge her with adultery, for which there was not the slightest ground, and she was banished to the little island of Pandataria, where she was shortly after put to death. According to Tacitus (Ann. xiv. 64) Octavia was only in her twentieth year; her unhappy life and her untimely death were the subject of general commiseration.

The affairs of Armenia (A. D. 62) were still in a troubled state, and the accounts of the historians of the period are not very clear. The Parthians again invaded Armenia, and Tiridates attempted to recover it from Tigranes. It seems to have been agreed between Vologeses and Corbulo that Tiridates should have Armenia, and that hostilities should cease. But the ambassadors whom Vologeses sent to Rome, returned without accomplishing the object of their mission, and the war against the Parthians in Armenia was renewed under L. Cæsenius Pactus. But the incompetence of the general caused the ruin of the enterprise, and he was forced to sue for terms to Vologeses, and to consent to evacuate Armenia (Tacit. Ann. xv. 16; Dion Cass. lxi. 21). In the following year Corbulo came to terms with Tiridates, who did homage to the portrait of Nero in the presence of the Roman commander (Tacit. Ann. xv. 30), and promised that he would go to Rome, as soon as he could prepare for his journey, to ask the throne of Armenia from the Roman emperor. The town of Pompeii in Campania was nearly destroyed in this year by an earthquake. Poppæa gave birth at Antium to a daughter, who received the title of Augusta, which was also given to the mother. The joy of Nero was unbounded, but the child died before it was four months old.

The origin of the dreadful conflagration at Rome (A. D. 64) is uncertain. It is hardly credible that the city was fired by Nero's order, though Dion and Suetonius both attest the fact, but these writers are always ready to believe a scandalous tale. Tacitus (Ann. xv. 38) leaves the matter doubtful. The fire originated in that part of the circus which is contiguous to the Caelian and Palatine hills, and of the fourteen regiones of Rome three were totally destroyed, and in seven others only a few half-burnt houses remained. A prodigious quantity of property and valuable works of art were burnt, and many lives were lost. The emperor set about rebuilding the city on an improved plan, with wider streets, though it is doubtful if the salubrity of Rome was improved by widening the streets and making the houses lower, for there was less protection against the heat. Nero found money for his purposes by acts of oppression and violence, and even the temples were robbed of their wealth. With these means he began to erect his sumptuous golden palace, on a scale of magnitude and splendour which almost surpasses belief. The vestibule contained a colossal statue of himself one hundred and twenty feet high (Suet. Ner. c. 31; Martial, Spect. Ep. 2). The odium of the conflagration which the emperor could not remove from himself, he tried to throw on the Christians, who were then numerous in Rome, and many of them were put to a cruel death (Tacit. Ann. xv. 44, and the note of Lipsius).

The tyranny of Nero at last (A. D. 65) led to the organisation of a formidable conspiracy against him, which was discovered by Milichus, a freedman of Flavius Scevinus, a senator and one of the conspirators. The discovery was followed by many executions. C. Calpurnius Piso was put to death, and the poet Lucan, a vile flatterer of Nero (Pharsal. i. 33, &c.), had the favour of being allowed to open his veins. Plautius Lateranus was hurried to death without having time allowed to embrace his children. It is not certain if Seneca was privy to the conspiracy: Dion, of course, says that he was.

It is probable that some proposals might have been made to him by the conspirators, and it is probable that he declined to join them. However this may be, the time was come for Nero to get rid of his old master, and, with his counsellors Poppæa and Tigellinus near him, he sent Seneca orders to die. The philosopher opened his veins, and, after long suffering, he was taken into a bath or vapour room, which stifled him. It seems that Seneca died about the time when the conspiracy was discovered; Lucan and others died after him. The senate was assembled, as if they were going to hear the results of a successful war, and Tigellinus was rewarded with the triumphal ornaments. (Tacit. Ann. xv. 72.)

The death of Poppæa came next. Her brutal husband, in a fit of passion, kicked her when she was with child, and she died of the blow. Her body was not burnt, but embalmed and placed in the sepulchre of the Julii. Nero now proposed to marry Antonia, the daughter of the emperor Claudius and his sister by adoption, but she refused the honour, and was consequently put to death. Nero, however, did marry Statilia Messallina, the widow of Vestinus, whom he put to death, because he had married Messallina, with whom Nero had cohabited.

The catalogue of the crimes of Nero makes the greater part of his life, but his crimes show the character of the man and of the times, and to what a state of abject degradation the Roman senate was reduced, for the senate was made the instrument of murder. The jurist C. Cassius Longinus was exiled to Sardinia. L. Janius Silianus Torquatus, a man of merit, L. Antistius Vetus, his mother-in-law Sextia, and his daughter Pollutia, the wife of Rubellius Plautus, were all sacrificed. Virtue in any form was the object of Nero's fear. For some reason or caprice the emperor gave a large sum, which we may assume was public money, to rebuild Lugdunum (Lyon), which had suffered by a fire; and the town showed its gratitude, by espousing his cause when he was deserted by every body. The grant, however, was made some years after the conflagration.

In the reign of Nero (A. D. 66) Apollonius of Tyana visited Rome, and, though he was accused of magic, he had the good luck to escape. Nero now became jealous of the philosophers, and Musonius Rufus, a Roman eque and a stoic philosopher, was banished by the emperor. The fragment of the sixteenth book of the Annals of Tacitus concludes with the account of the death of Annæus Mella, the father of Lucan, and C. Petronia, a man of pleasure, but probably not the author of the Satyrica. Nero, as Tacitus says (Ann. xvi. 21), now attacked virtue itself in the persons of Thrasea Paetus and Barea Soranus. The crime of Thrasea was his virtue: the charge against him was that he kept away from the senate, and by his absence condemned the proceedings of that body. The senate condemned him to die, but he had the choice of the mode of death, and he opened his veins. Soranus was rich, and that made part of his crime. He was condemned with his young daughter Servilia, who had without his knowledge consulted the fortune-tellers to know what would be her father's fate. (Tacit. Ann. xvi. 30, &c.) With the death of Thrasea, who, as the blood flowed from his veins, declared it to be a libation to Jupiter the Liberator, the fragment of the sixteenth book of Tacitus ends, and the fate of the despicable tyrant has not been transmitted to us in the words of the indignant historian, who himself is compelled to apologise for his tedious record of crimes and bloodshed. (Tacit. Ann. xvi. 16.)

The time chosen for the death of Thrasea and Soranus was that when Tiridates was preparing to make his entry into Rome. The Armenian king came by land to Rome with his wife and his children. The provinces that he passed through had to support the expense of his numerous train. He entered Italy from Illyricum, and was received by Nero at Naples, before whom he fell on his knees, and acknowledged him as his lord. Tiridates was conducted to Rome, where he humbled himself before Nero in the theatre, who gave him the crown of Armenia and permission to rebuild Artaxata (Dion Cass. lxiii. 6). Tiridates went home by way of Brundisium. Vologeses was invited to Rome by Nero to go through the same ceremony, but he declined the honour, and suggested that if Nero wished to see him he should come to Asia. (Dion Cass. lxiii. 7.)

Nero formed some plans for extending the empire, and various expeditions were talked of, but Nero was not a soldier: he had not even that Roman virtue. In the latter part of this year he visited Achæa with a great train, to show his skill to the Greeks as a musician and charioteer, and to receive the honours which were liberally bestowed upon him. While Nero was in Achæa, Cestius Gallus, the governor of Syria, sent him intelligence of his defeat by the Jews, who were in arms; on which Nero sent Vespasian, the future emperor, to carry on the war against them, and Mucianus to take the administration of Syria.

In the year A. D. 67 Nero was present at the Olympic games, which had been deferred from the year 65 in order that so distinguished a person might be present. To commemorate his visit he declared all Achæa to be free, which was publicly proclaimed at Corinth on the day of the celebration of the Isthmian games. But the Greeks paid dear for what they got, by the price of every thing being raised in consequence of Nero's visit; and they witnessed one of his acts of cruelty, in putting to death, at the Isthmian games, a singer whose voice drowned that of the imperial performer. (Lucian, Nero, vol. iii. p. 642, ed. Hemst.) Nero also paid a visit to Delphi, and got a kind of indirect promise of a long life; but other matters reported about this visit are somewhat confusedly told by different authorities. He also designed a canal across the Isthmus, which was commenced with great parade, and Nero himself first struck the ground with a golden spade. The works were carried on vigorously for a time, but were suspended by his own orders. While Nero was in Greece he summoned Corbulo there in an affectionate letter, but, on the old soldier arriving at Cenchreæ, Nero sent orders to put him to death, which Corbulo anticipated by stabbing himself. Thus perished a man who had served the empire and the emperor faithfully, and whose military talent and integrity entitled him to the name of a genuine Roman. (Dion. lxiii. 17.)

Nero had left Helius a freedman in the administration of Rome, with full power to do as he pleased, which power he abused. Helius, foreseeing the mischief that was preparing for his master, wrote to request him to return to Rome, and finally he went to Greece to urge his departure. Nero left Greece probably in the autumn of A. D. 67. He entered Rome in triumph, as befitting an Olympic victor, through a breach made in the walls, riding in the car of Augustus, with a musician at his side; and he displayed the numerous crowns that he had received in his Grecian visit. Music, chariot driving, and the like amusements, occupied this foolish man until, as Tillemont naïvely remarks, the rising in Spain and Gaul gave him other occupation.

Silius Italicus, the poet, and Galerius Trachalus were consuls A. D. 68, the last year of Nero's life. The storm that had long been preparing broke out in Gaul, where Julius Vindex, the governor of Celtica, called the people together, and, pointing out their grievances, and portraying the despicable character of Nero, urged them to revolt. Vindex was soon at the head of a large army, and he wrote to Galba, who was governor of Hispania Tarraconensis, to offer his assistance in raising him to the imperial power. Galba at the same time learned that Nero had sent orders to put him to death, on which he made a public harangue against the crimes of Nero, and was proclaimed emperor; but he only assumed the title of legatus of the senate and the Roman people. Nero was at Naples when he heard of the rising in Gaul, which gave him little concern, and he went on with his ordinary amusements. At last he came to Rome, where he heard of the insurrection of Galba, which threw him into a violent fit of passion and alarm, but he had neither ability nor courage to organise any effectual means of resistance. The senate declared Galba an enemy of the state; and Nero, for some reason or other, deprived the two consuls of their office, and made himself sole consul. This was his fifth consulate. Possibly he had some vague idea of putting himself more distinctly at the head of affairs with the title of sole consul, which Cn. Pompeius had once enjoyed before him and C. Julius Caesar.

Verginius Rufus, governor in Upper Germany, a man of ability and integrity, was not favourable to the pretensions of Galba. Rufus first marched against Vindex, and was supported by those parts of Gaul which bordered on the Rhine; the town of Lyon, with others, declared against Vindex. Verginius laid siege to Vesontio (Besançon), and Vindex came to relieve it. The two generals had a conference, and appear to have come to some agreement; but, as Vindex was going to enter the town, the soldiers of Verginius, thinking that he was about to attack them, fell on the troops of Vindex. The whole affair is very confused; but the fact that Vindex perished, or killed himself, is certain. The soldiers now destroyed the statues of Nero, and proclaimed Verginius as Augustus; but he steadily refused the honour, and declared that he would submit to the orders of the senate. The death of Vindex discouraged Galba, who was beginning to lose all hopes, when he received intelligence from Rome that he was recognised as the successor of Nero.

A famine at Rome, and the exertion that Nero was making to raise money, hastened his ruin. Nymphidius Sabinus, who was now præfectus prætorio with Tigellinus, taking advantage of a rumour that Nero was going to fly to Egypt, persuaded the troops to proclaim Galba. Nero was immediately deserted. He escaped from the palace at night with a few freedmen, and made his way to a house about four miles from Rome, which belonged to Phaon, one of his freedmen, where he passed the night and part of the following day in a state of agonising terror. His hiding-place being known, a centurion with some soldiers was sent to seize him. Though a coward, Nero thought a voluntary death better than the indignities which he knew were preparing for him; and, after some irresolution, and with the aid of his secretary Epaphroditus, he gave himself a mortal wound when he heard the trampling of the horses on which his pursuers were mounted. The centurion on entering attempted to stop the flow of blood, but Nero saying, "It is too late. Is this your fidelity?" expired with a horrid stare.

The body of Nero received funeral honours suitable to his rank, and his ashes were placed in the sepulchre of the Domitii by two of his nurses and his concubine Acte, who had won Nero's affections from his wife Octavia at the beginning of his reign. (Tac. Ann. xiii. 12; Suet. Ner. 50.) Suetonius, after his manner, gives a description of Nero's person, which is not very flattering: the "cervix obesa" of Suetonius is a characteristic of Nero's bust. (Lib. of Entertaining Knowledge, Townley Gallery, vol. ii. p. 28.)

In his youth Nero was instructed in all the liberal knowledge of the time except philosophy; and he was turned from the study of the old Roman orators by his master Seneca. Accordingly, he applied himself to poetry, and Suetonius says that his verses were not made for him, as some suppose, for the biographer had seen and examined some of Nero's writing-tablets and small books, in which the writing was in his own hand, with many erasures and cancellings and interlineations. He had also skill in painting and modelling. Though profuse and fond of pomp and splendour, Nero had apparently some taste. The Apollo Belvedere and the Fighting Gladiator, as it is called, by Agassias, were found in the ruins of a villa at Antium, which is conjectured to have belonged to Nero. (See Thiersch, Ueber die Epochen der Bildenden Kunst, &c. p. 312, 2d ed.)

Nero's progress in crime is easily traced, and the lesson is worth reading. Without a good education, and with no talent for his high station, he was placed in a position of danger from the first. He was sensual, and fond of idle display, and then he became greedy of money to satisfy his expenses; he was timid, and by consequence he became cruel when he anticipated danger; and, like other murderers, his first crime, the poisoning of Britannicus, made him capable of another. But, contemptible and cruel as he was, there are many persons who, in the same situation, might run the same guilty career. He was only in his thirty-first year when he died, and he had held the supreme power for thirteen years and eight months. He was the last of the descendants of Julia, the sister of the dictator Caesar.

There were a few writers in the time of Nero who have been preserved—Petrus the satirist, Lucan, the author of the Pharsalia, and Seneca, the preceptor of Nero. The jurist, C. Cassius Longinus, after whom the Sabiniani were sometimes called Cassiani, and Nerva, the father of the emperor Nerva, lived under Nero. (Tac. Ann. xiii.—xvi.; Suet. Ner.; Dion Cass. lxi.—lxiii. ed. Reimarus. All the authorities for the facts of Nero's life are collected by Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. i.) [G. L.]

COIN OF THE EMPEROR NERO.

NERO, the eldest son of Germanicus and Agrippina, was a youth of about twelve years of age at the death of his father in A. D. 19. In the following year (A. D. 20) he was commended to the favour of the senate by the emperor Tiberius, who went through the form of requesting that body to allow Nero to become a candidate for the quaestorship five years before the legal age. He likewise had the dignity of pontiff conferred upon him, and about the same time was married to Julia, the daughter of Drusus, who was the son of the emperor Tiberius. Nero had been betrothed in the lifetime of his father to the daughter of Silanus (Tac. Ann. ii. 43), but it appears that this marriage never took effect. By the death of Drusus, the son of Tiberius, who was poisoned at the instigation of Sejanus in A. D. 23, Nero became the heir to the imperial throne; and as Sejanus had compassed the death of Drusus, in order that he might succeed Tiberius, the same motives led him to plan the death of Nero, as well as of his younger brother Drusus. And this he found no difficulty in accomplishing, as the jealous temper of Tiberius had already become alarmed at the marks of public favour which were exhibited to Nero and Drusus as the sons of Germanicus, and he had expressed his displeasure in the senate, in A. D. 24, at the public prayers which had been offered for their health. Spies were placed about Nero, and every word and action of the unhappy young prince were eagerly caught up, misinterpreted and misrepresented, and then reported to the emperor. His wife was also entered in the interests of Sejanus, since her mother was the mistress of the all-powerful minister; and his brother Drusus, who was of an unamiable disposition, and who did not stand so high in the favour of their mother Agrippina, was readily induced to second the designs of Sejanus, in hopes that the death of Nero would secure him the succession to the throne. At length, in A. D. 29, Tiberius sent a letter to the senate in which he accused Agrippina and Nero in the bitterest terms, but was unable to convict them of any attempt at rebellion; the haughtiness of the former and the licentiousness of the latter were the chief crimes laid to their charge. The people, who loved Agrippina and hallowed the memory of Germanicus, surrounded the senate-house, exclaiming that the letter was a forgery. On the first day the senate came to no resolution on the matter, and Tiberius found it necessary to repeat his charges. The obsequious body dared no longer resist; and the fate of Agrippina and Nero was sealed. Nero was declared an enemy of the state, was removed to the island of Pontia, and shortly afterwards was there starved to death. According to some accounts he put an end to his own life, when the executioner appeared before him with the instruments of death. (Tac. Ann. iii. 29, iv. 8, 17, 59, 60, 67, v. 3, 4; Suet. Tib. 24, Cal. 7; Dion Cass. lvi. 8.) Respecting Drusus, the brother of Nero, see DRUSUS, No. 16, and respecting Julia, the wife of Nero, see JULIA, No. 9.

NERVA, ACUTIUS, one of the consules suffecti in the reign of Trajan, A. D. 100. (Faati; Plin. Ep. ii. 12.)

NERVA, COCCEIUS. 1. M. COCCEIUS NERVA, was consul with L. Gellius Poplicola, B. C. 36. (Dion Cass. xlviii. 54.) He is probably the Cocceius who brought about the reconciliation between M. Antonius and Caesar Octavianus, B. C. 40, though this Cocceius is called Lucius by Appian (B. C. v. 60, &c.); and also the Cocceius mentioned by Horace (Sat. i. 5. 28, &c.). He is sometimes considered to be the grandfather of the emperor Nerva, and consequently the same person who died in the time of Tiberius, A. D. 33, which is not possible.

2. M. COCCEIUS NERVA, who died A. D. 33, was probably the son of the consul of B. C. 36: he was the grandfather of the emperor Nerva. This Nerva was consul with C. Vibius Rufinus, A. D. 23: Tacitus (Ann. iv. 58) says that he had been consul. He was one of the intimate friends of Tiberius Caesar, who gave him the superintendence of the aqueducts of Rome (Frontinus, De Aqueduct. ii.). Nerva accompanied Tiberius in his retirement from Rome A. D. 26. In the year A. D. 33, he resolutely starved himself to death, notwithstanding the intreaties of Tiberius, whose constant companion he was. Tacitus (Ann. vi. 26) and Dion Cassius (lviii. 21) give different reasons for this resolution of Nerva, but we may infer from both of them that Nerva was tired of his master. Tacitus says, that he was profoundly skilled in the law. He is often mentioned in the Digest (43. tit. 8. s. 2; 16. tit. 3. s. 32), and he wrote several legal works, but the title of no one of them is mentioned.

3. M. COCCEIUS NERVA, was the son of the jurist. He must have been a precocious youth, if we rightly understand Ulpian (Dig. 3. tit. i. s. 1), when he says that he gave responsa (publice de jure responsisse) at the age of seventeen or a little more. He is probably the Cocceius Nerva mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xv. 72) as Praetor Designatus. He wrote a work De Usucapionibus (Dig. 41. tit. 2. s. 47) as Papinian states; and he is often cited in the Digest under the name of Nerva Filius. Gaius (Inst. ii. 195, iii. 133) cites Nerva, without saying whether he means the father or the son. [G. L.]

NERVA, M. COCCEIUS, Roman emperor, A. D. 96–98, was born at Narnia, in Umbria (Aur. Vict. Epit. 12), as some interpret the words of Victor, or rather his family was from Narnia. His father was probably the jurist, No. 3. The time of his birth was A. D. 32, inasmuch as he died in January, A. D. 98, at the age of nearly sixty-six (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 4). He was consul with Vespasian, A. D. 71, and with Domitian, A. D. 90. Tillemont supposes him to be the Nerva mentioned by Tacitus (Ann. xv. 72), but this Nerva is, perhaps, the father of the emperor.

Nerva was probably at Rome when Domitian was assassinated, and privy to the conspiracy, though Aurelius Victor (de Caes. 12) seems to intend to say that he was in Gaul, which is very improbable. His life was saved from the cruelty of Domitian by the emperor's superstition, who believed an astrologer's prediction that Nerva would soon die a natural death (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 15). On the assassination of Domitian, in September, A. D. 96, Nerva was declared emperor at Rome by the people and the soldiers, and his administration at once restored tranquillity to the state. He stopped proceedings against those who, under the system of his predecessor, had been accused of treason (majestas), and allowed many exiled persons to return to Rome. The class of informers were suppressed by penalties (Plin. Panegy. c. 35); some were put to death, among whom was the philosopher Sura; and, conformably to the old law, Nerva declared that slaves and freedmen should never be examined as witnesses against their masters or patrons when accused of a crime (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 1). These measures were necessary to restore order and confidence after the suspicious and cruel administration of Domitian. But there was weakness in the character of Nerva, as appears from the following anecdote. He was entertaining Junius Mauricus and Fabius Veiento at table. Veiento had played the part of an accuser (delator) under Domitian. The conversation turned on Catullus Messallinus, who was then dead, but had been an infamous informer under Domitian. "What would this Catullus be doing," said Nerva, "if he were alive now;" to which Mauricus bluntly replied, "he would be supping with us" (Aur. Vict. Epit. 12).

The public events of his short reign were few and unimportant; and it is chiefly his measures of internal administration of which there are any records. Nerva attempted to relieve the poverty of many of the citizens by buying land and distributing it among them, one of the remedies for distress which the Romans had long tried, and with little advantage. The practice of occasionally distributing money among the poor citizens, and allowances of grain, still continued under Nerva, one of the parts of Roman administration which continually kept alive the misery for which it supplied temporary relief. He also diminished the expences of the state by stopping many of the public shows and festivals. Many enactments, by which we must understand Senatus consulta, were passed in his time, among which the prohibition against making eunuchs is worthy of notice, but Domitian had already made the same regulation in the beginning of his reign (Dion Cass. lxxviii. 2), whence we must conclude that the law had either been repealed or required some stricter penalties to enforce it.

In the second year of his reign, Nerva was consul, for the third time, with L. Verginius Rufus, also for the third time consul. Rufus had been proclaimed emperor by the soldiers in the time of Nero, A. D. 68, but had refused the dangerous honour. The emperor made no difficulty about associating Rufus with himself in the consulship, but Rufus was a very old man, and soon died. Calpurnius Crassus, a descendant of the Crassi of the republic, with others, conspired against the emperor, but the plot was discovered, and Nerva rebuked the conspirators by putting into their hands at a show of gladiators, the swords with which the men were going to fight, and asking the conspirators, in the usual way, if they were sharp enough. This anecdote, if true, shows that the exhibitions of gladiators were in use under Nerva. The text of Dion does not state what was the punishment of Crassus, but Victor (Epit. 12) says that Crassus was relegated with his wife to Tarentum, and that the senate blamed the emperor for his leniency; but Nerva had sworn at the commencement of his reign that he would put no senator to death, and he kept his word.

The feebleness of the emperor was shown by a mutiny of the Praetorian soldiers, who were either urged on by their Praefectus, Aelianus Casperius, or had bribed him to support them. The soldiers demanded the punishment of the assassins of Domitian, which the emperor refused. Though his body was feeble, his will was strong, and he offered them his own neck, and declared his readiness to die. However, it appears that the soldiers effected their purpose, and Nerva was obliged to put Petronius Secundus and Parthenius to death, or to permit them to be massacred by the soldiers (Plin. Panegyrr. c. 6; Aur. Vict. Epit. 12; Dion Cass. lvi. 3). Casperius, it is said, carried his insolence so far as to compel the emperor to thank the soldiers for what they had done.

Nerva felt his weakness, but he showed his noble character and his good sense by appointing as his successor a man who possessed both vigour and ability to direct public affairs. He adopted as his son and successor, without any regard to his own kin, M. Ulpius Trajanus, who was then at the head of an army in Germany, and probably on the Lower Rhine. It was about this time that news arrived of a victory in Pannonia, which is commemorated by a medal, and it was apparently on this occasion that Nerva assumed the title of Germanicus. He conferred on Trajan the title of Caesar and Germanicus, and the tribunitian power. Trajan was thus associated with Nerva in the government, and tranquillity was restored at Rome. In the year A. D. 98, Nerva and Trajan were consuls. The emperor died suddenly on the 27th of January, in the sixty-third year of his age, according to Victor; but according to Dion, at the age of sixty-five years, ten months and ten days. Eutropius incorrectly states that he was seventy-one. Victor records an eclipse of the sun on the day of Nerva's death, but the eclipse happened on the 21st of March, A. D. 98.

The body of Nerva was carried to the pile on the shoulders of the senators, as that of Augustus had been, and his remains were placed in the sepulchre of Augustus. Nerva received the honour of deification. (The authorities for the reign of Nerva are contained in Tillemont, Histoire des Empereurs, vol. ii., who has made some use of the doubtful authority of the Life of Apollonius by Philostratus; Dion Cass. lib. lxxvii. with the notes of Reimarus; Aurelius Victor. ed. Arntzenius; and G. Plinius, Panegyricus, ed. Schaefer.) [G. L.]

COIN OF THE EMPEROR NERVA.

NERVA, LICINIUS. I. C. LICINIUS NERVA, a son of C. Licinius Nerva, of whom nothing is known. Nerva the son was one of the legati who, in B.C. 168, brought the news to Rome of the defeat of the Illyrian army, and the capture of Gentius, and the conquest of Illyricum. In A.C. 167, he was one of the six praetors, with the province of Hispania Ulterior. Drumann concludes that he did not go to his province, because at the close of B.C. 167 he was one of the commissioners appointed to carry back the Thracian hostages, which reason is not quite conclusive. (Liv. xlv. 3, 16, 42.)

2. A. LICINIUS NERVA is called the brother of Caius by Drumann, which is possible, but no proof is alleged. He was a tribunus plebis, B.C. 178, and he proposed that the consul, A. Manlius Vulso, should not hold his command among the Istri beyond a certain day, the object of the tribune being to bring Manlius to trial for misconducting the war. (Liv. xli. 10.) In B.C. 171 Nerva was one of three commissioners sent to Crete to get archers for the army of the consul P. Licinius Crassus, and in B.C. 169 he was sent with others into Macedonia to examine and report on the state of the Roman army there, and the resources of king Perseus. In B.C. 166, he was a praetor, with one of the Hispaniae as his province. (Liv. xlii. 35, xlv. 18, xlv. 44.)

3. A. LICINIUS NERVA, probably the son of the praetor of B.C. 166. According to Drumann he was praetor in B.C. 143, and in B.C. 142 governor of Macedonia, when his quaestor, L. Tremellius, defeated a Pseudoperseus, or a Pseudophilippus, for there seems some uncertainty about the name, and a body of 16,000 men in arms. Nerva received on this occasion the title of imperator. (Liv. Epit. 53; Eutrop. iv. 15.)

4. C. LICINIUS NERVA. His precise relationship to the preceding is unknown. He is mentioned by Cicero (Brut. 34), and contrasted with L. Bestia, whence Meyer concludes that he may have been Bestia's colleague in the tribuneship. Cicero calls him a bad man, but not without some eloquence.

5. LICINIUS NERVA, is known only from the coins as a quaestor of Decimus Brutus, in the war before Mutina. (Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 19, No. 85.)

6. P. LICINIUS NERVA, in B.C. 103, was praetor in Sicily at the time when the second Servile War broke out. The senate had made a decree that no free person of those nations which had alliance and friendship with Rome should be enslaved, and it was alleged that the Publicani had seized and sold many as slaves, probably because they did not pay the taxes. Nerva published an edict that all persons in Sicily who were entitled to the benefit of the decree should come to Syracuse to make out their case. Above eight hundred persons thus recovered their freedom, but those who held persons in slavery, fearing that the master would go further, prevailed on Nerva not to allow any further claims of freedom to be made, to which he assented, and a rising of the slaves was the consequence. This war lasted four years, and was ended by the proconsul Aquilius. The history of this rising is told circumstantially by Diodorus (xxxvi.; Excerpts by Photius, Cod. 244). The praetor by treachery gained some advantage over the slaves, and the Roman troops after this success retired to their quarters. But the disturbance soon broke out, and it assumed the form of a regular war under Athenion. L. Licinius Lucullus, the father of Lucullus, the vanquisher of Mithridates, dates, was sent in B. C. 102 to succeed Nerva in the government of Sicily.

7. A. LICINIUS NERVA SILIANUS, was adopted by some Licinius Nerva, as the name Silianus shows, out of the Silia gens. He was the son of P. Silius (Vell. Pat. ii. 116), a distinguished commander under Augustus, and consul, B. C. 20, with M. Appuleius. Silianus was consul, A. D. 7, but he is called Licinius Silanus in the text of Dion Cassius (lv. 30). P. Silius, the consul of B. C. 20, appears in the Fasti Consulares as P. Silius Nerva, whence it appears that the cognomen Nerva belonged to the Silii. [SILIUS.]

The authorities for the Licinii Nervæ are collected by Drumann, Geschichte Roms, vol. iv. p. 196, &c. [G. L.]

NERVA, SILIUS. [NERVA, LICINIUS, No. 7, and SILIUS.]

NERVA TRAJANUS. [TRAJANUS.]

NERULI'NUS, the son of P. Suillius, one of the chief instruments of the tyranny of Claudius, escaped accusation when his father was tried and condemned at the beginning of Nero's reign, A. D. 59, because the emperor thought that sufficient punishment had been inflicted on the family (Tac. Ann. xiii. 43). On the coins of Smyrna, struck in the time of Vespasian, we find the name of M. Suillius Nerulinus, proconsul (Eckhel, vol. ii. p. 556), and it is not improbable that this is the same person as the Nerulinus mentioned above. He may also be the same as the M. Suillius who was consul with L. Antistius, in the reign of Claudius, A. D. 50. (Tac. Ann. xii. 50.)

NESAIA (Nysaia), a daughter of Nerus and Doria, and one of the Nereides. (Hom. Il. xviii. 40; Hes. Theog. 249.) [L. S.]

NESEAS, painter. [ΖΕΥΞΙΠ.]

NESIO'TES, a sculptor, appears to have been an assistant of the celebrated Athenian artist Critias, and not a surname of the latter, as some modern writers have conjectured. [CRITIAS, Vol. i. p. 893.]

NESO (Nysos), one of the Nereides (Hes. Theog. 261); but Lycophron (1468) mentions one Neso as the mother of the Cumæan sibyl. [L. S.]

NESSUS (Nessos). 1. The god of the river Nestus (also called Nessus or Nesus) in Thrace, is described as a son of Oceanus and Thetys. (Hes. Theog. 341.)

2. A centaur, who carried Deianeira across the river Evenus, but, wishing to run away with her, he was shot by Hercules with a poisoned arrow, which afterwards became the cause of Hercules' own death. (Soph. Trach. 558; Apollod. ii. 7. § 4; comp. HERACLES.) [L. S.]

NESSUS, a painter, was the son of Habron, who was also a painter. [HABRON.]

NESTOR (Néstor), a son of Neleus and Chloris of Pylos in Triphylia, and husband of Eurydice (or, according to others, of Anaxibia, the daughter of Cratieus), by whom he became the father of Peisideia, Polycaste, Perseus, Stratus, Aretus, Echephron, Peisistratus, Antilochus, and Thrasymedes. (Hom. Od. iii. 413, &c., 452, 464, xi. 285, &c.; Apollod. i. 9. § 9.) With regard to Anaxibia having been his wife, we are informed by Eustathius (ad Hom. p. 296), that after the death of Eurydice, Nestor married Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus, and sister of Agamemnon; but this Anaxibia is elsewhere described as the wife of Strophius, and the mother of Pyrrhus. (Paus. ii. 29. § 4.) When Hercules invaded the country of Neleus, and slew his sons, Nestor alone was spared, because at the time he was not at Pylos, but among the Gerenians, where he had taken refuge. (Hom. Il. xi. 692; Apollod. ii. 7. § 3; Paus. iii. 26. § 6.) This story is connected with another about the friendship between Hercules and Nestor, for the latter is said to have taken no part in the carrying off from Hercules the oxen of Geryones; and Hercules rewarded Nestor by giving to him Messene, and became more attached to him even than to Hylas and Abderus. Nestor, on the other hand, is said to have introduced the custom of swearing by Hercules. (Philostr. Her. 2; comp. Ov. Met. xii. 540, &c.; Paus. iv. 3. § 1, who states that Nestor inhabited Messenia after the death of the sons of Aphares.) When a young man, Nestor was distinguished as a warrior, and, in a war with the Arcadians, he slew Ereuthalion. (Hom. Il. iv. 819, vii. 133, &c., xxiii. 630, &c.) In the war with the Eleians, he killed Itymoneus, and took from them large flocks of cattle. (xi. 670.) When, after this, the Eleians laid siege to Thyroëssa, Nestor, without the war-steeds of his father, went out on foot, and gained a glorious victory. (xi. 706, &c.) He also took part in the fight of the Lapithæ against the Centaurs (i. 260, &c.), and is mentioned among the Calydonian hunters and the Argonauts (Ov. Met. viii. 313; Val. Flacc. i. 380); but he owes his fame chiefly to the Homeric poems, in which his share in the Trojan war is immortalized. After having, in conjunction with Odysseus, prevailed upon Achilles and Patroclus to join the Greeks against Troy, he sailed with his Pylæans in sixty ships to Asia. (Il. ii. 591, &c., xi. 767.) At Troy he took part in all the most important events that occurred, both in the council and in the field of battle. Agamemnon through Nestor became reconciled with Achilles, and therefore honoured him highly; and whenever he was in any difficulty, he applied for advice to Nestor. (ii. 21, x. 18.) In the picture which Homer draws of him, the most striking features are his wisdom, justice, bravery, knowledge of war, his eloquence, and his old age. (Od. iii. 126, &c., 244, xxiv. 52, Il. i. 273, ii. 336, 361, 370, &c., vii. 325, ix. 104, x. 18, xi. 627.) He is said to have ruled over three generations of men, so that his advice and authority were deemed equal to that of the immortal gods. (Od. iii. 245, Il. i. 250; comp. Hygin. Fab. 10.) In this sense we have also to understand the tria sæcula, which he is said by Latin writers to have ruled. (Gellius, xix. 7; Cic. De Senect. 10; Horat. Carm. ii. 9. 13; Ov. Met. xii. 158.) But, notwithstanding his advanced age, he was brave and bold in battle, and distinguished above all others for drawing up horses and men in battle array. After the fall of Troy he, together with Menelaus and Diomedes, returned home, and safely arrived in Pylos (Od. iii. 165, &c.), where Zeus granted to him the full enjoyment of old age, surrounded by intelligent and brave sons. (Od. iv. 209, &c.) In this condition he was found by Telemachus, who visited him to inquire after his father, and was hospitably received by him. The town of Pylos in Messenia claimed to be the city of Nestor; and, when Pausanias visited it, the people showed to him the house in which Nestor was believed to have lived. (Paus. iv. 3. § 4, 36. § 2.) In the temple of Messene at Messene he was represented in a painting with two of his sons, and he was also seen in the painting of Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi. (Paus. iv. 31. § 9, x. 25, in fin.; Philostr. Her. 2.) [L. S.]

NESTOR (Νέστωρ). 1. Of Laranda in Lycia according to Suidas, in Lycania according to Strabo and Stephanus Byzantinus. He lived in the reign of the emperor Severus, between A. D. 194 and 211. He is mentioned by Suidas (s. v.) as an epic poet. We infer from Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Τοῦ δῶναι) that he wrote a poem called Ἀλεξάνδρειας, "On the deeds of Alexander," to which Suidas probably refers. Suidas also mentions that he was the father of the poet Peisander. Tryphiodorus, as we learn from Eustathius in the proemium to the Odyssey, wrote an Odyssey λειστογράφου, wanting the letter σ throughout. Similarly, Nestor, we learn from Suidas, wrote the Iliad, omitting in each book the letter indicating its number, as in the first book, the letter α, in the second, the letter β, and so on with the rest. He wrote also a poem entitled Μεταμorpφώσεις. Four fragments of his writings are inserted in the Anthologia Graeca (vol. iii. p. 54, ed. Jacobs). The fourth of these epigrams has point, and rebukes men for attempting poetry who are unskilled in the art. The last line has passed into the proverb of Erasmus, Equitandi peritus ne cunas. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 134, 517, iii. p. 46, iv. p. 483; Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 54, vol. xiii. p. 921; Suid. Steph. l. c.)

2. A stoical philosopher of Tarsus. (Strab. xiv. p. 674.)

3. An academic philosopher, preceptor of Marcellus, son of Octavia. Marcellus died B. C. 23. (Strab. lib. xiv. p. 675; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. pp. 237, 548.) [W. M. G.]

NESTORIDES (Νεστορίδης), a patronymic employed to designate Antiochus, the son of Nestor (Hom. Il. vi. 33, xv. 589, xxiii. 353), and Peisistratus, also the son of Nestor (Od. iii. 36, 482, &c.). [L. S.]

NESTORIUS, a celebrated Haeresiarch of the fifth century, was born, according to Socrates (H. E. vii. 29), and Theodoret (Haeret. Fabul. Compend. iv. 12), at Germanicia, a city in the northern extremity of Syria, amid the offshoots of the Taurus. Marcellinus (Chronicon) speaks of him as a native of Antioch, and Casian is understood by some to say (De Incarnat. vi. 3) that he was baptized at Antioch; but the passage in Casian is obscure, and the statement of Socrates is preferable to that of Marcellinus. He was apparently of humble birth. Cyril (Homil. iv. de Divers. p. 357; Opera, vol. v. pt. ii. ed. Paris, 1638), speaks of him as being "lifted out of the dunghill," a reference apparently to Pa. cxiii. 7, and raised to the height of heaven: language which could be applied only to one of obscure origin, even by so unscrupulous a person as Cyril. Theodoret (ibid.), who was disposed to the opinions of Nestorius, and who cannot be suspected of any personal ill-will to him, states that he could not discover either the place of his education or the extent of his acquirements; and the silence of Socrates as to his possessing any other qualifications for the patriarchate, than a good voice and a fluent utterance (εὐφώνος δὲ ἁλῶς καὶ εὐκλῶς), indicates that his early education was as defective as his birth was obscure. After various changes of residence, he fixed his abode at Antioch, and having received here some instruction, was ordained presbyter. He at once set himself to gain popularity, and succeeded: his fluency as a preacher attracted admiration; and his staid deportment, sober garb, and studious habits excited reverence. So great and general was the respect entertained for him, that when he was appointed patriarch of Constantinople, the appointment was hailed with general approval. He was consecrated 10th April 428, according to the authority of Socrates. Liberatus places his consecration on the 1st of April (Breviar. cap. 4) which Le Quien (Oriens Christianus, vol. i. col. 215) observes to be more consistent with the usage of the Constantinopolitan Church, as it coincided that year with Sunday, on which day the patriarchs were usually consecrated. Theophanes places the appointment of Nestorius in A. M. 5923, Alex. era, which corresponds with A. D. 430 or 431; but his chronology is by no means accurate in this part of his work. Nestorius was consecrated rather more than three months after the death of his predecessor Siennius.

He gave immediately on his appointment an indication of the violent and intolerant course which he afterwards pursued. He thus publicly addressed the emperor Theodosius the Younger (Socrat. H. E. vii. 29): "Purge the earth, sire, of heretics for me, and I will in return bestow heaven on you. Join me in putting away the heretics, and I will join you in putting away the Persians." The bigotry of some was pleased with the declaration, but wiser auditors listened with sorrow to the proof which it gave of his violent and boastful temper. His deeds were answerable to his words. The Arians had a house of prayer, in which they privately met for worship: on the fifth day from his ordination he attempted to destroy it; but its persecuted occupants chose rather to set it on fire themselves; and when the spreading conflagration had excited a tumult, they prepared, says Socrates (ibid.), but without stating in what way, to revenge the injury. The Novatians [NOVATIANUS] and the Quartadecimans of Asia were also persecuted by him; the former, according to Socrates (ibid.), from his envy of the reputation of Paulus their bishop; the latter, so far as appears, from mere intolerance. These persecutions led to tumults both at Miletus and Sardis, in which many persons lost their lives. The followers of Macedonius, too, [MACEDONIUS, No. 3], were goaded by persecution into outrage, and this was made the occasion of further oppression.

But while he was thus persecuting others, he was rising up enemies against himself by enunciating doctrines at variance, at least in appearance, with the orthodox views and tendencies of the age. He had brought with him from Antioch Anastasius, also a presbyter of that city, and in his administration of the patriarchate made him his confidential adviser. Theophanes calls him his Syacellus, or personal attendant. Both Nestorius and Anastasius appear to have imbibed the disposition prevalent at Antioch, to distinguish carefully between the divine and human natures attributed to Christ, a disposition promoted by the reaction occasioned by the opposite opinion of the Apollinarians. [APOLLINARIUS, No. 2]. With these tendencies Nestorius of course disapproved of the practice of some persons at Constantinople who called the Virgin Mary Θεοτόκος, "Mother of God." Against the expression Anastasius objected in a public discourse, which, according to Theplumes, Nestorius himself had prepared, and intrusted him to deliver. "Let no one," said the preacher, "call Mary 'the mother of God;' for Mary was a human being; and that God should be born of a human being is impossible." Eusebius, then a Scholasticus or pleader at Constantinople, afterward bishop of Dorylaeum, was, according to Theophanes, the first to catch at the obnoxious objection [EUSEBIUS OF DORYLAEUM]; and many both of the clergy and laity were scandalized by it. Nestorius, of course, supported Anastasius; and by continually insisting on the subject in dispute, and reiterating the objection to the term Θεοτόκος, aggravated the quarrel. As might be expected, his adversaries were too much inflamed to judge him fairly. Instead of recognising his true object, which was to guard against confounding the two natures of Christ, many of them charged him with reviving the dogma of Photinus and Paul of Samosata [PAULUS SAMOSATENUS; PHOTINUS], that Christ was ψαῖς ἀνθρώπου, "a mere man." Some of his own clergy preached against the heresy of their bishop, others attempted to catechize him on the alleged unsoundness of his faith. The violence and arrogance of Nestorius could not brook this: the preachers were silenced, the catechizers cruelly beaten and imprisoned: a monk who opposed his entrance into the church, was whipped and exiled; and many of the populace, for crying out that they had an emperor but not a bishop, were also punished with lashes. (Basil. diaconi Supplicatio, apud Council, vol. i. col. 1335, &c. ed. Hardouin.) Proclus, titular bishop of Cyzicus, himself afterwards a competitor for the patriarchate of Constantinople, preaching in the great church at the command, and in the presence of Nestorius, asserted the propriety of giving the title Θεοτόκος to the Virgin. The audience applauded, and Nestorius rose and delivered a discourse in reply to Proclus, the substance of which is preserved in a Latin translation by Marius Mercator (Opera, vol. ii. p. 26, ed. Garnier, p. 70, ed. Baluze; and apud Galland. Biblioth. Patrum, vol. viii. p. 633) [MERCATOR]. The conflict became hotter. Dorotheus bishop of Marcianopolis, an ultra Nestorian [DOROTHEUS, No. 5], pronounced a public anathema in the church of Constantinople against all who applied the word Θεοτόκος to the Virgin. The audience raised a great outcry and left the church; and abbots and monks, priests and laymen, withdrew from communion with the patriarch, who countenanced Dorotheus (Cyril. Epistolae, 6, 9, pp. 30, 37; Opera, vol. v. pars ii.). Nestorius, no wise daunted by this mark of public opinion, assembled a council of those who adhered to him, and deposed priests and deacons, and even bishops of the opposite party, on a charge of Manicheism.

As might be expected, the struggle had meanwhile extended beyond the church and patriarchate of Constantinople. Pope Coelestine I. of Rome, and the haughty and violent patriarch Cyril of Alexandria embraced the opposite side to Nestorius. [COELESTINUS; ST. CYRILLUS OF ALEXANDRIA.] Cyril assembled a council of the Egyptian bishops at Alexandria; and addressed synodal letters, one to Nestorius, setting forth the faith which the Egyptians regarded as orthodox, and concluding with twelve anathemas against the presumed errors of Nestorius; another to the recusants at Constantinople, clerical and lay, animating them in their resistance to their heretical bishop; and a third of similar tenour to the monks of that city. Nestorius was not slow to retort on his adversary the same number of anathemas. Coelestine, not satisfied with the doctrinal statements sent him by Nestorius, wrote to him (A. D. 430), threatening him with deposition and excommunication from the whole Catholic church within ten days, unless he expressed his accordance with the faith of the churches of Rome and Alexandria. He also wrote to the recusants to encourage them, and likewise to John, patriarch of Antioch [JOHANNES, No. 9], to inform him of the sentence of deposition and excommunication pronounced against Nestorius. John wrote to Nestorius, inviting him to withdraw his opposition to the term Θεοτόκος, but manifesting a very different temper from Cyril and Coelestine. Nestorius, in his reply, which is extant in a Latin version, vindicated his opposition to the word, affirming that he had, on his first arrival at Constantinople, found the church divided on the subject, some calling the Virgin "Mother of God," others "Mother of Man;" and that he, to reconcile all, if possible, had proposed to call her "Mother of Christ" (Epistol. Nestorii ad Joann. apud Concil. vol. i. col. 1331; comp. Evagr. H. E. i. 7). The expedient was unobjectionable; but the violence of its proposer would have prevented peace, even had the temper of the factions and the times been more peace-loving and moderate.

A general council was now inevitable; and an edict of the emperors Theodosius and Valentinian III. appointed it to be held at Ephesus. Nestorius, prompt and fearless, arrived with a crowd of followers soon after Easter (A. D. 431). Cyril, who, beside his own dignity, was appointed temporarily to represent Coelestine, arrived about Pentecost: and the session of the council commenced, although John of Antioch, and the bishops of his patriarchate had not yet arrived. Cyril and Nestorius had a sharp encounter, Cyril seeking by terror to break the resolution of his opponent, Nestorius undauntedly replying, and then withdrawing with the bishops of his party, declaring that he would not return to the council until the arrival of John and the Eastern bishops. Cyril and his party refused to wait; and having sent to warn Nestorius to attend, and their messengers having been refused admittance, they proceeded in his absence (22d June) to try him, and depose him. A very few days afterward John and his fellow-prelates of the East arrived; and being indignant at the indecent haste and manifest injustice of Cyril and his party, and being countenanced by Candidianus, Comes Domesticorum, who was present by the emperor's order, formed themselves into a council, at which, however, Nestorius was not present, and imitating the very conduct which they blamed, deposed Cyril himself, and Memnon, bishop of Ephesus, one of his chief supporters. Cyril, supported by Juvenal, bishop of Jerusalem, retorted by deposing John; and the general council, instead of healing, seemed likely to extend the breach. The whole church was threatened with disruption. Tumults and conflicts ensued; and John, Comes Largitionum, found it needful to place Nestorius, Cyril, and Memnon under surveillance. Nestorius appealed to the emperors; the party of Cyril did the same, as also did John and the Oriental bishops. It is needless here to relate all the perplexed particulars of the subsequent history. The deposition of Nestorius was ultimately confirmed, though he at last agreed for peace' sake to withdraw his objection to the word Θεοτόκος: many of the bishops of his party deserted him at once; and although John of Antioch and a number of the Eastern bishops held out for a time, ultimately John and Cyril were reconciled, and both retained their sees.

But the deposition of Nestorius, and the reconciliation of John and Cyril, neither suppressed the opinions of Nestorius, nor healed the dissensions which they had occasioned. Other teachers arose, who held and taught the same views, and diffused them among the Christians of the East, within and beyond the frontier of the empire toward Persia. The Nestorian communities, as they have continued to be called by their opponents, separated from the communion of the orthodox church, and were, doubtless for political reasons, patronized by some of the Persian kings [BARSUMAS]: and the Mahometan conquests in the seventh century, by the overthrow of the orthodox supremacy, gave scope to the spread of the Nestorians. Under the denomination of Chaldaean Christians, which is the designation they gave themselves, they still exist and are numerous in the East, having their own hierarchy of patriarchs, bishops, and inferior clergy; and retaining their characteristic tendency to distinguish carefully between the two natures of Christ, and their objection to the title "Mother of God."

After a vain attempt of Nestorius to gain the support of Scholastica, one of the eunuchs about the court, he was ordered to retire to the monastery, apparently that of Euprepus, in the suburbs of Antioch, in which he had dwelt before his election to the patriarchate. Here he remained four years, being treated, according to his own statement (apud Evagr. H. E. i. 7), with kindness and respect. As, however, he persisted in maintaining his opinions, or as his opponents called it, his blasphemy, he was sentenced to perpetual banishment in the Greater Oasis in Upper Egypt, probably in A. D. 435; at the instigation of his former supporter, John of Antioch [JOANNEΣ, No. 9], who was aggravated by his persistence, and by that of a few of the bishops who adhered to him. [MELLETIUS, No. 7.] In this remote and painful exile, his spirit remained unbroken. He wrote a work, addressed to some Egyptian, on the subject of his wrongs, and addressed various memorials to the governor of the Thebaid. After an interval of uncertain length, he was carried off by the Blemmyes, who ravaged the Oasis with fire and sword: their compassion, however, released him, and he returned to the Thebaid. But the vindictiveness of his enemies was not satisfied: he was harshly hurried from one place of confinement to another, and at last died miserably from the effects of a fall. The story of his dying from some disease, in which his tongue was eaten by worms, which Evagrius had read in a certain work, was probably an invention springing from the mistaken notion that, in the retributive judgment of God, the member which had sinned should bear the punishment. The time of his death is not settled: he was living in A. D. 439, when Socrates wrote his history (Socrat. H. E. vii. 34), and probably died before A. D. 450. His death did not abate the bitterness of his enemies; Evagrius records, with apparent satisfaction (H. E. i. 7, ad fin.), that he passed from the sufferings of this world to sharper and more enduring woe in the world to come.

It is impossible either to deny or justify the violent treatment of Nestorius by the council of Ephesus. Neither can we, without compassion, read his touching appeal to his persecutors (apud Evagr. ibid.), that his past sufferings might be counted sufficient. But our compassion is materially checked by the consideration that he reaped as he had sown; and that there is little reason to think that success would have been more mildly used by him and his partizans, had they been victorious.

Gennadius (De Viris Illustribus, c. 53) mentions only one work of Nestorius, which he describes as being "quasi de Incarnatione Domini," and adds that the Hæresiarach supported his opinion by perverting sixty-two places of Scripture. The work has perished, except that some passages, cited from the writings of Nestorius by Cyril of Alexandria, in his Adversus Nestorij Blasphemias Contradictionum, Libri V. [CYRILLUS ST. of ALEXANDRIA] are thought to be from it. Nestorius, however, produced other works beside that mentioned by Gennadius. Of his Homiliae, thirteen are preserved in the works of Marius Mercator [MERCATOR], vol. ii. in the edition of Garnier, who has diligently collected from the Concilia and the works of Cyril various fragments in Greek of the original homilies, and of the other writings of Nestorius. Several of his Epistolae are preserved, some in Greek in the Concilia, others in a Latin version in the Concilia, or in the works of Mercator. His Anathematismi duodecim, in reply to Cyril, are contained, in a Latin version, in the Concilia. Alti duodecim Anathematismi are extant in a Syriac version, and were published, with a Latin version, from the Syriac, in the Bibliotheca Orientalis of Assemani, vol. iii. pars ii. p. 199. Nestorius, also, wrote a history of his disputes with his opponents, which he appears to have entitled "the Tragedy;" and which is probably the work mentioned by Evagrius (H. E. i. 7), as addressed, in the form of a dialogue, to a certain Egyptian. It is mentioned by Ebedjesu the Syrian, in a catalogue of works ascribed to Nestorius. Of the Liber Heraclidis, mentioned also by Ebedjesu, nothing seems to be known. A Syriac Liturgy, ascribed to Nestorius, is mentioned by Ebedjesu, and is extant. It was published in the original, with several similar works at Rome A. D. 1592; and is given in a Latin version in the Liturgiae Orientales of Eusebii Renaudot, vol. ii. p. 626. 4to. Paris, 1716. A memorial of Nestorius, on his sufferings, is also cited by Evagrius (H. E. i. 7).

The following works are conjecturally ascribed to him:—1. Two Homiliae De Resurrectione et Ascensione Christi, which Combéfis, in his Anastorianum Norwæ, had ascribed to Athanasius. 2. An Epistle, written before the council of Chalcedon, from a Syriac version of which Assemani gives two extracts in his Bibliotheca Orientalis, vol. iii. pars i. p. 36, note 5. 3. A Liturgy, still in use among the Nestorians, and different apparently from that already mentioned. 4. A Confession of Faith, extant in Greek, and of which a Latin version is given by Mercator, and in the Concilia: but this confession is more probably the work of Theodore of Mopsuestia. The original and the version are both given by Garnier, Mercatoris Opera, vol. ii. p. 251. Various fragments of the works of Nestorius are cited in the Acta Concilii Ephesini, in the ἑκάστη: the passages cited under the title of Τερπία, Quaterniones, are apparently from a collection of his Homilies or Sermons (Socrates, H. E. vii. 29, 31, 32, 34; Evagrius, H. E. i. 2—7; Theophanes, Chronographia; Theodoret, Haeret. Fabular. Compend. iv. 12; Liberatus, Breviarium; Leontius Byzant. De Sectis, act. iv.; Gennadius, l. c.; Mercator, l. c.; Concilia, vol. i. col. 1271, &c. &c. ed. Hardouin.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 529, &c.; Cave, Hist. Litt. vol. i. p. 412, &c. ed. Oxford, fol. 1740—42; Tillemont, Mémoires, vol. xiv. passim. Fabricius has given a minute account of the works of Nestorius and of the ancient writers on the Nestorian controversy.) [J. C. M.]

NESTUS. [Nessus, No. 1.]

NICAEA (Níkaiá), a nymph, the daughter of the river-god Sangarius and Cybele. She was beloved by a shepherd, Hymnus, and killed him, but Eros took vengeance upon her, and Dionysus, who first intoxicated her, made her mother of Telete, whereupon she hung herself. Dionysus called the town of Nicæa after her. (Nonnus, Dionys. xvi.; Memnon, ap. Phot. Bibl. p. 233, ed. Bekker.) [L. S.]

NICAEA (Níkaiá). 1. Daughter of Antipater, was sent by her father to Asia to be married to Perdiccas, B.C. 323, at a time when the former still hoped to maintain friendly relations with the regent. Perdiccas, though already entertaining hostile designs, married Nicæa: but not long afterwards, by the advice of Eumenes, determined to divorce her, and marry Cleopatra instead. This step, which he took just before setting out on his expedition to Egypt, led to an immediate rupture between him and Antipater. (Arrian, ap. Phot. 70, a, b; Diod. xviii. 23.) We hear no more of Nicæa for some time, but it appears that she was afterwards—though at what period we know not—married to Lysimachus, who named after her the city, so celebrated in later times, on the Ascanian lake in Bithynia. (Strabo. xii. p. 565; Steph. Byz. s. v. Níkaiá.)

2. Wife of Alexander, tyrant of Corinth during the reign of Antigonus Gonatas. After the death of her husband, who was thought to have been poisoned by the command of the Macedonian king, Nicæa retained possession of the important fortress of Corinth: but Antigonus lulled her into security by offering her the hand of his son Demetrius in marriage, and took the opportunity during the nuptial festivities to surprise the citadel. (Plut. Arat. 17; Polyæn. iv. 6. § 1.) She is probably the same person mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Εὐφρομένη) as patronising the poet Euphorion, though that author calls her husband ruler of Euboea, instead of Corinth.

3. There is a Nicæa mentioned by Livy (xxxv. 26), as the wife of Craterus (i. e. probably the brother of Antigonus Gonatas of that name), of whom nothing more is known. [E. H. B.]

NICAEARCHUS, a painter, whose age and country are unknown, painted Venus among the Graces and Cupids, and Hercules sad in repentance for his madness. (Plin. xxxv. 11. a. 40. § 36.) [P. S.]

NICAEAS, bishop of Aquileia, about the middle of the fifth century, is spoken of under NICETAS, p. 1185.

NICAE'NETUS (Nikaieros), an epigrammatic poet, was, according to the conjecture of Jacobs (Anthol. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 921), a native of Abdera, but had settled in Samos. Athenæus (xiii.

p. 590, b.) speaks of him as either of Samos or of Abdera, and Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἀβδῆρα) mentions among the celebrated Abderites, Νικαιεὺς ἑρωςὸς. Athenæus (xv. p. 673, f.) speaks of him in connexion with his celebrating a Samian usage, as being a poet of strong native tendencies. From Athenæus (p. 673, b.) we infer that he lived prior to the age of Phylarchus, who wrote B.C. 219. (Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. pp. 519, 563.) He wrote, among other things, a list of illustrious women, and epigrams. (Athen. l. c.) Six epigrams ascribed to him, the fourth very doubtfully, are inserted in the Anthologia of Jacobs (vol. i. p. 205, vol. xiii. p. 921; comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 484). [W. M. G.]

NICA'GORAS (Nikaiōras), historical. 1. A Messenian, connected by the ties of hospitality with Archidamus, king of Sparta. When Archidamus fled into Messenia, Nica'goras provided him with a dwelling and all necessities; and when Cleomenes held out hopes to Archidamus of his restoration, Nica'goras conducted the negotiations, and in the end accompanied him back to Sparta. Archidamus was put to death by Cleomenes, but Nica'goras was spared. Having subsequently met Cleomenes at Alexandria, when compelled to fly to the court of his friend Ptolemy Euergetes [CLEOMENES, Vol. I. p. 795], Nica'goras endeavoured to avenge the death of Archidamus by inducing Sosibius to charge Cleomenes with conspiring against the king's life. Cleomenes was placed in confinement, but afterwards escaped. (Polyb. v. 37, &c.; Plut. Agis et Cleom. p. 821, b.)

2. A Rhodian, who, with Agesilochus and Nicander, was twice sent on an embassy to the Romans, in B.C. 169, to Rome, and in B.C. 168, to the consul Aemilius Paullus in Macedonia. See AGESILOCHUS, Vol. I. p. 70. (Polyb. xviii. 2. 14.) [C. P. M.]

NICA'GORAS, literary. An Athenian sophist, the son of the rhetorician Mnesaeus, who lived in the time of the emperor Philippus. He wrote an account of the lives of various illustrious men (Βίαι ἑκατόμυροι), of Cleopatra of the Troad, and a speech composed on the occasion of an embassy to the emperor. He had a son named Minucianus. The writings of Minucianus [see above, p. 1092, a] are sometimes erroneously attributed to his son Nica'goras. (Suidas, s. v. Μινουκίανός, Nikaiōras; Philostr. Vit. Soph. II. Aspas. extr.) [C. P. M.]

NICANDER (Nikaiōras), historical. 1. A king of Sparta, the eighth of the family of the Proclidae, the son of Charilaus, and the father of Theopompus. He was contemporary with Teleclus, and reigned twenty-eight or twenty-nine years, about B.C. 809—770. (Pausan. iii. 7. § 4. See Clinton, Fasti Hell. vol. i. and ii.) Some of his sayings are preserved by Plutarch (Lacæd. Apophthegm. vol. ii. p. 155, ed. Tauchn.)

2. A piratical captain (archipirata) in the employment of Polyxenidas, the commander of the fleet of Antiochus, against Pausistratus, the Rhodian admiral, B.C. 190. (Liv. xxxvii. 11.)

3. An Aetolian, who, when his countrymen were endeavouring to organize a coalition against the Romans, was sent as ambassador to Philip V., king of Macedonia, B.C. 193, to urge him to join the league, but without effect. (Liv. xxxv. 12.) Two years later, B.C. 191, he was sent, together with Thoon, to beg the assistance of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. By extraordinary diligence he accomplished his task, and returned from Ephesus to Phalara, on the Malia Gulf, within twelve days. After falling into the hands of Philip, by whom he was treated with unexpected kindness, he reached Hypata just at the moment when the Aetolians were deliberating about peace, and by bringing some money from Antiochus, and the promise of further aid, he succeeded in persuading them to refuse the terms proposed by the Romans. (Liv. xxvii. 29; Polyb. xx. 10, 11.) In B. C. 190 he was appointed praetor (or ἑταυρός) of the Aetolians (Clinton, Fasti Hell.), and endeavoured in vain to force the consul, M. Fulvius Nobilior, to raise the siege of Ambracia (Liv. xxxviii. 1, 4—6; Polyb. xxii. 8, 10), after which he was sent as ambassador to Rome, with Phaenaeus, to settle the terms of peace. (Polyb. xxii. 13.) We hear no more of him, but that, as he was ever afterwards favourably inclined towards the royal family of Macedonia, because of Philip's kindness to him, he fell under the displeasure of the Romans on that account during their war with Perseus, B. C. 171—168, and that he was summoned to Rome, and died there. (Polyb. xx. 11, xxvii. 13, xxviii. 4, 6.)

4. One of the ambassadors from Rhodes to Rome, with Agesilochus and Nicagoras, probably B. C. 169. (Polyb. xxviii. 2, 14.) [W. A. G.]

NICANDER (Νικάνδρος), literary. 1. The author of two Greek poems that are still extant, and of several others that have been lost. His father's name was Damnaeus (Eudoc. Viol. ap. Vilvoison's Anecd. Gr. vol. i. p. 308, and an anonymous Greek life of Nicander), though Suidas (probably by some oversight) calls him Xenophanes (s. v. Νικάνδρος), and he was one of the hereditary priests of Apollo Clarius [CLARIUS], to which dignity Nicander himself succeeded (comp. Nicand. Alexiph. v. 11). He was born at the small town of Claros, near Colophon in Ionia, as he intimates himself (Ther. in fine), whence he is frequently called Colophonius (Cic. de Orat. i. 16; Suid. &c.), and there is a Greek epigram (Anthol. Gr. ix. 213) complimenting Colophon on being the birth-place of Homer and Nicander. He was said by some ancient authors to have been born in Aetolia, but this probably arose from his having passed some time in that country, and written a work on its natural and political history. He has been supposed to have been a contemporary of Aratus and Callimachus in the third century B. C., but it is more probable that he lived nearly a century later, in the reign of Ptolemy V. (or Epiphanes), who died B. C. 181, and that the Attalus to whom he dedicated one of his lost poems was the last king of Pergamus of that name, who began to reign B. C. 138 (Anon. Gr. Life of Nicander, and Anon. Gr. Life of Aratus). If these two dates are correct, Nicander may be supposed to have been in reputation for about fifty years cir. B. C. 185—135 (see Clinton's Fasti Hell. vol. iii.). He was a physician and grammarian, as well as a poet, and his writings seem to have been rather numerous and on various subjects.

The longest of his poems that remains is named Θηριακά, and consists of nearly a thousand hexameter lines. It is dedicated to a person named Hermesianax, who must not be confounded with the poet of that name. It treats (as the name implies) of venomous animals and the wounds inflicted by them, and contains some curious and interesting zoological passages, together with numerous absurd fables, which do not require to be particularly specified here. Haller calls it "longa, incondita, et nullius fidei farrago" (Biblioth. Botem.). His other poem, called Ἀλεξίφάρμακα, consists of more than six hundred lines, written in the same metre, is dedicated to a person named Protagoras, and treats of poisons and their antidotes: of this work also Haller remarks, "descriptio vir ulla, symptomata fusc recensentur, et magna farrago et incondita plantarum potissimum alexipharmacarum subjicitur." A full analysis of the medical portions of both these works may be found in Mr. Adams's Commentary on the fifth book of Paulus Aegineta. Among the ancients his authority in all matters relating to toxicology seems to have been considered high. His works are frequently quoted by Pliny (H. N. xx. 13, 96, xxii. 15, 32, xxvi. 66, xxx. 25, xxxii. 22, xxxvi. 25, xxxvii. 11, 28). Galen (de Hippocr. et Plat. Decr. ii. 8, vol. v. p. 275, de Locis Affect. ii. 5, vol. viii. p. 133, de Simplic. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. ix. 2 § 10, x. 2 § 16, vol. xii. pp. 204, 289, de Ther. ad Pis. cc. 9, 13, vol. xiv. pp. 239, 265, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iii. 38, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 537), Athenaeus (pp. 66, 312, 366, 649, &c.), and other ancient writers; and Dioscorides, Aëtius, and other medical authors have made frequent use of his works. Plutarch, Diphilus and others wrote commentaries on his "Theriacal" [DIPHILUS], Mariannus paraphrased it in iambic verse [MARIANUS], and Eutecnius wrote a paraphrase in prose of his two principal poems, which is still extant. On the subject of his poetical merits the ancient writers were not well agreed; for though (as we have seen) a writer in the Greek Anthology compliments Colophon for being the birth-place of Homer and Nicander, and Cicero praises (de Orat. i. 16) the poetical manner in which in his "Georgics" he treated a subject of which he was wholly ignorant, Plutarch on the other hand (de Adv. Poët. c. 2, vol. i. p. 36, ed. Tauchn.) says that the "Theriacal," like the poems of Empedocles, Parmenides, and Theognis, have nothing in them of poetry but the metre. Modern critics have differed equally on this point; but practically the judgment of posterity has been pronounced with sufficient clearness, and his works are now scarcely ever read as poems, but merely consulted by those who are interested in points of zoological and medical antiquities:—how opposite a fate to that which has befallen Virgil's Georgics! In reference to his style and language Bentley calls him, with great truth, "antiquarian, obsoleta et caeca verba studiose venantem, et vel sui saeculi lectoribus difficilem et obscurum." (Cambridge Museum Criticum, vol. i. p. 371.)

The following are the titles of Nicander's lost works, as collected by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. iv. p. 348, Harles): 1. Αἰσώματα, a prose work, consisting of at least three books; quoted by Athenaeus (pp. 296, 477), Macrobius (Saturn. v. 21), Harporocration (Lex. s. v. Θόνιστος), and other writers. 2. Γεωργικά, a poem in hexameter verse, consisting of at least two books, of which some long fragments remain; mentioned by Cicero (de Orat. i. 16), Suidas, and others, and frequently quoted by Athenaeus, (pp. 52, 133, 371, &c.)

* Fabricius and Schweighaeuser (Athen. p. 339, and "Ind. Auctor.") reckon among Nicander's works a poem called Βουρτανικά, but this is wrong. See Dindorf's Athen. l. c. and "Ind. Scriptoz."

3. Γλῶσσαι, a work in at least three books; quoted by Athenæus (p. 288) and other writers. 4. Ἐρερυσμένα, a poem in hexameter verse, in five books, mentioned by Suidas, and quoted by Athenæus (pp. 82, 303), Antoninus Liberalis (Metamorph. cc. 12, 35), and other writers. It was perhaps in reference to this work that Didymus applied to Nicander the epithet "fabulosus" (Macrob. Satura. v. 22.). 5. Εὐρωπία, or Περὶ Εὐρώπης, in at least five books, quoted by Athenæus (p. 296), Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἄδως), and others. 6. Ἥλιαμοι, mentioned by the scholiast on the Theriaca. 7. Θηβαικά, in at least three books, mentioned by the scholiast on the Theriaca, and probably alluded to by Plutarch (de Herod. Malig. c. 33, vol. v. p. 210, ed. Tauchn.). 8. Ἰάσεων Συναγωγὴ, mentioned by Suidas. 9. Κολοφωνικά, of which work the same passage is quoted both by Athenæus (p. 569) and Harpocration (Lex. s. v. Πάνδημος 'Ἀφροδίτη'), though the former writer says it came from the third book, and the latter from the sixth. 10. Μελισσουργικά (Athen. p. 68). 11. Νύμφιοι (Schol. Nicand. Ther.). 12. Οἰταῖκά, a poem in hexameter verse, in at least two books, quoted by Athenæus (pp. 282, 329, 411). 13. Ὀφιακὴν (Schol. Nicand. Ther.; comp. Suid. s. v. Πάμφιλος). 14. The sixth book Περὶ πτερυγίων (Athen. p. 606). 15. Περὶ Ποιπτῶν (Parthen. Εἰοτ. c. 4), perhaps the same work as that quoted by the scholiast on the "Theriaca," with the title Περὶ τῶν ἐν Κολοφῶνι Ποιπτῶν; and probably the work in which Nicander tried to prove that Homer was a native of Colophon (Cramer's Anecd. Gr. Paris. iii. p. 98). 16. The Προγνωστικά of Hippocrates paraphrased in hexameter verse (Suid.). 17. Σικελικά, of which the tenth book is quoted by Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ζάγκλη). 18. Τάκινθος (Schol. Nicand. Ther.). 19. Ῥῆνος (ibid.). 20. Περὶ Χρηστηρίων πάντων, in three books. (Suid.)

Nicander's poems have generally been published together, but sometimes separately. They were first published in Greek at the end of Dioscorides, Venet. 1499, fol. ap. Aldum Manutium; and in a separate form, Venet. 1523, 4to. in aedib. Aldi. Both poems were translated into Latin verse by Jo. Gorneus, and by Euricius Cordus, and the "Theriaca" also by P. J. Steveius. The Greek paraphrase of both poems by Eutecnus first appeared in Bandini's edition, Florent. 1764, 8vo. The most complete and valuable edition that has hitherto appeared is J. G. Schneider's, who published the Alexipharmaca in 1792, Halae, 8vo., and the Theriaca in 1816, Lips. 8vo.; containing a Latin translation, the scholia, the paraphrase by Eutecnus, the editor's annotations, and the fragments of Nicander's lost works. The last edition is that published by Didot, together with Oppian and Marcellus Sidetes, in his collection of Greek classical authors, Paris, large 8vo. 1846, edited by F. S. Lehrs, and at present (it is believed) unfinished. The "Theriaca" were published in the Cambridge "Museum Criticum" (vol. i. p. 370, &c.), with Bentley's emendations, copied from the margin of a copy of Gorneus's edition, which once (apparently) belonged to Dr. Mead, and is now preserved in the British Museum. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. iv. p. 345, &c. ed. Harles; Haller, Biblioth. Botan. and Biblioth. Medic. Pract.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.)

2. A Peripatetic philosopher of Alexandria, who wrote a work Περὶ τῶν Ἀριστοτέλους Μαθητῶν. (Suid. s. v. Αλεσχόλων.)

3. A native of Chalcedon, who wrote a work relating to Prusias, king of Bithynia, entitled Προυσιῶν Συμπύσματα, of which the fourth book is quoted by Athenæus (xi. p. 496).

4. The son of Euthydemus, introduced by Plutarch in his dialogue, De Solert. Animal. § 8. (vol. v. p. 444, ed. Tauchn.), and in his Symposiaca, is, perhaps, the person to whom he addressed his treatise, De recta Rat. Aud. vol. i. p. 86. He lived in the first century after Christ.

5. A foolish sophist, mentioned by Philostratus, who lived in the second century after Christ. (Damian. p. 601, ed. Paris, 1608.)

6. A grammarian of Thyatira, who is supposed by Fabricius to have been the same person as Nicander of Colophon, on account of an expression used by Stephanus Byzantinus (De Urb. s. v. Θυάτειρα); it is, however, more probable that Stephanus confounded together two different individuals. He wrote a work, Περὶ τῶν Δημῶν (Harpocrat. Lex. s. v. Θυργωνίδαι, Τιτακίδαι), and another called by Athenæus (xv. p. 678), Ἀττικὴ Ὀνόματα, which is probably the same as that quoted by Harpocration, under the title Ἀττικὴ Διδιάλεκτος (s. v. Μέδριμος, Βωλεωνες, Τριπτήρα), and which consisted of at least eighteen books. (Harpocrat. s. v. ἐξηραλιφεῖν.) This is probably the work which is frequently quoted by Athenæus (iii. pp. 76, 81, 114, &c.).

7. A native of Delphi, mentioned by Plutarch, and called in one passage Ιερός (De EI apud Delphos, c. 5, vol. iii. p. 82), and in another προφήτης (De Defectu Oracul. c. 51, vol. iii. p. 200), may possibly, as Wytttenbach supposes, be the same individual as the son of Euthydemus mentioned above, No. 4. (Wytttenb. Notes to Plut. De Recta Rat. Aud. p. 37, c.)

8. "Ambrosius Nicander, Toletanus, qui circa A. Chr. 817, S. Cyriaci Episcopi Anconitani Martyrium versibus Latinis scripsisse, et catulpeas (sive argumenta) in Siliii Italici libros composuisse traditur." (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. iv. p. 354, ed. Harles.) Fabricius gives no authority for this statement, nor does Harles supply the defect. It appears, however, that there has been some confusion respecting this personage, who is, in fact, no other than Ambrosius de Victoria (or Nicanor), who lived in the sixteenth century. (See Anton. Biblioth. Hist. Vetus. vol. i. p. 508, vol. ii. p. 452; id. Biblioth. Hist. Nova, vol. i. p. 67.)

9. Nicander Nicius [Nicius]. [W. A. G.] NICANOR (Núkanwop). 1. Son of Parmenion, a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander. He is first mentioned at the passage of the Danube, in the expedition of Alexander against the Getae, a. c. 335, on which occasion he led the phalanx, (Arr. Anab. i. 4. § 3.) But during the expedition into Asia he appears to have uniformly held the chief command of the body of troops called the Hypaspistae (ὑπασπισταί) or foot-guards, as his brother Philotas did that of the εἰραῖροι, or horse-guards. We find him mentioned, as holding this post, in the three great battles of the Granicus, of

* This work, however, is attributed to one of the other writers of this name, by both Schweighaeuser and Dindorf, in their "Ind. Auctor." to Athenæus.

Issus, and of Arbela. He afterwards accompanied Alexander with a part of the troops under his command, during the rapid march of the king in pursuit of Darius (B.C. 330); which was probably his last service, as he died of disease shortly afterwards, during the advance of Alexander into Bactria. His death at this juncture was probably a fortunate event, as it saved him from participating either in the designs or the fate of his brother Philotas. (Arrian, Anab. i. 14, ii. 8, iii. 11, 21, 25; Curt. iii. 24, § 7, iv. 50, § 27, v. 37, § 19, vi. 22, § 18; Diod. xvii. 57.)

2. Father of Balacrus, the satrap of Cilicia. [BALACRUS.] It is probably this Nicanor who is alluded to in an anecdote related by Plutarch of Philip of Macedon, as a person of some distinction during the reign of that monarch. (Plut. Apophth. p. 177.)

3. Son of Balacrus, and grandson of the preceding. (Harpocration, s. v. Nicanor.)

4. Of Stageira, was despatched by Alexander to Greece to proclaim, at the Olympic games of the year B.C. 324, the decree for the recall of the exiles throughout the Greek cities. (Diod. xviii. 8; Deinarch, adv. Demosth. p. 199, ed. Bekk.) It is perhaps the same person whom we find at an earlier period entrusted with the command of the fleet during the siege of Miletus (Arr. Anab. i. 18, 19); at least it seems probable that the Nicanor there mentioned is not the son of Parmenion; he may, however, be identical with the following.

5. A Macedonian officer of distinction, who, in the division of the provinces at Tripardesius, after the death of Perdicas (B.C. 321), obtained the important government of Cappadocia. (Arrian, ap. Phot. p. 72, a.; Diod. xviii. 39; App. Mithr. 8.) He attached himself to the party of Antigonus, whom he accompanied in the war against Eumenes, and when, after the second battle in Gabiene, the mutinous Argyraspids consented to surrender their general into the hands of Antigonus [EUMENES], it was Nicanor who was selected to receive their prisoner from them. (Plut. Eum. 17.) After the defeat of Pithon and his associates, B.C. 316, Nicanor was appointed by Antigonus, governor of Media and the adjoining provinces, commonly termed the upper satrapies, which he continued to hold until the year 312, when Seleucus made himself master of Babylon. Thereupon Nicanor assembled a large force and marched against the invader, but was surprised and defeated by Seleucus at the passage of the Tigris, and his troops were either cut to pieces or went over to the enemy. According to Diodorus, he himself escaped the slaughter, and fled for safety to the desert, from whence he wrote to Antigonus for assistance. Appian, on the contrary, represents him as killed in the battle. It is certain, at least, that we hear no more of him. (Diod. xix. 92, 100; Appian, Syr. 55.)

6. A Macedonian officer under Cassander, by whom he was secretly despatched immediately on the death of Antipater, B.C. 319, to take the command of the Macedonian garrison at Munychia. Nicanor arrived at Athens before the news of Antipater's death, and thus readily obtained possession of the fortress, which he afterwards refused to give up notwithstanding the orders of Polysperchon. He however entered into friendly relations with Phocion, and through his means began to negotiate with the Athenians, who demanded the withdrawal of the Macedonian garrison from Munychia, according to the decree just issued by Polysperchon. But while he thus deluded them with false hopes, instead of surrendering Munychia, he took the opportunity to surprise the Peirææus also, and, having occupied it with a strong garrison, declared his intention to hold both fortresses for Cassander. (Diod. xviii. 64; Plut. Phoc. 31, 32; Corn. Nep. Phoc. 2.) In vain did Olympias, at this time on friendly terms with the regent, unite in commanding him to withdraw his troops: nor did Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, who arrived in Attica the following spring (B.C. 318) at the head of a considerable army, effect anything more. Shortly after, Cassander himself arrived with a fleet of thirty-five ships, and Nicanor immediately put him in possession of the Peirææus, while he himself retained the command of Munychia. He was, however, quickly despatched by Cassander with a fleet to the Hellespont, where he was joined by the naval forces of Antigonus; and though at first defeated by Cleitus, the admiral of Polysperchon, he soon after retrieved his fortune, and gained a complete victory, destroying or capturing almost the whole of the enemy's fleet. On his return to Athens he was received by Cassander with the utmost distinction, and reinstated in his former command of Munychia. But his late successes had so much elated him that he incurred the suspicion of aiming at higher objects, and intending to set up for himself. On these grounds Cassander determined to rid himself of one who was beginning to give him umbrage, and having succeeded by the basest treachery in decoying Nicanor into his power, he caused him to be put to death, after undergoing the form of a trial before the Macedonian army. (Plut. Phoc. 33; Diod. xviii. 65, 68, 72, 75; Polyæn. iv. 6, § 8, 11, § 1; Trog. Pomp. prol. xiv.)

7. A son of Antipater and brother of Cassander, put to death by Olympias, B.C. 317. (Diod. xix. 11.)

8. A friend and general of Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, who was despatched by the Egyptian king in B.C. 320, with an army to reduce Syria and Phœnicia; an object which he quickly effected, taking prisoner Laomedon, the governor of those provinces. (Diod. xviii. 43.)

9. A Syrian Greek, who, together with a Gaul named Apaturius, assassinated Seleucus III. Ceraunus, during his expedition into Asia against Attalus, B.C. 222. He was immediately seized and executed by order of Achæus. (Polyb. iv. 48; Euseb. Arm. p. 165, fol. ed.)

10. Surnamed the Elephant, a general under Philip V. king of Macedonia, who invaded Attica with an army shortly before the breaking out of the war between Philip and the Romans, B.C. 200; but, after laying waste part of the open country, he was induced, by the remonstrances of the Roman ambassadors then at Athens, to withdraw. (Polyb. xvi. 27.) He is again mentioned as commanding the rearguard of Philip's army at the battle of Cynoscephalæ, B.C. 197. (Id. xviii. 7; Liv. xxxii. 8.)

11. An Epeiros, son of Myrton, who united with his father in supporting the oppressive and rapacious proceedings of Charops in the government of their native country. [ΧΑΡΟΠΣ.] (Polyb. xxxii. 21.)

12. Son of Patroclus, was apparently the chief of the three generals who were sent by Lysias, the regent of Syria during the absence of Antiochus IV., to reduce the revolted Jews. They advanced as far as Emmaus, where they were totally defeated by Judas Maccabaeus, B. C. 165. (1 Macc. iii. iv., 2 Macc. viii.; Joseph. Ant. xii. 7. §§ 3, 4.) He is previously mentioned as holding an administrative office in Palestine. (Joseph. ib. xii. 5. § 5.)

13. A friend of Demetrius I. king of Syria, who had been detained, together with that monarch, as a hostage at Rome, and was one of the companions of his flight. (Polyb. xxxi. 22; Joseph. Ant. xii. 10. § 4.) When Demetrius was established on the throne of Syria, he despatched Nicanor, whom he had promoted to the dignity of elephantarch, or master of the elephants, with a large army into Judaea to reduce the Jews, who were still in arms under Judas Maccabaeus. Nicanor at first attempted to make himself master of the person of the Jewish leader by treachery, under pretence of a peaceful negotiation, but, having failed in this, he gave him battle at Capharsalem, and was defeated with heavy loss. A second action, near Bethoron, proved still more disastrous: Nicanor himself fell on the field, and his whole army was cut to pieces. (Joseph. Ant. xii. 10. §§ 4, 5; 1 Macc. vii., 2 Macc. xiv. xv.) [E. H. B.]

NICA'NOR (Νικάνωρ). 1. Aristotle's adopted son, repeatedly mentioned in his will, whom the philosopher destined to be his son-in-law. (Diog. Laërt. v. 12.) [See Vol. I. p. 317.]

2. A person mentioned in the will of Epicurus. (Diog. Laërt. x. 20.)

3. A celebrated grammarian, who lived during the reign of the emperor Hadrian, A. D. 127. According to Suidas (s. v.) he was of Alexandria; according to Stephanus Byzantinus (s. v. Ἱερὰ πόλις) he was of Hierapolis. His labours were principally directed to punctuation, hence he received the ludicrous name of Στίγματας (Suidas, l. c.), and, from his having devoted much of his attention to the elucidation of Homer's writings, through means of punctuation, he is called by Stephanus (l. c.) ὁ νέος Όμηρος. He wrote, also, on the punctuation of Callimachus, and a work Περὶ καθόλου στιγμῆς. He is copiously quoted in the Scholía Marciana on Homer. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 368, 517, vol. iii. p. 823, vol. vi. p. 345.)

4. Of Coe. He wrote a commentary on Theocritus, quoted in the Scholía on vii. 6. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 781, 798.)

5. Stephanus Byzantinus mentions a writer of this name to whom he adds that of Λεανθρος, as the author of a work called Μετονομασίαις. Athenaeus quotes the same work, but calls the writer a Cyrenian, without giving him the surname. This is probably the same writer with the Nicanor mentioned in connection with the ancient origin of the Egyptians by the Scholiast on Apollonius Rhodius, iv. 262. (Steph. Bys. s. v. Ῥῶνη; Athen. vii. p. 296; d; Apoll. Rhod. p. 160, ed. Wel-lauer.) [W. M. G.]

NICA'NOR, SAEVIUS, is celebrated by Suetonius as the first grammarian who acquired fame and honour among the Romans by teaching. He was the author of commentaries, the greater portion of which was said to have been suppressed (intercepta dicuntur), and of a satire where he declares himself to have been a freedman, and to have been distinguished by a double cognomen,—

Saeivus Nicanor, Marci libertus, negabit
Saeivus Postumius idem, at Marcus docebit.

Suetonius adds, that, according to some accounts, in consequence of reports affecting his character, he retired to Sardinia and there died. (Sueton. de Illust. Gramm. 5.) [W. R.]

NICA'NOR, of Paros, an encaustic painter, of whom we know nothing except that he painted in encaustic before Aristideia. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 39.) [P. S.]

NICARCHUS (Νικάρχος), historical. 1. An Arcadian officer among the Greek forces who went to assist the younger Cyrus. When the Greek generals were treacherously assassinated by Tissaphernes, Nicarchus was severely wounded, but not killed, and came and informed the Greeks of what had taken place. He was subsequently induced to go over to the Persians, taking about twenty men with him (Xen. Anab. ii. 5. § 33, iii. 3. § 5).

2. One of the generals of Antiochus. We find him serving in Coele Syria in the war between Antiochus and Ptolemaeus. Together with Theodotus he superintended the siege of Rabbatamana, and with the same general headed the phalanx at the battle of Raphia [ANTIOCHUS, Vol. I. p. 196]. (Polyb. v. 69, 71, 79, 83, 85.) [C. P. M.]

NICARCHUS (Νικάρχος), literary. 1. A person introduced by Aristophanes (Acharn. 856), whom Suidas mentions as a scyophant (s. v. μικρός γε μήκος and φανών).

2. An epigrammatist. Reiske (It. Notit. p. 249), on insufficient grounds, conjectures he was a native of Samos. From the use of a Latin word in one of his epigrams (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. iii. p. 66), we conclude that he lived at Rome. The inference that he lived near the beginning of the second century of the Christian era seems well founded. It is drawn not only from the general style of his writings, but from the fact, that in one of his epigrams (xxxi.) he satirizes Zopyrus, an Egyptian physician. From Plutarch (Symp. iii. 6) we learn that a physician of this name was his contemporary, and Celsus (v. 23) mentions Zopyrus in connection with king Ptolemy. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. vol. xiii. p. 922.) Thirty-eight epigrams are given under his name in the Greek Anthology. (Jacobs, vol. iii. p. 58, &c.) But the authorship of seven of these is doubtful. On the other hand, the third of Lollius Bassus, and four others of uncertain authorship, are assigned to him. The merit of these epigrams is not great. They are mostly satirical, and are often absurdly extravagant. What is worse, they are sometimes disfigured with grossness and obscenity. (Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. ll. cc. and vol. x. p. 17, &c.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 484.) [W. M. G.]

NICA'RETE (Νικαρέτη). 1. The mother of that Euxitheus, whose right of citizenship Demosthenes defended against Eubulides. (Dem. p. 1320, ed. Reiske.)

2. A courtesan, and proprietress of courtesans, amongst others of Neaera, against whom we have an oration of Demosthenes, Karà Νεαίρας. Athenaeus (xiii. p. 593, f) mentions her, but a comparison of his statements with those of Demosthenes (especially p. 1351, ed. Reiske) will show that, if the text be correct, he has misrepresented the statements of the orator.

3. A woman of Megara. Athenaeus states her to have been of good family and education, and to have been a disciple of Stilpo, a dialectic philosopher, who was alive B. C. 299. Diogenes Laërtius states that she was Stilpo's mistress, though he had a wife. (Athen. xiii. p. 596, e; Diog. Laërt. ii. 114.) Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 628) states, on the authority of Laërtius, that Nicarete was the mother-in-law of Simmia, a Syracusan. Laërtius, however, only (l. c.) mentions Stilpo's daughter as the wife of Simmia, but gives no hint as to who was her mother. [W. M. G.]

NICA'RETE (Νικαρέτη), St., a lady of good family and fortune, born at Nicomedeia in Bithynia, renowned for her piety and benevolence, and also for the numerous cures which her medical skill enabled her to perform gratuitously. She suffered great hardships during a sort of persecution that was carried on against the followers of St. Chrysostom after his expulsion from Constantinople, A. D. 404. (Sozom. Hist. Eccles. viii. 23; Niceph. Callist. Hist. Eccles. xiii. 25.) She has been canonized by the Romish Church, and her memory is celebrated on December 27 (Martyr. Rom.). Bzovius (Nomencl. Sanctor. Profess. Medic.) and after him C. B. Carpovius (De Medicis ab Eccles. pro Sanctis habit.) think it possible that Nicarete may be the lady mentioned by St. Chrysostom, as having restored him to health by her medicines (Epist. ad Olymp. 4. vol. ii. p. 571, ed. Bened.), but this conjecture is founded on a faulty reading that is now amended. (See note to the passage referred to.) [W. A. G.]

NICA'TOR, SELEUCUS. [SELEUCUS.]

NICE (Νίκη). 1. The goddess of victory, or, as the Romans called her, Victoria, is described as a daughter of Pallas and Styx, and as a sister of Zelus (zeal), Cratos (strength), and Bia (force). At the time when Zeus entered upon the fight against the Titans, and called upon the gods for assistance, Nice and her two sisters were the first that came forward, and Zeus was so pleased with their readiness, that he caused them ever after to live with him in Olympus. (Hes. Theog. 382, &c.; Apollod. i. 2. § 2.) Nice had a celebrated temple on the acropolis of Athens, which is still extant and in excellent preservation. (Paus. i. 22. § 4. iii. 15. § 5.) She is often seen represented in ancient works of art, especially together with other divinities, such as Zeus and Athena, and with conquering heroes whose horses she guides. In her appearance she resembles Athena, but has wings, and carries a palm or a wreath, and is engaged in raising a trophy, or in inscribing the victory of the conqueror on a shield. (Paus. v. 10. § 2. 11. §§ 1, 2, vi. 18. § 1; comp. Hirt, Mythol. Bilderb. p. 93, &c.)

2. A daughter of Thespis and, by Heracles, mother of Nicodromus. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.)

3. Nice also occurs as a surname of Athena, under which the goddess had a sanctuary on the acropolis of Megara. (Paus. i. 42. § 4; Eurip. Ion, 1329.) [L. S.]

NICE'PHORUS (Νικηφόρος), i. e. bringing victory, occurs as a surname of several divinities, such as Aphrodite. (Paus. ii. 19. § 6.) [L. S.]

NICEPHORUS I. (Νικηφόρος), emperor of Constantinople, A. D. 802—811, was a native of Seleucia in Pisidia, and by all sorts of court intrigues rose to the important post of logotheta, or minister of finances, with which he was invested by the empress Irene. The prime minister Aëtius, an eunuch, conspired against that excellent princess with a view of putting his brother Leo on the throne. His schemes were seen through by several of the grand functionaries of state, and a counter-conspiracy took place, which is decidedly one of the most remarkable recorded in history. The principal leaders on both sides were eunuchs, of whom seven were against Aëtius, viz., Nicetas, the commander of the guard, his two brothers, Sisinnius and Leo Clocas, the quaestor Theoctistus, Leo of Sinope, Gregorius, and Petrus, all of whom held the patrician rank. Their object was to raise Nicephorus to the throne, and they succeeded through one of those sudden strokes which are so characteristic of the revolutions of Constantinople. On the 31st of October, 802, Nicephorus was suddenly proclaimed emperor. He began his career by deceiving Irene by false promises; and no sooner had she entrusted her safety to him, than he sent her into exile in the island of Lesbos, where she died soon afterwards of misery and grief. The vices of the new master of the empire soon became so conspicuous that he incurred the hatred of the very parties to whom he was indebted for his elevation; but as he was supported by the clergy, and a crowd of reckless characters, he attacked his former friends openly, and put their leader Nicetas to death. Upon this Bardanes, surnamed the Turk, the bravest man and best general of Greece, rose in revolt, was proclaimed emperor by his adherents, and marched against Nicephorus, who was unable to vanquish him in the field, and took refuge in intrigue. Forsaken by his principal supporters Bardanes promised to submit on condition of enjoying his life and property. Both were granted him by the emperor. As soon, however, as Bardanes was in the power of his faithless rival, he was forced to take the monastic habit, had his property confiscated, was deprived of his eyes, and continued till his death to be a victim of unrelenting cruelty and revenge. In 803 Nicephorus sent ambassadors to Charlemagne, and received in his turn an embassy from the latter. A treaty was made between them, by which the frontiers of the two empires were regulated: Charlemagne was confirmed in the possession of Istria, Dalmatia, Liburnia, Slavonia, Croatia, and Bosnia; but the Dalmatian islands and sea-towns were left to Nicephorus. In these transactions Nicephorus showed no small deference to his great rival in the West, while he behaved with impudence towards his equally great rival in the East, the khalif Harun-ar-Raschid, who resented the insult by invading the empire. After a bloody war of several years, during which a great portion of Asia Minor was laid waste, Nicephorus was compelled to accept the disgraceful conditions of a peace, by which he was bound to pay to the khalif an annual tribute of 30,000 pieces of gold, out of which three were considered as being paid by the Greek emperor personally, and three others by his son Stauracius. In 807 Nicephorus set out for Bulgaria, being involved in a war with king Crum, and in the same year the Arabs ravaged Rhodes and Lycia. A dangerous conspiracy obliged him to return to Constantinople, where a few months after his arrival another one broke out of which he nearly became a victim. Through the death of Harun-ar-Raschid, in 809, Nicephorus was relieved from his most formidable enemy, but was nevertheless unable to secure peace to his subjects, king Crum of Bulgaria proving as dangerous as the khalif. In order to carry on the war against the Bulgarians with effect, Nicephorus established a strong and permanent cordon, or army of observation, along the Danube, and oppressed his people with taxes. The public indignation was roused, and an attempt was made to assassinate him. However, he was destined to die a more honourable death. Having drained the people of their gold and silver he was enabled to raise a very strong army, at the head of which he penetrated very far into Bulgaria (811), and so weakened Crum that the latter sued for peace. Nicephorus, proud of his success, rejected the request; but the barbarian king now rose with all the energy of despair, and, as often happens in such cases, ruined the man who was too sure of ruining him. The Greeks being encamped on a plain surrounded on all sides by steep rocks, intersected by a few narrow ravines, Crum contrived to block up all these defiles but one with enormous quantities of dry wood and other combustible materials, which one night were set on fire, while the Bulgarians from all sides shouted their war cries as if they intended to descend into the plain and take the camp by assault. The terrified Greeks rushed towards the only defile that was still open, but there were received by Crum with his main forces, and a conflict in the night ensued in which the Greek army was nearly destroyed, and Nicephorus lost his life, slain either by the enemy or his own enraged soldiers (25th of July 811). His son Stauracius, although badly wounded, escaped and hastened to Constantinople, where he was proclaimed emperor. (Theophan. p. 402, &c.; Cedren. p. 476, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 121, &c.; Manass. p. 93; Glyc. n. 285, &c.) [W. P.]

NICEPHORUS II. PHOCAS (Νικηφόρος ὁ Φωκάς), emperor of Constantinople A. D. 963—969, was the son of the celebrated Bardas Phocas, and was born in or about 912. He owed his elevation to those great military capacities which were hereditary in his family, and through which he obtained a fame that places him by the side of Narses, Belisarius, and the emperors Heraclius, Mauricius, and Tiberius. In 954 Constantine VII. Porphyrogenitus appointed him magnus domesticus, and his brothers Leo and Constantine, next to him the best generals, were also entrusted with great military commands. The Greeks were then at war with the khalif Modhi, against whom Nicephorus and his brothers marched in 956. The first campaign was rather disastrous to the Greeks, who were defeated in a pitched battle in which Constantine Phocas was taken prisoner by the Arabs, who afterwards put him to death. In 958 Nicephorus and Leo took a terrible revenge. Chabgan, the Arab emir of Aleppo, the terror of the Christians, had conquered Cilicia: Nicephorus defeated him several times, took Mopauestia and Tarsus, and forced him to fly into Syria, while Leo conquered the important fortress of Samosata. In an ensuing campaign in Syria the Greeks were likewise victorious, and, Romanus II. having succeeded his father Constantine in 959, Nicephorus proposed to the young emperor to drive the Arabs out of Crete, where they had established their power 136 years previously, to the great grief and annoyance of the Greeks. The expedition took place in 960, and the capital Candia, a fortress which was believed to be impregnable, having surrendered in 961, after a memorable siege of ten months, the island once more recognised the Greek rule. All Greece was in joy, and the conquest was thought to be so important, and, above all, was so unexpected, that the victor was allowed the honour of a public triumph in Constantinople. In 962 Nicephorus set out for another campaign in Syria, at the head of a splendid army of 200,000 men, according to the probably exaggerated statements of the Arabs, and of 80,000 men according to Lintprand. The passes across Mount Amanus were forced, Aleppo, Antioch, and the other principal towns of Syria surrendered, or were taken by assault, and Nicephorus pushed on towards the Euphrates. The victor was checked in his military career by the death of the emperor Romanus in 963, whose prime minister Brindas, jealous of the unparalleled success of Nicephorus, endeavoured to ruin him by intrigues. Brindas made tempting propositions to John Zimisceas and his brother Romanus Curcuna, through whose instrumentality he hoped to accomplish his objects; but those two generals, having apprised their commander-in-chief of the treachery of Brindas, Nicephorus was enabled to triumph over his rival. Theophano, the widow of Romanus, rewarded him by appointing him supreme commander of all the Greek armies in Asia, with unlimited and almost sovereign authority. In consequence of a widow, the mother of two infant princes, being placed at the head of the empire, the numerous partisans of Nicephorus persuaded him to seize the supreme power, and after some hesitation he allowed himself to be proclaimed emperor. Upon this he went to Constantinople, and consolidated his power by marrying Theophano; he was crowned in the month of December, 963; and along with him reigned, though only nominally, Basil II. and Constantine IX., the two infant sons of Romanus and Theophano.

During the absence of Nicephorus the Greeks were victorious in Cilicia, under the command of John Zimisceas, afterwards emperor, and Nicephorus having joined him in 964, they, in three campaigns, conquered Damascus, Tripoli, Nisibis, and many other cities in Syria, compelled the emir Chabgan to pay a tribute, and overran the whole country as far as the Euphrates. In 968 the Greeks crossed the Euphrates, Baghdad trembled, and the khalif seemed lost, but the death of Nicephorus, and the ensuing troubles in 969, saved the Mohammedan empire from destruction. Inflated with success Nicephorus had made himself odious to many of his subjects, and, although he was still popular with the army, the people in general, especially in Constantinople, were tired of his severity. Unfortunately for him he neglected his wife, and the bravest man in Greece fell a victim to the spite of a woman and the ambition of a jealous friend: John Zimisceas and Theophano conspired against his life. Some of their helpmates were hidden in the imperial palace, and one night, on a certain signal being given, Zimisceas came in a boat from the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus, where he was watching an opportunity, to the water-gate of the palace, joined his confederates, and, guided by Theophano, entered the emperor's bedchamber. They found him sleeping on a skin: he started up, but the sword of one Leo clove his skull and he was soon despatched. His murderer Zimisceas married his widow and succeeded him on the throne. Nicephorus Phocas was without doubt a most energetic man and a first-rate general, but his bright qualities were darkened by a very treacherous disposition, as we best see from his transactions with the emperor Otho I., which the latter entered into with a view of obtaining the hand of the princess Theophano or Theophania, the daughter of the late emperor Romanus, and stepdaughter of Nicephorus, for his son Otho, afterwards emperor. To this effect he sent, in 968, bishop Liutprand to Constantinople, who wrote a work on his embassy, which is one of the most interesting and important sources for the reign of Nicephorus, and the public and private lives of the Greeks of those times. The emperor Otho I. also endeavoured to obtain the cession of the Greek possessions in Italy, as a dowry of the princess Theophania, and it would perhaps have been advantageous to both parties if such a cession had taken place, Nicephorus being unable to defend Italy. The marriage of Otho II. with Theophania subsequently took place, but space forbids us to enter into the details of these transactions. (Liutprandus, Legatio ad Nicephorum Phocam; Cedren. p. 637, &c.; Zonar. vol. ii. p. 194, &c.; Manass. p. 114; Joel, p. 180; Glyc. p. 301, &c.) [W. P.]

NICEPHORUS III. BOTANATES (δ Βοτανάτης), emperor of Constantinople A. D. 1078—1081. He belonged to an illustrious family which boasted of a descent from the Fabii of Rome. He was looked upon as a brave general, but his military skill was the only quality that recommended him. It is related in the life of the emperor Michael VII. Parapinaces, how Michael lost his throne in consequence of the contemporaneous rebellion of Bryennius and Botaniates, the subject of this article, and that the latter succeeded Michael on the throne. Botaniates was crowned on the 25th of March, 1078, and soon afterwards married Maria, the wife of Michael, from whom she became divorced by the deposed emperor taking holy orders. Before Nicephorus could enjoy his crown he had to defend it against Bryennius, whom he routed and made a prisoner in the bloody battle of Salabrya. Bryennius met the fate of most of the unfortunate rebels: he had his eyes put out, and was finally assassinated. Nicephorus made himself so detested by his brutal manners, his ingratitude, and his debaucheries, that his short reign of three years was little more than an uninterrupted struggle against rebels, amongst whom Basilacius, who was defeated on the Vardar by Alexis Comnenus, Constantine Duca, and Nicephorus Melissenus, aspired to the throne. The last was still in arms when the two Comneni, Alexis and Isaac, were compelled to leave the court if they would maintain their dignity and independence, in consequence of which Alexis was proclaimed emperor and took up arms against his sovereign. Unable to resist the torrent, Nicephorus made propositions to Melissenus to abdicate in his favour, but Alexis Comnenus soon compelled him to do so in his own, and occupied the throne in his stead (1st of April, 1081). Nicephorus was obliged to become a monk and conform to the austere rules of St. Basil: he died some time after his deposition. His complaint that he regretted the loss of his throne and liberty less than the necessity he was under to refrain from eating meat, shows sufficiently what sort of man he was. (Zonar. vol. ii. p. 289, &c.; Bryenn. iii. 15, &c.; Scylit. p. 857, &c.; Joel, p. 185; Glyc. p. 332; Manass. p. 135.) [W. P.]

NICEPHORUS (Νικηφόρος), Byzantine

writers. 1. BLEMMIDAS or BLEMMYDAS, lived in the thirteenth century. He was descended from a distinguished and wealthy family, but, nevertheless, took holy orders, and led the life of an ascetic. Having erected a beautiful church at his own expense at Nicaea, he was appointed presbyter of it, and, by his really Christian life, gave a good example to his people. One day Marchesina, the concubine of the emperor John Duca, entered his church to hear the mass, when, to her astonishment and indignation, the honest Blemmidas ordered her to leave the church directly, and, as she refused to do so, he caused her to be turned out; in consequence of which he had to suffer much annoyance from the emperor. Theodore Lascaris, the successor of John Duca, behaved differently to him, and on the death of the patriarch Germanus, in 1255, offered him the vacant seat, which, however, Nicephorus declined. In the religious disputes between the Greeks and the Latins, Blemmidas showed himself well disposed towards the latter. The year of the death of Blemmidas is not known. He wrote various works, the principal of which are:—1. Opusculum de Processione Spiritus Sancti, &c. In this work he adopts entirely the views of the Roman catholics on the procession of the Holy Ghost and other matters; which is the more surprising, as he wrote a second work on the same subject, where he defends the opinion of the Greek church. Leo Allatius (De Consensu, ii. 14) endeavours to justify him for his want of principle, showing that he either wrote that work when very young, before he had formed a thorough conviction on the point, or that some schismatics published their opinions under the name of Blemmidas. 2. De Processione Spiritus Sancti Libri II. This is the second work, just mentioned, the first book of which is dedicated to the emperor Theodore Lascaris, and the second to Jacob, archbishop of Bulgaria, ed. Græce et Latine, by Oderius Ragnaldus, in the appendix to the first volume of his Annales Ecclesiast.; by Leo Allatius, in the first volume of Orthodoxæ Græciæ Script. 3. Epitola ad plurimos data postquam Marchesinam templo ejecit, Græce et Latine, in the second book of Leo Allatius, De Consensu. 4. Epitome Logica et Physica, Græce, Augsburg, 1605, 8vo. There are also many other writings by Blemmidas extant in manuscript, in the libraries of Munich, Rome, Paris, and other places. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1255; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 394.)

2. BRYENNIUS. [BRYENNIUS.]

3. CALLISTUS XANTHOPULUS, the celebrated author of the Ecclesiastical History, was born in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and died about 1450. According to his own saying (H. E. ii. p. 64), he had not yet completed his thirty-sixth year when he began to write that work, which he dedicated to the emperor Andronicus Palæologus the elder, who died in 1327, whence we may infer the time of his birth. His works are:—1. Historia Ecclesiastica, in twenty-three books, of which there are eighteen extant, compiled from Eusebius, Sozomenus, Socrates, Theodoretus, Evagrius, Philostorgius, and other ecclesiastical writers. The eighteen extant books contain the period from Christ down to the death of the tyrant Phocas, in 610; of the remaining five books, there are Arguments extant, from which we learn that the work was carried down to the death of the emperor Leo Philosophus, in 911; but it is questionable whether they are the production of Callistus, or of some other writer. Although Callistus compiled from the works of his predecessors, he entirely remodelled his materials, and his elegant style caused him to be called Thucydides ecclesiasticus; while his want of judgment, his credulity, and his love of the marvellous, in consequence of which his work abounds with fables, induced some critics to style him the Plinius theologorum. He had apparently studied the classical models, for his style is vastly superior to that of his contemporaries. Of this work there exists only one MS., which was originally in the library of Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary and Bohemia (1458—1490), at Ofen or Buda. When this city was taken by the Turks in 1526, the king's library was carried to Constantinople, where, soon afterwards, the MS. was purchased by a German scholar, who sold it in his turn to the imperial library in Vienna, where it is still kept. Editions: A Latin version by John Lang, of Erfurt, Basel, 1553, fol.; the same with scholia, 1560(61); Antwerp, 1560; Paris, 1562, 1573; Frankfurt, 1586, fol.; Paris, 1566, 12 vols. 8vo. The principal edition is by Fronto Ducaeus, Paris, 1630, 2 vols. fol., containing the Greek text, with Lang's translation, both carefully revised by the editor. 3. Συναγχα de Templo et Miraculis S. Mariæ ad Fontem, extant in MS. in the libraries of the Vatican and of Vienna, the latter very much damaged. 3. Catalogus Imperatorum Constantinopolitanorum, Versibus iambicis, finishing with Andronicus Palæologus the elder, who died in 1327; a later hand has added the emperors down to the capture of Constantinople. Editio princeps, the Greek text, by John Lang, Basel, 1536, 8vo.; by Labbe in Histor. Protept. Byzant., Paris, 1648; and often, the text or translation as an appendix to other works. 4. Catalogus Patriarchorum Constantinop., contains 141 persons, the last of whom is Callistus, who was made patriarch by the emperor John Cantacuzenus; later writers have added to the number; ed. ad calcem Epigrammatum Theodori Prodrumi, Basel, 1536, 8vo.; and by Labbe quoted above, who gives a similar catalogue in prose containing 149 patriarchs. 5. Catalogus Libror. Geneseos, Exodi, Levitici, Numerorum et Deuteronomi, in iambic verses, extant in MS. 6. Catalogus SS. Patrum Ecclesiæ, in eighteen iambic verses, first published by Fabricius in Bibl. Græc., quoted below. 7. Catalogus brevis Hymnographorum Ecclesiæ Græcæ, nine iambic verses, published by Fabricius, ibid. vol. xi, p. 81. 8. Menologium Sanctorum, in iambic verses, published by the same, together with Gaulmini Vita Moisi, Hamburg, 1714, 8vo. 9. Eccidium Hieronymianum, in 150 iambic verses, published with a metrical Latin version, by F. Morellus, in Expositio Thematum Dominicorum, &c., Paris, 1620, 8vo. Further, a great number of hymns, sermons, homilies, epistles, &c.; Vita S. Andree Apostoli, and other minor productions. Hody, the continuator of Cave, was of opinion that Anglicani Schismatis Redargutio, a work which he published at Oxford, 1691, 4to., ought to be ascribed to Nicephorus Callistus, but he afterwards changed his opinion. See his Letter to a Friend concerning a Collection of Canons, Oxford, 1692, 4to. That work was written about 1267. (Oudin, Comment. de Script. Ecclesiast. vol. iii. p. 709, &c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1333; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol.

vii. p. 437; Hamberger, Nachrichten von gelehrten Männern.)

4. CHARTOPHYLAX, a Byzantine monk of very uncertain age, wrote: Solutio Epistolæ II. ad Theodosium monachum, Græce et Latine, in Leunclavius, Jus Græco-Romanum, in the twelfth vol. of Biblioth. Patr. Maxim., and in Orthodoxographi. He is said to have lived in the beginning of the ninth century. Fabricius thinks he is the same as Nicephorus Diaconus et Chartophylax, who was present at the second council of Nicaea, and was afterwards raised to the patriarchate: if so, however, he would be identical with Nicephorus, the famous author of the Breviarium, who was made patriarch in 806. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 801; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. pp. 608, 674.)

5. CHUMNUS. [CHUMNUS.]

6. HIROMONACHUS. [No. 10.]

7. GREGORAS. [GREGORAS.]

8. MONACHUS, a doubtful person, lived about 1100, according to P. Possinus. One Nicephorus, a monk, is the author of Περί φυλακῆς καρδίας, De Custodia Cordis, a very interesting and valuable essay, which Possinus published, in Greek and Latin, in his Thesaurus Asceticus, Paris, 1648, 4to. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 1101; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 679.)

9. PATRIARCHA, the son of Theodorus, the notary or chief secretary of state to the emperor Constantine V. Copronymus, was born in 758, held the office of notarius to the emperor Constantine VI. (780—797), and was present at the second council of Nicaea, in 787, where he defended the images, for which his father had been twice sent into exile. Disgusted with the court intrigues he retired into a convent, and in 806 was raised to the patriarchate, after the death of the patriarch Tarasius. In 814 he strenuously opposed the emperor Leo Armenus when this prince issued his famous edict against the images. Leo, being unable to bend the stern mind of this patriarch, deposed him in 815, whereupon Nicephorus retired into the convent of St. Theodore, on one of the islands of the Propontis. There he died on the 2nd of June, 828. He is sometimes called Homologeta or Confessor, on account of his firm opposition to the iconoclasts and his ensuing deposition. Nicephorus is highly esteemed as the author of several important works, which are distinguished for their intrinsic value as much as for the style in which they are written. He wrote better than any of his contemporaries; he possessed the rare art of never saying a word too much, nor does he repeat himself, and he persuades equally through nature and art. His principal works are:

1. Κατορθωτικὸς λόγος ἱστορίας αἰσθητοῦ, Breviarium Historicum, commonly called Breviarium, one of the best works of the Byzantine period. It begins with the murder of the emperor Maurice in 602, and is carried down to the marriage of the emperor Leo IV. and Irene, in 770. Editio princeps by D. Petavius, with a Latin version and notes, Paris, 1616, 8vo., together with a fragment of Nicephorus Gregoras, the History of Georgina Pachymerea, &c. Other editions, Paris, 1648, fol., with Theophylactus; Venice, 1729. There are two French translations, one by Monterole, Paris, 1618, 8vo., and the other by Mœl, ib. 1634, 12mo. 2. Chronologia Compendiaria s. Tripartita, from Adam down to the time of the author. As early as about 672 this work was translated into Latin by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, and this version is contained in the Fabrot edition of the Ecclesiastical History of Anastasius, Paris, 1649, fol. It is also in most of the Biblioth. Patr., and was published separately by Anton. Contius, Paris, 1573, 4to. J. Camerarius made another translation, which was published together with his Commentarii, &c. de Synod. Niceana., Basel, 1561, fol. often reprinted. Further, the Greek text by Jos. Scaliger, in his Thesaurus Temporum, Leiden, 1606, fol.; Greek and Latin by J. Goaricus, ad calcem Chron. Eusebii, Paris, 1652, fol. Venice, 1729, fol. 3. 'Αντιφθρτικὸν Λόγος III., of which the first, Adversus Mamonam (id est, Constantine Copronymus) et Icononiacos was published by Canisius, in the fourth vol. of his Antiq. Lection., and in most of the Biblioth. Patr.; ample fragments of the Antirrhelica are in Combefis, Bibl. Auctuar. Paris, 1648. fol. 4. Χρυσογερπία, s. Indulus Libr. Sacror., the text with a translation by Anastasius Bibliothecarius, in Petri Pithoei Opera Posthum., Paris, 1609, 4to.; also by Pearson, in his Critic. Sacr. Pearson, in Vindicia Ignatii, thinks that the Stichometria was written by somebody who lived before our Nicephorus. 5. Confessio Fidei ad Leonem III. Papam; a Latin version in Baronius, Annales, ad an. 811; Greek and Latin, in Acta Synod. Ephes. Heidelberg, 1591, fol., together with Zonarar, Paris, 1620, and elsewhere. 6. Canones Brevescivi XVII., Greek and Latin, in the third book of Leunclavius, Jus Graec. Rom., also in the second book of Bonfinius, Jus Orientale, 1583, 8vo. 7. Canones (alii) XXXVII., Greek and Latin, in the third vol. of Cotelerius, Monument. Ecclesiae Graec. 8. Epistola continens XVII. Interrogationes de Re Canonica cum Responsionibus, ibid.

Bandurius intended to publish all the works of Nicephorus, and after completing all preparatory labours and making his work fit for the press, he published a "Conspexus," Paris, 1705, 8vo. Death prevented him from bringing out this edition of Nicephorus, which, according to the best knowledge of the writer of this article, is still in MS. in Paris: its publication is a great desideratum. The Elenchus Operum Nicephori given by Fabricius (vol. vii. p. 612, &c.) is taken from the "Conspexus," and we refer those students to it who wish to form an adequate idea of the number and importance of the works of Nicephorus. (Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 806; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 462, &c. 603, &c. 612, &c.; Hankius, Script. Byzant.)

10. PHILOSOPHUS, lived about 900, at Constantinople, where he enjoyed great esteem for his learning and genius. He wrote Oratio Panegyrica, s. Vita Antonii Caulei (Caulae) Patriarch. CP., who died in 891 (895), which is printed in Bollandi Acta Sanct., ad diem 12 Februarii. He is perhaps also the author of 'Οκτατευχός, s. Culena in Octuteuchum et Libros Regum, which is ascribed to one Nicephorus Hieromonachus. The Octateuchus was published at Venice, 1772—1773, 2 vols. fol., with a Latin version and a commentary: in the title there stands Leipzig, without a date. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 610; Cave, Hist. Lit. ad an. 895.)

12. URANUS, s. ORANUS, of uncertain age, wrote Vita S. Symeonis Stylitae j. minoris, who died in 597 (in Acta Sanctor. ad 24 diem Maii). [W.P.]

NICEFRATUS (Νικηφόρος). 1. The father of Nicias, the celebrated Athenian general. (Thuc. iii. 91; and passim.)

2. A son of Nicias, was put to death by the thirty tyrants, to whom his great wealth was no doubt a temptation. Theramenes, in his defence, as reported by Xenophon, mentions the murder of Niceratus as one of the acts which tended necessarily to alienate all moderate men from the government. On his death his wife slew herself to avoid falling into the power of the tyrants. Niceratus is spoken of as a man of very mild and benevolent disposition, and generally beloved. From Demosthenes we learn also that he was of a feeble constitution, and was childless; but the latter statement (if the reading ἀρας be the right one) is inconsistent with the account in Lysias (Xen. Hell. ii. 3. § 39; Schn. ad loc.; Diod. xiv. 5; Dica. c. Meid. p. 567; Lys. de Bonae Nicias Frat. p. 149). Niceratus is introduced as one of the characters in the Symposium of Xenophon. [E.E.]

NICEFRATUS (Νικηφόρος). To an epigrammatist of this name has been ascribed the fourth epigram of Nicanetus, already mentioned [NICAEANETUS], as of uncertain authorship. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iv. p. 485; Jacobs, Anthol. Graec. vol. vii. p. 230.) [W. M. G.]

NICEFRATUS (Νικηφόρος), a Greek writer on plants, one of the followers of Asclepiades of Bithynia (Dioscor. De Mat. Med. i. praef. vol. i. p. 2; St. Epiphani. Adv. Haeres. i. 1. 3, p. 3, ed. Colon. 1682), who is quoted by Asclepiades Pharmacion (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. ac. Loc. iii. 1, vol. xii. p. 634), and must, therefore, have lived in the latter half of the first century, a.c. His medical formulae are several times quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. vol. xiii. pp. 87, 96, 98, 110, &c., De Antid. ii. 13, vol. xiv. p. 197), and once by Pliny (H. N. xxxii. 31). Caelius Aurelianus mentions that he wrote a work on cataplasms (De Morb. ii. 5, p. 376). [W. A. G.]

NICEFRATUS, the son of Euctemon, an Athenian statuarius, flourished, as it seems from Pliny (H. N. xxxiv. 8, a. 19. §§ 19, 31), in the time of Alcibiades, of whom and his mother Demarete he made statues. He also made the Aesculapius and Hygieia, which stood, in Pliny's time, in the temple of Concord at Rome. Tatian (adv. Graec. 53, 62) mentions his statues of Telesilla and Glaucippe, respecting which see Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. c. [P.S.]

NICEROS, a painter of Thebes, the son and disciple of Aristides, and the brother of Ariston. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10, s. 36. § 23) [P.S.]

NICETAS (Νικητας), Byzantine writer. 1. ACOMINATUS (Ἀκομινάτος), also called CHONATES, because he was a native of Chonae, formerly Colossae, in Phrygia, one of the most important Byzantine historians, was born about the middle of the twelfth century, and was descended from a noble and distinguished family. The emperor Isaac II. Angelus (1185—1195) appointed him governor of Philippopolis, at a period when the revolt of the Bulgarians, and the approach of the emperor Frederic I. of Germany, with an army of 150,000 men (1189), devolved most important duties upon the governors of the large towns in Thrace. Nicetas also held the offices of hypetheta, praefectus sacri cubiculi, and others of importance, and he was honoured with the title of senator. He was present at the capture of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, of which he has given us a most impressive and, undoubtedly, faithful description. His palace was burnt down during the storm, and after many dangerous adventures he escaped, with his family, to Nicaea, through the assistance of a generous Venetian merchant. There he continued to live at the court of the emperor Theodore Lascaris, and employed his time in writing that great historical work which has brought his name down to posterity. He died at Nicaea in, or perhaps after 1216. Modern travellers have tried, but in vain, to discover his tomb. The Historia is a corollary of ten distinct works, each of which contains one or more books, of which there are twenty-one, giving the history of the emperors from 1118 down to 1206: viz. Joannes Comnenus (1118—1143), in one book; Manuel Comnenus (1143—1180), in seven books; Alexis Comnenus (1180—1183), in one book; Andronicus Comnenus (1183—1185) in two books; Isaac Angelus (1185—1195), in three books; Alexis Angelus (1195—1203), in three books; Isaac Angelus and his son Alexis (1203—1204), in one book; Alexis Ducas Murzuplus (1204), in one book; Urbs Capta, or the events during and immediately after the taking of Constantinople (1204), in one book; Baldwin of Flanders (1204—1206), in one book. The mode of quoting this historical work is thus: Nicetas, Isaac Angelus, i. 3; Urbs Capta, c. 1; Andron. Comnen. ii. 5, &c. Editions: Ed. princeps, by H. Wolf, with a Latin version, Basel, 1557, fol.; reprinted, with an index and a chronology by Simon Goulartius, Geneva, 1593, 4to; by Fabrot, with a most valuable Glossarium Graeco-barbarum, and a revised translation, notes, &c., Paris, 1647, fol. in the Paris collection of the Byzantines; the same badly reprinted, Venice, 1729, fol. The last edition is in the Bonn collection of the Byzantines, edited by J. Bekker, 1835.

A Greek MS. in the Bodleian, divided into two books, and giving an account of the conquest of Constantinople, with special regard to the statues destroyed by the Latins, is ascribed to Nicetas, but it seems to have been altered by a later writer, who made additions. The account of the statues, which is of great interest, is given by Fabricius quoted below, and critical investigations concerning this MS. are given by Harris, in his Philological Enquiries (part iii. c. 5). The work itself has been published by Wilken, under the title of Nicetas Narratio de Statuis antiquis, quas Franci, post captam anno 1204 Constantinopolim destruxerant, Lips. 1830. The four splendid brass horses at Venice were taken by the Venetians during the plunder of Constantinople in 1204, and fortunately escaped the barbarous avarice of the Latin soldiery. We cannot wonder at seeing Nicetas deeply incensed against the conquerors; but though very partial in his expressions, he is generally impartial as to facts. His style is bombastic, yet some portions of his work are most expressive and even beautiful. The History of Nicetas, as far as it treats the conquest of Constantinople, ought not to be studied without comparing it with Villehardouin's De la Conquête de Constantinople, and Paolo Ramusio's elegant work, De Bello Constantinopolitano, &c., Venice, 1635, fol.

Nicetas also wrote: Ἐναγνῆς ὁρθόδοξας, in twenty-seven books, the first five of which were translated into Latin by P. Morel (Morellus), Paris, 1561, 8vo., 1579, 1610; Geneva, 1629. They are also in the 12th vol. of the Bibl. Patr. Colon. But the whole is as yet unpublished. The complete work is extant in MS. in the Royal Library at Paris; and there is another, but somewhat abridged copy in the Bodleian. Some minor productions of Nicetas, among which a fragment on the ceremonies observed when a Mohammedan adopted the Christian religion, are extant in different libraries in Europe. Michael Choniates, the elder brother of Nicetas, wrote Μορὸβλα, being the life of Nicetas in bombastic verse, translated into Latin, and published by P. Morel, Paris, 1566, 8vo.; and also in the 25th vol. of the Bibl. Patr. Lugdun. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 737, &c.; Hankius, Script. Byzant.; Leo Allatius, De Nicetis; Hamberger, Nachrichten von gelehrten Männern; Harris, l.c.)

2. ARCHIDIACONUS et Chartophylax Magnae Ecclesiae Constantinopolitanae, lived about 1080, and wrote Ἀναθεματισμοὶ II., Anathematismi contra Joannem Philosophum Italum, a treatise on the orthodox faith, which is still esteemed in the Greek church, though it was never printed. It is extant in MS. at Venice. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1080; Leo Allat. De Consensu Utriusque Eccles. l. ii. c. 10.)

3. BYZANTINUS, a monk who lived about 1120, wrote Tractatus Apologeticus pro Synodo Chalcedonensi adversus Armeniae Principem, ed. Leo Allatius, Graece et Latine, in the first vol. of Græcia Orthodoxa, Rome, 1652, 4to.; some ascribe this work to Nicetas Paphlago. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1120; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 746.)

4. DAVID. [See No. 9.]

5. EUGENIANUS, lived probably towards the end of the twelfth century, and wrote in poetry "The History of the Lives of Drusilla and Charicles," which is the worst of all the Greek romances that have come down to us. It was published for the first time by Boissonade, together with the fragments of an erotic poem by Constantinus Munasses, 1819, 2 vols.

6. GEORGIUS, of uncertain age, wrote Epistolæ de Creatione Hominis, extant in MS. at Vienna. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. xii. p. 53.)

7. MARONITA, chartophylax, and afterwards archbishop of Thessalonica, lived about 1200, and devoted himself well disposed towards the contemplated union of the Greek and Latin churches. He wrote: 1. De Processione Spiritus Sancti Dialogorum Libri VIII., in which he introduces a Greek and a Latin discussing the above subject. Leo Allatius (Contra Hottinger. c. 19) gives some fragments of it. 2. Responsio ad Interrogationes Basilii Monachi, Graec. et Lat. in Leunclavius, Jus Graeco-Rom. 3. Responsio ad Interrogationes de diversis Casibus Ecclesiæ, ibid. 4. De Miraculis S. Demetrii Martyris, extant in the Bodleian. 5. Expositio Canonum s. Canticozum S. Joan. Damasceni, extant in MS. in Vienna. He also wrote some minor works. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1201.)

8. NICAENUS, chartophylax at Nicaea, of uncertain age, wrote De Schismate inter Eccles. Graecam et Romanam, extant in MS. in Paris and elsewhere; Leo Allatius gives a fragment of it in De Synodo Photian. Also perhaps De Azy-

mas et Sabbatorum Jejuniis, et Nuptiis Sacerdotum, which others ascribe to Nicetas Pectoratus. (Cave, Hist. Liter. D. p. 14.)

9. PAPHLAGO, DAVID, perhaps bishop of Dadybri in Paphlagonia, lived about 880, and became known by his attachment to the patriarch Ignatius, and by his attacks upon Photius. He wrote: — 1. Vita S. Ignatii Patriarchae, Graece et Latine, in Raderus (Acta Concilii, 8vo. Ingolstadt, 1004, 4to.); and also in the 8th vol. of Concilia. 2. Apostolorum XII. Encomia XII. 3. Orationes, viz in Marcum Evangelistam, in Nativitatem S. Mariae, in Exaltationem S. Crucis, in S. Gregorium Theologum, Oratio Panegyrica in S. Hyacinthum Amasirensen Martyrem, all of which together with the Encomia Apostolorum were published with a Latin translation by Combéfiis in Novissimum Auctarium, Paris, 1672, fol. 4. Oratio Panegyrica in inclytum Martyrem Eusebium, &c. ed. Graece et Lat. with notes by Combéfiis, in Illustrium Chrysi Martyrum Triumphum, Paris, 1660, 8vo. 5. Historia Apocrypha, lost. Nicophorus Callistus borrowed freely from it for his Historia Eccles. 6. Liber pro Synodo Chalcedonensi adversus Epistolam Regis Armeniae, more probably the work of Nicetas Byzantinus [No. 3]. 7. Commentarii in Gregor. Nazianzenum Tetrasticha et Monosticha, perhaps the work of Nicetas Serron. The text, Venice, 1563, 4to.; a Latin version, Imola, 1588, 8vo. 7. Several hymns and minor productions. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 880; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 747.)

10. PECTORATUS or STETHATUS (Στεθάτος), (Sterno), a monk of Constantinople, lived in the middle of the 11th century, and became known through his violent opposition to the union of the two churches, and his attacks upon Cardinal Humbertus and the other legates of the Pope at Constantinople. He wrote: — 1. Liber adversus Latinos de Azyriis et Sabbatorum Jejuniis, et Nuptiis Sacerdotum, ascribed by some to Nicetas Niceaeus. It was published by Bunsen in the 3d vol. of Canisius, Lectio. Antiq., and also by Baronius in the Appendix to the 11th vol. of the Annales. 2. Tractatus de Anima, extant in MS. 3. Carmen in Synonem juniozem, ed. Graece Leo Allatius in his Diatriba de Symeon. 4. Some minor productions extant in MSS. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1050; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 753.)

11. RHETOR, perhaps identical with Nicetas Paphlago. Among other productions the following are ascribed to him: — 1. Several Orationes known to Leo Allatius. 2. Diatriba in gloriosum Martyrem Pantielemoneum. 3. De Certamine et de Inventionem, &c. Reliquiarum S. Stephani Protomartyria. 4. Encomium in Magnum Nicolaum Myrobaleptem et Thaumaturgum. None of these have been published. (Cave, Hist. Liter. D. p. 14.)

12. SCUTARIOTA, a native of Scutari, opposite Constantinople, of uncertain age, wrote: — 1. Homiliae 111. 2. Scholias sive Annotationes in Nicetae Acominati Thesaurum Orthodox. 3. Epistolae, De Arte Rhetorica, poems and other minor productions extant in MSS. in Paris and elsewhere. (Cave, Hist. Liter. D. p. 15; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 755.)

13. SEMUS, a violent opponent of the Latins, against whom he wrote a small work, a Latin translation of which begins "Non simpliciter antiquis novis venerabiliora, &c." and of which Leo

Allatius gives some fragments in De Constantino, t. 14. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1110.)

14. SERRON, archbishop of Serrae or Serres in Macedonia, and afterwards of Heracleia, lived in the 11th century, and has often, by Leo Allatius for instance, been confounded with Nicetas Paphlago. He wrote: — 1. Commentarii in XVI. Nazianzenum Orationes, published ad calcem Opera Nazianzenum, and separately, under the name of Nicetas David Paphlago, Venice, 1563, 4to. 2. Responsa Canonica ad Interrogationes casualem Constantini Episcopi, Graece et Latine in Leunclavius, Jus Graeco-Romanum. 3. Catena in Jobem, a compilation ascribed by some to one Olympiodorus. Edit: A Latin version, by Paulus Comitulus, Venice, 1587, 4to.; Graece et Latine, by Patricius Junius, London, 1637, fol. 4. Catenae in Lucam, Matthaeum aliosque, perhaps. (Cave, Hist. Liter. ad an. 1077; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. viii. p. 431; Hamberger, Nachrichten von gelehrten Männern.)

15. THESSALONICENSIS, was archbishop of Thessalonica, and wrote Dialogi Sex de Processione Spiritus Sancti, of which Leo Allatius gives a fragment in Contra Hottinger. Nicetas of Thessalonica lived about 1200; he has often been confounded with Nicetas Acominatus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vii. p. 756.) [W. P.]

NICETAS, or, as his name is variously written, Nicaeas or Nicoas, or Nicetus or Nicoctus, was by birth a Dacian, and bishop of a city called by ecclesiastical writers Civitas Romaniana or Romesianensis, situated in Maesia, somewhere between Naissus and Sardica. This prelate visited Italy towards the close of the fourth century, and having repaired to Nola for the purpose of visiting the sepulchre of St. Felix, there gained the good-will of Paulinus, who celebrates, in a poem still extant, the high talents and virtues of his friend, and the zeal with which he laboured in preaching the Gospel among the barbarians. Nicetas paid a second visit to Nola a. d. 402, and it appears from an epistle of Pope Innocentius I. (n. xvii. ed. Coustant), where he is numbered among the dignitaries of Macedonia, that he was alive in 414.

Considerable confusion has been occasioned by the mistake of Baronius, who supposed that Nicetas the Dacian, mentioned in the Roman Martyrology under 7th January, was a different person from the Nicaeas Romanianae civitatis episcopus of Gennadius, and that the latter was the same with the Nicaeas of Aquileia, to whom a letter was addressed by Leo the Great in a. d. 458, — an hypothesis which forced him to prove that Aquileia bore the name of Civitas Romaniana. But the researches of Holstein, Quessel and Tillemont have set the question at rest.

Gennadius informs us that Nicetas composed in a plain but elegant style instructions for those who were preparing for baptism, in six books, of which he gives the arguments, and also Ad Iapaeum Virginem Libellus. Of these, the former is certainly lost, but we find among the works of St. Jerome (vol. xi. p. 178, ed. Vallarsi, vol. v. ed. Bened.), a tract entitled Objurgatio ad Suseannam Iapaeum, and among the works of St. Ambrose (vol. ii. p. 301. ed. Bened.) the same piece under the name Tractatus ad Virginem Iapaeum, although it can be proved by the most convincing arguments that neither of these dignities could have been the author. Hence it was conjectured by Cotelierius that it might, in reality, belong to Nicetas, and his opinion has been very generally adopted, although the matter seems to be involved in great doubt. (Gennadius, de Viris Illustr. 22; Schönmann, Bibliotheca Patrum Lat. vol. ii. § 17.) [W. R.]

NICETAS or NICAEAS was, as we have noticed above, bishop of Aquileia in the middle of the fifth century. His remains have been carefully collected from various sources by Mai in the "Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio e Vaticanis Codicibus edita," 4to. Rom. 1833, vol. vii. p. 314—340. They consist of four short tracts:—1. De Ratione Fidei. 2. De Spiritus Sancti Potentia. 3. De diversis Appellationibus Domino nostro Jesu Christo convenientibus. 4. Explanatio Symboli habita ad compentes, together with six fragments of a few lines each.

NICETAS, who was bishop of Trèves in the middle of the sixth century, does not fall within the limits of this work. [W. R.]

NICETAS (Nuctras), a physician, to whom is addressed one of the letters of Theophylactus, archbishop of Bulgaria (Ep. 55). He is there styled "Physician to the King," and must have lived in the eleventh century after Christ. He is, perhaps, the same person as the compiler of a collection of surgical treatises, who is supposed to have lived at Constantinople at the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century after Christ. It contains extracts from the works of Hippocrates, Soranus, Rufus, Galen, Orisbaeus, Paulus Aegineta, and other writers of less note; and is to be found in MS. in the Libraries at Paris (Codd. 2247, 2248), and Florence. Of the Laurentian MS., which is very ancient and valuable, a full account is given by Bandini in his Catal. Cod. Græc. Biblioth. Laurent. (vol. iii. p. 53, &c. cod. 7), where he has also inserted a complete list of the chapters contained in the volume, to the number of five hundred and eighteen. A part of the contents of this MS. was published at Florence, 1754 fol. by Antonio Cocchi, with the title:—"Græcorum Chirurgici Libri: Sorani unus de Fracturorum Signis, Orisbaei duo de Fractis et de Luxatis, e Collectione Nicetæ," &c. &c. The editor has added a Latin translation, and some valuable notes. The Commentary of Apollonius Chionensis on Hippocrates "De Articulis" was extracted from this collection. [APOLLONIUS, p. 245]. (See Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltern Medicin; Dietz's Preface to his Scholæ in Hippocr. et Gal.) [W. A. G.]

NICIAS (Nicias), historical. 1. A native of Gortyn, in Crete. He was connected with the Athenians by the ties of proxenia, and it was at his request that the reinforcements sent to Phormion, when engaged on the west of Greece in B. C. 429, were ordered to stop on their way at Crete, to attack Cydonia. (Thuc. ii. 85.)

2. The father of Hagnon, the Athenian general. (Thuc. ii. 58.)

3. One of the most celebrated of the Athenian generals engaged during the Peloponnesian war. He was the son of Niceratus, from whom he inherited a large fortune, derived mainly from the silver mines at Laureium, of which he was a very large leasee, employing in them as many as 1000 slaves. (Xen. Mem. ii. 5. § 2, de Vect. 4. § 14; Athen. vi. p. 272, e.) His property was valued at 100 talents. (Lys. pro Arist. Bonis. p. 648.) From this cause, combined with his unambitious character, and his aversion to all dangerous innovations, he was naturally brought into connection with the aristocratical portion of his fellow-citizens. He was several times associated with Pericles, as strategus; and his great prudence and high character gained for him considerable influence. On the death of Pericles he came forward more openly as the opponent of Cleon, and the other demagogues of Athens; but from his military reputation, the mildness of his character, and the liberal use which he made of his great wealth, he was looked upon with respect, and some measure of attachment, by all classes of the citizens. His timidity led him to buy off the attacks of the sycophants. This feature of his character was ridiculed by more than one comic poet of the day. The splendour with which he discharged the office of choregus exceeded anything that had been seen before. On one occasion, when charged with the conduct of the Theoria to Delos, he made a remarkable display of his wealth and munificence. To prevent the confusion which usually ensued when the Chorus landed at Delos amidst the crowd of spectators, he landed first at Rheneia; and having had a bridge prepared before he left Athens, it was thrown across the channel between Rheneia and Delos, in the course of the night, and by day-break it was ready, adorned in the most sumptuous manner with gilding and tapestry, for the orderly procession of the Chorus. After the ceremonies were over he consecrated a brazen palm tree to Apollo, together with a piece of land, which he purchased at the cost of 10,000 drachmae, directing that the proceeds of it should be laid out by the Delians in sacrifices and feasts; the only condition which he annexed being, that they should pray for the blessing of the god upon the founder. His strong religious feeling was perhaps as much concerned in this dedication, as his desire of popularity. It was told of him that he sacrificed every day, and even kept a soothsayer in his house, that he might consult the will of the gods not only about public affairs, but likewise respecting his own private fortunes. Aristophanes ridicules him rather severely in the Equites for his timidity and superstition (l. 28, &c. 80, 112, 358). The excessive dread which Nicias entertained of informers led him to keep as much as possible in retirement. He made himself difficult of access; and the few friends who were admitted to his privacy industriously spread the belief that he devoted himself with such untiring zeal to the public interests, as to sacrifice enjoyment, sleep, and even health, in the service of the state. His characteristic caution was the distinguishing feature of his military career. He does not seem to have displayed any very great ability, still less anything like genius, in the science of strategy; but he was cautious and wary, and does not appear on a single occasion to have been guilty of any act of remissness, unless it were in the siege of Syracuse. Hence his military operations were almost invariably successful. In B. C. 427 he led an expedition against the island of Minoa, which lies in front of Megara, and took it. (Thuc. iii. 51.) In the following year he led an armament of sixty triremes, with 2000 heavy-armed soldiers, against the island of Melos. He ravaged the island, but the town held out; and the troops being needed for an attack upon Tanagra, he withdrew, and, after ravaging the coast of Locria, returned home.

(Thuc. iii. 91 ; Diod. xii. 65.) He was one of the generals in B. C. 425, when the Spartans were shut up in Sphacteria. The amusing circumstances under which he commissioned his enemy, Cleon, to reduce the island, have already been described in the article CLEON [Vol. I. p. 797]. In the same year Nicias led an expedition into the territory of Corinth. He defeated the Corinthians in battle, but, apprehending the arrival of reinforcements for the enemy's troops, he re-embarked his forces. Two of the slain, however, having been left behind, whom the Athenians had not been able to find at the time, Nicias resigned the honours of victory for the purpose of recovering them, and sent a herald to ask for their restoration. He then proceeded to Crommyon, where he ravaged the land, and then directed his course to the territory of Epidaurus. Having carried a wall across the isthmus connecting Methone with the main land, and left a garrison in the place, he returned home. (Thuc. iv. 42—45 ; Diod. xii. 65.) In B. C. 424, with two colleagues, he led an expedition to the coasts of Laconia and captured the island of Cythera, a success gained with the greater facility, as he had previously had negotiations with some of the Cytherians. He stationed an Athenian garrison in the island, and ravaged the coast of Laconia for seven days. On his return he ravaged the territory of Epidaurus in Laconia, and took Thyrea, where the Spartans had settled the Aeginetans after their expulsion from their own island. These Aeginetans having been conveyed to Athens were put to death by the Athenians. (Thuc. iv. 54 ; Diod. l. c.) In B. C. 423, Nicias and Nicostratus were sent with an army to Chalcidice to check the movements of Brasidas. They obtained possession of Mende, and blockaded Scione ; while thus engaged they entered into an agreement with Perdiccas. Having finished the circumvallation of Scione, they returned home. (Thuc. iv. 130—132.)

The death of Cleon removed out of the way of Nicias the only rival whose power was at all commensurate with his own, and he now exerted all his influence to bring about a peace. He had secured the gratitude of the Spartans by his humane treatment of the prisoners taken at Sphacteria, so that he found no difficulty in assuming the character of mediator between the belligerent powers. The negotiations ended in the peace of B. C. 421, which was called the peace of Nicias on account of the share which he had had in bringing it about. (Thuc. v. 16, 19, 24, vii. 86.) In consequence of the opposition of the Boeotians, Corinthians, and others, and the hostile disposition of Argos, this peace was soon followed by a treaty of defensive alliance between Athens and Sparta. According to Theophrastus, Nicias, by bribing the Spartan commissioners, contrived that Sparta should take the oaths first. Grounds for dissatisfaction, however, speedily arose between the two states. The jealousy felt by the Athenians was industriously increased by Alcibiades, at whose suggestion an embassy came from Argos in B. C. 420, to propose an alliance. The Spartan envoys who came to oppose it were entrapped by Alcibiades into exhibiting an appearance of double dealing, and it required all the influence of Nicias to prevent the Athenians from at once concluding an alliance with Argos. He induced them to send him at the head of an embassy to Sparta to demand satisfaction with respect to the points on which the Athenians felt themselves aggrieved. The Spartan government would not comply with their demands, and Nicias could only procure a fresh ratification of the existing treaties. On his return the alliance with Argos was resolved on. (Thuc. v. 43, 46.)

The dissensions between Nicias and Alcibiades now greatly increased, and the ostracism of one or other began to be talked of. The demagogue Hyperbolus strove to secure the banishment of one of them that he might have a better chance of making head against the other. But Nicias and Alcibiades, perceiving his designs, united their influence against their common enemy, and the ostracism fell on Hyperbolus.

In B. C. 415, the Athenians resolved on sending their great expedition to Sicily, on the pretext of assisting the Segestaeans and Leontines. Nicias, Alcibiades, and Lamachus were appointed to the command. Nicias, who, besides that he disapproved of the expedition altogether, was in feeble health, did all that he could to divert the Athenians from this course. He succeeded in getting the question put again to the vote ; but even his representations of the magnitude of the preparations required did not produce the effect which he wished. On the contrary, the Athenians derived from them grounds for still greater confidence ; and Nicias and the other generals were empowered to raise whatever forces they thought requisite. When the armament arrived at Rhegium, finding the hopes which the Athenians had entertained with regard to the Segestaeans futile, in a conference of the generals Nicias proposed that they should call upon the Segestaeans to provide pay, if not for the whole armament, at least for the amount of the succours which they had requested, and that, if they furnished these, the forces should stay till they had brought the Selinuntines to terms, and then return home, after coasting the island to display the power of Athens. But the intermediate plan of Alcibiades was finally adopted. After the recall of Alcibiades Nicias found no difficulty in securing the concurrence of Lamachus in his plans. From Catana, which had come over to the Athenians and been made their head-quarters, Nicias and Lamachus proceeded with all their forces towards Segesta. On their way they captured Hyccara. Nicias went himself to Segesta, but could only obtain thirty talents. On their return they seem to have remained almost inactive for some time, but in the autumn they prepared to attack Syracuse. By a skilful stratagem the Athenians without molestation took possession of a station near the Olympieum, by the harbour of Syracuse. A battle took place the next day, in which the Syracusans were defeated. But, being in want of cavalry and money, the Athenians sailed away, and for the first part of the winter took up their station at Naxos. They were unsuccessful in their endeavours to induce Camarina to join them, but secured the assistance of several of the Sicel tribes. Even some Etruscan cities promised aid, and envoys were sent to Carthage. From Naxos Nicias removed to Catana. Additional supplies were sent from Athens, and arrived at Catana in the spring (B. C. 414). Nicias now made preparations for seizing Epipoles, in which he was successful ; and the circumvallation of Syracuse was immediately commenced. The work proceeded rapidly, and all attempts of the Syracusans to stop its were defeated. In a battle which took place in the marsh Lamachus was slain. It fortunately happened at this juncture that Nicias, who was afflicted with a painful disorder of the eyes, was left upon Epipolæ, and his presence prevented the Syracusans from succeeding in a bold attempt which they made to gain possession of the heights and destroy the Athenian works. This circumvallation was now nearly completed, and the doom of Syracuse seemed sealed, when Gylippus arrived in Sicily [GYLIPIPPUS]. Nicias, for the first time in his life probably, allowed his confidence of success to render him remiss, and he neglected to prevent Gylippus from making his way into Syracuse. He seems now to have supposed that he should be unable to stop the erection of a counter-wall on Epipolæ, and therefore abandoned the heights and established his army on the headland of Plemmyrium, where he erected three forts. His forces were defeated in an attempt to hinder the completion of the counterwork of the Syracusans. Succours were now called in by the Syracusans from all quarters, and Nicias found himself obliged to send to Athens for reinforcements, as his ships were becoming unsound, and their crews were rapidly thinned by deaths and desertions. He requested at the same time that another commander might be sent to supply his place, as his disorder rendered him unequal to the discharge of his duties. The Athenians voted reinforcements, which were placed under the command of Demosthenes and Eurymedon. But they would not allow Nicias to resign his command.

Meantime, Gylippus induced the Syracusans to try their fortune in a sea-fight. During the heat of the action he gained possession of the forts on Plemmyrium. The sea-fight at first was against the Athenians; but the confusion caused by the arrival of the reinforcements to the Syracusans from Corinth enabled the Athenians to attack them at an advantage, and gain a victory. Other contests followed in the great harbour, and in a severe engagement the Athenians were defeated with considerable loss. But at this moment the Athenian reinforcements arrived.

At the suggestion of Demosthenes, a bold attempt was made in the night to recover Epipolæ, in which the Athenians, after being all but successful, were finally driven back with severe loss. Demosthenes now proposed to abandon the siege and return to Athens. To this Nicias would not consent. He professed to stand in dread of the Athenians at home, but he appears to have had reasons for believing that a party amongst the Syracusans themselves were likely in no long time to facilitate the reduction of the city, and, at his urgent instance, his colleagues consented to remain for a little longer. But meantime fresh succours arrived for the Syracusans; sickness was making ravages among the Athenian troops, and at length Nicias himself saw the necessity of retreating. Secret orders were given that every thing should be in readiness for departure, supplies were countermanded, and nothing seemed likely to prevent their unmolested retreat, when an eclipse of the moon happened. The credulous superstition of Nicias now led to the total destruction of the Athenian armament. The soothsayers interpreted the event as an injunction from the gods that they should not retreat before the next full moon, and Nicias resolutely determined to abide by their decision. The Syracusans now resolved to bring the enemy to an engagement, and, after some successful skirmishing, in a decisive naval battle defeated the Athenians, though a body of their land forces received an unimportant check. They were now masters of the harbour, and the Athenians were reduced to the necessity of making a desperate effort to escape. Nicias exerted himself to the utmost to encourage the men, but the Athenians were decisively defeated, and could not even be induced to attempt to force their way at day-break through the bar at the mouth of the harbour. They set out on their retreat into the interior of Sicily. Nicias, though bowed down by bodily as well as mental sufferings, used all his arguments to cheer the men. For the details of the retreat the reader is referred to Thucydides. Nicias and Demosthenes, with the miserable remnant of the troops, were compelled to surrender. Gylippus was desirous of carrying Nicias to Sparta; but those of the Syracusans with whom Nicias had opened a secret correspondence, fearing lest its betrayal should bring them into difficulties, eagerly urged that he should be put to death. His execution draws the following just remarks from Bishop Thirlwall (Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. p. 455): "His death filled up the measure of a singular destiny, by which the reputation he had acquired by his prudence and fortune, his liberality and patriotism, his strength as well as his weakness, all the good and the bad qualities of his mind and character, his talents and judgment, as well as his credulity and superstition, his premature timidity, his tardy courage, his long-protracted wavering and his unseasonable resolution, contributed in nearly equal degrees to his own ruin and to the fall of his country. The historian deploras his undeserved calamity; but the fate of the thousands whom he involved in his disasters was perhaps still more pitiable." According to Pausanias (i. 29. § 12), his name was omitted on a monument raised at Athens to the memory of those who fell in Sicily, because he surrendered himself voluntarily. (Plut. Nicias; Diod. xii. 83, &c.; Thuc. vi. and vii.; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. iii. cc. 25 and 26.)

4. A herald of Philip, king of Macedonia, who was carried off from Macedonia, and kept ten months in custody at Athens. The letters of which he was the bearer were publicly read at Athens. (Philippi Epist. in Dem. Op. p. 159, ed. Reiske).

5. An Athenian, a relative of Apollodorus, who brought a suit against Phormion, on whose behalf Demosthenes wrote the speech ὕπερ Φορμιωνος. Nicias, Deinias, and Andromenes had induced Apollodorus to desist from a previous suit of the same kind. Nicias and Apollodorus married sisters, the daughters of Deinias. Nicias was uncle to a man named Stephanus, by whom he was stripped of his property. (Dem. adv. Steph. p. 1122, ed. Reiske.)

6. An officer in the service of Alexander the Great. After the capture of Sardes, he was appointed to collect the revenues of the province. (Arrian, i. 17. § 8.)

7. A friend and relation of Mennaenus, and a general in the service of Ptolemaeus Philopator. He was sent to oppose Antiochus and succour the city of Abila, but was defeated. (Polyb. v. 71.)

8. Praetor of the Achaean league in B.C. 207 (Liv. xxviii. 8.)

9. An officer in the service of Perses, king of Macedonia. He seems to have been in command at Pella. When the fortunes of Perseus appeared desperate, in a moment of bewilderment he gave directions to Nicias to throw his treasures into the sea, and to Andronicus to burn his fleet. The former executed the commands of the king, though a large part of the treasure was afterwards recovered. But Perseus, to get rid of the witnesses of such an act of folly, had both Nicias and Andronicus put to death, A. C. 169. (Liv. xlv. 10.)

10. A native of Coa, who made himself tyrant for a short time. He was a contemporary of Strabo. (Strab. xiv. p. 658.) [C. P. M.]

NICIAS (Nuklas), literary. 1. Of Eleia. To him some attributed the Βαρχικά, a poem generally ascribed to Orpheus. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. i. pp. 164, 172.)

2. A rhetorician of Syracuse, who, with Tisias, instructed Lycias, A. C. 443. (Suid. s. v. Αυτοίας.) Westermann (Gesch. der Griech. Bered. p. 38) suggests that the separate mention of a Syracusan Nicias may have arisen from the confusion of names. For though many writers mention him along with Tisias, they seem to have all drawn from one common source.

3. A slave of Epicurus, manumitted along with Mys and Lycon, B. C. 278. (Diog. Laërt. p. 272, ed. Lond. 1664.)

4. Of Nicaea, repeatedly referred to by Athenaeus, who names three works of his. These are, 1. Διαδοχαί, which seem to have been memoirs of the various schools of philosophy (vi. p. 273, d., xiii. p. 592, a.). 2. Ἀκραβικά, which may have been an account of Arcadian usages, perhaps a portion of a larger work on Greek local usages (xiii. p. 609, e., where Athenaeus simply speaks of him as Nuklas). 3. A history Περὶ τῶν φιλοσοφῶν (iv. p. 162, e.). But by comparing this passage, wherein he quotes Sotion, as the writer of the Διαδοχαί, with another (xi. p. 505, b. c.), where he mentions their names together, we think that we may justly conclude, that, through inadvertence, or an error in the text, the names of Nicias and Sotion have become interchanged, and that the history is to be transferred to Sotion. We have no means of ascertaining his age, except that he must have lived after Plato. (Athen. ii. cc.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 770.)

5. A Coan grammarian, who lived at Rome in the time of Cicero, with whom he was intimate. Suetonius (de Illust. Gramm. 14) calls him, if the ordinary reading be correct, Curtius Nicia. He also mentions (l. c.) that he originally belonged to the party of Pompey, but that, having endeavoured to involve Pompey's wife in an intrigue with Memmius, he was betrayed by her, and disgraced by his former patron. From the scattered notices of him found in Cicero, we may conclude that he was of an amiable disposition, but soft and effeminate. We nowhere read of his having any great reputation. In one passage (ad Attic. vii. 3) Cicero does not seem to trust much to his authority as to the question, whether Piræaea was the name of a locus or of an oppidum. If we may trust a corrupt passage in Suetonius (l. c.), he wrote a treatise on the writings of Lucilius. (Sueton. l. c.; Cic. ad Fam. ix. 10, ad Att. l. c. xii. 26, 53, xiii. 28; Clinton, R. H. vol. iii. p. 207.) Cicero's letters that mention him extend from B. C. 50 to 45.

6. A monk, who lived A. D. 601. He wrote:

1. Against the διακρίσεις of Philoponus. 2. Against Severus, the Eutychian. 3. Against the Pagans. He is not to be confounded with NICARAE. (Cave, Hist. Lit. Sc. Ec. vol. i. p. 695; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 494.) His writings are not extant. [W. M. G.]

NICIAS (Nuklas), the name of at least two physicians.

1. The physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epeirus, who, during his master's war with the Romans, went to C. Fabricius Luscinus, the consul, A. C. 278, and offered for a certain reward to take off the king by poison. (Cland. Quadrigar. ap. Aul. Gell. Noct. Att. iii. 8; Zonaras, Annal. vol. ii. p. 48, ed. Basel, 1557.) Fabricius not only rejected his base offer with indignation, but immediately sent him back to Pyrrhus with notice of his treachery, who, upon receiving the information, is said to have cried out, "This is that Fabricius whom it is harder to turn aside from justice and honour than to divert the sun from its course." (Eutrop. ii. 14.) Zonaras adds (l. c. p. 50), that the traitor was put to death, and his skin used to cover the seat of a chair.

2. A native of Nicopolis, in the second century after Christ, introduced by Plutarch in his Symposiaca (vii. l. § 1), as one of the speakers in the discussion, whether what is drunk enters the lungs. Nicias rightly maintained that it did not.

The writer on stones, Περὶ λίθων, quoted by Plutarch (Parall. § 13, De Flav. c. 20. § 4) and Stobaeus (Floril. tit. 100. § 12. p. 541), is a different person, and does not appear to have been a physician, though so classed by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. p. 346, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

NICIAS, a celebrated Athenian painter, was the son of Nicomedes, and the disciple of Antidotus (Plin. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 28). On this ground Sillig argues that since Antidotus was the pupil of Euphranor, who flourished about the 104th Olympiad, Nicias must have flourished about Ol. 117 or about A. C. 310. And this agrees with the story of Plutarch about the unwillingness of Nicias to sell one of his pictures to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, if we suppose Ptolemy I. to be meant (Non poss. suoc. vno. sec. Epicureos, 11). On the other hand, Pliny tells us that Nicias assisted Praxiteles in statuas circumambulantis, that is, covering marble statues with a sort of encaustic varnish, by which a beautifully smooth and tinted surface was given to them (see Dict. of Antiq. PAINTING, § viii.). Now Praxiteles flourished in the 104th Olympiad, A. C. 364–360. We must therefore either suppose that Nicias thus painted the statues of Praxiteles a considerable time after they were made, which is not very probable in itself, and is opposed to Pliny's statement; or else that Pliny has confounded two different artists, indeed he himself suggests that there may have been two artists of the name. (See Sillig, Catal. Artif. s. v.) But, plausible as this argument is, it is not conclusive, for the division of a master and pupil by seven or eight Olympiads is an arbitrary assumption. A pupil may be, and often is, nearly the same age as his teacher, and sometimes even older. Again, Pliny's dates are very loosely given; we can never tell with certainty whether they are meant to mark the early or the middle or the latter part of an artist's career. In the case of Praxiteles, we know that he executed great works considerably later than the date assigned by Pliny. Supposing then that Nicias, as a young man, assisted Praxiteles when in the height of his fame (and it is not likely that Nicias would have been so employed after he had obtained an independent reputation), and that his refusal to sell his picture to Ptolemy occurred when he was old, and had gained both reputation and wealth enough, there remains no positive anachronism in supposing only one artist of this name.

* Aelian calls the physician by the name of Cineas (Var. Hist. xii. 33); and Ammianus Marcellinus (xxx. 1), Valerius Antias (ap. Aul. Gell. l. c.), and Valerius Maximus (vi. 5. § 1), tell the story of one of the friends of Pyrrhus, whom the first-named author calls Demochares, and the two others Timochares.

Nicias was the most celebrated disciple of Euphranor. He was extremely skilful in painting female figures, careful in his management of light and shade, and in making his figures stand out of the picture (Plin. l. c.). The following works of his are enumerated by Pliny (l. c.): they seem to have been all painted in encaustic. A painting of Nemea, sitting on a lion, holding a palm in her hand, with an old man standing by with a staff, over whose head was a picture of a biga. This last point is not very intelligible; Lessing has endeavoured to clear it up (Lucoon, p. 280, note): Nicias placed on this picture the inscription, Νίκιας ἐνέκαυεν: the picture was carried from Asia to Rome by Silanus, and Augustus had it fastened into the wall of the curia which he dedicated in the comitium (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 4. a. 10). Father Liber in the temple of Concord. A Hyacinthus, painted as a beautiful youth, to signify the love of Apollo for him (comp. Paus. iii. 19. § 4); Augustus was so delighted with the picture that he carried it to Rome after the taking of Alexandria, and Tiberius dedicated it in the temple of Augustus. A Diana, probably at Ephesus, as Pliny mentions in immediate connection with it the sepulchre of Megabyzus, the priest of Diana, at Ephesus, as painted by Nicias. Lastly, what appears to have been his master-piece, a representation of the infernal regions as described by Homer (Nekula, Necromantia Homeri); this was the picture which Nicias refused to sell to Ptolemy, although the price offered for it was sixty talents (Plutarch, loc. sup. cit.): Pliny tells the same story of Attalus, which is a manifest anachronism. Plutarch also tells that Nicias was so absorbed in the work during its progress, that he used often to have to ask his servants whether he had dined. From the above pictures, Pliny distinguishes the following as grandes picturas: Calypso, Io, Andromeda, an admirable Alexander (Paris), and a sitting Calypso, in the porticoes of Pompey. Some pictures of animals were attributed to him: he was particularly happy in painting dogs.

Pausanias (vii. 22. § 4) gives a full description of his paintings in a tomb outside Tritaea in Achaia.

There is an interesting passage in Demetrius Phalereus (Eloc. 76), giving the opinion of Nicias respecting the art of painting, in which he insists on the importance of choosing subjects of some magnitude, and not throwing away skill and labour on minute objects, such as birds and flowers. The proper subjects for a painter, he says, are battles both on land and on sea; in which the various attitudes and expressions of horses and of men afford rich materials for the painter: the subject of the action was, he thought, as important a part of painting as the story or plot was of poetry.

Nicias was the first painter who used burnt ochre, the discovery of which was owing to an accident (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 6. § 20). He had a disciple, Omphalion, who was formerly his slave and favourite (Paus. iv. 31. § 9). He himself was buried at Athens, by the road leading to the academy (Paus. i. 29. § 15). [P. S.]

NICIPPE (Νικίππη). 1. A daughter of Pelops, and the wife of Sthenelus, by whom she became the mother of Alcinoös, Medusa, and Eurystheus. (Apollod. ii. 4. § 5.) It should be remarked that some call her Leucippe, Archippe, or Asydameia. (Heyne, ad Apollod. l. c.; Schol. ad Thucyd. i. 9.)

2. A daughter of Thespius, the mother of Antimachus, by Hercules. (Apollod. ii. 7. § 8.) [L. S.]

NICIPPUS (Νικίππος). 1. A Coan mentioned by Aelian (V. H. i. 29), who succeeded in making himself tyrant.

2. A friend and disciple of Theophrastus. (Diog. Laert. v. 53.)

3. One of the ephors of the Messenians in B. C. 220. With some other leading men amongst them, who held oligarchical views, he was a strenuous supporter of peace, even to the detriment of the public interests. When the envoys from the congress held at Corinth, at which war had been resolved on against the Aetolians, came to Messenia, Nicippus and his party, contrary to the feelings and wishes of the people generally, by means of some degree of compulsion got the reply returned to the envoys, that the Messenians would not enter into the war until Phigalea, a town on their borders, had been wrested from the Aetolians. Polybius, in a digression, finds great fault with the policy of this faction among the Messenians. (Polyb. iv. 31; Thirlwall, Hist. of Greece, vol. viii. p. 233, &c.) [C. P. M.]

NICO. [NICON.]

NICOBUL/A (Νικοβούλη), a Greek lady, quoted by Athenaeus (x. p. 434, c. xii. p. 537, d.), though with some doubt (Νικ. ἡ δ' ἀναβλὴ ταύτης τὰ συγγράμματα), as the author of a work about Alexander the Great. In the MSS. of Pliny the name Nicobulus is found, and Harduin (Index Auctorum, vol. i. p. 63) supposes that he accompanied Alexander in his expeditions. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 47.) [C. P. M.]

NICOBUL/LUS, an Athenian who was involved in a dispute arising out of some mine-property with a man named Pantaenetus, and was sued by him. The speech of Demosthenes against Pantaenetus was written for him on this occasion. (Dem. Παραγραφή πρὸς Πανταίνετον.) [C. P. M.]

NICOBUL/LUS, a friend and relative of Gregory Nazianzenus. He was the author of a poem, addressed to his son of the same name, in reply to one written by Gregory, in which the latter had begged him to allow his son to leave his native country for the purpose of studying eloquence. The poem of Nicobulus is found amongst those of Gregory, beginning Τέκνον ἐμόν, μύθους ποθέων ποθέεις τὰ φέριστα. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 311.) [C. P. M.]

NICOCHARES (Νικοχάρης), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, the son of Philonides, also a comic poet. He was contemporary with

Aristophanes (Suidas, s. v. Νικοκλήος), and of the ward Κυθαίων (Steph. Byz. s. v. Κυθαῖοι). If the conjecture of Böckh be correct (Corp. Inscript. vol. i. p. 354), he was alive so far down as B. C. 354. The names of his plays, as enumerated by Suidas (l. c.), are, Ἀμυνώγη, Πέλοψ, Γαλάτεια, Ἡρακλῆς γαμῶν, Ἡρακλῆς χορηγός, Κρήτες, Λακωνες, Ἀθηναῖαι, Κένταυροι, Χειρογαστροποι. Meineke (Com. Græc. Frag. vol. i. p. 253) ingeniously conjectures that the two first are but different names for the same comedy, from the fact that Πέλοψ does not occur in its alphabetical place, like the rest, and from the name Oenomaüs occurring in a quotation from the Ἀμυνώγη, given by Athenæus (two lines, x. p. 426, e.). Of the Galatæa two small fragments are preserved. (Pollux, x. 93; Schol. in Aristoph. Plut. vv. 179, 303.) To "Heracles marrying," reference is made, Pollux vii. 40, x. 135. In the former passage the play is spoken of ἐν Ἡρακλεῖ γαμούνῳ; this use of the verb, perhaps, like the Latin nubo, indicating the hero's unhusband-like subjection to Omphale. And in the latter passage the poet is spoken of thus: κατὰ Νικοκλήν. Of the Lacones, we learn from the Argument to the Plutus III. of Aristophanes, that it was represented B. C. 388, in competition with the Πλουτος β' of Aristophanes. Reference is made to it, Athen. xv. p. 667, e. Of the Lemniæ, the subject of which seems to have been the loves of Jason and Hypsipyle, we have two lines preserved by Athenæus (vii. p. 328, e.). Other short fragments, but without the names of the plays, are preserved by Athenæus (as i. p. 34, d.), Pollux, and others. From these fragments we can only infer that he treated in the style of the Old Comedy—sometimes rising into tragic dignity—the legends and local traditions of his country, no doubt ridiculing the peculiarities of the neighbouring states. (Meineke, l. c. and vol. ii. p. 842; Athen. Suid. Steph. Byz. l. c.; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. pp. 42, 101; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. 471.)

Aristotle mentions (Art. Poet. ii. 7) one Nicochares as the author of a poem called the Δηλίδας, in which he represents men as worse than they are. Whether the comic Nicochares be the author or not, as Aristotle mentions this poem in connection with the parody of Hegemon, and, immediately after, expressly distinguishes between the characters represented in tragedy and in comedy as a separate illustration, the Deliad cannot have been a comedy, as Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. ii. p. 471) inadvertently states. Δελίδας, "the Politrioniad," has been suggested as the probable name. But, looking at the practice of the comic poet to amuse himself with local peculiarities, it seems probable enough that he wrote a satirical extravaganza on the inhabitants of Delos. (Aristot. l. c.; Twining's transl. vol. i. p. 266, 2d ed.; Meineke, Com. Græc. Fr. vol. i. p. 256; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. l. c.) [W. M. G.]

NICOCLES (Νικοκλῆς), historical. 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus, was the son and successor of Evagoras I. Some authors have supposed that he had participated in the conspiracy to which his father Evagoras fell a victim; but there is no authority for this supposition, which has indeed been adopted only by way of explaining the strange error into which Diodorus has fallen, who represents Nicocles himself as the eunuch by whom Evagoras was assassinated (Diod. xv. 47, intpp. ad loc.). It is certainly incredible that had this been the case, Isocrates should have addressed to him a long panegyric upon his father's virtues, in which he also dwells particularly upon the filial piety of Nicocles, and the honours paid by him to the memory of Evagoras (Isoc. Evag. instit.).

Scarcely any particulars are known of the reign of Nicocles, but it appears to have been one of peace and prosperity. If we may trust the statement of his panegyrist Isocrates (who addressed to him two of his orations, and has made him the subject of another), he raised the cities under his rule to the most flourishing condition, replenished the treasury, which had been exhausted by his father's wars, without oppressing his subjects by exorbitant taxes, and exhibited in all respects the model of a mild and equitable ruler (Isoc. Nicocl. p. 32, &c.). The same author extols him also for his attachment to literature and philosophy (id. Evag. p. 207), of which he afforded an additional proof by rewarding Isocrates himself for his panegyric with the magnificent present of twenty talents (Vit. X. Orat. p. 838, a.). The orator also praises him for the purity of his domestic relations; but we learn from Theopompus and Anaximenes (ap. Athen. xii. p. 531), that he was a person of luxurious habits, and used to vie with Straton, king of Sidon, in the splendour and refinement of his feasts and other sensual indulgences. According to the same authorities he ultimately perished by a violent death, but neither the period nor circumstances of this event are recorded.

The annexed coin may be safely assigned to this Nicocles. See Borrell, Notice sur quelques médailles Grecques des Rois de Chypre, 4to., Paris, 1836.

COIN OF NICOCLES, OF SALAMIS.

2. Prince or ruler of Paphos, in Cyprus, during the period which followed the death of Alexander. He was at first one of those who took part with Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, against Antigonus (Diod. xix. 59; Droysen, Hellenismus, vol. i. p. 339), but at a subsequent period, B. C. 310, after Ptolemy had established his power over the whole island, Nicocles appears to have changed his views, and entered into secret negotiations with Antigonus. Hereupon, the Egyptian monarch, alarmed lest the spirit of disaffection should spread to the other cities, immediately despatched two of his friends, Argæus and Callicrates, to Cyprus, who surrounded the palace of the unhappy prince with an armed force, and commanded him to put an end to his own life, an order with which, after a vain attempt at explanation, he was obliged to comply. His example was followed by his wife Axiothea, as well as by his brothers and their wives, so that the whole family of the princes of Paphos perished in this catastrophe (Diod. xx. 21; Polyæn. viii. 48). Wesseling (ad Diod. l. c.) has erroneously identified this Nicocles with Nicoreon, king of Salamis [NICOREON], from whom he is certainly distinct. (See Droysen, vol. i. p. 404, not.) A coin of this prince, bearing the inscription ΝΙΚΟΚΛΕΟΥΣ

DIATION, has been mentioned by Eckhel (vol. iii. p. 87).

3. Of Soli, son of Pasirates, an officer in the army of Alexander, was appointed to the command of a trireme during the voyage down the Indus. (Arr. Ind. 18.)

4. An Athenian, who was put to death together with Phocion (s. c. 318), to whom he had always been attached by the warmest personal friendship: on which account he begged as a last favour to be allowed to drink the poison before his illustrious friend, a request which Phocion unwillingly conceded. (Plut. Phoc. 35, 36.)

5. Tyrant of Sicyon, to which position he raised himself by the murder of Paeasas, who had succeeded his son Abantidas in the sovereign power [ABANTIDAS]. He had reigned only four months, during which period he had already driven into exile eighty of the citizens, when the citadel of Sicyon (which had narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the Aetolians shortly before) was surprised in the night by a party of Sicyonian exiles, headed by young Aratus. The palace of the tyrant was set on fire, but Nicocles himself made his escape by a subterranean passage, and fled from the city. Of his subsequent fortunes we know nothing. (Plut. Arat. 3—9; Paus. ii. 8 § 3; Cic. de Off. ii. 23.)

6. A Syncusan, whose daughter was married to Hieron I., and became the mother of Deinomenes. (Schol. ad Pind. Pyth. i. 112.) [E. H. B.]

NICOCLES (Νικόκλης), literary. 1. A comic writer mentioned by Athenaeus (viii. p. 327), where, however, the name is incorrect, and should be altered into Timocles. [TIMOCLES]

2. A Lacedaemonian, was the teacher of grammar to the emperor Julian (Socrat. iii. 1). From the words of Socrates we may infer that he was a Christian. This Nicocles is perhaps the same as the one mentioned in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. εὐλόγος). Libanius (vol. i. p. 24) likewise mentions a rhetorician of Constantinople of this name. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 373; Westermann, Geschichte der Griechischen Beredsamkeit, § 102, n. 1.) [L. S.]

NICO-CRATES (Νικοκράτης). 1. A Cyprian of this name collected an extensive library, in very early times. (Athen. i. p. 3, a.)

2. Archon of Athens, s. c. 333. (Diod. xvii. 29; Dionys. Deinarch. vol. ii. p. 116.) Deinarchus pleaded against him, in behalf of Nicomachus. (Dionys. Deinarch. vol. ii. p. 118.)

3. A Lacedaemonian rhetorician twice referred to by Seneca. (Suasor. ii. ad extr. Controver. iii. 20, ad extr.) In the latter passage, he calls him aridus et exiguus declamator. Westermann (Gesch. der Griech. Beredt. p. 188) calls him Nicostratus.

4. A writer, otherwise unknown, quoted regarding a report that no one could sleep on the island of Aegae, sacred to Poseidon, on account of the god's appearance on the island, by the Scholiast on Apoll. Rhod. i. 831. [W. M. G.]

NICO-CREON (Νικοκρέων), 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus, at the time of Alexander's expedition into Asia. He submitted to the conqueror in common with the other princes of Cyprus, without opposition; and in s. c. 331, after the return of Alexander from Egypt, repaired to Tyre to pay homage to that monarch, where he distinguished himself by the magnificence which he displayed in furnishing the theatrical exhibitions. (Plut. Alex. 29.) After the death of Alexander he took part with Ptolemy against Antigonus, and in s. c. 315, we find him actively co-operating with Seleucus and Menelaus, the generals of Ptolemy, in effecting the reduction of those cities of Cyprus which had espoused the opposite cause. In return for these services he subsequently obtained from Ptolemy the territories of Citium, Lapethus, Ceryneia, and Marion, in addition to his own, and was entrusted with the chief command over the whole island. (Diod. xix. 59, 62, 79.) We know nothing of the fortunes of Nicocreon after this: but as no mention occurs of his name during the memorable siege of Salamis, by Demetrius (s. c. 306), or the great sea-fight that followed it, it seems probable that he must have died before those events. The only personal anecdote transmitted to us of Nicocreon is his putting to death in a barbarous manner the philosopher Anaxarchus in revenge for an insult which the latter had offered him on the occasion of his visit to Alexander. (Cic. Tus. ii. 22, de Nat. Deor. iii. 33; Plut. de Virt. p. 449; Diog. Laërt. ix. 59.)

2. A Cyprian who formed a design against the life of Evagoras I., king of Salamis: he was detected and arrested, but subsequently escaped. (Theopomp. ap. Phot. p. 120, a.) [R. H. B.]

NICODAMUS (Νικόδαμος), a statuary of Maenalis in Arcadia, made statues of the Olympic victors Androsthenes, Antiochus, and Damoxeni-das; one of Athena, dedicated by the Eleians; and one of Hercules, as a youth, killing the Nemean lion with his arrows, dedicated at Olympia by Hippotion of Tarentum. (Paus. v. 6. § 1, 26, § 5, vi. 6. § 1, 3. § 4, x. 25. § 4.) Since Androsthenes conquered in the pancratium in the 90th Olympiad, s. c. 420 (Thuc. v. 49), the date of Nicodamus may be placed about that time. [P. S.]

NICODEMUS (Νικόδημος), historical. 1. A tyrant of Centoripa in Sicily, who was driven out by Timoleon, s. c. 339. (Diod. xvi. 82.)

2. An Athenian of the deme Aphidnae, a partizan of Eubulus. He was murdered by Aristarchus, the son of Moschus. Demosthenes, for no other reason apparently than that he was opposed to the party of Eubulus, was suspected of having been privy to the murder (Dem. Meid. p. 549; Schol. Ulpian. ad p. 548; Deinarch. c. Dem. p. 24, ed. Reiske).

A man of the name of Nicodemus also figures in the speech of Isaeus, περὶ τοῦ Πύθρον κλήρου.

3. A Messenian, mentioned by Plutarch (Dem. p. 852, a.), who contrasts his political tergiversation (he had first espoused the cause of Cassander, afterwards that of Demetrius) with the conduct of Demosthenes.

4. A native of Elis, sent by Philopoemen at the head of an embassy to Rome, s. c. 187. (Polyh. xxiii. 1, 7.) [C. P. M.]

NICODEMUS (Νικόδημος), of Heracleia. Seven epigrams written by him have by an inadvertence of Brunk been attributed to Nicodemus, the physician of Smyrna. They are of the childish class of epigrams, called ἀντιστροφοντα, or ἀνακυκλικά, in which the sense is the same, though each distich be read from end to beginning, instead of from beginning to end. The epigrams of Nicodemus consist of two lines each, in the elegiac measure, and seem to have been principally inscriptions for statues and pictures. (Anth. Græc. vol. iii. p. 91, vol. xiii. p. 923, ed. Jacobs.) [W. M. G.]

NICODORUS (Νικόδορος), a native of Mantinea, who, with the advice of Diagoras the Melian, acted as lawgiver in his native city. (Aelian, V. H. ii. 23.) [C. P. M.]

NICOLA'US (Νικόλαος, Νικολάους), historical.
1. Father of BULIS, the Spartan. (Herod. vii. 134.)
2. Son of Bulia, was associated with Aneristus in his embassy to Persia, in B. C. 430, and, together with him, was put to death by the Athenians. [ANERISTUS.]

3. A Syracusan, who lost two sons in the war with Athens, but at its conclusion, in B. C. 413, endeavoured to persuade his countrymen to spare the Athenian prisoners. (Diod. xiii. 19—27.)

4. An Aetolian, and a general of Ptolemy IV. (Philopator). In B. C. 219 we find him besieging Ptolemais, which was held by the traitor Theodotus, who had revolted from Ptolemy to Antiochus the Great. Nicolaus, however, abandoned the siege on the approach of the Syrian king [LAGORAS]. In the same year he did much towards baffling the attempt of Antiochus on Dura or Dora in Phoenicia, by sending constant succours to the besieged. In B. C. 218 he was invested by Ptolemy with the supreme command in Coele-Syria, an appointment fully warranted, according to Polybius, by his military experience and bravery. He was, however, dislodged by Antiochus and his generals from a strong position which he had taken up between the range of Mount Libanus and the sea near the town of Porphyreon, and was obliged to seek safety in a precipitate flight towards Sidon. It may be conjectured that after this he deserted to Antiochus: at least, we find the name of Nicolaus of Aetolia mentioned among the generals of the Syrian king in his campaign in Hyrcania, B. C. 209. (Polyb. v. 61, 66, 68, 69, x. 29.) [E. E.]

NICOLA'US (Νικόλαος), literary. Nicolaus is the name of a great many writers and ecclesiastics in the times of the Byzantine empire, but only the most important of them are mentioned below. A full list of them is given in Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 286).

1. ARTABASDA (Ἀρταβάδης), of Smyrna, of uncertain but late age, is called in a Vatican manuscript Ἀρταβάδης, ἀριθμητικὸς καὶ γεωμέτρης ὁ Παῖδα. He was the author of a work on the art of counting with the fingers (Ἐκφράσις τοῦ δακτυλικοῦ μέτρου), which has been published by F. Morel, Paris, 1614; Possin. Catena Græc. Patrum in Marcum, p. 449, Rome, 1673; J. A. Fabric. Observ. in variis Loca Novi Testam. p. 159, Hamb. 1712; and J. G. Schneider, Eclogæ physicae, p. 477. (Schöll, Geschichte der Griechischen Literatur, vol. iii. pp. 345—347.)

2. CABBASILAS. [CABASILAS.]

3. CHALCOCONDYLES. [CHALCOCONDYLES.]

4. OF CONSTANTINOPLE, of which he was patriarch from A. D. 1084 to 1111, wrote several decrees and letters, of which an account is given by Cave. (Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 156, ed. Basil; Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 285.)

5. DAMASCENUS. [DAMASCENUS.]

6. EUBOICUS. [SECUNDINUS.]

7. HAGIOTHEODORUS, was archbishop of Athens in the twelfth century, in the reign of Manuel Comnenus. He is known as a jurist, who wrote a commentary upon the Basilica. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 633.)

8. HYDRUNTUS, lived at the beginning of the thirteenth century, in the reign of Alexius IV. Comnenus, and was distinguished by his opposition to the Latin church, against which he published several works, of which an account is given by Cave (ad ann. 1201) and Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 287).

9. OF METHONE in the Peloponnese, of which place he was archbishop, lived probably in the twelfth century, and also wrote many works against the Latin church, for an account of which we must again refer to Fabricius (vol. xi. p. 290) and the authorities which he cites. Nicolaus of Methone also deserves to be mentioned as one of the opponents of the Neo-Platonic philosophers. He published a work in reply to the Στοιχειώδης Στοιχείωσις of Proclus: this work of Nicolaus was published for the first time by J. Th. Voemel, under the title of Nicolas Methonensis Refutatio Institutionis Theologicas Procli Platonici, Francf. 1825.

10. OF MYRÆ. [See No. 17.]

11. MYRÆSIUS. [See below, No. 3.]

12. PEPAGOMENUS. [PEPAGOMENUS.]

13. PRAEPOSITUS. [See below, No. 4.]

14. RHABDA. [See No. 1, and RHARDA.]

15. SECUNDINUS. [SECUNDINUS.]

16. OF SMYRNA. [See No. 1.]

17. THE SOPHIST, lived under Leo I., and down to the reign of Anastasius, consequently in the latter half of the fifth century, was a pupil of Proclus. Suidas (s. v. Νικ.) mentions two works of his, Προγυμνάσματα and Μελέται ῥητορικαί. Part of the Προγυμνάσματα had been previously published as the work of Libanius, but has more recently appeared as the work of Nicolaus, in Walz's Rhetor. Græc. vol. i. pp. 266—420. Suidas (s. v.) mentions another sophist, a native of Myræ in Cilicia, and a pupil of Laclares, who taught at Constantinople, and was the author of a Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ καὶ Μελέται. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vi. p. 134; Westermann, Geschichte der Griech. Beredsamkeit, § 104, n. 10.)

NICOLA'US (Νικόλαος), the name of several physicians, who are often confounded, and whom it does not seem possible to distinguish with certainty.

1. The person quoted by Galen (De Compos. Medicam. acc. Gen. v. 11, vol. xiii. p. 831) must have lived in or before the second century after Christ. He may, perhaps, be the physician of whose medical formulæ one is quoted by Paulus Aegineta (iv. 37, vii. 17, pp. 520, 678) and Nicolaus Myræpsus (x. 143, p. 579). A pharmaceutical author of the same name is said by Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vol. xiii. pp. 5, 346, ed. vet.) to be quoted by Aëtius, but the writer has not been able to find the name in the place referred to (x. 27).

2. A native of Laodicea, who lived, according to Abū-l-Faraj (Hist. Dynast. p. 88), in the latter half of the fourth century after Christ. He wrote a work "De Summa Philosophiæ Aristotelicæ," which was translated into Syriac by Homsan Ibn Ishak; another "De Plantis," which is quoted by 'Abdū-l-Latîf (Hist. Aegypti Compend. pp. 19, 27); and a third, "Liber Responsionis ad illos qui Rem unam esse statuunt Intellectum et intelligibilia." To these Wenrich (De Auctor. Græcor. Version. et Comment. Syriac. Arab. Armen. et Pers. Lips. 1842, p. 294) adds two others, viz. "Compendium Philosophiæ Aristotelicæ," and "Aristotelis Historia Animalium in Compendium redacta." (See also De Sacy's Note on Abū-l-Latîf, p. 77.) This is no doubt the Nicolaus, whose work "De Philosophia Aristotelis" is quoted by Rhazes (Contin. xi. 4, vol. i. p. 228, ed. 1506).

3. Nicolaus Myrepsus (Νικόλαος ὁ Μυρσεύς, or the ointment-maker), the author of a Greek pharmaceutical work, which is still extant. He is probably the same physician who is mentioned by Georgius Acropolita as being eminent in his profession, but very ignorant of natural philosophy. (Hist. Byzant. c. 39, p. 34, ed. Paris. 1651.) He was at the court of Joannes III. Vatatzes at Nicaea, when the eclipse of the sun took place (Oct. 6. 1241), that shortly preceded the death of the empress Irene. Here he was held in great esteem by the emperor, and attained the dignity of Actuarius (id. ibid.; see Dict. of Ant. p. 611, b.). All this agrees very well with the scattered notices of his date and his personal history that we find in his own work. He mentions Mesue the younger (xxxii. 117, p. 706), who died A.D. 1015; "Michael Angelus regalis" (i. 295, p. 420), who is probably the first emperor of the family of the Palaeologi, and began to reign A.D. 1260; "Papa Nicolaus" (ii. 9, p. 469), who seems to be Pope Nicholas III., who began to reign A.D. 1277; and "Dominus Joannes" (x. 103, p. 575), and "Magister Johannes" (xxxii. 99, p. 703), who is probably Joannes Actuarius, who lived in the thirteenth century. He mentions his having visited or lived at Nicaea (xxiv. 12, p. 657), and also Alexandria (i. 241, xvii. 17, pp. 412, 612), whence he is sometimes called Nicolaus Alexandrinus.

His work has hitherto only been published in Latin with the title "Antidotarium," or "De Compositione Medicamentorum;" and has often been confounded with the similar work of Nicolaus Praepositus, from which however it may easily be distinguished. This consists of forty eight sections, containing more than 2500 medical formulae, arranged according to their form and object, while the other contains only about 150 formulae arranged alphabetically. The work of Nicolaus Praepositus has a short preface by the author, this has none: in this work there are sometimes mentioned several modes of preparing the same medicine, in the other never more than one: both works begin with the formula called "Aurea Alexandrina," but the composition of the different prescriptions does not always agree. The work of Nicolaus Myrepsus is evidently written later than the other, which it frequently copies, and does not appear to have been so popular in the middle ages. It is chiefly compiled from former writers, and contains several foolish and superstitious remedies. It was first published in an incomplete form in 1541. 4to. Ingolst. by J. Agricola Ammonius, and afterwards by Leonh. Fuchs, Basil. 1549, fol. translated from a much more complete MS. This translation is inserted in the second volume of H. Stephens's "Medicæ Artis Princeps," Paris, fol. 1567; and has been several times reprinted. (See Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. xiii. p. 4. &c. ed. vet.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin.)

4. Nicolaus, commonly called Praepositus, to distinguish him from Nicolaus Myrepsus, was at the head of the celebrated medical school at Salerno, in the former half of the twelfth century, as appears from the fact of his work being commented on by Matthæus Platearius. He is said to have belonged to a noble family, to have acquired considerable wealth, and to have been the principal physician of his age. He is sometimes said to be the author of two pharmaceutical works, a large one called "Antidotarium Magnum," or "Nicolaus Major" (or Magnus), for the use of druggists, and a smaller one, chiefly used by physicians, and called "Antidotarium Parvum," or "Nicolaus Minor" (or Parvus). This, however, appears to be a mistake that has arisen from confounding his work with that of Nicolaus Myrepsus, though (as we have seen) they are totally different books, though treating of the same subject. The "Antidotarium" is written in Latin, and was, during the middle ages, one of the most popular works on the subject. It was first published in 1471, 4to. Venet., and was frequently reprinted in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Matthæus Platearius wrote a commentary on the work, which is often printed with it. A very full account of the work, and the bibliographical questions relating to it, is to be found in the second edition of Choulant's Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Medicin. [W. A. G.]

NICOLA'US, an Athenian sculptor, whose name is inscribed, together with that of Criton, on a colossal Caryatid, found in 1766 in the vineyard of the house Strozzi, near Rome, on the Appian road. Winckelmann ascribes the work to the time of Cicero, Müller to that of the Antonines; (Winckelmann, Gesch. d. Kunst, bk. xi. c. 1. § 14; Müller, Archæol. d. Kunst, § 204, n. 5.) [P. S.]

NICOLOCHUS (Νικόλοχος). 1. A Lacedæmonian, whom Antalcidas left at Ephesus as vice-admiral (ἐπιστολεύς), in B. C. 388, while he went himself to negotiate with the Persian court [ANTALCIDAS]. Nicolochus, sailing from Ephesus to the aid of Abydus against the Athenians, stopped at Tenedos, where he ravaged the land and exacted a supply of money from the inhabitants. The Athenian generals, Iphicrates and Diotimus, were preparing to succour Tenedos, but, when they heard of the arrival of Nicolochus at Abydus, they sailed from the Chersonesus and blockaded him there. Antalcidas, however, on his return in B. C. 387, put an end to the blockade, and wrested from the enemy the command of the sea. In B. C. 375 Nicolochus was appointed admiral, and sent out to act against Timotheus in the Ionian sea. With a force inferior in number to that of the Athenians, he gave them battle near Alyzia, on the Acarnanian coast, and was defeated; but, soon after, he was reinforced with six Ambracian ships, and again challenged Timotheus. His challenge was not then accepted; but it was not long before Timotheus, having refitted his galleys and increased his fleet, by an addition from Corcyra, to seventy ships, decisively commanded the sea. (Xen. Hell. v. 1. §§ 6, 7, 25, &c., 4. §§ 65, 66; Schn. ad loc.; Polyæn. iii. 10; comp. Rehdantz, Vit. Iph. Chabr. Timoth. iii. § 7.)

2. Of Rhodes, a sceptic philosopher, and a disciple of Timon. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 115.) [E. E.]

NICOMACHIDES (Νικομαχίδης), an Athenian, whom Xenophon introduces in the Memorabilia (iii. 4), as not a little dissatisfied at the election of one Antisthenes to be general in preference to himself, and also as somewhat puzzled by the attempt of Socrates to show that a good house-keeper possesses the main qualifications for a military commander. [E. E.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος). 1. One of the sons of Machaon, the son of Aesculapius, by Anticleia, the daughter of Diocles, king of Phœræ, in Messenia. According to Pausanias (iv. 30. § 2), he succeeded to the kingdom after the death of his grandfather, together with his brother Gorgasus, and is therefore placed by some in the twelfth century B. C. Both brothers followed the example of their father, by practising the art of healing, for which they received divine honours after their death, and had a sanctuary at Phœræ, founded by Isthmius, the son of Glaucus (id. iv. 3. § 6). Suidas (s. v. Νικόμ.) says he was a native of Stageira, in Macedonia; but it is not likely that this city was then in existence. He also seems to say that he wrote six books on medicine (ἱατρικά), and one on natural science (φυσικά); but this is probably incorrect. In fact Nicomachus must be regarded as a purely mythical personage. According to Hermippus (ap. Diog. Laërt. v. 1. § 1), he was the ancestor of Nicomachus, the father of Aristotle.

2. The father of Aristotle, who belonged to the family of the Asclepiadae, and was descended from Nicomachus, the son of Machaon. He had another son named Arimnestus, and a daughter named Arimneste, by his wife Phaestia, or Phaestias, who was also descended from Aesculapius. He was a native of Stageira, and the friend and physician of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, B. C. 393—369. He was perhaps the author of the works attributed (apparently) by Suidas to his ancestor, the son of Machaon. (Suid. s. v. Ἀριστοτέλης, Νικόμαχος; Ammon. in vita Aristot.; Diog. Laërt. v. 1. § 1; Dionys. De Demosth. et Aristot. § 5; Joann. Teetiz. Chil. x. 727.) [W. A. G.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος), a scribe at Athens (γραμματεὺς), rose to citizenship from a servile origin, if we may believe the statements in the speech of Lysias against him. According to the same authority he was entrusted with a commission to transcribe the laws of Solon, a period of four months being allowed him for the purpose; but he extended the time, on various pretences, to six years, and drove a profitable trade by tampering with the laws, in the way of interpolation or omission, as it suited his several employers. In particular, he lent himself to the intrigues of the oligarchical party, in B. C. 405, and fabricated a law giving power to the council to take cognisance of the alleged offence of Cleophon. Notwithstanding, however, his services to the oligarchs, he was obliged to fly from Athens under the government of the Thirty. On the re-establishment of democracy he seems to have been again employed in the transcription and registering of the laws, and it was for misconduct in the execution of this duty that he was visited with the prosecution for which the speech of Lysias was written. (Xen. Hell. i. 7. § 35; Lys. c. Agor. p. 130, c. Nicom.) It was perhaps the same Nicomachus who is mentioned by Aristophanes (Ran. 1502) as a πομπήτης—one of those whose business it was to levy extraordinary supplies (see Dict. of Ant. s. v.)—and to whom Pluto is made to send, through Aeschylus, a present of a rope, with an urgent demand for his early appearance in the regions below. The Nicomachus also mentioned by Isocrates (c. Callim. pp. 373, 374) may, perhaps, have been the same person. [E. E.]

of any particulars of his life. The following points are merely indicated by their several authorities. From the will of Aristotle, as given by Laërtius, we infer that Nicomachus was a mere boy when the will was made, and that he was entrusted first to the care of tutors therein named, and then to the discretion of Nicenor, Aristotle's adopted son. We are told by the same authority that Theophrastus was his teacher. Eusebius (Præp. xv. 2) states that, while still young, he died in war. (Diog. Laërt. v. 1, 12, 35; Euseb. l. c.; Suid. s. v. Νικόμαχος.) He must have lived about A. C. 320.

His name, as an author, has become mixed up with that of his illustrious father. Cicero (de Fin. v. 5) and Laërtius (viii. 88) seem to attribute to him certain ethical writings that are generally ascribed to Aristotle. Some modern writers have assented to this, but on slender grounds. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. iii. p. 262.) It is not difficult to see how the mistake may have arisen. A portion of the moral writings of Aristotle bears the name of Ἠθικά Νικομαχεῖα, why we cannot tell; whether the father so named them, as a memorial of his affection to his young son, or whether they derived their title from being afterwards edited and commented on by Nicomachus. [See Vol. I. of this work, p. 331, a. Ἠθικά Εὐδημεία.] This last reason is rendered not improbable from the circumstance mentioned by Suidas (l. c.), that Nicomachus wrote six books (probably a comment) on ethics, and a comment on his father's work Περὶ τῆς φυσικῆς Ἀκρόσεως. Hence the confusion between the editor and commentator, and the original author. [W. M. G.]

NICO'MACHUS (Νικόμαχος), literary. Two dramatic poets of the name have been mentioned by Suidas (s. v.). The whole question regarding them has been examined minutely by Meineke (Fræg. Com. Græc. vol. i. pp. 75, &c., 496, &c.), and we shall briefly give his views, as probable and well supported by his authorities.

1. A tragic poet of Alexandria in the Troad, according to Suidas. He was a contemporary of Euripides and Theognis, B. C. 425, with whom he competed, and successfully, contrary to universal expectation. We may infer from the language of Suidas that the play which gained the prize was on the subject of Oedipus. He wrote, according to Suidas, eleven tragedies. But his list evidently contains two comedies. As corrected by Meineke, it contains the following subjects:—Alexander, Eriphyle, Geryones, Aletides, Neoptolemus, Myri, Oedipus, Ilii Excidium sive Polyxena, Tyndareus, Alcmæon, and Teucer, the last three constituting a trilogy. He was of no great reputation, as the language of Suidas implies. Only four words remain that can be traced to him.

2. A comic poet of the time of Pherecrates, B. C. 420. To him are doubtfully assigned (Athen. viii. 364, a, where he designates him ὁ ῥυθμικός, the comedy of Χέλων, and (Harpor. s. v. Μεταλλεύς, p. 242) the comedy of Μεταλλεύς, usually assigned to Pherecrates.

3. A poet of the new comedy. The Εὐδήμεια, perhaps the Μερενβαλρωμαί, both attributed to the first Nicomachus, by Suidas, and another, the Νεωμυθία, were probably written by him. Of the first, we have an extract, consisting of forty-two lines, in Athenæus (vii. p. 290, e.), containing a humorous dialogue, wherein a cook magnifies the requirements of his office. (Meineke, vol. v. p. 583, &c.) Of the last we have two lines preserved by Stobaeus, 53. 10. (Meineke, vol. v. p. 583; Stob. vol. ii. p. 59, ed. Gaisford.) Athenaeus gives (ii. p. 58, a.) three lines, and (xi. p. 781, f.) one line (Meineke, vol. v. p. 587, &c.), from plays of Nicomachus, whose titles he does not mention.

There are several other literary persons of this name. By one of them there is an epigram on an earthquake which desolated Plataea. The point of it lies in the ruins of Plataea, constituting the monument of those that perished. Of the date of the earthquake, or the writer of the epigram, we know nothing. (Anth. Graec. vol. ii. p. 258, ed. Jacobs.) Nor do we know who the Nicomachus is who wrote περί δορῶν Αἰγυπτίων, quoted by Athenaeus (xi. p. 478, a.), though this work is sometimes attributed to Nicomachus Gerasenus. [W. M. G.]

NICOMACHUS (Νικόμαχος Γερασένος, or Γερασένος), called Gerasenus, from his native place, Gerasa in Arabia, was a Pythagorean, and the writer of a life of Pythagoras, now lost. His date is inferred from his mention of Thrasyllus, who lived under Tiberius. He wrote on arithmetic and music, and is the earliest, we believe, of those whose names became bye-words to express skill in computation. In the Philopatria is the phrase "you number like Nicomachus of Gerasa." This writer exercised no small influence on European studies, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; but indirectly. Boëthius, in his arithmetical work, is no more than the abbreviator of the larger work of Nicomachus, now lost. The never-ending distinction of specific ratios by names (see Numbers, old appellations of, in the Supplement to the Penny Cyclopaedia), is the remote consequence of Nicomachus having been a Pythagorean.

The extant works of Nicomachus are:—1. Ἀριθμητικὴς εἰσαγωγὴς βιβλία β, the lesser work on arithmetic. It was printed (Gr.) by Christian Wechel, Paris, 1538, 4to; also, after the theologumena Arithmeticae, attributed to Iamblichus, Leipzig, 1817, 8vo. A Latin version by one Appuleius is lost, as also various commentaries, of which only fragments remain. 2. Ἐγχειρίδιον ἀρμονικῆς βιβλία β, a work on music, first printed (Gr.) by Joh. Meursius, in his collection, Leyden, 1616, 4to, and afterward in the collection of Meibomius, (Gr. Lat.), Amsterdam, 1652, 4to; and again in the works of Meursius by Lami, Florence, 1745, fol. The works which are lost are a collection of Pythagorean dogmata, referred to by Iamblichus; a larger work on music, promised by Nicomachus himself, and apparently referred to by Eutocius in his comment on the sphere and cylinder of Archimedes; θεολογούμενα ἀριθμητικῆς, mentioned by Photius, but a different work from that above alluded to; τέχνη ἀριθμητική, the larger work above noted, distinctively mentioned by Photius; a work on geometry, to which Nicomachus himself once refers; περί ἑορτῶν Αἰγυπτίων, mentioned by Athenaeus, but whether by this Nicomachus or another, uncertain. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. v. p. 629; Hoffman; Schweiger.) [A. De M.]

NICOMACHUS (Νικόμαχος), artist. 1. A painter, of the highest distinction, was (according to the common text of Pliny) a Theban, the son and disciple of the painter Aristodemus, the elder brother and teacher of the great painter Aristides, and the father and teacher of Aristocles. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. a. 36. § 22.)

We have thus the following stemma:—

Aristodemus.

But the names vary in the MSS., and in the Bamberg MS. they are altogether different, giving the following stemma:—

Aristiacus.

To decide with certainty between the readings is impossible: it may, however, be remarked that there is no other passage in which the names of Aristodemus and Aristocles occur. (Comp. the Kunstblatt, for 1832, p. 188.)

Nicomachus flourished under Aristratius of Sicyon, and Philip of Macedonia. He may therefore be placed at n. c. 360, and onwards. He was an elder contemporary of Apelles and Protogenes.

He is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers in terms of the highest praise. Cicero says that in his works, as well as in those of Echion, Protogenes, and Apelles, every thing was already perfect. (Brutus, 18.) Plutarch mentions his paintings, with the poems of Homer, as possessing, in addition to their force and grace, the appearance of having been executed with little toil or effort. (Tymol. 36.) Vitruvius mentions him as among the artists who were prevented from attaining to the very highest fame, not from any want of skill or industry, but from accidental circumstances (iii. Proem. § 2).

Pliny tells us that Nicomachus was one of the artists who used only four colours (H. N. xxxv. 7. a. 32; comp. Dict. of Antiq. s. v. Colores), and that, like Parrhasius, he used the Eretrian ochre in his shadows (ibid. 6. s. 21). He was one of the most rapid of painters. As an example, Pliny relates that, having been commissioned by Aristratius to paint the monument which he was erecting to the poet Telestes, Nicomachus postponed the commencement of the work so long as to incur the anger of the tyrant, but, at last, beginning it only a few days before the time fixed for its completion, he fulfilled his engagement with no less skill than rapidity. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. a. 36. § 22.)

As his works, Pliny mentions, the Rape of Proserpine, which once hung above the shrine of Youth (Juventas) in the temple of Minerva, on the Capitol: a Victory with a four-horsed chariot (quadrigam in sublime raptens), also in the Capitol, where it had been placed by Planus; Apollo and Diana: Cybele riding on a lion: a celebrated picture of female bacchanals, surprised by satyrs stealing upon them: and a Scylla, at Rome, in the temple of Peace (Plin. l. c.). He was the first who painted Ulysses with the pileus (ibid.). Pliny also mentions his unfinished picture of the Tyndaridae, among the examples of unfinished works by great masters, which were more highly admired than even their perfect paintings. (H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 41.) His disciples were his brother Aristides, his son Aristocles, and Philoxenes of Eretria (Plin. l. c. 36. § 22; but compare the commencement of this article), and also Corybas (ibid. 40. § 42).

Stobæus (Serm. 61) has preserved an interesting saying of Nicomachus. An amateur remarking to him that he could see no beauty in the Helen of Zeuxis, the painter, replied, "Take my eyes, and a goddess will be revealed to you." The same answer is ascribed by Aelian (V. H. xiv. 47) to a certain Nicostratus, who is not mentioned elsewhere, and whose name is therefore probably an error for Nicomachus.

2. A statuary or sculptor, whose name appears on a marble base recently discovered in Athens. From the form of the letters, the date of the inscription is supposed to fall in the time of the earliest successors of Alexander. (Rosa and Thiersch, in the Kunstblatt for 1840, p. 48.)

3. The engraver of a gem representing a Faun sitting on a tiger's skin. (Bracci, tab. 87; Stosch, 44.) [P. S.]

NICO'MACHUS, METIUS FALCO'NIUS, stood second on the roll of consular senators at the death of Aurelian. His speech, in which he urged Tacitus to accept the purple, has been preserved by Vopiscus. (Vopisc. Tacit. 6; TACITUS.) [W. R.]

NICOME'DES I. (Νικομήδης), king of Bithynia, was the eldest son of Zipoetes, whom he succeeded on the throne, a. c. 278. (Memnon, c. 20, ed. Orell.; Clinton, vol. iii. p. 411.) Like many other Eastern potentates it appears that he commenced his reign by putting to death two of his brothers, but the third, Zipoetes, raised an insurrection against him, and succeeded in maintaining himself for some time in the independent sovereignty of a considerable part of Bithynia. Meanwhile, Nicomedes was threatened with an invasion from Antiochus I., king of Syria, who had already made war upon his father, Zipoetes, and to strengthen himself against this danger, he concluded an alliance with Heracleia, and shortly afterwards with Antigonus Gonatas. The threatened attack, however, passed over with little injury. Antiochus actually invaded Bithynia, but withdrew again without risking a battle. It was apparently as much against his revolted subjects as his foreign enemies that Nicomedes now called in the assistance of more powerful auxiliaries, and entered into an alliance with the Gauls, who, under Leonnorius and Lutarius, were arrived on the opposite side of the Bosphorus, and were at this time engaged in the siege of Byzantium, a. c. 277. Having furnished them with the means of crossing over into Asia, he first turned the arms of his new auxiliaries against his brother, Zipoetes, whom he defeated and put to death, and thus reunited the whole of Bithynia under his dominion. (Memnon, c. 16, 18, 19; Liv. xxxviii. 16; Justin. xxv. 2.) Of the events that followed we have little information; it is probable that the Gauls subsequently assisted Nicomedes against Antiochus (Trog. Pomp. prol. xxv; comp. Droysen, Hellenism, vol. ii. p. 178), but no particulars are recorded either of the war or the peace that terminated it. It appears, however, that Nicomedes was left in the undisturbed possession of Bithynia, which he continued to govern from this time till his death, and which rose to a high degree of power and prosperity during his long and peaceful reign. In imitation of so many others of the Greek rulers of Asia, he determined to perpetuate his own name by the foundation of a new capital, and the site which he chose, in the immediate neighbourhood of the Megarian colony of Astacus, was so judiciously selected that the city of Nicomedeia continued for more than six centuries to be one of the richest and most flourishing in Asia. (Memnon, c. 20; Strab. xii. p. 563; Steph. Byz. v. Νικομήδεια, who erroneously calls Nicomedes son of Zeilas; Euseb. Chron. Ol. 129. 1; Paus. v. 12. § 7; Tzetz. Chil. iii. 950.) The foundation of Nicomedeia is placed by Eusebius (l. c.) in a. c. 264. The duration of the reign of Nicomedes himself after this event is unknown, but his death is assigned with much probability by the Abbé Sevin (Mém. de l'Acad. des Inscrip. tom. xv. p. 34) to about the year a. c. 250. He had been twice married; by his first wife, Ditiela, a Phrygian by birth (who had been accidentally killed by a favourite dog belonging to the king), he had two sons, Prusias and Zeilas, and a daughter, Lyandra; but his second wife, Etazeta, persuaded him to set aside his children by this former marriage, and leave his crown to her offspring. The latter were still infants at the time of his death, on which account he confided their guardianship by his will to the two kings, Antigonus Gonatas and Ptolemy, together with the free cities of Heracleia, Byzantium and Cius. But, notwithstanding this precaution, his son Zeilas quickly established himself on the throne. [ZEILAS.] (Memnon, c. 22; Arrian ap. Tzetz. Chil. iii. 960; Plin. H. N. viii. 40 (61), who calls the first wife of Nicomedes, Consingia.) It is probably this Nicomedes who sought to purchase from the Cnidians the celebrated statue of Venus, by Praxiteles, by offering to remit the whole public debt of the city. (Plin. H. N. viii. 39, xxxvi. 4. § 21.) [E. H. B.]

NICOME'DES II., surnamed EPIPHANES, king of Bithynia, was son of Prusias II., and fourth in descent from the preceding. He is first mentioned as accompanying his father to Rome in a. c. 167, where they were favourably received by the senate (Liv. xlv. 44). At this time he must have been a mere child; but, as he grew up, the popularity of the young prince incurred the jealousy of Prusias, who, wishing to remove him out of the sight of the Bithynians, sent him to Rome as a kind of hostage. Here we find him in a. c. 153, supporting the ambassadors of Prusias, who were sent to defend that monarch against the complaints of Attalus II., king of Bithynia. (Polyb. xxxii. 26.) Nicomedes remained at Rome till a. c. 149, and had, during his residence there, risen to a high place in the favour of the senate; but this only served to increase the suspicions and enmity of Prusias, who at length despatched Menas to Rome with an embassy to the senate, but with secret instructions to effect the assassination of the prince. But Menas, on finding the favour which Nicomedes enjoyed at Rome, instead of executing his instructions, divulged them to the prince himself, and in conjunction with Andronicus, the ambassador of Attalus, urged him to dethrone his father, who had rendered himself by his vices the object of universal contempt and hatred. Nicomedes readily listened to their suggestions, and departing secretly from Rome landed in Epeirus, where he openly assumed the title of king, and proceeded to the court of Attalus, who received him with open arms, and prepared to support his pretensions with an army. Prusias, abandoned by his subjects, took refuge in the citadel of Nicæa, from whence he wrote to Rome to solicit the intervention of the senate. But, although three deputies were despatched by the Romans to investigate the matter, they ultimately retired without effecting anything. The inhabitants of Nicomedeia, where Prusias had sought protection, opened the gates of the city to Nicomedes, and the old king was assassinated at the altar of Jupiter, by the express order of his son, B. C. 149. (Appian. Mithr. 4—7; Justin. xxiv. 4; Zonar. ix. 28; Liv. Epit. 1; Strab. xiii. p. 624; Diod. xxxii. Exc. Phot. p. 523, Exc. Vat. p. 92.)

Nicomedes retained, during a period of no less than fifty-eight years, the crown which he had thus gained by parricide. But of his long and tranquil reign very few events have been transmitted to us. He appears to have uniformly courted the friendship of the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Aristonicus, B. C. 131. (Strab. xiv. p. 646; Oros. v. 10; Eutrop. iv. 20.) At a later period, B. C. 103, Marius applied to him for auxiliaries in the war against the Cimbri, which he, however, refused on account of the exactions and oppressions exercised by the Roman farmers of the revenue upon his subjects. (Diod. xxxvi. Exc. Phot. p. 531.) But it is clear that Nicomedes was not wanting in ambition when an opportunity of aggrandizement presented itself, and we find him uniting with Mithridates VI. (apparently about B. C. 103) in the conquest of Paphlagonia, the throne of which had been left vacant by the death of Pylaemenes. The Roman senate, indeed, quickly ordered the two kings to restore their new acquisition, but Nicomedes merely transferred the crown to one of his own sons, who had taken the name of Pylaemenes, and whom he pretended to regard as the rightful heir. (Justin. xxxvii. 4.) Not long after (about B. C. 96, see Clinton, vol. iii. p. 436), an opportunity seemed to offer itself of annexing Cappadocia also to his dominions, Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes VI., having thrown herself upon his protection in order to defend herself and her sons from the designs of Mithridates. Nicomedes (though he can hardly have been less than eighty years of age at this time) married Laodice, and established her in the possession of Cappadocia, from which, however, she was quickly again expelled by Mithridates. After the death of her two sons [ARIARATHES] Nicomedes had the boldness to set up an impostor, whom he alleged to be a third son of Ariarathes VI., and even sent Laodice herself to Rome to bear witness in his favour. The senate, however, rejected his claim, as well as that of Mithridates; and while they compelled the latter to abandon Cappadocia, in order to preserve an appearance of fairness, they deprived Nicomedes also of Paphlagonia. (Justin. xxxviii. 1, 2.) This is the last event recorded of his reign; his death must have taken place in or before B. C. 91. (Id.

ib. 3; Clinton, vol. iii. p. 419.) There appears to be no foundation for the statement of some modern writers that he was murdered by his son, Socratea. (See Visconti, Iconogr. Grecque, vol. ii. p. 188.) [E. H. B.]

NICOMEDES III., PHILOPATOR, king of Bithynia, was the son of Nicomedes II., by his wife Nysa (Memnon, c. 30), though his enemy Mithridates VI. pretended that he was the son of a concubine, a female dancer (Justin. xxxviii. 5, § 1). It was probably on this pretext that the latter set up against him his brother Socratea, surnamed the Good (ὁ Χρηστός), whom he persuaded to assume the title of king and the name of Nicomedes, and invade the territories of his brother at the head of an army furnished him by Mithridates. Nicomedes was unable to cope with a competitor thus supported, and was quickly driven out of Bithynia; but he now had recourse to the protection of the Roman senate, who, it seems, had already acknowledged his title to the throne, and who now immediately issued a decree for his restoration, the execution of which was confided to L. Cassius and M. Aquilius. To this Mithridates did not venture to offer any open opposition, and Nicomedes was quietly reseatened on the throne of his father, B. C. 90 (Appian, Mithr. 7, 10, 11, 13; Memnon, c. 30; Justin. xxxviii. 3, 5; Liv. Epit. lxxiv.) But, not satisfied with this, the Roman deputies urged Nicomedes to make reprisals, by plundering excursions into the territories of Mithridates himself; and the king, however unwilling to provoke so powerful an adversary, was compelled to listen to their suggestions, in order to gratify the avarice of his Roman allies. Mithridates at first sent ambassadors to complain of these aggressions, but, as may be supposed, without effect. Thereupon he assembled a large army, and prepared to invade Bithynia, B. C. 88. Nicomedes on his part gathered together a force of 50,000 foot and 6000 horse, with which he met the army of Mithridates under his generals Archelaus and Neoptolemus, at the river Amnion in Paphlagonia, but was totally defeated with great slaughter. The Roman officers, who had inconsiderately brought on this danger, without having a Roman army to support them, soon shared the same fate, and Nicomedes himself, after a vain attempt in conjunction with L. Cassius, to raise a fresh army in Phrygia, abandoned the contest without farther struggle, and took refuge at Pergamus, from whence he soon after fled to Italy (Appian, Mithr. 11—19; Memnon, c. 31; Justin. xxxviii. 3; Liv. Epit. lxxvi.; Strab. xii. p. 562). Here he was compelled to be a passive spectator of the contest between his victorious adversary the Romans; but in B. C. 84 the restoration of Nicomedes was one of the conditions of the peace concluded between Sulla and Mithridates, and C. Curio was deputed by the Roman general to reinstate the Bithynian monarch in the possession of his kingdom (App. Mithr. 60; Plut. Sull. 22, 24; Memnon, c. 35; Liv. Epit. lxxviii.). Nicomedes reigned nearly ten years after this second restoration, but of the events of this period we know nothing, and it was probably one of peace and prosperity. The only occasion on which his name is mentioned is in B. C. 81, when Caesar, then very young, was sent to him by the praetor M. Minucius Thermus, to obtain the assistance of the Bithynian fleet. The young man was received with the greatest favour by Nicomedes; and the intercourse between them gave rise to the most injurious suspicions, which were never afterwards forgotten by the enemies of Caesar (Suet. Caes. 2, 49; Plut. Caes. 1). Nicomedes died at the beginning of the year B. C. 74, and having no children, by his will bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people. Mithridates, however, set up an impostor, whom he pretended to be the legitimate son of Nicomedes, and whose claims to the throne he prepared to support by arms. For the events that followed see MITHRIDATES. (Eutrop. vi. 6; Liv. Epit. xciii.; App. Mithr. 71; Epist. Mithr. ad Arsac. ap. Sall. Hist. iv. p. 239, ed. Gerlach.)

Great confusion has been made by many modern writers in regard to the later kings of Bithynia, and it has been frequently supposed that there were not three but four kings of the name of Nicomedes. It is, however, certain from Appian (Mithr. 10), that Nicomedes III., who was expelled by Mithridates, was the grandson of Prusias II.; nor is there any reasonable doubt that he was the same who bequeathed his kingdom to the Romans, and was consequently the last king of Bithynia. A passage of Appian (Mithr. 7) which seems to assert the contrary, is certainly either erroneous or corrupt; and Syncellus (p. 276, c.), who reckons eight kings of Bithynia, beginning with Zipoetes, probably included Socrates, the brother of Nicomedes III., in his enumeration. (See on this subject Eckhel, vol. ii. pp. 444, 445; Visconti, Iconographie Grecque, vol. ii. p. 191; Orelli, Onomast. Tull. p. 420; and Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 418—420.)

Nicomedes III., as well as his father, takes on his coins the title of Epiphanes. They can be distinguished only by the difference of physiognomy, and by the dates, which refer to an era commencing B. C. 288, during the reign of Zipoetes [ZIPOETES].

COIN OF NICOMEDES III.

NICOMEDES (Νικομήδης), literary. 1. A commentator on Orpheus. (Athen. xiv. p. 637, a. b.)

2. Of Acanthus, quoted regarding the age of Perdicas. (Athen. v. 217, d.)

3. A commentator on Heraclitus. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 15.)

4. The writer of annotations on the Ἀναλυτικὰ πρότερα of Aristotle, which exist in some libraries, but are unedited. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. iii. p. 215.)

5. Of Pergamus, a rhetorician, and a pupil of Chrestus, flourished in the second century of the Christian era. (Philost. Vit. Soph. ii. 11.)

6. Of Smyrna, a physician and epigrammatist. Bruncus has inadvertently attributed to him eight epigrams that belong to Nicodemus. We have two epigrams written by him, both votive, and engraved on the same statue, which was one of Aesculapius, fabricated by the sculptor Boëthus.

The style proves that they were written long after the time of Boëthus. Indeed the first epigram bears this expressly, χειρὸν δέγμα παλαγγεῖον. We have also an epitaph on Nicomedes. (Anthol. Graec. vol. iii. p. 92, &c. x. p. 131, &c. xiii. p. 924. &c. ed. Jacoba.)

NICON (Νίκων), historical. 1. A Tarentine, who headed the insurrection of his fellow-citizens against Milon, the governor, who had been left by Pyrrhus in command of the citadel of Tarentum. (Zonar. viii. 6, p. 379, a.)

2. Another Tarentine, surnamed PERCON, who, together with Philemenus, betrayed his native city to Hannibal during the second Punic war, B. C. 212. The plan was formed by thirteen noble youths, of whom Nicon and Philemenus were the leaders. Having contrived to hold frequent conferences with Hannibal, and concert all their measures with him, without exciting any suspicion, they appointed a night for the execution of their scheme, on which the Roman governor, M. Livius, was to give a great feast: and Nicon admitted Hannibal with a body of troops at one gate, while Philemenus contrived to make himself master of another, by which he introduced 1000 select African soldiers. The Romans were taken completely by surprise, and Hannibal made himself master, almost without opposition, of the whole of Tarentum, except the citadel. (Polyb. viii. 26—36; Liv. xxv. 8—10.) The latter was closely blockaded by the Carthaginians and Tarentines, and in 210 a Roman fleet of twenty ships, under D. Quinctius having advanced to its relief, was encountered by that of the Tarentines under Democrates, and a naval action ensued, in which Nicon greatly distinguished himself by boarding the ship of the Roman commander, and running Quinctius himself through the body with a spear: an exploit which decided the fortune of the day in favour of the Tarentines. (Liv. xxvi. 39.) The following year (B. C. 209) the Romans having in their turn surprised Tarentum, Nicon fell, fighting bravely, in the combat which ensued in the forum of the city. (Id. xxvii. 16.)

3. A relation of Agathocles, the infamous minister and favourite of Ptolemy Philopator, who was put to death, together with his kinsman, B. C. 205. (Polyb. xv. 33.)

4. The treasurer of Perseus, who is called Nicias by Livy and Appian, is named Nicon by Diodorus (xxx. Exc. Vales. p. 579.)

5. A leader of the Cilician pirates, who was taken prisoner by P. Servilius Isauricus. (Cic. in Verr. v. 30. § 79.) He is probably the same person mentioned by Polyænus, as having occupied the town of Phernæ in Messenia, from whence he ravaged the neighbouring country; but having at length been taken prisoner, he surrendered the town into the hands of the Messenians, in order to save his own life. (Polyæn. ii. 35.)

6. A Samian, who saved the ship of which he was steersman, by a dexterous stratagem. (Id. v. 34.)

[E. H. B.]

NICON (Νίκων), literary. 1. A comic writer, assigned by Meineke to the new comedy. A fragment of three lines is preserved by Athenæus, from his play Κίθαροβάς (xi. p. 487, c.), and Pollux gives a portion of the same passage (vi. 99). (Meineke, Frag. Poet. Com. vol. i. p. 485, c. p. 578.)

2. An Armenian abbot. He died from his parents and was trained in a monastery on the confines of Pontus and Paphlagonia. About A. D. 961, he was sent by the abbot of his monastery on a missionary tour. In the course of it he visited Crete, recently freed from the Saracens, and reclaimed the inhabitants to Christianity. He was employed A. D. 981 to intercede with the Bulgarians, who were making incursions into the Grecian empire, and died, about A. D. 998. He was canonised, his name being in the calendar of both the Greek and Latin churches, on the 26th of November. From his life, written originally in Greek, and translated by Sirmondus, Baronius (Annales, vol. x.) has extracted the account of numerous miracles performed by him. Two treatises against the Armenians ascribed to him (Cave speaks doubtfully of the last), are printed, in Greek and Latin, by Cotelierus (Not. ad Patres Apostol. pp. 152, 237). Besides these, other unpublished works of Nikon are mentioned. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. x. p. 299, vol. xi. p. 275; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii. p. 103.)

3. A monk of Rhæthus in Palestine. Under the reign of Constantine Duca, about A. D. 1060, instigated, it is said, by the fear lest the Saracens should in their conquests obliterate the records of the Christian faith, he compiled a work entitled, Παράκτης τῶν ἀρμυνηῶν τῶν δέλων ἐπτολῶν τοῦ Κυρίου. It consists of two books, and sixty-three chapters, containing extracts from the Scriptures, the ecclesiastical canons, the fathers, and other ecclesiastical documents, besides the civil law. Except some extracts given by Cotelierus (Monument. Eccles. Græc.), no part has been published. Fabricius (Bibl. Græc. vol. xi. p. 275, &c.) gives an account of the sources from which Nikon has drawn his extracts, as well as of other writings attributed to him. [W. M. G.]

NICON (Νίκων), an architect and geometrician of Pergamus in Mysia, the father of the physician Galen. (Suid. s. v. Γάληνος; Joann. Tzet. Chil. xii. 9.) He himself superintended the early education of his son, by whom he is highly praised in several places, not only for his knowledge of astronomy, grammar, arithmetic, and various other branches of philosophy, but also for his patience, justice, benevolence, and other virtues. (Galen, De Dignosc. et Cur. Anim. Morb. c. 8, vol. v. p. 41, &c.; De Prob. et Præc. Aliment. Succ. c. 1, vol. vi. p. 755, &c.; De Ord. Libror. suor. vol. xix. p. 59.) He died when his son was in his twentieth year, A. D. 149, 150. (l. c. vol. vi. p. 756.) [W. A. G.]

NICON (Νίκων), a physician, mentioned by Cicero, A. C. 45 (ad Fam. vii. 20), the tutor of Sextus Fadius, and the author of a work Περὶ Πολυπραγίας, De Educitate.

He is perhaps the person quoted by Celsus (De Medic. v. 18. § 26, p. 87), and called in some editions Micon. [W. A. G.]

NICO'PHANES (Νικοφάνης), a native of Megalopolis. He was a man of distinction, and was connected with Aratus by the rites of hospitality. In accordance with a secret agreement entered into with Aratus, Nicophanes and Cercidas induced the Megalopolitans to send an embassy to the congress of the Achæans, to induce them to join them in seeking for assistance from Antigonus. They were themselves deputed for this object, in which they were successful, A. C. 225. (Polyb. ii. 48, &c.) [C. P. M.]

NICO'PHANES, a Greek painter, who appears, from the way in which he is mentioned by Pliny (H. N. xxxv. 10. s. 36. § 23), to have been a younger contemporary or successor of Apelles. Pliny says that in beauty few could compare with him; but it must have been that meretricious kind of beauty, into which the finished grace of Apelles might easily be degraded by an imitation, for Polemon numbered him among the πορνόγραφος. (Athen. xiii. p. 567, b.)* In apparent contradiction to this judgment are the words of Pliny (l. c.): "Colurnus ei et gravitas artis." But Sillig proposes to amend the passage by altering the punctuation, thus: "Annumeratur his et Nicophanes, elegans et concinnus, ita ut venustate ei pauci computentur: colurnus ei et gravitas artis multum a Zeuxide et Apelle abest." A simpler, and perhaps equally satisfactory explanation is, that this is one of the many examples of Pliny's want of the power of discrimination. [P. S.]

NICOPHON and NICOPHRON (Νικοφών, Νικόφρων). The former is undoubtedly the correct orthography; Suidas is the only authority for the latter. He mentions the name four times (s. vv. Νικόφρων, ἀράχνη, σέρφος, κοίμισαι), in the two first of which he calls him Νικόφρων, but every where else, both by him and others, Νικόφῶν is the name given. He was the son of Theron, an Athenian, and a contemporary of Aristophanes at the close of his career. Athenæus (iii. 126, e.) states that he belonged to the old, but he seems rather to have belonged to the middle comedy. 1. We learn from the argument to the Plutus 111. of Aristophanes that he competed for the prize with four others, A. C. 388. Aristophanes exhibiting the second edition of his Plutus, and Nicophon a play called Ἄδωνις, of which no fragments remain, and which is nowhere else mentioned. 2. Suidas (s. v. Νικόφρων) and Eudocia alone mention another play of his, Ἐξ ἔδου ἀνδρῶν. Besides these, he wrote other four plays, which are more frequently mentioned. 3. Ἀφροδίτης γυναι (Suid. s. vv. Νικόφρων, ἀράχνη, σέρφος; Pollux, x. 156; Schol. ad Aristoph. Aves, 82, 1283). 4. Παρθένος (Suid. s. vv. Νικ., κοίμισαι; Athen. vii. p. 323, b.; Pollux, vii. 33). 5. Χειρογράφος (Athen. iii. p. 126, e. ix. p. 389, a.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Aves, 1550). Suidas calls this play Ἐγχειρογράφος. Meineke, on the authority of the Etym. M. p. 367, 32, gives to Nicophon three lines quoted by Athenæus (xiv. p. 645, b.) from a play bearing the name of Χειρογράφος, which had before been given to Nicochares, and in this he is followed by Dindorf. 6. Ξεφύγης (Suid.; Athen. iii. p. 80, b. vi. p. 269, e. ix. p. 368, b.). Besides these references there are others of less importance, collected by Meineke. No more than about twenty-seven lines of his writings remain; and from these, we can only say, as to his merits as a comic writer, that he seems to have possessed no small fund of humour. (Meineke, Frag. Poet. Comic. vol. i. p. 256, &c. vol. ii. p. 848, &c.; Clinton, F. H. vol. ii. p. 101.) [W. M. G.]

NICO'STHENES. 1. A Greek painter, of whom we only know that he was the teacher of Theodorus of Samos, and of Stadienus. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 11. s. 40. § 42.) 2. A vase painter,

* A similar, or rather worse character is given by Plutarch (De Aud. Poet. p. 18. b.) of a painter Chærephanes, who is not elsewhere mentioned, and whose name Sillig suspects to be a corruption of Nicophanes.

several works of whose have been recently discovered. (Raoul-Rochette, Lettre à M. Schorn, p. 9.) [P. S.]

NICO'STRATE (Νικόστρατη). 1. [CAMENÆ.]

2. Wife of Oebalus, and mother of Hippocoon. (Schol. ad Eurip. Or. 447; OEBALUS.) [L. S.]

NICO'STRATUS (Νικόστρατος), a son of Menelaus by the slave Pieria. (Paus. iii. 18. § 7, 19. § 9.) According to others (Apollod. iii. 11. § 1), he was a son of Menelaus by Helena. [L. S.]

NICO'STRATUS (Νικόστρατος), historical. 1. An Athenian general, the son of Diitrephes. We first hear of him in B. C. 427. The struggle between the oligarchical and democratical parties in Coreyra had commenced, when Nicostyratus arrived from Naupactus with twelve ships and a body of 500 Messenians. Through his mediation a compact was entered into between the contending parties, and a defensive and offensive alliance with the Athenians was formed. As Nicostyratus was about to depart the leaders of the commonalty persuaded him to leave five of his vessels, promising to man five for him instead. On board these they attempted to place their enemies, but the latter fled for refuge to the temple of the Dioscuri. Nicostyratus strove to allay their fears, but to no purpose. About 400 of the party took refuge in the temple of Here, and were thence carried over to the island of Ptychia. A few days afterwards, before the Athenians had departed, the Peloponnesian fleet under Alcidas and Brasidas arrived. The democratical party were thrown into consternation. The Athenian squadron set out in good order to meet the enemy, and skilfully sustained the attack of thirty-three vessels of the Peloponnesian fleet; and Nicostyratus was beginning to repeat the manoeuvres of Phormio, which had been attended with such success off Naupactus, when the remaining part of the fleet, having routed the Coreyraeans, advanced against the Athenians, who were compelled to retire. (Thuc. iii. 75, &c.) In B. C. 424, Nicostyratus was one of the colleagues of Nicias in the expedition in which Cythera was taken. (Thuc. iv. 53, &c.) He was one of the Athenians who took the oaths to the year's truce concluded between Sparta and Athens (Thuc. iv. 119); and later in the same year was the colleague of Nicias in the expedition to Chalcidice [NICIAS]. (Thuc. iv. 129, 130.) In B. C. 418, Nicostyratus and Laches led a body of 1000 heavy-armed soldiers and 300 cavalry to Argos, accompanied by Alcibiades as ambassador. The Athenian troops, accompanied by the allies of Argos, proceeded to attack Orchomenos, which made no resistance. From Orchomenos, having been joined by the Argives, the combined forces proceeded against Tegea. Agis marched to protect the place, and in the battle which ensued near Mantinea Nicostyratus and his colleague were both slain. (Thuc. v. 61—74).

2. An Athenian, known by the surname ὁ καλός, was slain in an engagement with the forces of Thrasylbulus, in a descent which the latter made from Phyle (Xen. Hellen. ii. 4. § 6).

3. Two different persons of the name of Nicostyratus are mentioned in the speech of Demosthenes against Eubulides; one, the son of Niciades, the other a foreigner, who was surreptitiously enrolled amongst the citizens through the agency of Eubulides. (Dem. adv. Eubul. pp. 1305, 1317, ed. Reiske.)

4. An Athenian, against whom Demosthenes wrote a speech for Apollodorus, who charges him with a good deal of ingratitude and unneighbourly conduct. Nothing more is known of him than the incidents mentioned in the speech itself, which are not worth detailing here.

5. An Athenian, who died away from Attica, leaving some property; for one of the parties in a law-suit about which Isaacus wrote the speech, Περὶ τοῦ Νικόστρατου κλήρου.

6. An Argive, who, according to Diodorus (xvi. 44), was not only possessed of uncommon strength and courage, but was equally distinguished for his prudence and discretion both in the council and in the field. In battle he wore a lion's skin and carried a club in imitation of Hercules. He conducted a body of 3000 Argives to the assistance of the Persian king, Ochus, for his expedition against Egypt; the king having specially requested that the Argives would send him at the head of such troops as they could furnish. Nicostyratus seems to have taken a conspicuous part in the military operations of the king. (Diod. xvi. 48.) Plutarch (Apophth. p. 192. a., de Vit. Pud. p. 535) records a saying of his in reply to Archidamas, king of Sparta, who promised him a large sum of money and any Spartan woman whom he might choose as a wife to induce him to deliver up to him a fortress of which he had the command.

7. An officer in the service of Alexander the Great. He was one of those who joined with Sostratus in entering into a conspiracy to assassinate Alexander in revenge for an insult offered to Hermolans. The conspiracy, happily, miscarried. (Curt. viii. 6. § 9, &c.)

8. A native of Trichone, in Aetolia, who is spoken of more than once by Polybius as having, in conjunction with a man named Lattabus, in violation of treaties and in time of peace, made an outrageous attack upon the congress of the Pamboeotians. (Polyb. iv. 3, ix. 34.)

9. A Rhodian, who commanded a vessel in the naval battle with Philip off Chios, B. C. 201. In B. C. 168 he was one of the ambassadors sent by the Rhodians to L. Aemilius and to Perseus. (Polyb. xvi. 5, xxix. 4.)

10. Prætor of the Achæan league in B. C. 197. He was present at the meeting held at Mycenæ, at the invitation of Nabis, at which Flamininus and Attalus were also present. On the part of the Achæans he entered into a truce for four months with Nabis. (Liv. xxxiii. 39, 40.) Later in the same year, being at Sicyon with a body of troops, by a skilfully devised stratagem he inflicted a severe defeat on the forces of Philip, stationed at Corinth under the command of Androsthenes [ANDROSTHENES], while they were ravaging the lands of Pellene, Sicyon, and Phlius. (Liv. xxxiii. 14, 15.)

11. A native of Cilicia, and a man of distinguished family. The period when he lived may be gathered from the statement of Quintilian (Inst. Orat. ii. 8. § 14), that in his youth he had seen Nicostyratus, who was then an old man. When a boy, Nicostyratus was carried off by pirates, and taken to Aegeæ, where he was purchased from them by some person. He was renowned for his strength and prowess, and at one of the Olympic festivals gained the prize on the same day in the wrestling match and the pancration. (Paus. v. 21. § 11; Tacit. de Orat. 10.) [C. P. M.]

NICOSTRATUS, literary. 1. The youngest of the three sons of Aristophanes, according to Apollodorus. He was himself a comic poet. By Athenaeus (xiii. p. 597, d.) he is expressly called a poet of the middle comedy. But he belonged also in part to the new comedy. Harpocration (p. 266) speaks of his play called Ὀπριθευτής, as belonging to that species of comedy; and some of the characters which he introduced in other dramas demonstrate the same. In his Βασίλεις he introduced a boasting soldier (Athen. vi. p. 230, d.); in his Τοκιστής, an avaricious money-lender (Athen. xv. p. 685, f) and a vaunting cook (Athen. xiv. p. 664, b.). Photius (Cod. 190, p. 183, ed. Bekk.) has got a story that Nicostratus being inflamed with a mad passion for some one named Tettigidaea, leapt off the Leucadian rock.

The titles of nineteen of the plays of Nicostratus have come down to us. Three of these, the Ἀντύλλος (Athen. iii. 108, c. 118, e.), the Ὀλυνπίων (Athen. iv. p. 169, e. vii. p. 280, d.; Suidas, s. v. Φιλέταυρος), and the Πάνδροσος (Athen. xiii. p. 587, d. xv. p. 693, a. h.) were also attributed to Philetaerus, who, according to some authorities (Schol. ad Plat. Apol. Socr. p. 331), was the third son of Aristophanes [ΦΙΛΕΤΑΕΥΡΟΣ]. The remaining plays of Nicostratus were: 7. Ἱεροφάντης. 8. ΚΑΙΝΗ. 9. Ἄερα. 10. Ἡσίδοος. 11. Διδύμοι. 12. Ἀντιρώα. 13. Ἐκδήνη. 14. Μάγειρος. 15. Ὀπίς. 16. Πλούτος. 17. Σύρος. 18. Ἀνελκυσμένος. 19. Ψευδοστρατηγίας. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 472; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. pp. 346, &c.; Bode, Gesch. der Hellen. Dichtkunst, vol. iii. part. ii. p. 410.)

2. A dramatic writer mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (iv. 18). He bore the nickname of Κλυταμνήστρα, and is probably a different person from the preceding. Meineke is inclined to believe him to have been the author of the Thesela, mentioned by Diogenes Laërtius (ii. 59), though some MSS. there have the reading Πυθόδοτος.

3. A tragic actor, who lived before B.C. 420. He is confounded by Suidas (s. v.) with the son of Aristophanes. (Xen. Symp. iii. 11; Plut. Moral. p. 348, f, Append. Vatic. i. 65; Meineke, Hist. Crit. Com. Graec. p. 347.)

4. A rhetorician, a native of Macedonia. He lived in the time of M. Antoninus. According to Suidas (s. v.) he was the author of the following works: Δεκαμυθία, Εἰκόνες, Πολυμυθία, Σαλατουργοί, and several other works, encomia on the emperor, and various others. Some of his μύθοι were in a dramatic form. Philostratus (de Vit. Sophist. ii. 31) praises the elegance of his style. (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. vi. p. 135.)

5. A native of Trapezus, who lived in the reign of Aurelian. He wrote an account of the exploits of Philippus, the successor of Gordianus among the Arabs; and also an account of Decius, Gallus, Valerianus, and the son of Gallienus, up to the time of the expedition of Valerianus against Sapor, the king of the Persians, A. D. 259. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 288, ed. Westermann.)

6. A writer on music, mentioned in a fragment annexed to Censorinus, and attributed to him by many. (Voss. de Hist. Graec. p. 475.) [C. P. M.]

NICOSTRATUS (Νικόστρατος), a physician, mentioned by Antiphanes the younger (ap. Athen. xiii. 51, p. 586; Harpocr. s. v. Ἀντικύρα) as having left to a courtesan, at his death, a large quantity of hellcbore, whence she acquired the nick-name Anticyra. He is perhaps the same person whose medical formulae are frequently quoted by Andromachus (ap. Gal. De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. viii. 2, ix. 6, vol. xiii. pp. 139, 308, and Aët. iii. 1, 32, p. 478), and others, and who must, therefore, have lived in or before the first century after Christ. [W. A. G.]

NICOSTRATUS, artist. [NICOMACHUS.]

NIGER, a Latin writer (judging by his name) on Materia Medica, who lived later than Cratevas, and a little before Dioscorides (Dioscor. De Mat. Med. i. praef., vol. i. p. 2), and therefore probably about the beginning of the first century after Christ. He seems to have enjoyed some reputation as a writer, as he is mentioned by St. Epiphanius (adv. Haeres. i. l. § 3. p. 3), and several times by Galen among eminent pharmaceutical authors (De Simplic. Medicam. Temper. ac Facult. vi. praef. vol. xi. p. 797, De Antid. i. 2. vol. xiv. p. 7, Gloss. Hippocr. praef. vol. xix. p. 64). Caelius Aurelianus calls him the friend of Tullius Bassus (De Morb. Acut. iii. 16. p. 233), and Galen says he was a follower of Asclepiades (L. c. vol. xi. p. 794).* He is perhaps the person called Sextus Niger by Pliny (Index to H. N. xx.), and some suppose his name to have been Petronius Niger. [PETRONIUS.] [W. A. G.]

NIGER, AQUILLIUS, a writer referred to by Suetonius for a statement respecting the death of the consul Hirtius. (Suet. Aug. 11.)

NIGER, BRUTIDIUS, aedile A. D. 22, and one of the accusers of D. Silanus (Tac. Ann. iii. 66). He appears to be the same as the Brutidius of whom Juvenal speaks (x. 82) in his account of the fall of Sejanus, and likewise the same as the Brutidius Niger, of whose writings the elder Seneca has preserved two passages relating to the death of Cicero. (Senec. Suas. 7.)

NIGER, Q. CAECILIUS, by birth a Sicilian and quaestor of Verres during his administration of Sicily, endeavoured to obtain the conduct of the accusation of Verres, pretending to be his enemy, but in reality desiring to deprive the Sicilians of the powerful advocacy of Cicero. The speech of Cicero, entitled Divinatio in Q. Caecilium, was delivered against this Caecilium, when the judges had to decide to which of the two the prosecution should be entrusted.

NIGER, LENTULUS. [LENTULUS, No. 33.]

NIGER, NOVIVUS, quaestor in B.C. 63, was appointed to investigate the cases of the Catilinarian conspirators, and Caesar, who was then praetor, was charged by L. Vettius as one of Catiline's conspirators. Caesar subsequently cast Novius into prison for permitting a magistrate of higher rank to be accused before him. (Suet. Caes. 17.)

NIGER, C. PESCENNIUS, was descended from a respectable family of equestrian rank, which had attained to provincial distinction at Aquinum. The name of his father was Annus Fuscus, his mother was Lampridia. After having long served as a centurion he passed with credit through the various stages of military advancement under Marcus Aurelius and his son, was raised by the latter to the consularship, and appointed to the command of the Syrian armies, chiefly, it is said, through the interest of Narcissus, the favourite athlete of the prince. After intelligence had reached the East of the death of Commodus, of the shameful elevation and of the miserable end of Julianus, Pescennius was saluted emperor by his troops, A. D. 193. Nor were his prospects altogether hopeless. Severus, his former friend, was, indeed, in possession of the capital, but it was well known that he was regarded with evil eyes by the senate, who, as well as the populace, had even before the death of Julianus openly declared their partiality to Niger. His chances of success, moreover, were perhaps rendered more complicated, but by no means diminished, by the pretensions of Clodius Albinus, who, although he had for the time being, acknowledged the claims of Severus, and professed himself satisfied with the second title of Caesar, was holding the armies of Gaul in hand, ready to take advantage of any opportunity which might offer. But Pescennius was no match for the vigorous activity of his rival. While still loitering listlessly in fancied security at Antioch, he received information that Severus was already marching to the East, at the head of a powerful force. Then, at length, he occupied Thrace and Northern Greece, threw strong garrisons into Byzantium and the most important cities of Asia, fortified the defiles of Taurus, and, at the same time, attempted, but without success, to open negotiations by offering to divide the empire. The first battle was fought by his chief legate Aemilianus, who having encountered the general of Severus in the vicinity of Cyzicus was routed and slain. This engagement was followed by a second near Nicaea in Bithynia, in which Pescennius commanded in person with no better fortune; the third encounter, which took place on the gulph of Issus near the Cilician gates, decided the war, for having been defeated after a bloody contest in which no less than 20,000 of his men are said to have fallen, and Antioch having soon after been captured, the pretender fled towards the Euphrates, was overtaken, brought back, and put to death A. D. 194. His wife, his sons, together with his whole family, shared the same fate, and his property was confiscated. His head, fixed upon a pole, was despatched to Byzantium, which still held out against the conqueror, and was exhibited to the besieged as a significant warning of what they might expect should they continue to offer an obstinate resistance.

Dion Cassius speaks of Niger as a person not very conspicuous for good or for evil, deserving neither much censure nor much praise. His most marked characteristics, both physical and moral, were all of a military cast, and he is said to have set up Camillus, Annibal, and Marius as his models. He was tall of stature, muscular in limb, but graceful withal, a proficient in athletic exercises, and gifted with a voice so loud and clear, that he could be heard distinctly at the distance of a mile. His cognomen of Niger is said to have been derived from the extreme swarthiness of his throat, although otherwise fair skinned and of ruddy complexion. Spartianus has preserved many anecdotes of the firmness with which he enforced the most rigid discipline upon all under his command, but he preserved his popularity by the strict impartiality which he displayed, and by the bright example of frugality, temperance, and hardy endurance of toil which he exhibited in his own person. We are told that he proposed to M. Aurelius and to Commodus many salutary regulations for the better government of the provinces, and he might undoubtedly have proved most useful to the state could he have remained satisfied with filling a subordinate station, but he was led astray by the counsels of Severus Aurelianus whose daughters were betrothed to his sons, and who persuaded him to persevere, against his own better judgment, in the attempt to mount the throne. The invectives of the emperor Severus, who represented him as a hypocrite and a debauchee, must be attributed to jealous rancour; and, although he was but moderately versed in literature, harsh in his address, and under the dominion of strong and vehement passions, he is well entitled to the comprehensive praise of having been a good soldier, a good officer, and good general. (Dion Cass. lxxii. 8, lxxiii. 13, 14, lxxiv. 6—8; Spartian. Julian. 5, Sever. 6—9, Pescenn. Niger; Aur. Vict. de Caes. 20, Epit. 20; Eutrop. viii. 10.) [W. R.]

COIN OF PESCENNIVS NIGER.

NIGER, TREBIUS, one of the companions of L. Lucullus, proconsul in Hispania Baetica, A. C. 150, wrote a work on natural history which is referred to by Pliny (H. N. ix. 25. s. 41, 50. s. 48, xxxii. 2. s. 6).

NIGIDIUS FIGULUS. [FIGULUS.]

NIGRINIANUS, a Roman Caesar or Augustus, known to us from medals only, and these struck after his death. They are very rare, but exist in all the three metals, bearing upon the obverse a head, either bare or radiated, with the legend AVRO NIGRINIANO; on the reverse, a funeral pyre, or an eagle, or an altar, or an eagle upon an altar, with the word CONSECRATIO. It has been conjectured that he was the son of Alexander, who assumed the purple in Africa, A. D. 311, and was soon after destroyed by Maxentius. There is not, however, a jot of evidence in favour of this hypothesis. (Eckhel, vol. vii. p. 520.) [W. R.]

COIN OF NIGRINIANVS.

NIGRINUS, AVI'DIUS, was proconsul in a province in the reign of Domitian, but his name does not occur in the Fasti. (Plin. Ep. x. 71. s. 74, 72. s. 75.)

NIGRINUS, C. PETRONIVS PONTIVS, consul A. D. 37, the year in which the emperor Tiberius died. (Dion Cass. lviil. 27; Suet. Tib. 73; Tac. Ann. vi. 45.)

NILEUS (Nileus), a Greek physician, whose name is sometimes written Nilus (Nēdos) and Neleus (Νήλεus), though Νεῖλεus is probably the most correct form of the word, as it is the most common. He must have lived some time in or before the third century B. C., as he is mentioned by Heracleides of Tarentum (ap. Galen. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iv. 40, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 736). He is quoted by Celsus (v. 18. § 9, vi. 6. §§ 8, 11, viii. 20. pp. 86, 120, 121, 185), Caelius Aurelianus (De Morb. Acut. ii. 29, p. 142), Galen (De Compos. Medicam. sec. Loc. ii. 2, iv. 8, viii. 5, ix. 2, vol. xii. pp. 568, 569, 765, 766, 806, vol. xiii. pp. 181, 182, 239, De Antid. ii. 10, vol. xiv. p. 165), Alexander Trallianus (viii. 12. p. 268), Oribasius (Synops. iii. p. 50; and Coll. Medic. in Mai's Class. Auct. & Codic. Vatic. Edit. vol. iv. pp. 123, 130, 131, 153, 155), Aëtius (i. 4, 10, ii. 3, 21, 24, 108, iii. 4, 2, iii. 1, 16, 17, pp. 166, 307, 308, 353, 365, 454, 455), and Paulus Aegineta (iii. 22, 37, 46, 49, vii. 16, 18, pp. 432, 468, 470, 473, 672, 684), and was celebrated for the invention of a machine for the reduction of dislocations, called πλυνθρον, of which a description is given by Oribasius (De Machinam. c. 8. p. 167.) [W. A. G.]

NILOXENUS (Νειλόξενος). 1. A native of Naucratis in Egypt, mentioned by Plutarch (Sept. Sap. Conv. 2) as a sage who lived in the time of Solon.

2. A Macedonian, son of Satyrus. He was a friend of Alexander the Great, and was left by him with an army to superintend the affairs of the province, when he founded Alexandria on Mount Caucasus. (Arr. iii. 28.) [C. P. M.]

NILUS (Νεῖλος), the god of the river Nile in Egypt, is said to have been a son of Oceanus and Thetys, and father of Memphis and Chione. (Hes. Theog. 338; Apollod. ii. 1. § 4; Serv. ad Aen. iv. 250.) Pindar (Pyth. iv. 90) calls him a son of Cronos. [L. S.]

NILUS or NEILUS (Νεῖλος), the name of several Byzantine writers. A full account of them is given by Leo Allatius, Diatrise de Nilis et eorum Scriptis, in the edition of the letters of Nilus [see below, No. 1], Rome, 1688, and by Harless (Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. x. p. 3, &c.), to which writers we must refer for further particulars and authorities. It is only the most important of them, and the chief facts connected with them that can be mentioned here.

1. ASCETA ET MONACHUS (and Saint), lived in the fifth century of the Christian aera. Saxius places him about the year A. D. 420. He was descended from a noble family in Constantinople, and was eventually raised to the dignity of eparch, or governor of his native city; but being penetrated, we are told, with a deep feeling of the reality of divine things, he renounced his rank and dignities, and retired with his son Theodulus to a monastery on Mount Sinai, while his wife and daughter took refuge in a religious retreat in Egypt. His son is said to have perished in an attack made upon the convent by some barbarians; but Nilus himself escaped, and appears to have died about A. D. 450 or 451.

Nilus was the author of many theological works, several of which have been printed, though they have not yet been collected into one edition. Photius gives extracts from some of his works. (Bibl. Cod. 276.) Some of the works of Nilus were first published in Latin by P. F. Zinus, Venet. 1557, 8vo. Next some other works of Nilus, which had not been printed in the above-mentioned edition, were published by Possinus, Paris, 1639, 4to.; but the best edition of his miscellaneous works is that of Suaresius, entitled S. Nili Tractatus seu Opuscula, Rome, 1673, fol. The letters of Nilus, which are very numerous, being more than three hundred, were first published by Possinus, Paris, 1657, 4to.; but a better edition is the one published at Rome, 1668, fol., with the Latin version of Leo Allatius. Of the various works of Nilus the most important are, 1. Κεφάλαια ἢ Παρανόσεις, containing advice on the way in which a Christian should live; in fact, a summary of practical divinity. 2. Letters, for the most part on the same subject as the preceding work. 3. Ἐπικρίτου ἐγχειρίδιον, in which the Manual of Epictetus, as given by Arrian, is accommodated to the use of Christians. This manual, which appears in the edition of Suaresius mentioned above, is also published in the fifth volume of Schweighäuser's Epictetæ, Lips. 1800. (Phot. l. c.; Niceph. H. E. xiv. 54; Allatius, Fabric. l. c.; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. i. p. 428; Tillemont, Mém. de l'Hist. Eccl. vol. xiv. p. 189.)

2. CABASILAR. [CABASILAS.]

3. OF RHODES, of which he was metropolitan, about A. D. 1360. He is stated, however, to have been a native of Chios. He was the author of several works, of which the most important was a short history of the nine oecumenical councils, published by H. Justellus as an appendix to the Nomocanon of Photius, Paris, 1615, 4to.; by Voellius and Justellus in Bibl. Juris Canonici, 1661, fol. vol. ii. p. 1155; and by Harduinus, Concilii, vol. v. p. 1479. Nilus also wrote some grammatical works, of which an account is given by F. Passow, De Nilo, grammatico adhuc ignoto, ejusque grammatica aliisque grammaticis Scriptis, Vratil. 1831—32, 4to.

4. SCHOLASTICUS, of whom we know nothing, except that he is the author of an epigram in the Greek Anthology (vol. iii. p. 235, ed. Jacobs; Brunck, Anal. iii. p. 14).

NILUS, physician. [NILRUS].

N'INNIA GENS, plebeian, and of very little note. No persons of this name are mentioned at Rome till towards the end of the republic, when we read of L. Ninnius Quadratus, a warm friend of Cicero's [QUADRATUS]. But as early as the second Punic war there was a noble house of this name at Capua, and the Ninnii Celeres are mentioned among the noble and wealthy families with whom Hannibal resided during his stay in that city. (Liv. xxiii. 8.)

N'INNIIUS CRASSUS, is mentioned as one of the translators of the Iliad into Latin verse (Priscian, ix. p. 866, ed. Putschius), but the name is perhaps corrupt. (Wernsdorf, Poët. Latin. Minores, vol. iv. p. 569.)

NINUS (Νίνος), the eponymous founder of the city of Ninus or Nineveh, must be regarded as a mythical and not an historical personage. His exploits are so much mixed up with those of Semiramis, his wife, whose name was much more celebrated in antiquity, that we refer the account of Ninus to the article Semiramis. [SEMIAMIS.]

There is also another Ninus, who is represented by some authorities as the last king of Nineveh, and the successor of Sardanapalus, who is usually described as the last king. See SARDANAPALUS.

NINYAS (Nivas), the son of Ninus and Semiramis, is spoken of under SEMIRAMIS.

NIOBE (Nibē). 1. A daughter of Phoroneus, and by Zeus the mother of Argus and Pelagus. (Apollod. ii. 1. § 1; Paus. ii. 22. § 6; Plat. Tim. 22. b.) In other traditions she is called the mother of Phoroneus and wife of Inachus.

2. A daughter of Tantalus by the Pleiad Taygete or the Hyad Dione (Ov. Met. vi. 174; Hygin. Fab. 9), or, according to others, a daughter of Pelops and the wife of Zethus or Alalcomeneus (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1367), while Parthenius relates quite a different story (Erot. 33), for he makes her a daughter of Asson and the wife of Philottus, and relates that she entered into a dispute with Leto about the beauty of their respective children. In consequence of this Philottus was torn to pieces during the chase, and Asson fell in love with his own daughter; but she rejected him, and he in revenge burnt all her children, in consequence of which Niobe threw herself down from a rock (comp. Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 159). But according to the common story, which represents her as a daughter of Tantalus, she was the sister of Pelops, and married to Amphion, king of Thebes, by whom she became the mother of six sons and six daughters. Being proud of the number of her children, she deemed herself superior to Leto, who had given birth only to two children. Apollo and Artemis, indignant at such presumption, slew all the children of Niobe. For nine days their bodies lay in their blood without any one burying them, for Zeus had changed the people into stones; but on the tenth day the gods themselves buried them. Niobe herself, who had gone to mount Sipylus, was metamorphosed into stone, and even thus continued to feel the misfortune with which the gods had visited her. (Hom. Il. xxiv. 603—617; Apollod. iii. 5. § 6; Ov. Met. vi. 155, &c.; Paus. viii. 2. in fin.) Later writers, and especially the dramatic poets have greatly modified and enlarged the simple story related by Homer. The number and names of the children of Niobe vary very much in the different accounts, for while Homer states that their number was twelve, Hesiod and others mentioned twenty, Alcman only six, Sappho eighteen, Hellanicus six, Euripides fourteen, Herodotus four, and Apollodorus fourteen. (Apollod. l. c.; Ov. Met. vi. 182; Aelian, V. H. xii. 36; Gellius, xx. 6; Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 159; Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1367; Hygin. Fab. 11; Tetz. ad Lyc. 520.) According to Homer all the children of Niobe fell by the arrows of Apollo and Artemis; but later writers state that one of her sons, Amphion or Amyclas, and one of her daughters, Meliboea, were saved, but that Meliboea, having turned pale with terror at the sight of her dying brothers and sisters, was afterwards called Chloris, and this Chloris is then confounded with the daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, who was married to Neleus. (Apollod. l. c.; Hom. Od. xi. 282; Paus. ii. 21. in fin., v. 16. § 3.) The time and place at which the children of Niobe were destroyed are likewise stated differently. According to Homer, they perished in their mother's house; and, according to Apollodorus, the sons were killed by Apollo during the chase on mount Cithaeron (Hygin. Fab. 9, says on mount Sipylus), and the daughters by Artemis at Thebes, not far from the royal palace. According to Ovid, the sons were slain while they were engaged in gymnastic exercises in a plain near Thebes, and the daughters during the funeral of their brothers. Others, again, transfer the scene to Lydia (Eustath. ad Hom. p. 1367), or make Niobe, after the death of her children, go from Thebes to Lydia, to her father Tantalus on mount Sipylus, where Zeus, at her own request, metamorphosed her into a stone, which during the summer always shed tears. (Ov. Met. vi. 303; Apollod. l. c.; Paus. viii. 2. § 3; Soph. Antig. 823, Electr. 147.) In the time of Pausanias (i. 21. § 5) people still fancied they could see the petrified figure of Niobe on mount Sipylus. The tomb of the children of Niobe, however, was shown at Thebes. (Paus. ix. 16. in fin., 17. § 1; but comp. Schol. ad Eurip. Phoen. 159.) The story of Niobe and her children was frequently taken as a subject by ancient artists (Paus. i. 21. § 5, v. 11. § 2); but none of the ancient representations is more celebrated than the group of Niobe and her children which filled the pediment of the temple of Apollo Sosianus at Rome, and was found at Rome in the year 1583. This group is now at Florence, and consists of the mother, who holds her youngest daughter on her knees, and thirteen statues of her sons and daughters, independent of a figure usually called the paedagogus of the children. It is, however, not improbable that several of the statues which now compose the group, originally did not belong to it. Some of the figures in it belong to the most masterly productions of ancient art. The Romans themselves were uncertain as to whether the group was the work of Scopas or Praxiteles. (Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 4; comp. Welcker, Zeitschrift für die alte Kunst, p. 589, &c.) [L. S.]

NIPHATES (Nipētrēs), one of the Persian generals in the battle of the Granicus. (Arrian, i. 12.) [C. P. M.]

NIREUS (Nipeús). 1. A son of Charopus and Aglaia, was, next to Achilles, the handsomest among the Greeks at Troy, but unwarlike. He came from the island of Syme (between Rhodes and Cnidus), and commanded only three ships and a small number of men. (Hom. Il. vi. 671; Hygin. Fab. 270.) According to Diodorus (v. 53), he also ruled over a part of Cnidus, and he is said to have been slain by Eurypylus or Aeneias. (Dict. Cret. iv. 17; Dar. Phryg. 21; Hygin. Fab. 113.) His beauty became proverbial. (Lucian, Dial. Mort. 9.)

2. A son, or favourite of Heracles, with whom he fought against the lion of mount Helicon. (Ptolem. Hephaest. 2.) [L. S.]

NISUS (Nīos). 1. A son of Pandion (or, according to others, of Deion or Ares) and Plyia, was a brother of Aegeus, Pallas, and Lycus, and husband of Abrote, by whom he became the father of Scylla. He was king of Megara; and when Minos, on his expedition against Athens, took Megara, Nisus died, because his daughter Scylla, who had fallen in love with Minos, had pulled out the purple or golden hair which grew on the top of her father's head, and on which his life depended. (Apollod. iii. 15. §§ 5, 6, 8; Schol. ad Eurip. Hippod. 1090.) Minos, who was horrified at the conduct of the unnatural daughter, ordered Scylla to be fastened to the poop of his ship, and afterwards drowned her in the Saronic gulf. (Apollod. l. c.) According to others, Minos left Megara in disgust, but Scylla leaped into the sea, and swam after his ship; but her father, who had been changed into an eagle, perceived her, and shot down upon her, whereupon she was metamorphosed into either a fish or a bird called Ciris. (Ov. Met. viii. 6, &c.; Hygin. Fab. 198; Virg. Georg. i. 405, Eclog. vi. 74.) The tradition current at Megara itself knew nothing of this expedition of Minos, and called the daughter of Nisus Iphinoë, and represented her as married to Megareus. It is further added, that in the dispute between Sciron and Nisus Aeacus assigned the government to Nisus (Paus. i. 39. § 5), and that Nisa, the original name of Megara, and Nisaea, afterward the port town of Megara, derived their names from Nisus, and that the promontory of Scyllaeum was named after his daughter. (Paus. i. 39. § 4, ii. 34. § 7; Strab. viii. p. 373.) The tomb of Nisus was shown at Athens, behind the Lyceum. (Paus. i. 19. § 5.)

2. A son of Hyrtacus, a companion of Aeneias and friend of Euryalus, whose death he avenged by slaying Volscens, and then himself, in a dying state, threw himself upon the body of his friend and expired. (Virg. Aen. ix. 176, &c. 444.)

3. A noble of Delichium, and father of Amphinomus, who was one of the suitors of Penelope. (Hom. Od. xvi. 395, xviii. 126, 412.) [L. S.]

NITOCRIS (Nitocris). 1. A queen of Babylon, mentioned by Herodotus, who ascribes to her many important works at Babylon and its vicinity. According to his account she changed the course of the river above Babylon, built up with bricks the sides of the river at the city, and also threw a bridge across the river. He also relates that she was buried above one of the city gates, and that her tomb was opened by Darius. (Herod. i. 185—189.) Who this Nitocris was has occasioned great dispute among modern writers, and is as uncertain as almost all other points connected with the early history of the East. Since Herodotus (i. 185) speaks of her as queen, shortly after the capture of Ninus or Nineveh by the Medes, which is placed in B. C. 606, it is supposed by most modern writers that she was the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, who began to reign in B. C. 604, and the mother or grandmother of Labynetus or Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon. See Clinton, F. H. vol. i. p. 278, note f, who brings forward some other arguments in support of this opinion.

2. A queen of Egypt. Herodotus relates that she was a native Egyptian, and the only female of the 330 Egyptian monarchs whose names were read to the historian by the priests from a papyrus manuscript. He further tells us that she was elected to the sovereignty in place of her brother, whom the Egyptians had killed, and that she devised the following scheme in order to take revenge upon the murderers of her brother. She built a very long chamber under ground, and when it was finished invited to a banquet in it those of the Egyptians who had had a principal share in the murder. While they were engaged in the banquet she let in upon them the waters of the Nile by means of a large concealed pipe and drowned them all, and then, in order to escape punishment, threw herself into a chamber full of ashes. (Herod. ii. 100.)

This Nitocris appears to have been one of the most celebrated personages in Egyptian legends. Even in the times of the Roman emperors we find her name mentioned as one of the old heroines of the East, as we see from the way in which she is spoken of by Dion Cassius, and the emperor Julian, both of whom class her with Semiramis (Dion Cass. lxxii. 6; Julian. Orat. pp. 126, 127). Julius Africanus, and Eusebius (apud Synell. pp. 58, 59), who borrow their account from Manetho, describe her as the most high-minded and most beautiful woman of her age, with a fair complexion, adding that she built the third pyramid. By this we are to understand, as Bunsen has shown, that she finished the third pyramid, which had been commenced by Mycerinus, and the same fact is intimated by the curious tale of Herodotus (ii. 134), which states that the erection of the pyramid was attributed by many to the Greek cozeran, Rhodopis, who must, in all probability, be regarded as the same person as Nitocris. [RHODOPIS.]

Bunsen makes Nitocris the last sovereign of the sixth dynasty, and states that she reigned for six years in place of her murdered husband (not her brother, as Herodotus states), whose name was Menthuphia. The latter is supposed to be the son or grandson of the Meiris of the Greeks and Romans. The tale related by Herodotus of Nitocris constructing a subterraneous chamber for the punishment of the murderers of her brother is supposed by Bunsen, with much probability, to have reference to her erection of the third pyramid, though the waters of the Nile could not have been let into it, as the water of the river does not rise high enough for the purpose. (Bunsen, Aegyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, vol. ii. pp. 236—242.)

NIXI DII, a general term, which seems to have been applied by the Romans to those divinities who were believed to assist women at the time when they were giving birth to a child. (Quos putabant praesidere parturientium viribus, Fest. p. 175, ed. Müller; Ov. Met. ix. 294; Nonius, p. 57.) Before the cella of Minerva, on the Capitol, there were three statues, which were designated as Dii Nixi. [L. S.]

NOBILIOR, the name of a family of the plebeian Fulvia gens. This family was originally called Paetinus [PAETINUS], and the name of Nobilior seems to have been first assumed by the consul of B. C. 255 (see below, No. 1), to indicate that he was more noble than any others of this name. His descendants dropped the name of Paetinus, and retained only that of Nobilior.

1. SER. FULVIUS M. F. M. N. PAETINUS NOBILIOR, was consul B. C. 255, with M. Aemilius Paullus about the middle of the first Punic war. In the beginning of this year Regulus had been defeated in Africa by the Carthaginians, and the remains of his army were besieged in Clypea. As soon as the senate heard of this disaster they sent both consuls with a fleet of at least three hundred ships, to bring off the survivors. After reducing Cosura the Romans met the Carthaginian fleet near the Hermæan promontory, and gained a most brilliant victory over it. The loss of the Carthaginians was very great, though the numbers are differently stated, and are evidently corrupt in Polybius. After the victory the consuls landed at Clypea, but did not remain long in Africa on account of the complete want of provisions. As it was near the summer solstice, in the month of July, when the Romans set out homewards, the pilots cautioned them to avoid the southern coast of Sicily, as violent gales from the south and south-west make that coast very dangerous at that time of the year. The consuls, however, disregarded their warning; and off Camarina they were surprised by a fearful storm, which destroyed almost the whole fleet, and strewed the coast from Camarina to Pachynus with wrecks and corpses. Both consuls, however, escaped, and celebrated a triumph as proconsuls in the following year (Polyb. i. 36, 37; Eutrop. ii. 22; Oros. iv. 9; Diod. xxiii. 14; Zonar. viii. 14). Respecting the date of this campaign, see Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, vol. iii. p. 591, and Arnold, Hist. of Rome, vol. ii. p. 593. n. 67.

2. M. FULVIUS M. F. S. P. N. NOBILIOR, grandson of the preceding, was curule aedile B. C. 195, and praetor B. C. 193, when he obtained Further Spain as his province, with the title of proconsul. He remained in this country two years, and fought with great success against the nations that still resisted the Roman supremacy. He gained a victory over the united forces of the Vaccæi, Tectones, and Celtiberi, near the town of Toletum (Toledo), and took their king, Hilermus, prisoner. He then obtained possession of the town of Toletum, which is the first time that this place is mentioned in history. On his return to Rome in B. C. 191 he was granted the honour of an ovation. (Liv. xxxiii. 42, xxxiv. 54, 55, xxxv. 7, 22, xxxvi. 21, 39.) In B. C. 189 he was consul with M. Fulvius Nobilior, and received the conduct of the war against the Aetolians. He captured the strong town of Ambracia, and then compelled the Aetolians to sue for peace, which was granted them on favourable terms. Shortly afterwards he obliged the island of Cephallenia, which had been excluded from the terms of the peace, to submit to the dominion of Rome. He remained in his province for the next year as proconsul; and on his return to Rome, in B. C. 187, celebrated a most splendid triumph. In the following year he exhibited for ten successive days the games which he had vowed in the Aetolian war, and which were the most magnificent that had yet been seen at Rome. There were venationes of lions and panthers; and contests of athletæ were now for the first time exhibited in the city. The conquest of Aetolia by this consul is also commemorated in the inscription of a statue discovered at Tusculum, from which place the Fulvii originally came. [Fulvia gens.] (Polyb. xxii. 8—15; Liv. xxxvii. 47, 48, 50, xxxviii. 3—11, 28, 30, 33, xxxix. 4, 5, 22; Aurel. Vict. de Vir. Ill. 52; Orelli, Inscr. No. 562.) In B. C. 179 he was censor with M. Aemilius Lepidus, the pontifex maximus. The two censors had previously been at feud, but were reconciled to one another upon their election, and discharged the duties of their office with unanimity and concord. They executed many public works, which are mentioned by Livy. (Liv. xl. 45, 46, 51, xli. 2; Val. Max. iv. 2. § 1; Cic. de Prov. Cons. 9.)

Fulvius Nobilior had a taste for literature and art; he was a patron of the poet Ennius, who accompanied him in his Aetolian campaign; and he belonged to that party among the Roman nobles who were introducing into the city a taste for Greek literature and refinement. He was, therefore, an object of the attacks of Cato the Censor, who actually reproached him with having taken Ennius with him into Aetolia, and insinuated that he was corrupting the old Roman discipline by bestowing military crowns upon the soldiers for trivial reasons. Cato also made merry with his name, calling him nobilior instead of nobilior. (Cic. Tusc. i. 2, Brut. 20, pro Arch. 11, de Orat. iii. 63.)

Fulvius, in his censorship, erected a temple to Hercules and the Muses in the Circus Flaminius, as a proof that the state ought to cultivate the liberal arts, and adorned it with the paintings and statues which he had brought from Greece upon his conquest of Aetolia. He also set up Fasti in this temple, which are referred to by Macrobius. (Cic. pro Arch. l. c.; Plin. H. N. xxxv. 10. a. 36. § 4; Eumenius, Orat. pro Scholis Instaurand. 7. § 3; Macrobi. Satura. i. 12.) He left behind him two sons, both of whom obtained the consulship. (Nos. 3 and 4.) His brother, by his mother's side, was C. Valerius Laevinus, who accompanied him in his Aetolian campaign (Polyb. xxii. 12), and who was consul in B. C. 176.

3. M. FULVIUS M. F. M. N. NOBILIOR, son of No. 2, was tribune of the plebs B. C. 171 (Liv. xlii. 32), curule aedile B. C. 166, the year in which the Andria of Terence was performed (Tw. Andr. Terent.), and consul B. C. 159, with Cn. Cornelius Dolabella. Of the events of his consulship we have no records; but as the triumphal fasti assign him a triumph in the following year over the Eleates, a Ligurian people, he must have carried on war in Liguria.

4. Q. FULVIUS M. F. M. N. NOBILIOR, son of No. 2, was consul B. C. 153 with T. Annius Luscius. Livy mentions (xxxix. 44) a Q. Fulvius Nobilior who was appointed in B. C. 184 one of the triumviri for founding the colonies of Potentia and Pisaurum; and as Cicero says (Brut. 20) that Q. Nobilior, the son of the conqueror of the Aetolians, was a triumvir coloniae deducendae, though he does not mention the name of the colony, it would seem that the Q. Nobilior mentioned by Livy is the same as the one referred to by Cicero. But there are two objections to this natural conclusion: in the first place, it is exceedingly unlikely, and quite contrary to Roman practice, that such important duties as were involved in the foundation of a colony should have been entrusted to a person so young as Q. Nobilior must have been at that time, since he did not obtain the consulship for thirty-one years afterwards; and in the second place, the Q. Fulvius M. f. who, says Livy (xl. 42), was elected triumvir epulo in B. C. 180, while still a boy (praetentatus), can hardly mean any one else than the son of the great M. Fulvius whose name occurs so often in that part of the historian's writings. A consideration of dates will make it almost certain that this Q. Fulvius M. f. must be the same as the consul of B. C. 153; for supposing him to have been sixteen when he was enrolled in the college of the epulones, he would have been forty-three when he was elected consul, the age at which a citizen could first obtain this honour. We therefore conclude that the Q. Nobilior who was triumvir in B. C. 184 must be a different person from the consul of 153.

The consuls of the year B. C. 153 entered upon their office on the kalends of January, whereas up to this time the ides of March had been the day on which they took possession of their dignity. The formidable revolt of the Celtiberians is given as the reason of this alteration; but whatever may have been the cause, the kalends of January continued from this time forth to be the first day of the consular year. (Cassiodorus and Marrianus, Chron.; Liv. Epit. 47, refers to this change, but the words are not intelligible as they stand. See the notes in Drakenborch's edition.) Since the conquest of the Celtiberians, in B.C. 179, by Gracchus, the father of the celebrated tribunes, this warlike nation had given the Romans no trouble, which, however, was more owing to the wise regulations of Gracchus, after his victories, than to the victories themselves. But in consequence of the Romans suspecting the Celtiberian town of Segida or Segeda, they embarked in a war against the whole nation, which was not brought to a conclusion till B.C. 134, by the capture of Numantia by Scipio. Fulvius was sent into Spain in his consulship with an army of nearly 30,000 men, but was very unsuccessful. He was first defeated by the enemy under the command of a native of Segida, called Carus, with a loss of 6000 men, on the day of the Vulcanalia, or the 23d of August; and the misfortune was looked upon as so severe, that no Roman general would afterwards fight on that day unless compelled. Fulvius retrieved, however, to some extent, the disaster, by an attack of the Roman cavalry, who checked the conquerors in their pursuit, and slew Carus and a considerable number of his troops. Shortly afterwards the consul received from Masinissa a reinforcement of Numidian cavalry and some elephants; and the latter caused such terror in the enemy, that they fled before the Romans, and shut themselves up in the town of Numantia. But under the walls of this place Fulvius experienced a new disaster: a restive elephant, whose example was imitated by his companions, threw the Roman army into confusion; and the Celtiberians, availing themselves of this circumstance, sallied from the town, slew 4000 Romans, and captured their elephants. After meeting with one or two other repulses, Fulvius closed his inglorious campaign, and retired to winter-quarters, where many of the troops perished of hunger and cold. He was succeeded in the command by Claudius Marcellus, the consul of the next year. (Appian, Hisp. 45—47; Polyb. xxxv. 4.)

Fulvius was censor in B.C. 136. (Fasti Capit.) Cicero tells us that he inherited his father's love for literature, and that he presented the poet Ennius with the Roman franchise when he was a triumvir for founding a colony (Cic. Brut. 20).

5. M. FULVIUS NOBILIOR, tribune of the soldiers, B.C. 180, and described as a brother of Q. Fulvius, was probably brother of the Quintus who was triumvir coloniae deducendae in B.C. 184. See the beginning of No. 4. (Liv. xl. 41.)

6. M. FULVIUS NOBILIOR is mentioned by Sallust (Cat. 17) as one of Catiline's conspirators. He is perhaps the same as the M. Fulvius Nobilior who was condemned in B.C. 54, but for what crime we do not know. (Cic. ad Att. iv. 16. § 12.)

NOCTUA, Q. CAEDIQ. CIUS, consul, B.C. 289, and censor 283, is only known from the Fasti.

NODOTUS or NODUTUS, is said to have been a divinity presiding over the knots in the stem of plants producing grain; but it seems more probable that originally it was only a surname of Saturnus. (Aug. De Civ. Dei. iv. 8; Arnob. adv. Gent. iv. 7.) [L. S.]

NOMENTA'NUS is mentioned several times by Horace as proverbially noted for extravagance and a riotous mode of living. He was one of the guests at the celebrated dinner of Nasidienus. The Scholiasts tell us that his full name was L. Cassius Nomentanus. (Hor. Sat. i. l. 102, i. 8. 11, ii. l. 22, ii. 3. 175, 224, ii. 8. 23, 25, 60.)

NO'MIA (Nopla), an Arcadian nymph, from whom mount Nomia, near Lycosura in Arcadia, was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. viii. 38. § 8, x. 31. § 2.) [L. S.]

NO'MI'US (Némos), a surname of divinities protecting the pastures and shepherds, such as Apollo, Pan, Hermes, and Aristaeus. (Aristoph. Theoph. 983; Anthol. Palat. ix. 217; Callim. Hymn. in Apoll. 47.) [L. S.]

NOMOS (Némos), a personification of law, described as the ruler of gods and men. (Pind. Fragm. 151, p. 640, ed. Böckh; Plat. Gorg. p. 484, b.; Orph. Hymn. 63.) [L. S.]

NONACRIS (Nácrapis), the wife of Lycaon, from whom the town of Nonacris in Arcadia was believed to have derived its name. (Paus. viii. 17. § 5.) From this town Hermes and Evander are called Nonacriates and Nonacrius, in the general sense of Arcadian. (Steph. Byz. s. v. Nácrapis; Or. Fast. v. 97.) [L. S.]

NONIA GENS, plebeian. Persons of this name are not mentioned till the very end of the republic, but occur frequently under the early emperors. The principal cognomens of the Nonii are ASPERNAS, BALBUS, GALLUS, QUINTILLANUS, and SUPERNAS, or SUPERNAS; but as one or two persons of the name of Aspernas are omitted under that head, they are given below under NONIUS. The only cognomens which occur on coins are Quintilianus and Supernas.

NONIA'NUS, CONSIDI'US. There were two persons of this name who espoused Pompey's party in the civil war, and who are spoken of under CONSIDIUS, Nos. 8 and 9. The annexed coin, however, seems to refer to neither of them. It bears on the obverse the head of Venus, with C. CONSIDI NONIANI; and, on the reverse, a temple on the top of a mountain, on which is written, XAVC., the mountain itself being surrounded with fortifications. The coins seem to refer to the temple of Venus at Eryx, in Sicily, which was probably repaired by this C. Considius Nonianus, at the command of the senate.

COIN OF C. CONSIDIUS NONIANUS.

NONIANUS, M. SERVI'LIUS, was consul A. D. 35, with C. Sestius Gallus. (Dion Cass. lvi. 25; Tac. Ann. vi. 31; Plin. H. N. x. 43. s. 60.) In the passages just referred to he is called simply M. Servilius; but the Fasti give him the surname of Nonianus, and Pliny, in another passage (H. N. xxxvii. 6. s. 21), speaks of the consul, Servilius Nonianus, who was, he tells us, the grandson of the Nonius, proscribed by M. Antonius. [NONIUS, No. 4.] His name shows that he was adopted by one of the Servilii. The consul of A. D. 35 was, therefore, the same as the M. Servilius Nonianus, who was one of the most celebrated orators and historians of his time. The emperor Claudius listened to the recitation of his works; and Quintilian also heard him, and speaks with commendation of his works, although he says he was "minus presens, quam historiae auctoritas postulat." Pliny calls him "princeps civitatis;" and Tacitus, who mentions his death in A. D. 60, praises his character as well as his talents. (Quintil. x. 1. § 102; Plin. Epist. l. 13; Plin. H. N. xxviii. 2. a. 5; Tac. Ann. xiv. 19, Dial. de Orat. 23.)

NONIUS. 1. A. NONIUS, a candidate for the tribuneship of the plebs for B. C. 100, was murdered by Glaucia and Appuleius Saturninus, because he was opposed to their party. (Appian, B. C. l. 28; Plut. Mar. 29; Liv. Epit. 69.)

2. NONIUS, a friend of Fimbria, in whose army he was in B. C. 84, when Sulla was preparing to attack him; but when Fimbria wished his soldiers to renew their military oath to him, and called upon Nonius to do so first, he refused. (Appian, Mithr. 59.)

3. NONIUS STRUMA was raised to one of the curule magistracies by Julius Caesar, but appears to have been unworthy of the honour. Hence Catullus exclaims (Carm. 52):—

“Quid est, Catulle, quid moraris emori?
Sella in curuli Struma Nonius sedet.”

4. NONIUS, the son of Nonius Struma [No. 3], was proscribed by M. Antonius in consequence of his possessing an opal stone of immense value. He was the grandfather of Servilius Nonianus [NONIANUS]. (Plin. H. N. xxxvii. 6. a. 21.)

5. NONIUS, a centurion of the soldiers, was murdered by his comrades in the Campus Martius, B. C. 41, because he endeavoured to put down some attempts at disorder and mutiny. (Appian, B. C. v. 16.)

6. NONIUS had the charge of one of the gates of Rome in what is called the Perusinian war, B. C. 41, and admitted L. Antonius into the city. (Appian, B. C. v. 30.)

7. NONIUS ASPRENAS had the title of proconsul in B. C. 46, and served under Caesar in the African war, in that year, and also in the Spanish war, B. C. 45. (Auct. B. Afr. 80, Hisp. 10.)

8. C. NONIUS ASPRENAS, probably a son of the preceding, was accused, in B. C. 9, of poisoning 130 guests at a banquet, but the number in Pliny is probably corrupt, and ought to be thirty. The accusation was conducted by Cassius Severus, and the defence by Asinius Pollio. The speeches of these orators at this trial were very celebrated in antiquity, and the perusal of them is strongly recommended by Quintilian. Asprenas was an intimate friend of Augustus, and was acquitted through the influence of the emperor. (Plin. H. N. xxxv. 12. a. 46; Suet. Aug. 56; Dion Cass. iv. 4; Quintil. x. 1. § 23.) In his youth, Asprenas was injured by a fall while performing in the Ludus Trojæ before Augustus, and received in consequence from the emperor a golden chain, and the permission to assume the surname of Torquatus, both for himself and his posterity. (Suet. Aug. 43.) The Torquatus, to whom Horace addresses two of his poems (Carm. iv. 7, Sat. i. 5), is supposed by Weichert and others, to be the same as this Nonius Asprenas, since all the Manlii Torquati appear to have perished, which was the reason probably why Augustus gave him the ancient and honourable surname of Torquatus. Some modern writers have supposed that the C. Asprenas, who was accused of poisoning, was the same as the proconsul of this name in the African war [No. 7]; but Weichert has brought forward sufficient reasons to render it much more probable that he was his son. (Weichert, De Lucii Varii et Cassii Parmensis Vita, &c., Grævæ, 1836, pp. 197—199, and Excursus I., “De C. Nonio Asprenate,” p. 301, &c.; comp. Meyer, Orator. Roman. Fragm. p. 492, &c., 2nd ed.) For the other persons of the name of Nonius Asprenas, see ASPRENAS.

9. NONIUS RECEPTUS, a centurion, remaining firm to Galba, when his comrades espoused the side of Vitellius, A. D. 69, was thrown into chains by them and shortly after put to death. (Tac. Hist. i. 56, 59.)

10. NONIUS ACTIANUS, an infamous delator under Nero, was punished at the beginning of Vespasian's reign, A. D. 70. (Tac. Hist. iv. 41.)

NONIUS MARCELLUS, the grammarian. [MARCELLUS.]

NONNOSUS (Νόννος), was sent by the emperor Justinian I. on an embassy to the Aethiopians, Amerites, Saracens, and other Eastern nations. On his return he wrote a History of his embassy, which has perished, but an abridgment of it has been preserved by Photius (Bibl. Cod. 3). From the account of Photius we learn that the father of Nonnosus, whose name was Abraham, had been also sent on an embassy to the Saracens, and that his grandfather Nonnosus had likewise been sent on a similar embassy by the emperor Anastasius. The abridgment of Photius has been reprinted, in the Bonn collection of the Byzantine writers, in the volume containing the fragments of Dexippus, Eunapius, &c., edited by Niebuhr and Bekker, 1829. (Fabric. Bibl. Græc. vol. vii. p. 543; Voss. de Hist. Græc. p. 326, ed. Westermann.)

NONNUS (Νόννος), a Greek poet, was a native of Panopolis in Egypt, and seems to have lived shortly before the time of Agathias (iv. p. 128), who mentions him among the recent (νέοι) poets. Whether he is the same person as the Nonnus whose son Soëna is recommended by Synesius to his friends Anastasius and Pylaemenes, is uncertain. (Synes. Ep. ad Anast. 43, ad Pylaem. 102.) Respecting his life nothing is known, except that he was a Christian, whence he cannot be confounded with the Nonnus mentioned by Suidas (s. v. Νόννος). He is the author of an enormous epic poem, which has come down to us under the name of Διονυσιακά or Βακχικά, and consists of forty-eight books. As the subject of the poem is a pagan divinity and a number of mythological stories, some writers have supposed that it was written previous to his conversion to Christianity or that it was composed in ridicule of the theology of the pagans; but neither opinion appears to be founded on any sound argument, for it does not appear why a Christian should not have amused himself with writing a poem on pagan subjects. The poem itself shows that Nonnus had no idea whatever of what a poetical composition should be, and it is, as Heinaius characterises it, more like a chaos than a literary production. Although the professed subject of the poem is Dionysus, Nonnus begins with the story of Zeus carrying off Europa; he proceeds to relate the fight of Typhon with Zeus; the story of Cadmus and the foundation of Thebes, the stories of Actæon, Persephone, the birth of Zagreus and the deluge, and at length, in the seventh book, he relates the birth of Dionysus. The first six or seven books are so completely devoid of any connecting link, that any one of them might by itself be regarded as a separate work. The remaining books are patched together in the same manner, without any coherence or subordination of less important to more important parts. The style of the work is bombastic and inflated in the highest degree; but the author shows considerable learning and fluency of narration. The work is mentioned by Agathias, repeatedly by Eustathius in his commentary on Homer, and in the Etymologicum Magnum (s. v. Διδύμοι). There is an epigram in which Nonnus speaks of himself as the author of a poem on the fight of the Gigantes, but it seems that this is not a distinct work, but refers to the fight of Zeus and the Gigantes related in the first books of the Dionysiaca. The first edition that was published is that of G. Falckenburg, Antwerp, 1569, 4to. In 1605 an octavo edition, with a Latin translation, appeared at Hanau. A reprint of it, with a dissertation by D. Heinsius, and emendations by Jos. Scaliger, was published at Leiden in 1510, 8vo. A new edition, with a critical and explanatory commentary, was edited by F. Graefe, Leipzig, 1819–1826, in 2 vols. 8vo.

A second work of Nonnus, which has all the defects that have been censured in the Dionysiaca, is a paraphrase of the gospel of St. John in Hexameter verse. The first edition of it was published by Aldus Manutius, Venice, 1501, 4to.; and subsequently others appeared at Rome, 1508, Hagenu, 1527, 8vo. with an epistle of Phil. Melancthon, Frankfurt, 1541; Paris, 1541, 1556; Gossler, 1616; Cologne, 1566. It was also repeatedly translated into Latin, and several editions appeared with Latin versions. The most important of these is that of D. Heinsius, Lugd. Bat. 1627, 8vo.

There is further a collection and exposition of various stories and fables, bearing the titles of Συναγωγή καὶ ἐξηγήσεις ἱστοριῶν, which is ascribed to Nonnus, and was published at Eton in 1610, 4to. by R. Montacutius. But Bentley (Upon the Ep. of Phalaris, p. 17, &c.) has shown that this collection is the production of a far more ignorant person than Nonnus. (Comp. Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. vol. viii. p. 601, &c.; Ouwaroß, Nonnus von Panopolis der Dichter, ein Beitrag zur Gesch. der Griech. Poesie, Petersburg and Leipzig, 1817, 4to.) [L. S.]

NONNUS, THEOPHANES, (Θεοφανὴς Νόννος), sometimes called Nonus, a Greek medical writer who lived in the tenth century after Christ, as his work is dedicated to the emperor Constantinus Porphyrogenitus, A. D. 911—959, at whose command it was composed. Though commonly called Nonnus, it is supposed by some persons that his real name was Theophanes. His work is entitled Ἐκπεμπὴ τῆς ἱατρικῆς ἀράδος τέχνης, Compendium totius Artis Medicæ, and consists of two hundred and ninety short chapters; it is compiled almost entirely from previous writers, especially Alexander Trallianus, Aëtius, and Paulus Aegineta, whom, however, he does not once mention by name. Almost the only point worthy of notice is that (according to Sprengel) he is the earliest Greek medical writer, who makes distinct mention of distilled rose-water, an article which his countrymen seem to have gained from the Arabians. It was first published by Jeremias Martius, Greek and Latin, Argent., 8vo. 1568; and afterwards, in a much improved form, in 1794, 1795, 8vo. two vols., Gothæ et Amstel., edited by J. S. Bernard, and published after his death. (See Freind's Hist. of Physic, vol. i.; Sprengel, Hist. de la Méd., vol. ii.; Haller, Bibl. Medic. Pract. vol. i.; Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. xii. p. 685, ed. vet.; Choulant, Handb. der Bücherkunde für die Aeltere Med.) [W. A. G.]

NORAX (Νόραξ), a son of Hermes and Erytheia, the daughter of Geryones, is said to have led an Iberian colony to Sardinia, and to have founded the town of Nora. (Paus. x. 17. § 4.) [L. S.]

NORBANUS, occurs as a name of several distinguished Romans towards the latter end of the republic, but they appear to have had no gentile name. Many modern writers suppose that C. Norbanus, who was consul B. C. 83 [see below, No. 1], belonged to the Junia gens, but for this there is no authority whatsoever. In fact, Norbanus came to be looked upon as a kind of gentile name, and hence a cognomen was attached to it. Thus, in some of the Fasti, the C. Norbanus just mentioned bears the cognomen Balbus or Bulbus; and subsequently several of the family are called by the surname of Flaccus. It is quite uncertain to which member of the family the following coin belongs. It bears on the obverse the head of Venus, and on the reverse ears of corn, a caduceus, and fasces with an axe. (Eckhel, vol. v. p. 262.)

COIN OF C. NORBANUS.

1. C. NORBANUS, was tribune of the plebs, B. C. 95, when he accused Q. Servilius Cæpio of majestas, because he had robbed the temple of Tolosa in his consulship, B. C. 106, and had by his rashness and imprudence occasioned the defeat and destruction of the Roman army by the Cimbri, in the following year (B. C. 105). The senate, to whom Cæpio had by a lex restored the judicia in his consulship, but of which they had been again deprived two years afterwards, made the greatest efforts to obtain his acquittal; but, notwithstanding these exertions, and the powerful advocacy of the great orator L. Crassus, who was then consul, he was condemned by the people, and went into exile at Smyrna. The disturbances, however, which took place at his trial, afforded the enemies of Norbanus a fair pretext for his accusation; and in the following year (B. C. 94), he was accordingly accused of majestas under the lex Appuleia. The accusation was conducted by P. Sulpicius Rufus; and the defence by the celebrated orator M. Antonius, under whom Norbanus had formerly served as quaestor, and who gives in the De Oratore of Cicero a very interesting account of the line of argument which he adopted on the occasion. Norbanus was acquitted. (Cic. de Orat. ii. 48, 49, iii. 21, 25, 39, 40, Orat. Part. 30; Val. Max. viii. 5. § 2; Meyer, Fragm. Rom. Orator p. 287, &c., 2d ed.)

In B. C. 90 or 89, Norbanus was praetor in Sicily during the Social or Marsic war, but no attempt at insurrection occurred in the island. (Cic. Verr. v. 4, comp. iii. 49.) In B. C. 88 he came to the assistance of the town of Rhegium, which was very nearly falling into the hands of the Samnites, who, taking advantage of the civil commotions at Rome, had formed the design of invading Sicily. (Diod. Eclg. xxxvii. p. 540, ed. Wesseling. The text of Diodorus has Ἰσθμὸς Ὀψάρης, for which we ought undoubtedly to read with Wesseling, Ἰσθμὸς Νοψάρης.) In the civil wars Norbanus espoused the Marian party, and was consul in B. C. 83 with Scipio Asiaticus. In this year Sulla crossed over from Greece to Italy, and marched from Brundisium into Campania, where Norbanus was waiting for him, on the Volturnus at the foot of Mount Tifata, not far from Capua. Sulla at first sent deputies to Norbanus under the pretext of treating respecting a peace, but evidently with the design of tampering with his troops; but they could not effect their purpose, and returned to Sulla after being insulted and maltreated by the other side. Thereupon a general engagement ensued, the issue of which was not long doubtful; the raw levies of Norbanus were unable to resist the first charge of Sulla's veterans, and fled in all directions, and it was not till they reached the walls of Capua that Norbanus was able to rally them again. Six or seven thousand of his men fell in this battle, while Sulla's loss is said to have been only seventy. Appian, contrary to all the other authorities, places this battle near Canusium in Apulia, but it is not improbable, as Drumann has conjectured (Geschichte Roms, vol. ii. p. 459), that he wrote Casilinum, a town on the Volturnus. In the following year, B. C. 82, Norbanus joined the consul Carbo in Cisalpine Gaul, but their united forces were entirely defeated by Metellus Pius. [METELLUS, No. 19.] This may be said to have given the death-blow to the Marian party in Italy. Desertion from their ranks rapidly followed, and Albinovanus, who had been entrusted with the command of Ariminum, invited Norbanus and his principal officers to a banquet. Norbanus suspected treachery, and declined the invitation; the rest accepted it and were murdered. Norbanus succeeded in making his escape from Italy, and fled to Rhodes; but his person having been demanded by Sulla, he killed himself in the middle of the market-place, while the Rhodians were consulting whether they should obey the commands of the dictator. (Appian, B. C. i. 82, 84, 86, 91; Liv. Epit. 85; Vell. Pat. ii. 25; Plut. Sull. 27; Oros. v. 20; Flor. iii. 21. § 18.)

2. NORBANUS FLACCUS. [FLACCUS.]

3. APPIUS NORBANUS, who defeated Antonius in the reign of Domitian, is more usually called Appius Maximus. [MAXIMUS, p. 986, b.]

4. NORBANUS, praefectus praetorio under Domitian, was privy to the death of that emperor. (Dion Cass. lxxvii. 15.)

5. NORBANUS LUCINIANUS, one of the infamous servants of Domitian, was banished (relegatus) in the reign of Trajan. (Plin. Ep. iii. 9.)

6. NORBANUS, banished by Commodus. (Lamprid. Commod. 4.)

NOTIA or NURTIA, an Etruscan divinity, who was worshipped at Volturni, where a nail was driven every year into the wall of her temple, for the purpose of marking the number of years. (Liv. vii. 3; Juvenal. x. 74.) [L. S.]

NOSSIS, a Greek poetess, of Locri in Southern Italy, lived about B. C. 310, and is the author of twelve epigrams of considerable beauty, extant in the Greek Anthology. From these we learn that her mother's name was Theuphila, and that she had a daughter called Melinna. Three of her epigrams were published for the first time by Bentley; and the whole twelve are given by J. C. Wolf, Poetiarum octo Fragm. &c., Hamb. 1734, by A. Schneider, Poetiarum Graec. Fragm. Giessae, 1802, by Brunck, Anal. vet. Poet. Gr. vol. i., and by Jacobs, Anth. Graec. vol. i. (Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vol. ii. p. 133; Bentley, Dissertation upon the Epistles of Phalaris, pp. 256, 257, Lond. 1777.)

NOTHIPPIUS, a tragic poet, with whom we are only acquainted through a fragment of the Morise of the comic poet Hermippus, who describes Nothippus as an enormous eater. (Athen. viii. p. 344, c. d.)

NOVATIANUS, according to Philostorgius, whose statement, however, has not been generally received with confidence, was a native of Phrygia. From the accounts given of his baptism, which his enemies alleged was irregularly administered in consequence of his having been prevented by sickness from receiving imposition of hands, it would appear that in early life he was a gentile; but the assertion found in many modern works that he was devoted to the stoic philosophy is not supported by the testimony of any ancient writer. There can be no doubt that he became a presbyter of the church at Rome, that he insisted upon the rigorous and perpetual exclusion of the Lapsi, the weak brethren who had fallen away from the faith under the terrors of persecution, and that upon the election of Cornelius [CORNELIUS], who advocated more charitable opinions, to the Roman see in June, A. D. 251, about sixteen months after the martyrdom of Fabianna, he disowned the authority of the new pontiff, was himself consecrated bishop by a rival party, was condemned by the council held in the autumn of the same year, and after a vain struggle to maintain his position was obliged to give way, and became the founder of a new sect, who from him derived the name of Novatians. We are told, moreover, that he was a man of unsocial, treacherous, and wolf-like disposition, that his ordination was performed by three simple illiterate prelates from an obscure corner of Italy, whom he gained to his purpose by a most disreputable artifice, that these poor men quickly perceived, confessed, and lamented their error, and that those persons who had at first espoused his cause quickly returned to their duty, leaving the schismatic almost alone. We must observe that these adverse representations proceed from his bitter enemy Cornelius, being contained in a long letter from that pope to Fabius, of Antioch, preserved in Eusebius, that they bear evident marks of personal rancour, and that they are contradicted by the circumstance that Novatianus was commissioned in 250 by the Roman clergy to write a letter in their name to Cyprian which is still extant, by the respect and popularity which he unquestionably enjoyed after his assumption of the episcopal dignity, even among those who did not recognise his authority, and by the fact that a numerous and devoted band of followers espousing his cause formed a separate communion, which spread over the whole Christian world, and flourished for more than two hundred years. The career of Novatianus, after the termination of his struggle with Cornelius, is unknown; but we are told by Sozomen (H. E. iv. 28) that he suffered death under Valerian; and from Pacianus, who flourished in the middle of the fourth century, we learn that the Novatians boasted that their founder was a martyr.

The original and distinguishing tenet of these heretics was, as we have indicated above, that no one who after baptism had, through dread of persecution or from any other cause, fallen away from the faith, could, however sincere his contrition, again be received into the bosom of the church, or entertain sure hope of salvation. It would appear that subsequently this rigorous exclusion was extended to all who had been guilty of any of the greater or mortal sins; and, if we can trust the expression of St. Ambrose (De Poen. iii. 3), Novatianus himself altogether rejected the efficacy of repentance, and denied that forgiveness could be granted to any sin, whether small or great. There can be no doubt that communion was refused to all great offenders, but we feel inclined to believe that Socrates (H. E. iv. 28) represents these opinions, as first promulgated, more fairly when he states, that Novatianus merely would not admit that the church had power to forgive and grant participation in her mysteries to great offenders, while at the same time he exhorted them to repentance, and referred their case directly to the decision of God—views which were likely to be extremely obnoxious to the orthodox priesthood, and might very readily be exaggerated and perverted by the intolerance of his own followers, who, full of spiritual pride, arrogated to themselves the title of Kathari, or Puritans, an epithet caught up and echoed in scorn by their antagonists.

It is necessary to remark that the individual who first proclaimed such doctrines was not Novatianus, but an African presbyter under Cyprian, named Novatus, who took a most active share in the disorders which followed the elevation of Cornelius. Hence, very naturally, much confusion has arisen between Novatus and Novatianus; and Lardner, with less than his usual accuracy, persists in considering them as one and the same, although the words of Jerome are perfectly explicit, distinguishing most clearly between “Novatianus Romanæ urbis presbyter” and “Novatus Cypriani presbyter.” Indeed, the tenth chapter of his Catalogue becomes quite unintelligible if we confound them.

Jerome informs us that Novatianus composed treatises De Pascha; De Sabbato; De Circumcisione; De Sacerdote; De Oratione; De Cibis Judaicis; De Instantia; De Attalo, and many others; together with a large volume De Trinitate, exhibiting in a compressed form the opinions of Tertullian on this mystery. Of all these the following only are now known to exist:—

I. De Trinitate u. De Regula Fidei, ascribed by some to Tertullian, by others to Cyprian, and inserted in many editions of their works. That it cannot belong to Tertullian is sufficiently proved by the style and by the mention made of the Sabelians, who did not exist in his time, while Jerome expressly declares that the volume De Trinitate was not the production of Cyprian, but of Novatianus. The piece before us, however, does not altogether answer his description, since it cannot be regarded as a mere transcript of the opinions of Tertullian, but is an independent exposition of the orthodox doctrine very distinctly embodied in pure language and animated style.

II. De Cibis Judaicis, written at the request of the Roman laity at a period when the author had, apparently, withdrawn from the fury of the Decian persecution (A. D. 249–257), probably towards the close of A. D. 250. If composed under these circumstances, as maintained by Jackson, it refutes in a most satisfactory manner the charges brought by Cornelius in reference to the conduct of Novatianus at this epoch. The author denies that the Mosaic ordinances, with regard to meats, are binding upon Christians, but strongly recommends moderation and strict abstinence from flesh offered to idols.

III. Epistolæ. Two letters, of which the first is certainly genuine, written A. D. 230, in the name of the Roman clergy to Cyprian, when a vacancy occurred in the papal see in consequence of the martyrdom of Fabianus, on the 13th of February, A. D. 250.

The two best editions of the collected works of Novatianus are those of Welchman (8vo. Oxon. 1724), and of Jackson (8vo. Lond. 1728). The latter is in every respect superior, presenting us with an excellent text, very useful prolegomena, notes and indices. The tracts De Trinitate and De Cibis Judaicis will be found in almost all editions of Tertullian from the Parisian impression of 1545 downwards. (Hieronym. de Viris Ill. 10; Philostorg. H. E. viii. 15; Euseb. H. E. vi. 43; Pacian. Ep. 3; Ambros. de Poen. iii. 3; Cyprian. Ep. 44, 45, 49, 50, 55, 68; Socrat. H. E. iv. 28, v. 22, and notes of Valesius; Sozomen. *H. NOVATUS. [NOVATIANUS].

NOVATUS, JUNIUS, published a libellous letter against Augustus under the name of Agrippa, but was punished only by a pecuniary fine. (Suet. Aug. 51.)

NOVELLIUS TORQUATUS. [TORQUATUS.]

NOVELLUS, ANTONIUS, was one of Otho's principal generals, but possessed no influence with the soldiery. (Tac. Hist. i. 87, ii. 12.)

NOVENSILES DII, are mentioned in the solemn prayer which the consul Decius repeated after the pontifex previous to his devoting himself to death for his country. (Liv. viii. 9.) Instead of Novensiles, we also find the form Novensides, whence we may infer that it is some compound of insides. The first word in this compound is said by some to be novus, and by others novem (Arnob. iii. 38, 39); and it is accordingly said that the Novensiles were nine gods, to whom Jupiter gave permission to hurl his lightnings. (Arnob. l. c.; Plin. H. N. ii. 52.) But this fact, though it may have applied to the Etruscan religion, nowhere appears in the religion of the Romans. We are therefore inclined to look upon Novensides as composed of novæ and insides, so that these gods would be the opposite of Indigetes, or old native divinities; that is, the Novensides are the gods who are newly or recently introduced at Rome, after the conquest of some place. For it was customary at Rome after the conquest of a neighbouring town to carry its gods to Rome, and there either to establish their worship in public, or to assign the care of it to some patrician family. This is the explanation of Cincius Alimentus (ap. Arnob. iii. 38, &c.), and seems to be quite satisfactory. [L. S.]

NOVIA GENS, plebeian, was of very little note. Persons of this name are first mentioned in the last century of the republic, but none of the Novii obtained the consulship till A. D. 78.

NOVIUS. 1. Q. NOVIUS, a celebrated writer of Atellan plays, was a contemporary of Pomponius, who wrote plays of the same kind, and of the dictator Sulla. (Macrob. Sat. i. 10; Gell. xv. 13.) The plays of Novius are frequently mentioned by Nonius Marcellus, and occasionally by the other grammarians. A list of the plays, and the fragments which are preserved, are given by Bothe. (Poët. Lat. Scenic. Fragmenta, vol. ii. p. 41, &c.)

2. L. NOVIUS, a colleague and enemy of P. Clodius in his tribunate, A. C. 58. A fragment of a speech of his is preserved by Asconius (in Cic. Mil. p. 47, Orelli).

NOX. [Nyx.]

NUCIUS, NIXANDER (Νικάνδρος Νοκίους), a native of Corcyra, born about the beginning of the sixteenth century, who was driven from his own country by various misfortunes, and took refuge at Venice. Here he was taken into the service of Gerard Veltuyckus, or Veltwick (with whom he had been previously acquainted), who was going as ambassador from the emperor Charles V. to the court of the Sultan Solymán, A. D. 1545. He accompanied him not only to Constantinople, but also over several other parts of Europe, and wrote an account of his travels, which is still extant, and contains much curious and interesting matter. There is a MS. of this work in the Bodleian library at Oxford (containing two books, but not quite perfect at the end), from which the second book has been edited in Greek with an English translation under the direction of Dr. Cramer, small 4to., 1841, London, printed for the Camden Society. In his introduction, Dr. Cramer has given a short analysis of the contents of the first book. There is another and more complete MS. of Nucius's Travels preserved in the Ambrosian library at Milan, consisting of three books, from which there was, some years ago, an intention on the part of one of the officers of the library of editing the work, but the writer is not aware that this intention has ever been put into execution (Compare Dr. Cramer's Introduction to his edition.) [W. A. G.]

NUMA MARCIUS. 1. The son of Marcus, is described in the legend of Numa Pompilius as the most intimate friend of that king. Marcius urged Numa to accept the Roman throne, accompanied him from his Sabine country to Rome, there became a member of the senate, and was chosen by his royal friend to be the first Pontifex Maximus, and the depository of all his religious and ecclesiastical enactments. It is related that Marcius aspired to the kingly dignity on the death of Pompilius, and that he starved himself to death on the election of Tullus Hostilius. (Plut. Num. 5, 6, 21; Liv. i. 20.)

2. The son of the preceding, is said to have married Pompilia, the daughter of Numa Pompilius, and to have become by her the father of Ancus Marcius. Numa Marcius was appointed by Tullus Hostilius prefectus urbi. (Plut. Num. 21, Coriol.; Tac. Ann. vi. 11.)

NUMA POMPILIUS, the second king of Rome. The legend of this king is so well told by Niebuhr (Hist. of Rome, vol. i. p. 237, &c.), from Livy and the ancient authorities, that we cannot do better than borrow his words. "On the death of Romulus the senate at first would not allow the election of a new king; every senator was to enjoy the royal power in rotation as interrex. In this way a year passed. The people, being treated more oppressively than before, were vehement in demanding the election of a sovereign to protect them. When the senate permitted it to be held, the Romans and Sabines disputed out of which nation the king should be taken. It was agreed that the former should choose him out of the latter; and all voices concurred in naming the wise and pious Numa Pompilius of Cures, who had married the daughter of Tatius.

"It was a very prevalent belief in antiquity that Numa had derived his knowledge from the Greek Pythagoras; Polybius and other writers attempted to show that this was impossible, for chronological reasons, inasmuch as Pythagoras did not come into Italy till the reign of Servius Tullius; but an impartial critic, who does not believe that the son of Mnesarchus was the only Pythagoras, or that there is any kind of necessity for placing Numa in the twentieth Olympiad, or, in fine, that the historical personality of Pythagoras is more certain than that of Numa, will be pleased with the old popular opinion, and will not sacrifice it to chronology.

"When Numa was assured by the auguries that the gods approved of his election, the first care of the pious king was turned, not to the rites of the temples, but to human institutions. He divided the lands which Romulus had conquered and had left open to occupancy. He founded the worship of Terminus. It was not till after he had done this that Numa set himself to legislate for religion. He was revered as the author of the Roman ceremonial law. Instructed by the Camena Egeria, who was espoused to him in a visible form, and who led him into the assemblies of her sisters in the sacred grove, he regulated the whole hierarchy; the pontiffs, who took care, by precept and by chastisement, that the laws relating to religion should be observed both by individuals and by the state; the augurs, whose calling it was to afford security for the councils of men by piercing into those of the gods; the flamens, who ministered in the temples of the supreme deities; the chaste virgins of Vesta; the Salii, who solemnised the worship of the gods with armed dances and songs. He prescribed the rites according to which the people might offer worship and prayer acceptable to the gods. To him were revealed the conjurations for compelling Jupiter himself to make known his will, by lightnings and the flight of birds; whereas others were forced to wait for these prodigies from the favour of the god, who was often silent to such as were doomed to destruction. This charm he learnt from Faunus and Picus, whom, by the advice of Egeria, he enticed and bound in chains, as Midas bound Silenus in the rose garden. From this pious prince the god brooked such boldness. At Numa's entreaty he exempted the people from the terrible duty of offering up human sacrifices. But when the audacious Tullus presumed to imitate his predecessor, he was killed by a flash of lightning during his conjurations in the temple of Jupiter Elicius. The thirty-nine years of Numa's reign, which glided away in quiet happiness, without any war or any calamity, afforded no legends but of such marvels. That nothing might break the peace of his days, the ancile fell from heaven, when the land was threatened with a pestilence, which disappeared as soon as Numa ordained the ceremonies of the Salii. Numa was not a theme of song, like Romulus; indeed he enjoined that, among all the Camenae, the highest honours should be paid to Tacita. Yet a story was handed down, that, when he was entertaining his guests, the plain food in the earthenware dishes were turned on the appearance of Egeria into a banquet fit for gods, in vessels of gold, in order that her divinity might be made manifest to the incredulous. The temple of Janus, his work, continued always shut: peace was spread over Italy; until Numa, like the darlings of the gods in the golden age, fell asleep, full of days. Egeria melted away in tears into a fountain."

The sacred books of Numa, in which he prescribed all the religious rites and ceremonies, were said to have been buried near him in a separate tomb, and to have been discovered by accident, five hundred years afterwards, by one Terentius, in the consulship of Cornelius and Baebius, B. C. 181. By Terentius they were carried to the city-prætor Petilius, and were found to consist of twelve or seven books, in Latin, on ecclesiastical law (de jure pontificum), and the same number of books in Greek on philosophy: the latter were burnt at the command of the senate, but the former were carefully preserved. The story of the discovery of these books is evidently a forgery; and the books, which were ascribed to Numa, and which were extant at a later time, were evidently nothing more than ancient works containing an account of the ceremonial of the Roman religion. (Plut. Numa; Liv. i. 18—21; Cic. de Rep. ii. 13—15; Dionys. ii. 58—66; Plin. H. N. xiii. 14. s. 27; Val. Max. i. 1. § 12; August. de Civ. Dei. vii. 34.)

It would be idle to inquire into the historical reality of Numa. Whether such a person ever existed or not, we cannot look upon the second king of Rome as a real historical personage. His name represents the rule of law and order, and to him are ascribed all those ecclesiastical institutions which formed the basis of the ceremonial religion of the Romans. Some modern writers connect his name with the word νόμος, "law" (Hartung, Die Religion der Römer, vol. i. p. 216), but this is mere fancy. It would be impossible to enter into a history of the various institutions of this king, without discussing the whole ecclesiastical system of the Romans, a subject which would be foreign to this work. We would only remark, that the universal tradition of the Sabine origin of Numa intimates that the Romans must have derived a great portion of their religious system from the Sabines, rather than from the Etruscans, as is commonly believed.

NUMENIUS (Νουμηνίος), of Apameia in Syria, a Pythagorean-Platonic philosopher, who was highly esteemed by Plotinus and his school, as well as by Origen. (Porphyr. Vit. Plot. 2, 17; Suid. s. v. Νουμηνίος, Νουμηνίος.) He and Cronius, a man of a kindred mind and a contemporary, who is often spoken of along with him (Porphyr. De Ant. Nymph. p. 121 ed. Holsten.), probably belonged to the age of the Antonines. He is mentioned not only by Porphyrius, but also by Clemens of Alexandria and Origen. Statements and fragments of his apparently very numerous works have been preserved by Origen, Theodoret, and especially by Eusebius, and from them we may with tolerable accuracy learn the peculiar tendency of this new Platonico-Pythagorean philosophy, and its approximation to the doctrines of Plato. Numenius is almost invariably designated as a Pythagorean, but his object was to trace the doctrines of Plato up to Pythagoras, and at the same time to show that they were not at variance with the dogmas and mysteries of the Brahmins, Jews, Magi and Egyptians. (See the Fragm. of the 1st book Περὶ τὰ ἀγαθὰ, ap. Euseb. Praep. Evang. ix. 7.) Numenius called Plato "the Atticising Moses," probably on the supposition of some historical connexion between them. (Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 342; Euseb. Praep. Evang. xi. 10. p. 527; Suid. s. v.) In several of his works, therefore, he had based his remarks on passages from the books of Moses, and he had explained one passage about the life of our Saviour, though without mentioning him in a figurative sense. (Orig. adv. Cels. iv. p. 198, &c. Spenc.; comp. i. p. 13; Porphy. De Ant. Nymph. p. 111, &c.) He had also endeavoured to inquire into the hidden meaning of the Egyptian, perhaps also of Greek mythology. (See his explanation of Serapis ap. Orig. Ibid. v. p. 258; Fr. ἐκ τοῦ περὶ τῶν παρὰ Πλάτωνα ἀπορρήτων, ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiii. 5.) His intention was to restore the philosophy of Plato, the genuine Pythagorean and mediator between Socrates and Pythagoras (neither of whom he prefers to the other) in its original purity, cleared from the Aristotelian and Zenonian or Stoic doctrines, and purified from the unsatisfactory and perverse explanations, which he said were found even in Speusippus and Xenocrates, and which, through the influence of Arcesilas and Carneades, i. e. in the second and third Academy, had led to a bottomless scepticism. (See especially Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiv. 5.) His work on the apostasy of the Academy from Plato (Περὶ τῆς τῶν Ἀκαδημαϊκῶν πρὸς Πλάτωνα διαστάσεως), to judge from its rather numerous fragments (ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xiv. 5—9), contained a minute and wearisome account of the outward circumstances of those men, and was full of fabulous tales about their lives, without entering into the nature of their scepticism. His books Περὶ τὰ ἀγαθὰ seem to have been of a better kind; in them he had minutely explained, mainly in opposition to the Stoics, that existence could neither be found in the elements because they were in a perpetual state of change and transition, nor in matter because it is vague, inconstant, lifeless, and in itself not an object of our knowledge; and that, on the contrary, existence, in order to resist the annihilation and decay of matter, must itself rather be incorporeal and removed from all mutability (Frag. ap. Euseb. Praep. Ev. xv. 17), in eternal presence, without being subject to the variation of time, simple and imperturbable in its nature by its own will as well as by influence from without. (Ib. xi. 10.) True existence, according to him, is identical with the first god existing in and by himself, that is, with good (τὸ ἀγαθόν), and is defined as spirit (πνεῦμα, ib. xi. 18, ix. 22). But as the first (absolute) god existing in himself and being undisturbed in his motion, could not be creative (δημιουργός), he thought that we must assume a second god, who keeps matter together, directs his energy to it and to intelligible essences, and imparts his spirit to all creatures; his mind is directed to the first god, in whom he beholds the ideas according to which he arranges the world harmoniously, being seized with a desire to create the world. The first god communicates his ideas to the second, without losing them himself, just as we communicate knowledge to one another, without depriving ourselves of it. (Ibid. xi. 18.) In regard to the relation existing between the third and second god, and to the manner in which they also are to be conceived as one (probably in opposition to the vague duration of matter), no information can be derived from the fragments which have come down to us. [Ch. A. B.]

NUMENIUS (Νουμήνιος). 1. A sceptical philosopher, and a pupil of Pyrrhon, must be distinguished from Numenius of Apameia. (Diog. Laërt. ix. 68, 102, 114.)

2. A rhetorician, who lived in the reign of Hadrian, to whom he addressed a consolatory discourse (παρηγορητικόν) on the death of Antinous. He also wrote Περὶ τῶν τῆς Ἀλέξανδρου ὁμήρων, Χρειῶν συναγωγῆς, and arguments (ὁρθότατος) to the works of Thucydides and Demosthenes. (Suid. s. v. and Eudoxia.) He was the father of the rhetorician Alexander, who is hence frequently called Alexander Numenius. [See Vol. I. p. 123, a.]

NUMENIUS (Νουμήνιος), a medical writer, quoted by Celsus (v. 18. § 35, 21. § 4, pp. 88, 92) and Aëtius (iv. 1. § 20, p. 621, in which passage for Numius we should read Numenius). He is, perhaps, the native of Heracleia, who was a pupil of Dieuches, and lived probably in the fourth or third century B. C. (Athen. i. p. 5.) He wrote a poem on fishing, Ἀλιευτικά, which is frequently quoted by Athenæus. A person of the same name, who wrote on venomous animals, Θηριακά, is quoted by the Scholiast on Nicander. (Fabric. Bibl. Gr. vol. ii. p. 627, ed. vet.) [W. A. G.]

NUMERIA, the goddess. [NUMERIUS.]

NUMERIA'NUS, M. AURELIUS, the younger of the two sons of the emperor Carus, and his companion in the expedition against the Persians, undertaken in A. D. 283. After the death of his father, which happened in the following year, he was, without opposition, acknowledged as joint emperor with his brother Carinus. The idle fears of the army compelled him to abandon all hopes of prosecuting a campaign commenced with so much glory, and of extending the conquests already achieved. For terrified by the mysterious fate of Carus [CARUS], which they regarded as a direct manifestation of the wrath of heaven, and an evident fulfilment of the ancient prophecy which fixed the river Tigris as the limit of the Roman sway, the soldiers refused to advance. Yielding to their superstitious terrors, Numerianus commenced a retreat in the very hour of victory, and slowly retraced his steps towards the Thracian Bosphorus. During the greater part of the march, which lasted for eight months, he was duly confined to his litter by an affection of the eyes, induced, it is said, by excessive weeping. After this seclusion had continued for a considerable period, dark reports began to circulate, and the excitement increasing by degrees, at length became so fierce that the soldiers forced their way into the Imperial tent, and discovered the dead body of their prince. The concealment practised by Arius Aper, prefect of the praetorians, father-in-law of the deceased, and who had lately acted as his representative, gave rise to the worst suspicions. He was publicly arraigned of the murder in a military council, held at Chalcedon, and, without being permitted to speak in his own defence, was stabbed to the heart by Diocletian, whom the troops had already proclaimed emperor, and who on this occasion acted with a degree of hasty violence strangely at variance with the calmness of his well-regulated mind. [DIOCLETIANUS.]

The Augustan historian represents Numerianus as a prince remarkable alike for moral and intellectual excellence. He gained universal love and admiration by gentleness of temper, affability of address, and purity of life, while at the same time he bore away the palm in eloquence and poetry from all his contemporaries—virtues and accomplishments which shone the more conspicuous and bright when contrasted with the brutal profligacy and savage cruelty of his brother and colleague Carinus [CARINUS]. (Vopisc. Numerian.; Aur. Vict. Epit. 38, de Cæs. 38; Eutrop. ix. 12; Zonar. xii. 30.) [W. R.]

COIN OF NUMERIANUS.

NUMERIUS, a praenomen among the Romans of rather rare occurrence. Hence the copyists of manuscripts frequently changed N., its contracted form, into M. Varro says that this praenomen was given to those who were born quickly; and that women in childbirth were accustomed to pray to a goddess Numeria, who must have been a deity of some importance, as the pontifex mentioned her in the ancient prayers (Var. Frags. p. 319, Bipont.; comp. Hartang, Die Religion der Römer, vol. ii. p. 240). As a Roman praenomen the feminine Numeria could not be used any more than Marica (Varr. L. L. ix. 55, ed. Müller). Festus relates that Numerius was never used as a praenomen by any patrician house, till the Fabius, who alone survived after the six and thirty had been slaughtered by the Etruscans, married the wealthy daughter of Otacilius Maleventanus, on the condition that the first child should receive the praenomen of its maternal grandfather, Numerius. (Festus, p. 171, ed. Müller.)

Numerius also occurs as the gentile name of a few persons:—

1. NUMERIUS, one of the friends of Marius, provided a vessel for him at Ostia, when he was proscribed by Sulla in B. C. 88 (Plut. Mar. 35). Numerius, however, is probably only the praenomen of the friend of Marius.

2. Q. NUMERIUS RUFUS, tribune of the plebs, B. C. 57. [RUFUS.]

3. NUMERIUS ATTICUS. [ATTICUS.]

NUMESTIUS, NUMERIUS, was received by Cicero among his friends, upon the recommendation of Atticus. (Cic. ad Att. ii. 20, 22, 24.)

NUMICIA GENS, an ancient patrician house, a member of which, T. Numicius Priscus, obtained the consulship as early as B. C. 469. PRINCEPS is the only cognomen in this gens.

NUMICIUS. 1. TI. NUMICIUS, tribune of the plebs, a. c. 320, was with his colleague, Q. Maelius, given over to the Samnites, when the Romans resolved not to adhere to the peace made at Candium. Livy calls the colleague of Maelius, L. Julius and not Numicius (Cic. de Off. iii. 30; Liv. ix. 8). For further details, see MÆLIUS, No. 3.

2. NUMICIUS, to whom Horace addresses the sixth epistle of his first book, is otherwise a person quite unknown.

NUMIDA, M. AEMILIUS, was decemvir sacrorum, and died in a. c. 211. (Liv. xxvi. 23.)

NUMIDA, PLOTIUS, a friend of Horace, who addresses to him one of his odes (i. 36), to celebrate his safe arrival in Italy, after undergoing the perils of the war against the Cantabri in Spain.

NUMIDICUS, the agnomen of Q. Metellus, who fought against Jugurtha. [METELLUS, No. 14.]

NUMIDIUS QUADRATUS. [QUADRATUS.]

NUMISIA GENS, is probably merely another orthography of Numicia Gens. [NUMICIA GENS.] In the time of the republic we find no Numisii with a cognomen [NUMISIUS], but under the empire persons of this name occur, with the cognomens of LUPUS and RUPUS.

NUMISIANUS (Νουμισιανός), written also Νουμισιανός, Νουμισιανός, or Νουμισιανός, but more frequently in the first of these forms), an eminent physician at Corinth, whose lectures Galen attended about a. d. 150, having gone to Corinth for that express purpose (Galen, de Anat. Adm. i. 1, vol. ii. p. 217). He was, according to Galen (l. c.), the most celebrated of all the pupils of Quintus, and one of the tutors to Pelops (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Nat. Hom." ii. 6, vol. xv. p. 136), and distinguished himself especially by his anatomical knowledge. He wrote a commentary on the "Aphorisms" of Hippocrates (id. Comment. in Hippocr. "De Humor." i. 24, vol. xvi. p. 197, Comment. in Hippocr. "Aphor." iv. 69, v. 44, vol. xvii. pt. ii. pp. 751, 837), which appears to have been well thought of in Galen's time. He is also mentioned by Galen, de Ord. Libror. suor. vol. xix. p. 57, and de Anat. Adm. viii. 2, vol. ii. p. 660, and bk. xiv. (in MS. Arabic translation in the Bodleian library). [W. A. G.]

NUMISIUS. 1. L. NUMISIUS of Circeii, was one of the two chief magistrates (praetores) of the Latins in a. c. 340, the year in which the great Latin war broke out, and which the principal commander in the war. (Liv. viii. 3, 11.)

2. C. NUMISIUS, praetor a. c. 177, obtained Sicily as his province. (Liv. xli. 8.)

3. T. NUMISIUS, of Tarquini, was one of the ten commissioners sent into Macedonia in a. c. 167, to regulate its affairs after its conquest by Aemilius Paulus (Liv. xlv. 17). About the same time, or a little earlier, he was at the head of the embassy sent by the Roman senate to endeavour to mediate between Antiochus Epiphanes and the two Ptolemies (Philometor and Physcon). (Polyb. xxix. 10.)

4. NUMISIUS, seems to have been the name of an architect, since Cicero speaks of Numisiana forma, that is, the plan of a house or villa designed by one Numisius. (Cic. ad Q. Fr. ii. 2. § 1.)

5. NUMISIUS TIRO, is branded by Cicero as one of the cut-throats of M. Antonius, the triumvir. (Cic. Phil. ii. 4, v. 6, xii. 6.)

NUMISIUS, the architect of the theatre at

Herculaneum. His name is preserved in an inscription on the building. [P. S.]

NUMITOR. [ROMULUS.]

NUMITORIA. 1. The mother of Virginia. (Dionys. xi. 30.) [NUMITORIUS, No. 2.]

2. The wife of M. Antonius Creticus, praetor a. c. 75, was the daughter of Q. Numitorius Pullus, who betrayed Fregellae. [NUMITORIUS, No. 3.] She left no children. (Cic. Phil. iii. 6.)

NUMITORIA GENS, plebeian, was of considerable antiquity, but none of its members ever attained any of the higher offices of the state. Pullus is the only cognomen which occurs in this gens. The annexed coin belongs to this gens, but it is quite uncertain to whom it refers.

COIN OF NUMITORIA GENS.

NUMITORIUS. 1. L. NUMITORIUS, is mentioned as one of the five tribunes who were first elected in the comitia tributa, a. c. 472 (Liv. ii. 58).

2. P. NUMITORIUS, the maternal uncle of Virginia, attempted to resist the iniquitous sentence of the decemvir App. Claudius, and was elected tribune of the plebs upon the expulsion of the decemvir, a. c. 449. In his tribunate he accused Sp. Oppius, one of the late decemvirs. (Liv. iii. 45, 54; Dionys. xi. 28, 38, 46.)

3. Q. NUMITORIUS PULLUS, of Fregellae, betrayed his native town to the Roman praetor L. Opimius, a. c. 125, when it rose in revolt to obtain the Roman franchise. The town was taken and destroyed by Opimius (Cic. de Invent. ii. 34; comp. Cic. de Leg. Agr. ii. 33; Liv. Epit. 60; Vell. Pat. ii. 6). The daughter of this Numitorius married M. Antonius Creticus. [NUMITORIA, No. 2.]

4. C. NUMITORIUS, was a distinguished man of the aristocratical party, who was put to death by Marius and Cinna, when they entered Rome at the close of a. c. 88. His body was afterwards dragged through the forum by the executioner's hook. (Appian, B. C. i. 72; Flor. iii. 21. § 14.)

5. C. NUMITORIUS, a Roman equest, who was a witness against Verres. (Cic. Verr. v. 63.)

NUMMIUS, is a name which occurs only in the Fasti and inscriptions of the time of the empire. Thus we find a T. Rusticus Nummius Gallus, consul suffectus, a. d. 26, a Nummius Sisenna, consul a. d. 133, and a M. Nummius Albinus, consul a. d. 206.

NUMONIUS VALA. [VALA.]

NYCTEIS (Νυκτῆις), a feminine patronymic of Nycteus, and applied to his daughter Antiope, the wife of Polydorus and mother of Labdacus. (Apollod. iii. 5. § 5; NYCTEUS.) [L. S.]

NYCTEUS (Νυκτῆς), a son of Hyrieus by the nymph Clonia, brother of Lycus and Orion, and husband of Polyxo, by whom he became the father of Antiope. (Apollod. iii. 10. § 1; Anton. Lib. 25.) According to others Antiope was the daughter of the river-god Asopus. (Apollod. l. c.; Hom. Od. xi. 259, &c.) Antiope was carried off by Epepeus, king of Aegialeia; and Nycteus, who, as the guardian of Labdacus, was staying at Thebes, took revenge by invading with a Theban army the territory of Sicily: but he was defeated; and being severely wounded, he was carried back to Thebes, where, previous to his death, he appointed his brother Lycus guardian of Labdacus, and at the same time demanded of him as a duty to take vengeance on Epopeus. But the latter died before Lycus could fulfil his promise. (Paus. ii. 6. § 2; Hygin. Fab. 7, 8.) When Labdacus had grown up, Lycus surrendered the government to him; but as Labdacus died soon after, Lycus again became the guardian of his son, Laius, but was expelled by his own great-nephews, Amphion and Zethus. (Paus. ix. 5. § 2; Eurip. Her. Fur. 27.) A very different account is found in Apollodorus (iii. 5. § 5), for according to it, Nycteus and Lycus were the sons of Chthonius, and were obliged to quit their country on account of the murder of Phlegyas. They then settled at Hyria; but Lycus was chosen commander by the Thebans, and usurped the government which belonged to Laius, and in which he maintained himself for twenty years, until he was slain by Amphion and Zethus. Nycteus made away with himself in despair, because his daughter, who was with child by Zeus, fled to Epopeus at Sicily; but before he died, he commissioned Lycus to take vengeance on Epopeus. Lycus promised, and kept his word, for he slew Epopeus, and kept Antiope as his prisoner. According to Hyginus (Fab. 157), Nycteus and Lycus were the sons of Poseidon and Celaeno. (Völcker, Mythol. des Japet. Geschlechts, p. 116.) [L. S.]

NYCTIMENĒ, a daughter of Epopeus, king of Lesbos, or, according to others, of Nycteus. Pursued and dishonoured by her amorous father, she concealed herself in the shade of forests, where she was metamorphosed by Athena into an owl. (Hygin. Fab. 204; Or. Met. ii. 590; Lutat. ad Stat. Theb. iii. 507; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. i. 403.) [L. S.]

NYMPHAE (Νύμφαι), the name of a numerous class of inferior female divinities, though they are designated by the title of Olympian, are called to the meetings of the gods in Olympus, and described as the daughters of Zeus. But they were believed to dwell on earth in groves, on the summits of mountains, in rivers, streams, glens, and grottoes. (Hom. Od. vi. 123, &c., xii. 318, Il. xx. 8, xxiv. 615.) Homer further describes them as presiding over game, accompanying Artemis, dancing with her, weaving in their grottoes purple garments, and kindly watching over the fate of mortals. (Od. vi. 105, ix. 154, xiii. 107, 356, xvii. 243, Il. vi. 420, xxiv. 616.) Men offer up sacrifices either to them alone, or in conjunction with other gods, such as Hermes. (Od. xiii. 350, xvii. 211, 240, xiv. 435.) From the places which they inhabit, they are called ἀγρονόμοι (Od. vi. 105), ὄρεσιβάδες (Il. vi. 420), and ρυήδες (Od. xiii. 104).

All nymphs, whose number is almost infinite, may be divided into two great classes. The first class embraces those who must be regarded as a kind of inferior divinities, recognised in the worship of nature. The early Greeks saw in all the phenomena of ordinary nature some manifestation of the deity; springs, rivers, grottoes, trees, and mountains, all seemed to them fraught with life; and all were only the visible embodiments of so many divine agents. The salutary and beneficent powers of nature were thus personified, and regarded as so many divinities; and the sensations produced on man in the contemplation of nature, such as awe, terror, joy, delight, were ascribed to the agency of the various divinities of nature. The second class of nymphs are personifications of tribes, races, and states, such as Cyrene, and many others.

The nymphs of the first class must again be subdivided into various species, according to the different parts of nature of which they are the representatives. 1. Nymphs of the watery element. Here we first mention the nymphs of the ocean, Ἀκαιοῖναι or Ἀκαιοῖδες, νύμφαι ἁλίας, who are regarded as the daughters of Oceanus (Hea. Theog. 346, &c., 364; Aeschyl. Prom.; Callim. Hym. in Dian. 13; Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1414; Soph. Philoct. 1470); and next the nymphs of the Mediterranean or inner sea, who are regarded as the daughters of Nereus, whence they are called Nereides (Nηρηίδες; Hea. Theog. 240, &c.). The rivers were represented by the Potameides (Ποταμιίδες), who, as local divinities, were named after their rivers, as Acheloides, Anigrades, Ismenides, Amnisiades, Pactolides. (Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1219; Virg. Aen. viii. 70; Paus. v. 5. § 6, i. 31. § 2; Callim. Hym. in Dian. 15; Or. Met. vi. 16; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἀμνιάδες.) But the nymphs of fresh water, whether of rivers, lakes, brooks, or wells, are also designated by the general name Naiades, Ναϊίδες, though they have in addition their specific names, as Κρηναῖα, Πηγαῖα, Ἐλευσιόνοιοι, Λιμνατιίδες, or Λιμναίδες. (Hom. Od. xvii. 240; Apollon. Rhod. iii. 1219; Theocrit. v. 17; Orph. Hymn. 50. 6, Argon. 644.) Even the rivers of the lower regions are described as having their nymphs; hence, Nymphæ infernae paludis and Avernales. (Or. Met. v. 540, Fast. ii. 610.) Many of these presided over waters or springs which were believed to inspire those that drank of them, and hence the nymphs themselves were thought to be endowed with prophetic or oracular power, and to inspire men with the same, and to confer upon them the gift of poetry. (Paus. iv. 27. § 2, ix. 3. § 5, 34. § 3; Plut. Aristid. 11; Theocrit. vii. 92; comp. MUSAE.) Inspired soothsayers or priests are therefore sometimes called νυμφόληπτοι. (Plat. Phaedr. p. 421, c.) Their powers, however, vary with those of the springs over which they preside; some were thus regarded as having the power of restoring sick persons to health (Pind. Ol. xii. 26; Paus. v. 5. § 6, vi. 22. § 4); and as water is necessary to feed all vegetation as well as all living beings, the water nymphs (ἰδρυίδες) were also worshipped along with Dionysus and Demeter as giving life and blessings to all created beings, and this attribute is expressed by a variety of epithets, such as καρποτρέφοι, αἰολοκαί, νύμφαι, κοιροτρέφοι, &c. As their influence was thus exercised in all departments of nature, they frequently appear in connection with higher divinities, as, for example, with Apollo, the prophetic god and the protector of herds and flocks (Apollon. Rhod. iv. 1218); with Artemis, the huntress and the protectress of game, for she herself was originally an Arcadian nymph (Apollon. Rhod. i. 1225, iii. 881; Paus. iii. 10. § 8); with Hermes, the fructifying god of flocks (Hom. Hymn. in Aphrod. 262); with Dionysus (Orph. Hymn. 52; Horat. Carm. i. l. 31, ii. 12. 3); with Pan, the Seileni and Satyrs, whom they join in their Bacchic revels and dances.

2. Nymphs of mountains and grottoes, are called Ὀρειγενίδες or Ὀρεαίδες, but sometimes also by names derived from the particular mountains they inhabited, as Κιθαίωνες, Πηλίδες, Κορύκας, &c. (Theocrit. vii. 137; Virg. Æn. i. 168, 500; Pana. v. 8. § 6, ix. 8. § 5, x. 32. § 5; Apollon. Rhod. i. 550, ii. 711; Ov. Her. xx. 221; Virg. Eclog. vi. 56.)

3. Nymphs of forests, groves, and glens, were believed sometimes to appear to and frighten solitary travellers. They are designated by the names Ἄλυσσες, Ἰλαιοὶ, Ἀδωνίδες, and Ναῖαιαι. (Apollon. Rhod. i. 1066, 1227; Orph. Hymn. 50. 7; Theocrit. xiii. 44; Ov. Met. xv. 490; Virg. Georg. iv. 535.)

4. Nymphs of trees, were believed to die together with the trees which had been their abode, and with which they had come into existence. They were called Δρυίδες, Ἀμυρδρυίδες or Ἀδρυίδες, from δρῦς, which signifies not only an oak, but any wild-growing lofty tree; for the nymphs of fruit trees were called Μηλίδες, Μηλιδῶδες, Ἐπιμηλίδες, or Ἀμυμηλίδες. They seem to be of Arcadian origin, and never appear together with any of the great gods. (Paus. viii. 4. § 2; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 477, &c.; Anton. Lib. 31, 32; Hom. Hymn. in Ven. 259, &c.)

The second class of nymphs, who were connected with certain races or localities (Νύμφαι χθόνιαι, Apollon. Rhod. ii. 504), usually have a name derived from the places with which they are associated, as Nysiades, Dodonides, Lemniae. (Ov. Fast. iii. 769, Met. v. 412, ix. 651; Apollod. iii. 4. § 3; Schol. ad Pind. Ol. xiii. 74.)

The sacrifices offered to nymphs usually consisted of goats, lambs, milk, and oil, but never of wine. (Theocrit. v. 12, 53, 139, 149; Serv. ad Virg. Georg. iv. 380, Eclog. v. 74.) They were worshipped and honoured with sanctuaries in many parts of Greece, especially near springs, groves, and grottoes, as, for example, near a spring at Cyrtone (Pana. ix. 24. § 4), in Attica (i. 31. § 2), at Olympia (v. 15. § 4, vi. 22. § 4), at Megara (i. 40. § 1), between Sicyon and Phlius (ii. 11. § 3), and other places. Nymphs are represented in works of art as beautiful maidens, either quite naked or only half-covered. Later poets sometimes describe them as having sea-coloured hair. (Ov. Met. v. 432.) [L. S.]

NYMPHIDIANUS (Νυμφιδιανός), of Smyrna, a Neo-Platonist, lived in the time of the emperor Julian, and was the brother of Maximus and Claudianus. The emperor Julian, who was greatly attached to Maximus, made Nymphidianus his interpreter and Greek secretary, though he was more fit to write declamations and disputations than letters. He survived his brother Maximus, and died at an advanced age. (Eunap. Vit. Soph. p. 137.) [L. S.]

NYMPHIDIUS LUPUS, had served in the army, along with the younger Pliny, who warmly recommends his son to the emperor Trajan. (Plin. Ep. x. 19 or 56.)

NYMPHIDIUS SABINUS, was commander of the praetorian troops, together with Tigellinus, towards the latter end of Nero's reign. He took an active part in suppressing the conspiracy of Piso against Nero, A. D. 66, and was in consequence rewarded by the emperor with the consular insignia. His mother was a freed woman, who was accustomed to sell her favours to the servants of the imperial palace; and as Caligula did not disdain such intercourse, Nymphidius claimed that emperor for his father. On the death of Nero in A. D. 68, Nymphidius attempted to seize the throne, but was murdered by the friends of Galba. (Tac. Ann. xv. 72, Hist. i. 5, 25, 37; Plut. Galb. 8—15.)

NYMPHIS (Νύμφις), the son of Xenogoras, a native of the Pontic Heracleia, lived in the middle of the second century, B. C., and was a person of distinction in his native land, as well as an historical writer of some note. He was sent as ambassador to the Galatians to propitiate that people, when the inhabitants of Heracleia had offended them by assisting Mithridates, the son of Ariobarzanes, with whom the Galatians were at war. (Memnon, c. 24, ed. Orelli.) As Ariobarzanes was succeeded by this Mithridates about B. C. 240, we may refer the embassy to this year. (Clinton, F. H. sub anno.) Memnon likewise mentions (c. 11) a Nymphis, as one of the exiles in B. C. 281, when Seleucus, after the death of Lysimachus, threatened Heracleia; but notwithstanding the remark of Clinton (sub anno 281) the interval of forty-one years between the two events just mentioned, leads to the conclusion that the latter Nymphis was a different person from the historian, more especially as Memnon, in the former case, expressly distinguishes Nymphis by the epithet δ' Ιστορικός. Nymphis was the author of three works, which are referred to by the ancient writers:—

1. Περὶ Ἀλεξάνδρου καὶ τῶν Διαδόχων καὶ Ἐπ' ἑξ ὧν, concerning Alexander, his successors, and their descendants, in twenty-four books. This work ended at the accession of the third Ptolemy, B. C. 247. (Suid. s. v. Νόμης; Aelian, H. N. xvii. 3.)

2. Περὶ Ἡρακλείας, in thirteen books, gave the history of his native city to the overthrow of the tyrants in B. C. 281. (Suid. l. c.; Athen. xii. pp. 536, a. 549, a. xiv. p. 619, e.; Schol. ad Apoll. Rhod. ii. 650, 729, 752, iv. 247; Steph. Byz. s. v. Ἰνδός, Φρίξος; Plut. Moral. p. 248, d.; Schol. ad Aristoph. Av. 874.)

3. Περὶ Πύλου Ἀκτίας. (Athen. xiii. p. 596, e.) The fragments of Nymphis are collected by J. C. Orelli, in his edition of Memnon, Leipzig, 1816, pp. 95—102. (Voss. de Hist. Graecis. p. 140, ed. Westermann; Clinton, F. H. vol. iii. p. 510.)

NYMPHIUS, an Italian Greek, one of the chief men of Palaeopolis, who, together with Charilaüs, betrayed the town to Q. Publilius Philo, the Roman proconsul, in the second Samnite war (B. C. 323), and drove out the Roman garrison. (Liv. viii. 25, 26.)

NYMPHODORUS (Νυμφόδορος), a citizen of Abdera, whose sister married Sitalces, king of Thrace. The Athenians, who had previously regarded Nymphodorus as their enemy, made him their proxenus in B. C. 431, and, through his mediation, obtained the alliance of Sitalces, for which they were anxious, and conferred the freedom of their city on Sadocus, Sitalces' son. Nymphodorus also brought about a reconciliation between the Athenians and Perdiccas, king of Macedonia, and persuaded them to restore to him the town of Therna, which they had taken in B. C. 432 (see Thuc. i. 61). In B. C. 430 Nymphodorus aided in the seizure, at Bisanthe, of Anaxerxes and the other ambassadors, who were on their way to ask aid of the Persian king against the Athenians. (Herod. vii. 137; Thuc. ii. 29, 67; comp. Arist. Act. 145.) [E. E.]

which he lived is unknown, but he was the author of a work entitled Nóμμα 'Aσίας, that is, the Laws or Customs of Asia, of which the third book is mentioned by Clemens of Alexandria (Strom. i. p. 139; comp. Protrept. 19), who quotes from it a passage concerning some Egyptian customs. In the second of the passages here cited Clemens calls the work Nόμμα Βαβυλωνία, but there can be no doubt that it was the same production as the Nόμμα 'Aσίας. Sometimes it is referred to under the brief title of Nόμος. (Schol. ad Apollon. Rhod. ii. 1010, 1031, iii. 202, iv. 1470.) The Scholiast on Sophocles (Oed. Col. 337) quotes the thirteenth book of this work; but the whole is lost, and only a very few fragments have been transmitted to us.

2. Of Syracuse, likewise an historian, seems to have lived about the time of Philip and Alexander the Great of Macedonia. He was the author of a work entitled 'Aσίας Περίπλους (Athen. vi. p. 265, vii. p. 321, xiii. p. 609), and of a second entitled Περὶ τῶν ἐν Σικελίᾳ θαυμασμάτων (Athen. i. p. 19, xiii. p. 588), which is sometimes simply referred to by the title Περὶ Σικελίας. (Athen. viii. p. 831, x. p. 452; Schol. ad Theocr. i. 69, v. 15, ad Hom. Od. μ. 301, where, instead of Μεμφίδωρος, we should read Νυμφόδορος; comp. Aelian, H. A. xi. 20.) Aelian (H. A. xvi. 34) quotes a statement from Nymphodorus relating to the use the Sardinians made of goat-skins, and from which it might be inferred that he also wrote on Sardinia, but this may have been a mere digression introduced into his work on Sicily. (Plin. Elench. libb. iii. v. vii. xxxiii. xxxiv. xxxv.; Tertull. De As. 57; Steph. Byz. s. v. 'Αθύρας; Harpocrat., Hesych. s. v. αθύρας; comp. Ebert, Dissert. Sioul. pp. 155—222.) [L. S.]

NYMPHODORUS (Νυμφόδορος), a Greek physician, who must have lived in or before the third century a. c., as he is mentioned by Heraclides of Tarentum (ap. Galen, Comment. in Hippocr. "De Artic." iv. 40, vol. xviii. pt. i. p. 736). He was celebrated for the invention of a machine for the reduction of dislocations, called γλωσσοκόμην, which was afterwards somewhat modified by Aristion, and of which a description is given by Oribasius (de Machinam. c. 24, p. 179, &c.). He is mentioned by Celsus along with several other eminent surgeons (viii. 20, p. 185), and is perhaps the person quoted by Pliny in the passages referred to in the preceding article.

Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. xiii. p. 351, 352, ed. vet.) and Haller (Bibl. Chirurg. and Bibl. Med. Pract.) suppose him to be the same person as Nymphodotus (Νυμφόδοτος), whose medical formulæ are quoted by Andromachus (ap. Galen, de Compos. Medicam. ecc. Gen. vi. 14, vol. xiii. p. 926), Aëtius (iii. l. §§ 45, 49, pp. 500, 504, 505, 506), and Paulus Aegineta (vii. 12, p. 665), and who must have lived in or before the first century after Christ; but this is quite uncertain. [V. A. G.]

NYMPHODOTUS. [NYMPHODORUS.]

NYPSIUS (Νύψιος), a native of Neapolis, and a brave and skilful officer, who was sent by the younger Dionysius to the relief of the citadel at Syracuse, which was besieged by the Syracusans under Dion. He arrived just in time to prevent the garrison from surrendering the citadel, and, by a sudden sally in the night, defeated the Syracusans with great slaughter; but the next day, Dion having returned to the city, Nypsius was defeated in his turn, and once more shut up within the citadel. (Diod. xvi. 18—20; Plut. Dion. 41—46.) [E. H. B.]

NYSA (Νύσα), a daughter of Aristaeus, who was believed to have brought up the infant god Dionysus, and from whom one of the many towns of the name of Nysa was believed to have derived its name. (Diod. iii. 69.) [L. S.]

NYSA or NYSSA (Νύσα or Νύσσα). 1. Queen of Bithynia, wife of Nicomedes II., and mother of Nicomedes III. (Memnon, c. 30.) She is generally considered to have been originally a dancer, because Nicomedes III. is termed, by his rival Mithridates, "saltatrix filius" (Justin xxxviii. 5); but it is more probable that the latter by such an expression meant to stigmatise Nicomedes as illegitimate, though he was in reality the son of Nysa.

2. Wife of Nicomedes III. Mithridates pretended that she was the mother of the impostor whom he set up as a claimant to the throne of Bithynia, a. c. 74. (Mithr. Ep. ad Arsac. ap. Sall. Hist. iv. p. 239, ed. Gerlach.)

3. A daughter of Nicomedes III., whose cause was defended by J. Caesar, in gratitude for her father's friendship. (Suet. Caes. 49.)

4. A sister of Mithridates the Great, who was taken prisoner by Lucullus at Cabeira, which saved her from sharing the fate of the other sisters and wives of the king, who were put to death shortly after at Pharnacia. (Plut. Lucull. 18.)

5. A daughter of Mithridates the Great, who had been betrothed to the king of Cyprus, but accompanied her father in his flight to the kingdom of Bosphorus, where she ultimately shared his fate, and put an end to her life by poison, a. c. 63. (Appian, Mithr. 111.) [E. H. B.]

NYSAEUS, NY'SIUS, NYSEUS, or NYSL'GENA (Νυσάιος), a surname of Dionysus, derived from Nysa, a mountain or city, either in Thracæ, Arabia, or India, where he was said to have been brought up by nymphs. According to some, it was derived from Nisus, who is said to have been his father, or at least to have educated him. (Hom. Il. vi. 133, Hymn. xxv. 5; Apollon. Rhod. ii. 905, iv. 431; Diod. i. 15, iii. 68; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 23; Virg. Aen. vi. 806; Ov. Met. iv. 13.) [L. S.]

NYSAEUS (Νυσάιος), son of the elder Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, by his wife Aristomache, the daughter of Hipparchus. (Diod. xvi. 6.) We know nothing of the steps by which he rose to the supreme power at Syracuse; but it seems probable that he succeeded his brother Hipparchus in the sovereignty, which he held until a. c. 346, when he was expelled by his half-brother, the younger Dionysius. (Plut. Timol. 1.) He was chiefly remarkable for his love of drinking and his immoderate addiction to gross sensual indulgence. (Theopomp. ap. Athen. x. pp. 435, 436; Aelian, V. H. ii. 41.) [E. H. B.]

NYSEIDES or NYSLADES (Νύσαις), the nymphs of Nysa, who are said to have reared Dionysus, and whose names are Cisseis, Nysa, Erato, Eriphia, Bromia, and Polyhymno. (Hygin. Fab. 182, Poet. Astr. ii. 21; Apollod. iii. 4. § 3; Ov. Met. iii. 314, Fast. iii. 769; Orph. Hymn. 50. 14; Schol. ad Hom. Il. xviii. 486.) [L. S.]

NYX (Νύξ), Nox or Night personified. Homer (Il. xiv. 259, &c.) calls her the subduer of gods and men, and relates that Zeus himself stood in awe of her. In the ancient cosmogonies Night is as the very first created beings, for she is descended as the daughter of Chaos, and the sister of Nyx, by whom she became the mother of Aether and Hemera. (Hes. Theog. 123, &c.) According to Orphic (Orphica Argon. 14) she was the daughter of Nyx. She is further said, without any husband, have given birth to Moros, the Keres, Thanatos, Hypnos, Dreams, Momus, Oizys, the Hesperides, Nemesis, and similar beings. (Hes. Theog.

 &c.; Cic. de Nat. Deor. iii. 17.) In later times, with whom she is merely the personification of the darkness of night, she is sometimes described as a winged goddess (Eurip. Orest. 176), and sometimes as riding in a chariot, covered with a dark garment and accompanied by the stars in her course. (Eurip. Ion. 1150; Theocrit. ii. in fin.; Orph. Hymn. 2. 7; Virg. Aen. v. 721; Tibull. ii.

 1. 87; Val. Flacc. iii. 211.) Her residence was in the darkness of Hades. (Hes. Theog. 748; Eurip. Orest. 175; Virg. Aen. vi. 390.) A statue of Night, the work of Rhoeus, existed at Ephesus (Paus. x. 38. § 3). On the chest of Cypselus she was represented carrying in her arms the gods of Sleep and Death, as two boys (v. 18. § 1). [L. S.]
